Thus did things reſt, until the Prince Abradates loſt a great friend, and maintainer, of the illuſtrious Cleander, who as you are not ignorant was arreſted as a Priſoner. This accident raiſed a greater diſorder in the Court than I know how to expreſs, for there was not one (except Mexaris, who looking upon him as the Protector of Abradates, was glad of his diſgrace) who had not eyes full of tears, and who did not accuſe Crœſſus of much precipitation and injuſtice, for ſuſpecting him upon ſuch ſlight ſurmiſes, a man who had made him a Debtor for ſo many Victories: But the tears for Cleander were no ſooner dried, but all eyes were ſwelled again with new ones for the Princeſs Palmis, who was alſo arreſted, and carried to Epheſus amongſt the profeſſed Votaries. After all this, Mexaris began to huff, aud look big, with more authority than uſual; and Crœſſus knew very well that Cleander, whom he would not acknowledg for the Prince Artamas, was very ſerviceable unto him, to make all the Grandees of his Dominions reſpectively obedient unto him. But now Mexaris began to ſpeak of his Marriage, as a match almoſt made up; and ſince it was not to be imagined he would ſpeak ſo, unleſs he had ſome aſſurance of it from Crœſſus, thoſe who told Abradates of it ſpoke ſo confidently, as if it were out of any queſtion; So that he in an abſolute deſpair went unto Doraliſa, who being then not well, the Princeſs came to ſee her. It is impoſſible, Madam, I ſhould tell you all that Abradates ſpoke that day unto the Princeſs, for he ſpoke ſo much, that ſhe had much ado to anſwer. Sometimes he would find fault with her luke-warmneſs towards him, ſometimes he would conjure her to aſſiſt him; preſently after, he would beſeech her to caſt off Mexaris. Thus paſſing from one diſcourſe to another, without varying from the ſame ſubject, they paſſed away all the Afternoon, and nothing was reſolved upon, till Doraliſa began to ſpeak. Madam (ſaid ſhe unto Panthea) Why do you not imploy Perinthus unto the Prince your Father, you know he is very prevalent with him: 'Tis true, ſaid Panthea, But I will not diſcover my heart unto ſo many men, until the utmoſt extremity; Yet I promiſe you, ſaid ſhe, if the buſineſs be arrived at ſuch a height as Abradates ſpeaks of, I ſhall ſtrive with my ſelf to ſpeak unto Perinthus, that he would tranſact with the Prince my Father againſt Mexaris. Will you not be pleaſed to move him alſo in behalf of Abradates, ſaid this Prince unto her? That's more than I can do, replyed ſhe, and I ſhould but deceive you if I ſhould promiſe it. In the mean time, Perinthus hearing as others did, that Mexaris gave out, as if he were to marry Panthea out of hand; and knowing moreover from the Prince of Claſomena, that Mexaris aſſured he was not now upon ſuch terms as to fear Crœſſus would be an obſtacle, as he did whil'ſt Prince Atis was alive, or before the impriſonment of Cleander, therefore Perinthus thought himſelf in ſome danger from thence; as long as his buſineſs was to defeat the deſigns of a beloved Lover, he thought it advantageous, that Mexaris ſhould be preferred before Abradates; but as ſoon as he heard Mexaris talk of marrying Panthea, his deſires were to defeat the deſigns of him whoſe intereſt he advanced before. Afterwards conſidering with himſelf what a miſerable misfortune it would be unto the Princeſs, to marry a Prince, againſt whom he knew ſhe had a moſt unalterable averſion, he repented of all he had done; and when he underſtood that the match was made, and the Marriage ready to be performed, he fell into a moſt horrid deſpair, and offered above a hundred times to go and confeſs all his crimes unto the Princeſs, and then kill himſelf at her feet: For, would he ſay, What have I to do but die, ſince I can never be happy, and ſince I cannot live, unleſs I hinder the happineſs of the only perſon whom I love? But (ſometimes would he ſay (Why then cannot I give my conſent ſhe ſhould marry Mexaris? For ſince I am moſt certain that I my ſelf can never pretend unto her, there can no better way be found to take her quite from Abradates, than to beſtow her for ever unto Mexaris: But then, (would he ſay preſently after)

Is not Mexaris my Rival as much as the other? And is it ſufferable that any one ſhould marry the perſon one loves? Ha! no, no, my deſign was never that Panthea ſhould be the Wife of Mexaris: I would have Abradates defeated in his deſign of her, but I would never have her beſtowed upon his Rival and mine: Then, would he ſay after, upon better thoughts, Is it juſt, that to leſſen my own miſeries a little, I ſhould render that Princeſs whom I adore, the moſt unfortunate perſon upon earth? She, I ſay, who has given me a thouſand teſtimonies of her favour and eſteem, unto whom I never did, nor durſt diſcover my paſſion: She, I ſay, againſt whom I cannot complain, though ſhe ſhould for ever baniſh me, if I ſhould preſume to tell her that I loved her; and ſhe who might without injuſtice hate me, if ſhe knew what I did againſt her. In the mean time, I cannot allow her to be the Wife of Abradates; and ſince I cannot enjoy her whom I do love, there is ſome Juſtice that ſhe who infuſed that cruel paſſion into my heart, ſhould taſte of the ſame miſery, in never marrying Abradates. After he had thus diſcourſed upon the matter, and conſidered the preſent ſtate of things, he fancied a courſe, by which he thought he might prevent both Mexaris and Abradates from marrying Panthea; and this was his project. Since the commitment of Cleander, Andramites, who conducted the Princeſs Mandana, and the Princeſs Palmis from Epheſus to Sardis, was in great favour with Crœſſus, and a particular friend unto Perinthus, who was with him every day, as well becauſe they often met together at Court, as becauſe Andramites being a Lover of Doraliſa, he courted her, and followed her in all places, and by conſequence was very oft at the Princeſs of Claſomena's Lodging, where Perinthus was a daily gueſt. This ſecret Lover then did project to prejudice Abradates in the opinion of Panthea's Father, and to prejudice Mexaris alſo by the interceſſion of Andramites, whom he deſigned to employ unto Crœſſus: And not to defer the execution of his reſolves, he went to find out his friend: He told him, that the Princeſs Panthea having an invincible averſion to the Prince Mexaris, ſhe had employed him to find out ſome courſe to defeat all the deſigns which he had upon her, and that he knew of no better way than addreſſes unto him, that he would be pleaſed to negotiate ſo with Crœſſus, that he ſhould not approve or conſent unto the match. Andramites, who loved Perinthus, and who hoped for ſome good offices from him towards Doraliſa; and who moreover knew that Crœſſus had reaſon to diſlike the Marriage between Mexaris and Panthea, did promiſe him to negotiate ſo effectually, that he would abſolutely hinder Mexaris from ever marrying the Princeſs by the conſent of Crœſſus, for he knew the diſlike of that Prince unto this Alliance. Perinthus returned thanks with abundance of joy, and ſtayed not long for accompliſhment of his hopes, for within two days after, Crœſſus did forbid Mexaris from thinking of any Marriage with Panthea, propoſing unto him another match. Since Mexaris was reſolved to look more high than formerly he uſed, he took this language very fiercely: But Crœſſus being tranſported with anger at an anſwer of ſo little reſpect, did talk unto him with ſuch Authority, that Mexaris was glad to ſubmit, to be ſilent, and to retire, and I believe he would have left Sardis, if his Love to Panthea had not ſtayed him. In the mean time, fearing the Prince of Claſomena ſhould cool upon the matter, he went unto him, aſſuring him that he ſhould e're long prevail with the King, and conjuring him not to alter his intentions: The truth is, the Prince of Claſomena ſaw Mexaris ſo near unto the Crown, that he promiſed him what he could deſire. You may imagine, Madam, how great was the joy of Panthea, when ſhe heard of all the paſſages between Crœſſus and Mexaris, and how Abradates was raviſht at the defeat of his Rival; Since they knew not from whence this good fortune ſhould proceed, they did attribute it only unto Crœſſus, who out of reaſons of State did diſlike and oppoſe the Marriage: So that the firſt private meeting which Abradates had with Doraliſa about it, we conſumed two whole hours in diſcourſe of nothing elſe, and rejoycing at it. In the mean while, whil'ſt Andramites was thus negotiating with Crœſſus againſt Mexaris, Perinthus tranſacted ſecretly againſt Abradates with the Prince of Claſomena; So that hoping to hinder both Princes from enjoying that perſon whom both they and he loved, he became more jocund and ſociable than he uſed to be. Mexaris for his part, conſidering what courſes were moſt expedient to take, ſeemed to comply unto the Kings commands, ſeeming to ſmother the paſſion which was in his ſoul, though his intentions always were to marry Panthea, and ſo he aſſured the Prince her Father in ſecret. Whil'ſt theſe things were thus carried on, Andramites, who was deeply in Love with Doraliſa, (and had been ſo before he married that fair one who died about a year ſince) deſired Perinthus to do him all the good offices he could unto Doraliſa, which Perinthus promiſed to do; and further telling him, that if his own endeavours would not prevail, he would beſeech the Princeſs to favour his deſires. Thus was Perinthus ingaged to return the favours of Andramites; ſo that he ſet himſelf not only to ſpeak in his advantage unto Doraliſa, but he deſired me alſo to ſpeak, which accordingly I did upon the firſt fit opportunity, though I told her it was at the inſtance of Perinthus. I think, Madam, that I told you already, Doraliſa did much eſteem Perinthus; and perhaps if ſhe had been able to infuſe ſuch thoughts into his heart as ſhe deſired, he ſhould have been tender enough towards her; and ſince it was ſo, it may eaſily be imagined, that though he was importunate in behalf of Andramites, yet he was ſo far from ſerving him, that he did rather but prejudice him, yet did ſhe return no uncivil anſwers, but in ſuch a manner as he might eaſily ſee he did no very great good office for his friend. Then, Madam, to perplex Perinthus the more, It chanced that the Princeſs, who breathed ſome hopes to marry the Prince Abradates, and did foreſee that ſhe ſhould then leave Sardis, ſhe reſolved by no meens to loſe Dorailſa, and therefore did project to marry her unto Perinthus, ſince ſhe knew that Doraliſa did much eſteem him, ſhe made no queſtion, but if he could or would expreſs any affection to her, ſhe would receive him very favourably. So that at his going out of Doraliſa's houſe, where he had been to ſolicite in behalf of Andramites, he received command to come unto the Princeſs: He was no ſooner with her, but ſhe told him that ſhe would give him ſome teſtimonies of her friendſhip. I have received ſo many already, Madam, ſaid he unto her, that I need not wonder to find you ſo full of goodneſs: But do what I can, Madam, I am afraid I ſhall dye in ingratitude. You may ſoon acquit your ſelf in point of gratitude (ſaid ſhe) if you pleaſe. I moſt humbly beſeech you, Madam, ſaid he in haſte, tell me which way? By applying your ſelf a little more unto Doraliſa (ſaid ſhe unto him) for Perinthus, you will much oblige me, if you look upon her as one whom I deſire you to marry, to the end I may not loſe her; and that engaging you both in my ſervice, we may be for ever inſeparable: I am ſure (ſaid ſhe, and would not give him time to ſpeak) that Doraliſa for all her talk does not think you in love, no more than I do; therefore knowing how much you eſteem her, and what the merit and fortune of this perſon is, I do not think this is an unjuſt Propoſition, nor that you ought to refuſe it.

Panthea having ended her ſpeech, and Perinthus returned out of that maze which the motion of the Princeſs had put him into, he anſwered her with no leſs ſubtilty than civility, though with moſt ſenſible ſorrow. I think my ſelf moſt unhappy, Madam (ſaid he unto her) that you ſhould deſire of me ſuch things as are both unjuſt and impoſſible; though you believe it to be ſo juſt and eaſie, yet it is neither the one nor the other. Why Perinthus (ſaid the Princeſs) is it any Injuſtice that one that is a moſt accompliſhed man, and one whoſe Soul is not already engaged, ſhould marry the moſt amiable and ſpritely woman upon Earth, and one who wiſhing for a heart that never was in love, finds ſuch a one in you? Yet, Madam, replied he, though I were ſuch a one as you ſpeak, I ſhould never pleaſe her; for Doraliſa expects to be loved, and truly I cannot love her otherwiſe than I ſhould do a Siſter. Yet I pray you ſeem as if you did more (replied the Princeſs) and I ſhall think my ſelf much obliged; and though at the firſt you can love her no otherwiſe than as a Siſter, yet time may make you love her as your Wife. Truly, Madam, replied he, I cannot do more; for not knowing you had any ſuch deſign as this, I have ſpoke unto her with extream zeal in the behalf of Andramites, who is ready to dye for love of her; and who is not only every way a more accompliſh'd man than my ſelf, but is a man of much better fortunes than I: Therefore, Madam, though I ſhould take upon me to diſſemble a love, it would be to little purpoſe after all this: Moreover, what might Andramites think of my falſe proceeding? and when you have well thought upon it, what would your ſelf think of me? Ha, Perinthus (ſaid the Princeſs) though you will not obey me, yet however let me entreat you not to ſolicit for Andramites; for if it be poſſible I would not have Doraliſa married in Sardis. If the Prince Mexaris marry you (ſaid Perinthus to her) you will not loſe her though ſhe marry Andramites. 'Tis true, ſaid ſhe, but thanks be to the Gods I ſhall never marry him; but I have ſome Reaſons to think I ſhall e're long leave Sardis, and return into Claſomena. If the Prince Abradates (ſaid he to diſcover her mind) ſhould be ſo happy as to marry you, he would not carry you to Suſa, for his affairs are not ſo well compoſed for it; and I do not know whether or no Crœſſus would ſuffer him to dwell in Claſomena. However it be (ſaid the Princeſs, and bluſhed) I would not have Andramites marry Doraliſa, but wiſh with all my heart Perinthus would marry her. I cannot betray my truſt, Madam, ſaid he to her, and ſighed. I cannot conceive (replied the Princeſs) but ſince you eſteem Doraliſa ſo much as you do, and alſo loves her, as you ſay, as much as if ſhe were your Siſter, but you may more eaſily obey me: For, as for Andramites, added ſhe, I will undertake to give him ſatisfaction. As ſhe was ſaying ſo, Doraliſa entered, who finding ing Perinthus alone with her, and imagined that he was deſiring her to ſpeak in favour of Andramites: For Heavens ſake, Madam, ſaid ſhe unto Panthea, do me the favour to tell me whether I was not the ſubject of your diſcourſe? Indeed you were, replyed the Princeſs, and that ſo much, that we ſpoke of nothing elſe. I do imagine, replied Doraliſa, that Perinthus, to teſtifie unto you as well as unto me, that I have no very great ſhare in his heart, hath deſired you to ſolicit me in behalf of Andramites: but Madam, if he have, I beſeech you deny him, for I do not know that man in the World which I would not marry before him: Yet he is a moſt compleat man, replied Perinthus. 'Tis true, ſaid ſhe; but ſince queſtionleſs he loved the Lady which he married, who indeed was very fair and amiable, he is not fit for my purpoſe, ſince I am reſolved to have none but ſuch a one as never loved any but my ſelf. As ſhe pronounced this laſt word, Andramites entered, who eaſily perceived that the endeavours of Perinthus had not been very propitious; for Doraliſa, whoſe ſpirits were incenſed, not knowing very well at what, did jeer that day extreamly, and ſo much the more, becauſe ſhe obſerved it pleaſed the Princeſs. Within a while after, much company coming in, and Andramites talking to her in a low voice, ſhe brought him unto ſuch a paſs, as he did proteſt unto her, that he never loved any but her, no not his wife which he married. Fie Andramites (cryed ſhe out) how is it poſſible then you ſhould ever love me, me I ſay, who am neither ſo fair nor lovely as ſhe was: Then would he have told her that he could not love his Wife, becauſe he loved her at that ſame time, and that he never would have married her, but in obedience to his father, yet all theſe were but cold arguments to help him; for ſhe being tickled with the paſſage that he ſhould tell her he never loved his Wife, and ſeeing all the company departed but Perinthus and Andramites, ſhe began to laugh and jeer; and tell him as much as ever the moſt improſperous Love could poſſibly deſerve: and ſince it was a moſt odd kind of Complement, ment, that one who would perſwade another to marry him, ſhould tell her he never loved his Wife, the Princeſs could not chuſe but laugh alſo. But though Andramites would excuſe all by ſaying, the Reaſon was becauſe he could love none but her, yet all his arguments would not ſerve. Perinthus alſo, deſiring to teſtifie unto his friend that he was as zealous in his behalf as he could, did maintain that Doraliſa was much beholding to him for loving her better than his Wife, or for loving her ſo much, that he could not love his Wife at all. But all the arguments they both could deviſe, were not able to convince Doraliſa. Perinthus was much perplexed, for he durſt not ſpeak ſo zealouſly in behalf of his friend, as he ſhould if the Princeſs had not ſpoke unto him; for he was afraid to ſpeak much to his advantage, leſt he ſhould incenſe her ſo, that he thought himſelf in a ſtrait confinement. After this, the Princeſs was often perſwading Perinthus to alter his deſign, but ſhe found him ſtill in an unalterable obſtinacy: ſhe did not yet acquaint Doraliſa with her project, I only did know of it; for ſhe being ſtill in hopes to change his mind, ſhe would not tell Doraliſa what reſiſtance ſhe found in him. In the mean while Perinthus durſt hardly look either upon the Princeſs or Doraliſa, but fell into an extream melancholy: As for Abradates, ſince his liberality had won him all the ſervants belonging to the Prince of Claſomena, he was informed by them who heard Perinthus ſpeak unto his Maſter, that he did ſolicit for Mexaris with all his zeal: ſo that going the very ſame hour unto Doraliſa, to ask her advice, whether he ſhould acquaint the Princeſs with it, or ſpeak unto Perinthus, he there underſtood by Andramites that it was Perinthus alſo which moved him to induce Crœſſus unto the hinderance of the Marriage between Mexaris and Panthea: for tho' Doraliſa did treat him very harſhly, yet ſometimes ſhe would make him tell her any thing ſhe deſired to know: ſo that Abradates imparted unto her all that he knew, and ſhe afterwards all that Andramites told her unto him; and ſince theſe two things were contraries, yet ſeemed moſt certain, they did extreamly perplex him. Then they determined not to believe any thing, nor to reſolve upon any courſe, until they knew what the Princeſs conceived upon the matter. Doraliſa went preſently to her, and told all that both Abradates and her ſelf did know; and particularly how Andramites, (thinking doubtleſs to do a good office to Perinthus and himſelf alſo) told her, that it was by his negotiation that Mexaris was out of favour with Crœſſus. Truly, replied the Princeſs, if what Andramites reports be true, I am much obliged unto Perinthus; and if that which is told unto Abradates, be true, I have great cauſe of complaint againſt him, ſince he knows I cannot endure Mexaris. That which admires me moſt, ſaid the Princeſs, is, that he who informed Abradates that Perinthus did ſolicit for Mexaris, is not a Man likely to tell a lye; therefore I rather think it to be Andramites who tells the untruth. No, Madam, ſaid Doraliſa, certainly Andramites did not invent it. Then muſt I be ſatisfied of my doubts, replied the Princeſs, from Perinthus himſelf; for I know him to be a Man of Honour and Sincerity, who, I am fully perſwaded, will confeſs the truth of any thing whatſoever: So that deferring no longer, ſhe ſent for Perinthus; and Doraliſa coming into my Chamber, ſhe left Panthea at liberty to examin Perinthus. As ſoon as he was come, ſhe looked attentively upon him; I pray, Perinthus, ſaid ſhe unto him, tell me whether I muſt chide you or thank you? I think, Madam, replied he, you have not reaſon to do either; ſince I do not remember I ever did you any conſiderable ſervice to deſerve the one, and ſince I am ſure I never intended to diſpleaſe you ſo far as to deſerve the other: Nevertheleſs, ſaid ſhe, I am informed by one, that you have done me an extraordinary piece of ſervice; and by another, that you have been extreamly perfidious: Tell me therefore, Perinthus, have you obliged or diſobliged me? However, I promiſe you to pardon the crime, if you confeſs it: Tell me then, Perinthus, what I muſt think of you? Madam, ſaid he unto her, when I ſhall know whereof I am accuſed, I will ſe if I can juſtifie my ſelf. To ſhew you, ſaid ſhe unto him) that I had rather commend than accuſe you: Tell me firſt, whether it is to you that I am obliged for cauſing Crœſſus to be ſo ſharp with Mexaris? It is very true, Madam, replyed he, that ſince I could not think Mexaris worthy of you, and having obſerved a great averſion in you towards him, I induced Andramites to ſpeak unto Crœſſus, that he would break off that Marriage, which I knew would diſpleaſe you. Thus far, replyed Panthea, I am much obliged to you: But why then, in your ſpeaking unto the Prince my Father, did you not negotiate according to my mind? And why were you ſuch a defender of Mexaris to him?

Perinthus hearing the Princeſs, did change colour, and ſhe perceiving the alteration which appeared in his eyes, knew by it that there was ſome truth in the reports; yet notwithſtanding, ſince Love is never without an excuſe for any crime, Perinthus found one: I muſt confeſs, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) that your intelligence is good, and that in certain occaſions, wherein the Prince your Father was pleaſed to intimate unto me how fully he was reſolved to marry you unto the Prince Mexaris, I did not directly oppoſe his intentions; and my reaſon was, becauſe I knew that it was not in his power to execute them: Then did I perſwade him, as well as I could, not to ſuffer this Prince to marry you, without the conſent of Crœſſus, which I knew he could not obtain: I did ſometimes agree with him, that Mexaris was a great Prince, who in all likelihood, one day, would be King of Lydia: So that, Madam, without any prejudice unto your intereſts, I preſerved my ſelf in his favour, but did not deprive my ſelf of any means to do you any ſerviceable office to him, when occaſion ſhould ſerve. Your anſwer (replyed the Princeſs) is full of Wit, and ſeems alſo to be true, ſince there is no likely reaſons why you ſhould negotiate two contraries at one time: But yet, ſince there is ſomething in your proceeding which is not ſuitable to your uſual manner of tranſacting, you ſhall repair the fault, by anſwering me ingenuouſly to what I ſhall ask you; therefore, if you will perſwade me that your intentions were clear, give me an exact and faithful account of all that the Prince my Father ſaid unto you concerning me; for ſince I ſhall never attempt any thing againſt his pleaſure; and ſince I never look but to be miſerable, I do not think my demand of you is unjuſt. I do promiſe you, Madam, ſaid he very craftily, to tell you every thing which he ſaid concerning the Prince Mexaris. Do not alter my words, replied the Princeſs, but ingage your ſelf to tell me all that he ſaid concerning me. Perinthus, who knew well the Princeſs would not have ſpoke ſo, but becauſe ſhe would know what the Prince her Father ſaid unto him concerning Abradates, he was ſo non-plus'd, that he knew not what to anſwer; but at the laſt, ſince ſhe preſſed him very much; I am ſo afraid, ſaid he unto her, to tell you any thing which ſhall not pleaſe, that I am ſorry to be ingaged unto what you deſire me: The Princeſs wiſhed ſhe had the hardineſs to let him know that ſhe ſhould be no leſs obliged unto him for ſpeaking in behalf of Abradates, as for ſpeaking againſt Mexaris, but ſhe could not do it; and I believe, if ſhe had made that prayer unto him, he would either have ſunk down with ſorrows, or elſe have expreſſed ſuch marks of his paſſion as ſhe would have perceived it. After this diſcourſe, Panthea did really believe that Perinthus had no other intentions, but to imploy his fortunes in ſerving her, and poſſeſſed Abradates with the ſame opinion: But as for Doraliſa, ſhe was not ſo eaſily perſwaded into that belief, but on the contrary, all her ſuſpicions of the paſſion of Perinthus began to revive in her mind; yet, ſince ſhe did really eſteem him, ſhe ſaid nothing to the Princeſs, leſt ſhe ſhould injure him; yet ſhe could not chuſe but impart her thoughts unto me, after ſhe had made me promiſe her ſecreſie: At the firſt, I could not believe her ſerious, but afterwards, my ſuſpicions were ſtronger than hers; I abſolutely concurred with the opinion of Doraliſa, and reſolved as well as ſhe not to prejudice ſo excellent a qualify'd man, as Perinthus was, upon bare ſuſpicions, which perhaps were ill-grounded, ſince they were built only upon conjectures, which often are fallacious, and therefore, I reſolved peremptorily not to ſpeak a word of any thing to the Princeſs; yet notwithſtanding, ſince this might grow unto ſome bad conſequences, we reſolved to obſerve him very circumſpectly, and to inform each other of our diſcoveries: I confeſs, Madam, that I committed one piece of lightneſs in this buſineſs, in telling Doraliſa of that propoſition which the Princeſs made unto him concerning her Marriage; but I thought it ſo manifeſt a teſtimony of that paſſion which we ſuſpected, as I could not keep it from her: I had no ſooner told it, but I wiſh'd it in again, yet not long; not that I told it unto her in ſuch a manner as might give her any cauſe of complaint; yet for all that, I perceived it touched her ſo to the quick, that it made her bluſh. I leave you to conſider, (ſaid I then unto her, to pleaſe her) whether Perinthus, eſteeming you as he doth, and proffering ſo much friendſhip, would not have received that motion which the Princeſs made with much joy, though he had no love at all towards you, if he had not been in love with ſome other; and therefore it muſt be concluded, that he is in love with another, and that other is certainly the Princeſs. If he be in love with Panthea, replyed Doraliſa, I do pardon him with all my heart, for the ſame paſſion which he is poſſeſſed with, will ſufficiently puniſh him for the folly of it: But if it be with any other, I will be revenged upon him, both for his refuſal, and the injury which the Princeſs hath done me, in makeing ſuch an offer without acquainting me. Doraliſa, maugre her anger, yet knew very well, that the intentions of the Princeſs were very obliging; but however, ſhe would not complain ſo much againſt Perinthus, as againſt her. Since this time, this cloſe Lover could hardly hide himſelf from us; in all his actions, and all his words, we thought we ſaw evident ſymptomes of his Love: Alſo we obſerved him ſo cloſely, that he perceived us, and asked the reaſon. Since he feared that the Princeſs ſhould acquaint Doraliſa liſa with thoſe paſſages which were between them, and fearing alſo leſt ſhe ſhould take them ill, he doubled his civilities towards her, not daring to ſpeak unto her of Andramites, whom Doraliſa, at the deſire of the Princeſs, did treat leſs ſeverely, ſince it was by his means Mexaris was croſſed in his deſigns. In the mean while, Mexaris building his hopes upon the word of the Prince of Claſomena, did wait for ſome favourable opportunity, either to alter the mind of Crœſſus, or to marry Panthea whether he would or no, if there were no other remedy; ſo that he lived a life full of anxiety, and hopes of a happy ſucceſs in his deſign: Abradates was more happy than he, for being ſure of Panthea's heart, that very thought ſweeten'd all his bitter hours, maugre all opoſitions and obſtacles which croſſed his compleat happineſs: But as for the miſerable Perinthus, his life was a conſtant ſeries of ſorrows, yet he had his poor intervals of eaſe, to think that Panthea neither marrying Mexaris nor Abradates, perhaps would never marry. He has told me ſince, that when he thought that ſuch a thing might perhaps be, he was almoſt as much joyed at the very thought of it, as any Lover could be in the enjoyment of his Miſtreſs. Thus did things reſt for a certain time, whil'ſt the love of Andramites unto Doraliſa made converſation very pleaſant, ſince certainly, never was any fuller of witty, odd, and gallant expreſſions than this Lady was unto him, for as he always affirmed, that he had never loved any but her, ſo ſhe told him always, that if he had loved the Wife he had loſt, he had not been for her humour, and if he had not loved her, then he was moſt unjuſt. ſince ſhe was very fair and lovely, and by conſequence, ſhe would never marry one that had been an ill Huſband. Upon a day then, when Mexaris and Abradates were both with the Princeſs, though the laſt of theſe came but ſeldome, by the orders of Panthea: Doraliſa asked them, ſince they ſpoke unto her concerning Andramites, whether ſhe had not good reaſon to reject the deſires of a Man, who never dropt a tear for the death of his Wife? If he had ſeen her die, ſaid Abradates to her) and never grieved at it, only becauſe he looked upon her as an obſtacle unto his deſign to be loved by you, he is ſo far from being guilty of inſenſibility, that you ought to commend his conſtancy, and to recompence him for it. It is true, ſaid Doraliſa, in that reſpect I am obliged to him; But why would he marry her, if he loved me? And if he did not love me, why did he not grieve for her? But if he ſhould grieve for her, ſaid the Princeſs, he could not Love you? I confeſs it, replyed ſhe, and he would be more happy in it, if he did not Love me: His happineſs would be very mean, replyed Mexaris, who ſhould eternally lament the death of one he did love: And I aſſure you (anſwered Doraliſa, and ſmiled) that a living Miſtreſs, who is a little phantaſtical, is as troubleſome as any dead Wife, though ſhe were the worſt in the world: Your arguments, replyed Mexaris, are againſt your ſelf: There are a ſort of ſlight phancies (ſaid Abradates) which beauties wear only as prety vanities, which are very troubleſome to thoſe that love them: And there are ſome alſo (replyed Mexaris very coldly) unto whom they are advantages, and with out reaſon makes them to be preferred before others, who do not value them: It may chance ſo, replyed Abradates; but I for my part, who owe much reſpect unto Ladies, and have no leſs opinion of their judgment than of their wit, I am perſwaded the commonly happy Lovers deſerve to be ſo: You have reaſon doubtleſs (ſaid Doraliſa) and thoſe fault-finding Lovers who never ſpeak, but are accuſing them they love, either of fantaſticalneſs or want of judgment, are certainly both fantaſtical and indiſcreet themſelves: ſuch men as theſe are they who are offended at any trivial matter, and think much better of themſelves than they deſerve, conceiving high injuſtice to be done them, if they be not accepted of, and eſteemed as much as they eſteem themſelves.

It's very true (ſaid the Princeſs, not being able to forbear) and I know ſome who do as you ſay: And I do know ſome alſo (ſaid Doraliſa) and perhaps the ſame you mean: but however, ſince Love is blind as well as Juſtice, it muſt operate in the hearts of Ladies as it ought to do in the hearts of Judges, to wit, without Partiality, or Conſideration of Greatneſs, or Quality, or Menaces, or Complaints of Pretenders: It ought to judge equally with equity upon the merit and ſervices of thoſe who offer them. Why then do you not judge in favour of Andramites, replyed Abradates? Becauſe I do not find it within the compaſs of my power, replyed ſhe; all the favour that I can do him, is not to judge him at all. Yet ſince you do believe, ſaid Mexaris, that Love makes all the compleat men in the World, why do you not think Andramites very accompliſhed, ſince certainly he loves you infinitely? I never ſaid, replyed ſhe, that all thoſe who are in love are compleat men; but that none can be perfectly compleat unleſs he have been in love: ſo that it is not for that reaſon I refuſe Andramites, whoſe merit is very high: but only becauſe if he did love his Wife, I cannot admit of him, ſince I will have ſuch a heart as never loved any; and if he did not love her, I ſhall much diſlike him, becauſe I conceive it was his duty to love her. The general Rule then, replied Abradates, which ſaith that Love is a cauſe of Love, and that he which loveth cauſeth himſelf to be loved, holds not true, ſince Andramites cannot move your heart. The Rule you mention, replyed ſhe, is not general, and I ſhould be very ſorry it were. But that which hath cauſed this ſaying, which is known amongſt all Nations, and ſometimes found falſe, is certainly becauſe the true intention and meaning of thoſe who firſt made it a general Rule, was never underſtood: for indeed they did never intend that to love one ought infallibly to be loved: but their meaning as well as mine certainly was, that to move another to love it is requiſite to be loving: ſo that in ſaying unto a man, If thou deſireſt I ſhould love thee, then love me, I inſtruct him in the means to obtain his end, and to make that which is good in his heart to appear; and ſometimes that which is evil, added the Princeſs. Love though ought not to be blamed, Madam (replyed Doraliſa) which certainly never infuſeth any evil inclinations: And as one cannot complain againſt the Sun (which I always compare with Love) becauſe it nouriſheth a thouſand venomous vermin at the very ſame time that it blancheth the Lillies, and Rubies the Roſes: ſo Love ought not to be accuſed for the buſineſs of ſome leud Lovers that are in the World, ſince it inſpires only heroique actions, and cauſeth men to practiſe all the virtues, who without this paſſion were perhaps men of rude Souls: If men be bad, the fault is not in Love, but them: if the dunghill ſtink when the Sun ſhines upon it, the fault is not in the Sun, but in the dunghill. The Princeſs laughed heartily at the expreſſions of Doraliſa, and ſo did Abradates: But as for Mexaris, he was much netled: and the more, becauſe Doraliſa bolted out a hundred things which touched him to the quick: and once he obſerved, that when Abradates and Doraliſa looked upon one another, they ſmiled and winked in deriſion; and that Abradates by a nod of his head ſeemed to thank Doraliſa for all her bitter jeers which ſhe had vented. So that theſe things exaſperating his ſpirit, he ſpoke not a word that day, unleſs ſome ſhort and ſharp words to Abradates, who anſwered him with as much reſolution, as the Reſpect which he owed unto the Princeſs, and the Quality of his Rival, would permit him. Since ſhe obſerved the perplexities of Mexaris ſhe endeavoured to ſweeten the Converſation; and indeed the choller of this Prince ſeeming to cool a little, ſhe did not ſuſpect any ill conſequence of it.

They went both from the Princeſs at the ſame time, for when Mexaris ſaw that Abradates was going, he took leave of the Princeſs alſo, and would needs be gone, though ſhe deſired to ſtay him: When they were at the bottom of the ſtairs, Mexaris talked with one of his men in a low voice: and afterwards asked Abradates, if he would walk a turn in the Gardens of the Palace which were cloſe by; and Abradates anſwered, he would wait upon him; ſo they went out; Mexaris being waited upon by eight or ten of his men, and Abradates with the like number. As ſoon as they were in the Garden, Mexaris carryed Abradates into a great Walk, where none were preſent; and after he had beckoned unto his men that they ſhould not follow, he ſtood ſtill, and looked upon Abradates with an imperious aſpect: I have had intentions a long time (ſaid he unto him) to ſpeak nnto you; but my hopes, that of your ſelf, you would do that which a thouſand Reaſons require you ſhould, hath moved me to defer it till now, to advertiſe you, that you do not carry your ſelf, as the Son unto the Queen of Suſiana, my Siſter, ought to do: For though my age do not much differ from yours, yet I muſt exact from ycu ſome difference, both as you are my Nephew, and as you are an Exile, come unto this Court for Refuge, where I ought to be preferred before you. Sir (replied Abradates with a bold civility) I do not know that I have failed in any reſpects which I owe you, either as being ſon unto the Queen of Suſiana, or as I am come for Refuge unto a place where indeed you are very conſiderable, and therefore I think I may ſafely ſay, that your complaints againſt me are unjuſt, and your manner of complaint is a little too high. Your daily actions, replied Mexaris, are much more injurious to me, for you cannot be ignorant of my devoted affection unto the Princeſs of Claſomena. and yet you apply your ſelf too obſequiouſly in your Courtſhip of her. Though the manner of your language, replied Abradates, might perhaps make me excuſable, if I ſhould not render you an account of my actions and deſigns, yet the reſpect which I owe you as Brother unto the Queen my Mother, and unto the King, who gives me protection in his Court, obligeth me to tell you, that I loved the Princeſs of Claſomena from the very firſt inſtant that ever I ſaw her, and I did not know any thing of your paſſion to her, until ſuch time as I was not able to be Commander of my own: Alſo underſtanding that Crœſſus would never approve of your Marriage with her, I conceived it would be no great injury unto you, if I uſed my beſt endeavours to obtain a happineſs which you could never enjoy. But can you think, ſaid Mexaris, that the ſame Reaſon of State, which moves the King not to conſent I ſhould marry one who would render me too potent in his Kingdom, will ever permit you who are a ſtranger to marry her? No, no, Abradates, let not this imagination delude you, but be aſſured that it is not the will of Crœſſus you ſhould think of this Alliance: And conſider further, if you be wiſe, that the Prince of Claſomena will never beſtow his Daughter upon an exil'd Prince. Hitherto, replied Abradates, I have ſpoke unto you as I am Son unto the Queen of Suſiana, as a Prince protected in Lidia, and as Nephew unto the Prince Mexaris; but now I will ſpeak to you as a Lover of Panthea, as one who knows not how to yield unto any, and as one who will love and ſerve her as long as he lives: The truth is, ſaid he, if the caſe were ſo as that the Princeſs of Claſomena ſhould make choice of you, then I had nothing elſe to do but die; and I have ſo high a reſpect of her, though not of you, as to die without complaint: but ſince ſhe makes no ſuch choice, be pleaſed to know, that I will not alter my courſe. Though you were in Suſa, replied Mexaris, and I an Exile protected there as you are in Lidia, you could not ſpeak more haughtily and boldly than you do. I ſhould then ſpeak more mildly, replied Abradates, becauſe I know it unworthy to inſult over thoſe that are miſerable: And is it not as unworthy (anſwered Mexaris) to refuſe thoſe Reſpects which are due unto Protectors? I ſhall never neglect them I owe unto the King of Lidia, replied Abradates; and I am ſorry that Love ſhould force me unto that which I do againſt a Prince ſo near unto him. I muſt have better ſatisfaction (replied Mexaris very fiercely) for if you do not abſolutely renounce Panthea, I muſt call you to an account with a Sword in your hand. I will do all I can, replied Abradates, to do neither the one nor the other. But you muſt (anſwered Mexaris) and that quickly, therefore reſolve with your ſelf which of them you will chuſe. Since you force me to tell you, replied Abradates, I will preſerve Panthea, I will defend my ſelf, and not aſſault you, unleſs I muſt in my own defence: This is all, Sir, that either Love or Reſpect can exact from me: I wiſh that I were able to yield the Princeſs of my Soul unto you, but indeed I cannot: and though my reſolution is to do nothing againſt thoſe Reſpects I owe you, yet will I not do any thing againſt my Love. When Abradates had ſaid this, he ſaw Mexaris go towards a thick Buſh which grew cloſe by a Chriſtal Fountain in the middle of a Walk; and that he pull'd out two Swords, giving him one, and ſaying, that ſince he could not yield Panthea, he ſhould win her if he could, for he would diſpute it with him until death. Abradates at the firſt would not take it, but only to defend himſelf from the blows of Mexaris, in whoſe face he ſaw ſo much fury as might well exaſperate him: but when he ſaw that the better language he gave him, and the more he recoyled, the more did his choller augment, and more furiouſly did he aſſault him, Love and Jealouſie being at laſt ſtronger than his reſpects unto Mexaris, he then kept his ground, and fought like one that would vanquiſh. In the mean time, ſince I believe you deſire to know how Mexaris could find theſe two Swords in the Buſh; be pleaſed to remember, that I told you at their going from the Princeſs, that Prince whiſper'd with one of his ſervants; and let me tell you, that he then commanded him to carry theſe two Swords unto the place appointed, which was very remarkable, becauſe of the Fountain near it; and after this command executed, he charged him with another, purpoſely to ſend him away from that place, and appointed him to go and ſeek for a man that dwelt in the furtheſt part of all Sardis, expreſly charging him not to ſpeak a word of theſe two Swords.

But as he went out of the Garden to ſeek this man his Maſter ſent him unto, he met one of the Princeſs's ſervants at the door, who was his intimate friend, unto whom he imparted his buſineſs, and asked his advice, for the ſervant of Mexaris thought that his

Maſter intended to fight with him he ſent for: But the Princeſs's ſervant having more wit than he, and knowing that Mexaris and Abradates went out together, he ſuſpected ſome miſchief; and after he had adviſed him rather to return into the Garden, than go upon his meſſage, and to tell his Maſter how he underſtood the man he ſent him unto was not at home, he himſelf went haſtily unto the Princeſs, whom he found in diſcourſe with Perinthus, and acquainted her with what he knew: He had no ſooner ſpoke it, but the Princeſs cried out, and changed colour ſo much, that Perinthus could not chuſe but ſee what a particular intereſt ſhe took in the life of Abradates; for he knew her cares could not be for the other. I leave you to judge, Madam, in what a pitiful perplexity he was, when looking upon the Princeſs, he ſaw her eyes all tears, and fears for the death of Abradates; and ſince ſhe knew, that in ſuch occaſions as this, a very minute is precious, ſhe came to Perinthus, entreating him with extream earneſtneſs: My dear Perinthus (ſaid ſhe unto him) you will infinitely oblige me, if you will go and prevent all miſchief that may enſue upon this quarrel; and to oblige you to make more haſte, let me tell you, that it will be the moſt conſiderable ſervice that I ever injoyned you: You may eaſily judg how Perinthus was ſurprized and vexed at this imployment which the Princeſs did put him upon; he offered to ſpeak two or three times, but the Princeſs would not hear, but bad him make all haſte: So that poor Perinthus, much againſt his mind, went to part two men, whom he would rather have fought with if he durſt: True it is, he was not the firſt that came in, for the claſhing of Swords being heard by thoſe who were in other walks, they ran in with all haſte, yet came too late alſo, for the combate was firſt ended. I ſhall not relate unto you, Madam, all the paſſages of it, it will ſuffice to tell you, that Abradates was Conquerour, and Mexaris wounded and diſarm'd, and confeſſing that Abradates was of an invincible valour. But I beſeech you Madam, imagine a little, what might be the cogitations of Pe- rinthus, when in the incertainty of the event of this combate, he went unto theſe two Princes: He hath ſince confeſſed unto me, that he could never compoſe or reconcile himſelf unto his own wiſhes; Sometimes he wiſhed them both killed, ſometimes that at leaſt Abradates were vanquiſhed, and ſometimes again, finding much injuſtice and baſeneſs in his wiſhes, he wiſhed his own death, eſpecially when he reflected upon the ſorrows and fears of Panthea, leaſt any misfortune ſhould befal Abradates: Moreover, to his further miſery, he met this illuſtrious Conquerour of Mexaris, with one of his friends which chance brought into the Garden, following of him; and to compleat the miſeries of Perinthus. Abradates no ſooner ſaw him, but he addreſſed himſelf to him: If I can without any incivility (ſaid he unto him) deſire you to tell the Princeſs of Claſomena, that it is ſhe only who hath preſerved me from being vanquiſhed by Mexaris, I will deſire ſo much favour from you; and to aſſure her that I attribute the happy ſucceſs of my combate, unto the paſſion which I have towards her. Perinthus was ſo confounded with this diſcourſe, that he ſilently hearkned unto it, without any other anſwer than profound reverence. But Abradates taking his ſilence for a conſent unto his deſires left him, and went to expect what Cræſſus would think of his action. In the mean while, many of the Court did tranſact in his behalf, and amongſt the reſt Andramites, who to ſerve Perinthus, had diſſwaded Cræſſus from conſenting unto the Marriage between Mexaris and Panthea, did now all he could to appeaſe this Prince, thinking it as ſerviceable to Perinthus as the other: So that Cræſſus was ſo qualified, that he reflected all the fault upon his Brother, and excuſed Abradates: It was alſo his pleaſure they ſhould imbrace each other as ſoon as Mexaris was recovered: But the moſt cruel part for Abradates was, that Perinthus moved Andramites to perſwade the King, that the only way to prevent all future quarrels between them, was to charge them both equally not to think of any Marriage with Panthea: And Andramites to colour the matter, told Crœſſus, that the Princeſs her ſelf was in ſuch fears leſt either of theſe two Princes ſhould come to untimely death, by reaſon of her, that ſhe her ſelf deſired it; ſo that Crœſſus charged them both to give over all thoughts of her: 'Tis true, he ſpoke unto theſe two Rivals in different manners; for he abſolutely commanded Mexaris, and entreated Abradates, treating the one as a Subject, and the other as a Stranger, yet notwithſtanding they could not reſolve to promiſe him obedience, ſaying always, that Love was ſuch a Soveraign paſſion, as they could not ſo readily ſurmount it; yet they ſpoke this with ſo much reverence unto Crœſſus, out of fear to incenſe him, leſt he ſhould ſend them both out of Sardis, that their reſiſtance did not offend, and Crœſſus believed they intended obedience, though they proteſted that they thought it impoſſible. Thus it happened, that the Conquerour was no happier than the Conquered, and Perinthus was only he who reaped the fruit of Abradates his Victory, out of his joyes, to hope that the Princeſs ſhould marry neither him nor Mexaris: But, Madam, the paſſage was rare, when Perinthus returned to render an account unto the Princeſs of the combat, for though ſhe heard of others, yet ſince every one is glad to have repetitions of any thing which pleaſeth, or which they have any intereſt in: Perinthus was no ſooner come unto her, Doraliſa and my ſelf being preſent, but ſhe ſpoke unto him: Well, Perinthus (ſaid ſhe unto him with much joy in her eyes) Thanks be to the Gods, the Prince Abradates and the Prince Mexaris are both alive: They are, Madam, replied he, but the laſt of theſe is wounded: 'Tis true, ſaid ſhe, but ſince I underſtand his wounds are not dangerous, I cannot chuſe but rejoice that their combat proved not more fatal: I conceive, Madam, replied he, that whoſoever underſtands the true ſence of your words, will think Abradates more glorious in your language, than in his diſarming Mexaris. However it be (ſaid ſhe, and bluſhed) give me an exact relation of the combat. Perinthus now was extreamly put to it, and not being

ing able himſelf to ſet forth the glory of his Rival, whom he ſaw was too deep in the heart of his Princeſs already, he told her, that he could not truly do it, for the friends of Mexaris reported one way, and the friends of Abradates another, but the principal of all was what ſhe knew already, that Abradates received not a wound, and that Mexaris was wounded. It is very ſtrange, Perinthus (ſaid Doraliſa, and laughed, and who knew as well as I did the true cauſe why he would not ſatisfie the Princeſs) you ſhould be ſo ill informed of this combat: For my part, ſaid ſhe further to diſcover his thoughts, had I been at any Ball, and the Princeſs ſhould preciſely ask me what paſſed there, certainly I ſhould have related every thing with the leaſt circumſtance: ſhe ſhould know, whether the Hall were ill or well furniſhed, who danced moſt, which Ladies were beſt dreſſed, and moſt fair, which of the men was the greateſt Gallant, who talked long with ſuch a one, and who with ſuch a one, and who with ſome other; and ſhe ſhould know every trivial paſſage of the Aſſembly ſo perfectly, as if ſhe were there preſent. In the mean time, you who are a brave and gallant man, in lieu of relating every circumſtance, as I could have done, does only tell the Princeſs that Mexaris is wounded, and that Abradates is Conquerour. 'Tis very true (ſaid the Princeſs, and ſmiled) Perinthus is to blame: I ſhould have thought it, Madam, replied he, no great diſcretion to relate a combat unto Ladies, in the ſame manner as it ſhould be related unto men: It had not been handſom indeed, ſaid Doraliſa, to have related Wars and Battels, or your own peculiar Victories: But for a ſingle Duel, and a combat wherein you have no intereſt, and which is fought between two Princes of ſuch eminency, it ought to be exactly related. I ſhall better inform my ſelf another time, replied he, and remember your inſtructions hereafter: Hereafter, ſaid the Princeſs, Heavens forbid you e're be put unto it. Panthea ſpoke this with ſuch an Emphaſis, that Perinthus knowing thereby her thoughts, was dumb for a quarter of an hour together: during which time, Doraliſa talking ing on as ſhe begun, did almoſt make him deſpair. But to return from whence I tranſgreſſed, give me leave to tell you, Madam, that Abradates was ſo ſad to ſee that in conquering Mexaris he was not the better, as it was impoſſible he ſhould be more, though it was ſome comfort to ſee himſelf in better ſtate than his Rival, yet he thought himſelf moſt unfortunate: When the Princeſs knew it, ſhe was alſo much troubled, though her care was not to ſhew it: So as the firſt time that Abradates met her at Doraliſa's houſe, there paſſed ſuch diſcourſe between them, as did confirm their amity: The Princeſs kept ſtill in thoſe limits which ſhe had preſcribed unto her ſelf, never to marry Abradates without the conſent of the Prince her Father, but never to marry Mexaris, what violence ſoever ſhe was put unto. Thus that which in appearance ſhould quench their paſſions, did render them more ſtrong; and Perinthus in ſtriving to prejudice Abradates, did againſt his will do him better ſervice than if he had endeavoured it. This cloſe Lover yet did think himſelf more happy than he was before the Combat of theſe two Rivals: for though he knew very well, that the heart of Panthea was deeply engaged, yet he had ſome hopes that ſeeing ſhe could not marry Abradates, ſhe would ſtrive to exclude him out of her mind; inſomuch as we perceived him more pleaſant and free than he uſed to be. As for Mexaris, he was ſo melancholy, that none living could be more; not but that he had ſtill good words from the Prince of Claſomena, but ſince words are but wind, and Perinthus kept him from beſtowing his Daughter without the King's conſent, he was no leſs unquiet: In the mean while Abradates and he lived with a cold kind of civility to each other, ſuch as ſeemed to be an inclination to another Quarrel. Since the King did not forbid them ſeeing of Panthea, but only from thoughts of Marriage, they often met at her houſe; but more often in other places, leſt they ſhould too much incenſe Crœſſus. Thus did they live a kind of compulſive and unpleaſant lives; yet Abradates was much leſs miſerable than his Rival;

ſince he did not only know himſelf not hated, but ſo much in favour with the World, that the Princeſs never went unto any place, but he had intelligence of it the very ſame hour: For ſince he was liberal unto all, his Intelligencers were moſt exactly true and faithful to him: And I am confident there was not a man of any condition whatſoever, neither about the Prince of Claſomena, nor about the Princeſs his Daughter, which was not moſt really for him, except Perinthus.

On the contrary, the avarice of Mexaris was ſuch, that he had not any intelligence ſo much as from his own ſervants, ſo that he knew no more but what every one knew. After then he had lived thus ſome certain days, he fell upon a moſt unjuſt and violent Reſolution, which was, to carry away Panthea, if he could not by any means win the Prince of Claſomena to let him marry the Princeſs his Daughter ſecretly. As he entertained theſe thoughts, News was brought, that the Princeſs Baſilina, Aunt unto Panthea, was ſick of a mortal diſeaſe: Upon this the Princeſs, who did moſt tenderly love her, beſeeched her Father that ſhe might go and pay her laſt duties unto her who had been ſo dear unto her. Since her deſire was juſt, ſhe eaſily obtained it; and the Prince of Claſomena himſelf had gone this Voyage, if he had not been advertiſed that Crœſſus would not be pleaſed with it: his Reſolutions then were, that Panthea ſhould go alone, and that Perinthus ſhould be a Conductor; which employment you may imagine he moſt joyfully undertook; yet was he vexed to leave Mexaris with the Prince her Father and his Maſter, unleſs he had been with him alſo: yet notwithſtanding, the ſatisfaction he ſhould have to be with the Princeſs out of ſight of all his Rivals, did carry him above all other conſiderations. In the mean while, Panthea conſidering that ſhe ſhould ſtand in need of ſome comfort in this ſorrowful Voyage, deſired the Aunt of Doraliſa, with whom ſhe lived, to let her Niece go with her, which ſhe granted as willingly as Doraliſa wiſhed it: ſo that the next morning we departed, and went towards Claſomena. Abradates reſented this ſeparation extream ſadly; and the greateſt aggravation of his ſorrows was, that ſince this Journey was ſo haſtily undertaken, he could not bid adieu unto the Princeſs in private : ſo that but for me he had not known that ſhe wiſhed him to remember her during this abſence. I ſhall not tell you, Madam, how melancholy the Princeſs was all the Voyage, nor how great her ſorrows were, when arriving in Claſomena we found the Princeſs Baſilina ſo very ill, that there was no hopes of her Recovery : This, Madam, would be too tedious unto you : But give me leave to tell you, that four days after our firſt arrival this excellent Princeſs died ; whoſe death Panthea took ſo heavily, that ſhe fell ſick her ſelf ; ſo that ſhe could not return ſo ſoon to Sardis ; for though her diſeaſe was not very violent, yet it was ſo great as to hinder her from travel ; ſo that Perinthus enjoyed a longer happineſs than e're he looked for, in being free from the ſight of his Rivals, and continually ſeeing his Princeſs ; and indeed he became ſo blithe and pleaſant whilſt we ſtayed at Claſomena, that the Princeſs would not admit of any company but his, Doraliſa, and mine : ſo that it may not unfitly be ſaid, that as Roſes grow amongſt thorny prickles, ſo the delights of Perinthus did grow amongſt his ſorrows : 'Tis true, his ſweets did laſt no longer than the ſweets of a fading Roſe : For beſides that Love is an enemy to reſt and ſerenity, he and his delights were blaſted by a ſtinging Letter from Andramites ; for it brought him news, that Mexaris was perpetually as cloſe to the Prince of Claſomena, as if he were his ſhadow : yet for all this, ſince the Princeſs was not amongſt them, they could not put their Reſolutiens into execution ; he hoped therefore that aſſoon as he ſaw the Prince of Claſomena, he would make him alter his deſign if he had any which were contrary to his intentions : So that his trouble at it was not ſo great as his ſatisfaction to be ſo near his Princeſs, and ſo far off his Rivals, but there was another paſſage which was a much more bitter Pill unto him ; for be pleaſed to know, Madam, that the Prince Abradates, not being able to live ſo long without ſome news of Panthea, did write twice every week conſtantly as long as we ſtayed in Claſomena unto either Doraliſa or my ſelf ; or to ſay better, unto the Princeſs, ſince the Contents of them all related only unto her : at the firſt he intimated his ardent deſires of obtaining licence to write unto her ſelf ; but ſhe would not by any means permit it, leſt by any accident his Letters ſhould miſcarry : but as for thoſe which were written unto Doraliſa and me, they were written in ſuch an ambiguous manner, as they would admit of ſeveral interpretations : So that the Princeſs heard from Abradates almoſt without any danger, and Abradates underſtood from us as much as he deſired to know. But the better to make our matters myſterious, we intimated unto Abradates, that when we would mention any thing unto him which concerned the Princeſs, it ſhould be under the name of Perinthus : ſo that you may imagine that the Name of Perinthus was in all our Letters. It chanced once as ill luck was, when Perinthus came to Doraliſa's Chamber as ſhe was writing unto Abradates ; and though it was always her cuſtom when ſhe writ, to appoint her Woman that waited upon her, to let none enter before ſhe was firſt acquainted, yet ſhe did not exactly obey her at that time, but on the contrary, ſhe wanting ſomething which was in another Room, ſhe went out, unperceived by her Miſtreſs, and left the door open, hoping to return e're any came : but whilſt ſhe ſtayed talking with ſome of the Princeſs's Women, Perinthus came in, who hearing no noiſe in the Chamber, thought that either none was there, or elſe that Doraliſa was ſick : but to ſatisfie himſelf he went in, and ſaw that ſhe was behind a Screen, writing upon a table oppoſite unto a great Glaſs, and her back towards him : Since Doraliſa's mind was very intent upon her Writing, ſhe never minded any noiſe, and therefore it is no wonder if ſhe did not hear Perinthus enter, who being full of curioſity to ſee what ſhe writ, that he might have ſome ſubject to twit her with, as ſhe had often him, did go towards her, and did tread as ſoftly as if ſhe had been aſleep, and he afraid to wake her : at laſt he came cloſe to her, and leaning his head almoſt over her ſhoulder, he read what ſhe writ unto Abradates; yet could he not know unto whom this Letter was addreſſed: but he was much amazed when the firſt word he read was his own Name; his curioſity augmented, and he read all ſhe had writ, which, as I remember, was in theſe words:

> Perinthus yeſterday ſpoke unto me concerning you in ſuch an obliging way, that I wiſh you knew what we ſaid in your Commendations: your laſt Letter ſeemed unto him the moſt pleaſant in the world, and ſo admirably politick, that I read it no leſs than thrice unto him: You may well know, that ſince he did ſo commend you for it, I dare not after him: I have many other things to ſay, which unto you are more—

As Doraliſa had writ this laſt word, and Perinthus read it with extream impatience to ſee the ſequel, that thereby he might underſtand the beginning, which was like unto a Riddle to him, knowing that Doraliſa never ſhewed him any Letter; ſhe lifted up her eyes, and looking in the Glaſs which was oppoſite to her, ſhe ſaw Perinthus reading her Letter over her ſhoulder. She no ſooner ſpyed him but ſhe cryed out: Fie, fie, Perinthus (ſaid ſhe, and hid her Letter) have you forgot that reſpect which is due unto our Sex? Why, why, fair Doraliſa (ſaid he unto her, and ſmiled) are you making me ſpeak things I never thought upon? I pray let me ſee this Letter which you ſay I thought ſo pleaſant, and which was ſo polite, that I read it no leſs than three times. Doraliſa then perceiving that he had read all ſhe writ, thought it better to turn it into rallery, than make a ſerious matter of it, thinking that the more angry ſhe was, the more would he apprehend it myſterious: alſo ſince thoſe that uſe to play upon others: cannot well take ſo much liberty unto themſelves, unleſs they allow it unto others: ſo ſhe thought that ſhe had no reaſon to be angry with Perinthus, becauſe ſhe had played him a hundred ſuch tricks in her life; ſo that changing her countenance, and beginning to laugh and read the Letter, to gain more time for the explanation of it, Perinthus deſired to read it alſo, and ſhe not denying, he read it word for word. I pray Doraliſa, ſaid he unto her, why did your Pen drop ſuch a lye as this, and to whom do you tell it? for I am certain, that all the day yeſterday you did not ſpeak one word unto me; yet you tell the perſon unto whom you write, that I ſpoke a hundred times of her yeſterday in a moſt obliging manner: And you add further, that her laſt Letter was very pleaſant; and you told all theſe with ſuch a confidence, that you amazed me: However, ſaid Doraliſa, I am confident, I did you no ill office, for in ſaying all this, I ſaid nothing in your diſadvantage: but on the contrary, ſaid that you acknowledg'd it for a polite and pleaſant Letter, and that I durſt not give her any commendations after you.

I beſeech you Doraliſa (ſaid he unto her) tell me, and ſhew me this that I commended ſo, otherwiſe I ſhall be much incenſed: Truly, anſwered ſhe, if I were a bad friend I ſhould ſhew it; but to let you ſee that I am a good one, know that a Lady in Sardis, who for her honour I will not name, did write a Letter unto me, which, to ſhew her wit, ſhe hath ſtuffed full of Fuſtian and big words, which ſignifie nothing: So that knowing by her ſtile ſhe loves to be commended, doubtleſs I did her that office in the higheſt manner, ſince I told her ſhe had your commendations: I ſhould believe you Doraliſa, replyed he, if you would ſhew me this her Letter: Since perhaps you are acquainted with her hand (replyed Doraliſa) I will not ſhew it unto you. In the mean time, Perinthus, added ſhe, I pray leave me the liberty to finiſh out my Letter: Really, ſaid he, I do believe this is a buſineſs of ſome earneſt, for at the place where you left, it ſeems you had more matters to expreſs than complements: 'Tis true (replyed Doraliſa, and laughed) therefore I deſire you to leave me: I cannot, ſaid he; for to be plain with you, I do not believe a word of all this you have told me: What do you believe then (ſaid ſhe unto him?) I know not what to believe or think, yet I am the moſt miſtaken man alive, if this Letter do not contain ſome cloſe ſecrets: If you think ſo, ſaid Doraliſa, then you are unreaſonable to preſs unto a diſcovery of it, ſince you know ſecrets are ſuch things as our friends muſt tell us themſelves, and we ought not to ask them: If I had not ſeen my name in your Letter, replied he, doubtleſs I ſhould be more diſcreet: But ſince you are ſo bold as to tell three or four lies of me, I thought I might be as bold in asking you the truth of thoſe things which I deſire to know: What would you know? replied Doraliſa. I would know, ſaid he, unto whom you direct your Letter: I have already told you, replied ſhe, that I will not; all that I can do for your ſatisfaction is to proteſt moſt ſolemnly, that all I have or ſhall write unto her, does not at all relate unto your intereſt: For Heavens ſake, ſaid Perinthus, do not uſe me thus, for if you refuſe me this, I ſhall relate the ſtory of it, not only to every one here, but unto all the Court alſo when I return to Sardis: Perinthus is ſo diſcreet, replied Doraliſa, that I do not fear he will ſo far incenſe me: Doraliſa has been often ſo waggiſh with me, replied he, that Perinthus would not be much to blame, if he were once in his life revenged: When you have told all you can, replied ſhe, What then will the iſſue be? The iſſue doubtleſs will be, anſwered Perinthus, that they will know you keep a ſecret correſpondence with ſome or other: They know well enough already (replied ſhe, and ſmiled) that I have not yet found this compleat man I look for; therefore my reputation will not be wounded by any thing you can ſay againſt me. Perhaps (ſaid Perinthus then, and looked ſtedfaſtly upon her) you negotiate in behalf of ſome other, and perhaps alſo you have leſs intereſt than I have in the ſecret meaning of this Letter: I ſhould have thought, replied Doraliſa, that a man who will not open his own ſecrets unto any, would not be ſo preſſing to know the ſecrets of others: However it be, ſaid he, I have ſuch an extream deſire to be ſatisfied in what I ask of you, or that you will confeſs it unto me if I can gueſs at it, that there is nothing which I will not willingly do to oblige you unto it: Let me then know what you gueſs it to be, ſaid ſhe, and afterwards I ſhall know how far I can anſwer. As they were upon theſe terms I chanced to enter, not knowing of any conteſt betwixt them: And ſince the Princeſs feared that Doraliſa had not writ unto Abradates obligingly enough, I came to tell her ſhe ſhould not ſeal up her Letter before ſhe ſhewed it unto the Princeſs. To acquit my ſelf of this employment, I whiſpered my meſſage into her ear, but as low as I whiſpered it, Perinthus heard it as well as Doraliſa: So that comparing what I told Doraliſa, unto what he had read in her Letter, he believed that this Letter which the Princeſs deſired to ſee, was the ſame which included his name, and he made no further ſcruple of it, but that this myſterious Letter related unto the Princeſs and Abradates. Doraliſa then offered to tell me the paſſage which was between them, but Perinthus cared no more for this Rallery, and riſing up to go away: I need not ask you any more, ſaid he unto her, for I know it already without putting you to the trouble of telling it. Doraliſa ſeeing a great alteration in his countenance, feared leſt he ſhould ſpeak ſomething in prejudice of the Princeſs, and therefore ſhe ſtayed him: Then telling me in three words the ſubject of their quarrel, to let me underſtand what I ought to ſay, and to perſwade him alſo that there was no myſtery in the Letter, I did what I could to make him believe all this was but a piece of Doraliſa's ſporting Wit, which was in a frolick humour; but I perceived he did not believe me, and ſo certainly he left us. He was no ſooner gone out of the Chamber, but Doraliſa and I called him back again. Upon a little conſultation together, we concluded it better that Perinthus alone ſhould ſuſpect ſomething, than that he ſhould tell this paſſage unto ſome ſuch men as would tell it unto a thouſand, which might produce ill conſequences. Perinthus then being returned into Doraliſa's Chamber, we ſeriouſly entreated him not to reveal this paſſage between him and her; telling him, (to the end he ſhould not deny us, and alſo to deceive him) that e're long we would acquaint him with the truth of the matter. No, no, (replied Perinthus with a hollow kind of expreſſion) I will not reveal this ſecret which is ſo dear unto you, never fear it; I reſpect the perſon to whom it relates, more than to have any ſuch thought. Doraliſa and I would have ſaid more unto him, but he went away without giving us, or we giving him any other anſwer. In the mean time, we reſolved to hinder him from acquainting the Princeſs with this accident, leſt it ſhould too much trouble her, and thought it better to comply with him, and tell exactly what he could gueſs it to be, yet we could not meet with a ready opportunity for it, for none that belonged to the Princeſs could ſee him that day, not that he had ſhut up himſelf to conceal his melancholy, but that he was gone to ſee if he could diſcover whether any of Abradates his men were in Claſomena; and indeed his queſt was not in vain, for he found out by a ſtrange chance, that there was a man lodged in the Captain of the Caſtles houſe, who would not be ſeen; ſo that by inquiring who he was, he underſtood by a ſervant of the Captain's, who was my Couſin, that this ſtranger was to depart in the morning after, that he came but the day before, that he came from Sardis, and that I had ſpoke with him in the Garden. I leave you to judge, Madam, after this, whether a man ſo much in Love, and ſo full of wit and ſpirit as Perinthus was, would not conclude that there was a ſecret correſpondency between Panthea and Abradates, he apprehended then the very truth, and ſaw plainly that his name in Doraliſa's Letter was only an umbrage unto Panthea's name: It is a thing impoſſible to expreſs the deſpair of Perinthus: Is it not miſery enough, ſaid he, that I dare not ſo much as tell the perſon whom I adore, that I love her, but that I muſt be alſo perſecuted with a thouſand ſad circumſtances, which add bitter aggravations unto all my ſorrows? Muſt no name but mine colour the favours which the Princeſs whom I adore confers upon my Rival? Fy, fy, I cannot endure it: And the truth is, Madam, this trivial inconſiderable paſſage did ſo perplex him, that he was beyond all patience: Love does infuſe ſo much folly and weakneſs into the ſpirits of the moſt compleat men, that he had not been half ſo much ſtung, if the Princeſs had expreſſed her favours unto Abradates by any other name than his. This bitter thought did ſo corrode upon his heart, that he intended to deſire the Princeſs not to uſe his name any more in her Letters; and to that end, the next morning he came unto her lodging, but ſo melancholy and altered, that Panthea thinking he had been ill, did moſt obligingly ask him how he did, telling him ſhe ſhould be extreamly ſorry he ſhould fall ſick: Whil'ſt ſhe was recovering her health, and that ſhe intended as he brought her from Sardis to Claſomena, ſo he ſhould carry her back again from Claſomena to Sardis. Perinthus received theſe marks of friendſhip from the Princeſs very reſpectively, but with ſo much ſadneſs in his face, that it was evident there was as much in his ſoul. In the mean while, Doraliſa and I did ſearch for him all that day, and it chanced when he came, that the Princeſs was gone into her Cloſet with Doraliſa, and ſome Claſomenian Ladies, and Perinthus and my ſelf were alone together, in a Tarraſs cloſe by the Chamber: There we ſilently ſtood both of us, in expectation what either would ſay unto the other: At laſt, ſeeing Perinthus ſo buſie with his own thoughts, that he minded nothing; I ſpoke firſt unto him, and I asked him whether he was deſirous I ſhould keep my word, and tell him what he had ſo much deſire to know? No Pherenice, ſaid he, and ſighed, I know too much already; but I have one favour to ask, which I beſeech you do not deny me: If it be both juſt and poſſible, (ſaid I unto him) you ſhall certainly obtain it: Then I conjure you, (replied he) to let Doraliſa uſe my name no more in writing unto that perſon ſhe writ laſt; and it is much better for her to make uſe of any other to hide that which ſhe would have kept a ſecret, for this may prejudice me more than ſhe is aware of: I would have deſired the ſame of Doraliſa her ſelf, but her humour is ſuch, that ſhe never hears me but in way of jeſt; and therefore I addreſs my ſelf unto you, who being of a leſs frolick diſpoſition, has doubtleſs a more tender ſoul to be mov'd at the deſires of your Friends. Perinthus ſpoke after ſuch a mournful manner, as I perceived by his tone the ſadneſs of his heart, which moved mine to pity him: So that anſwering him as ſweetly as I could, to the end I might thereby oblige him to a confidence in me: Perinthus, ſaid I unto him, I ſhall eaſily obtain what you deſire of Doraliſa; and ſince you do forbid her to ſpeak all the good of you ſhe pleaſeth, when occaſion ſhall happen, I do aſſure you, ſhe ſhall uſe your name no more when ſhe writes unto her friend, for I know ſhe infinitely eſteems you, and would not upon any terms give you any offence: But pray tell me, why are you ſo incenſed againſt her for uſing your name, at a time when ſhe could not take any other that ſhe knew better? Pherenice, ſaid he unto me, if you will make me a firm promiſe of fidelity, I will impart part of my thoughts unto you: I will ſeriouſly make that promiſe, ſaid I unto him, provided you conceal nothing from me: Since you never imparted any thing at all to me, (replyed he) I dare not diſcover all I know unto you, unleſs you firſt vow ſecreſie. I thought, after this, Perinthus intended to tell me, he loved the Princeſs; and ſince I longed to hear him ſpeak of his paſſion, that I might endeavour to cure him of it, I promiſed and vowed all he deſired. After which, looking ſtedfaſtly upon me, Is it not true, Pherenice, (ſaid he unto me, with a ſadneſs in his eyes as would have moved the moſt inſenſible ſoul to pity him) that the Letter which Doraliſa writ, was unto Abradates? and that the name of miſerable Perinthus was uſed only to umbrage the name of the adorable Panthea? Perinthus, (ſaid I unto him, and interrupted him) you do not keep within the limits of our conditions, for I promiſed not to reveal any ſecret you ſhall impart unto me; for I perceive, by the very beginning of your diſcourſe, that you are ſo far from imparting and truſting me, that you deſire I ſhould impart and truſt you. Conſider well, Perinthus, what you ſay, and do not begin your diſcourſe with any queſtions, if you deſire I ſhould anſwer you: Neither, to tell you truly, do I very well underſtand, though what you ſuppoſe were true, what prejudice it would be to you, though your name were placed in lieu of Panthea's. If the Prince of Claſomena, (replied he very faintly) ſhould by any accident meet with one of thoſe Letters, might he not ſuſpect me of holding ſome intelligence, and that I did betray him? I, I ſay, unto whom he has ſaid a hundred times, he would not have the Princeſs marry Abradates: Ha, Perinthus, (ſaid I unto him) have you not profeſſed your ſelf ſo obliged unto the ſervice of the Princeſs, as that you ought to wiſh well unto Abradates, if you did believe ſhe looked favourably upon him? Yes, and ſo you would, if you had not ſome other ſecret reaſon, which I perceive well enough, and for your tranquilities ſake, wiſh were not true: Yes, yes, Perinthus, you do love Panthea, and ſome ſparks of jealouſie perſwades you that ſhe loves Abradates: This is it that makes you take it ſo ill your name ſhould be uſed in a Letter, which, you think, is unto that Prince: I have long ſince perceived the paſſion in you to her, yet I knew no reaſon you had to truſt none with it, but to ſmother that fire which conſumes you, a little ſpark, if covered, will grow to a great flame; but a great fire will not hurt, if not covered; therefore, let me perſwade you ingenuouſly to confeſs it unto me, otherwiſe you will induce me to tell the Princeſs all I know: If you will truſt me, added I, I ſhall promiſe you an inviolable fidelity; and if you will not, I do proteſt, that as ſoon as I am parted from you, I will tell the Princeſs, that I think you are in love with her, and ſhall give her ſuch evidences of the truth of it, that perhaps ſhe will forbid you ever ſeeing her again. Perinthus hearing me ſay ſo, looked attentively upon me, and ſpoke not a word: He conſidered which was the more advantageous for him, to confeſs, or not confeſs that he loved her: If I confeſs it, ſaid he, perhaps ſhe will tell, and if ſhe tell, I am undone: But if I do not confeſs, ſhe will the ſooner tell, and my ruine is the more inevitable, both ways ruin'd, what ſhall I do? Then afterwards, imagining I would never be ſo importunate to know a thing which I would condemn in him, he began to flatter himſelf with a bottomleſs hope of he knew not what, and anſwer me enigmatically. When I ſaw his ſoul begin to ſtagger, I preſſed him further, and that ſo home, that I ſaid the Princeſs ſhould preſently know he was in Love with her, if he would not acknowledge it to me. At laſt, after he had made me ſolemnly ſwear that I would never diſcover what he would tell me, neither unto Doralisa nor the Princeſs, nor any elſe whatſoever, he promiſed to lay open the whole truth unto me; yet firſt I declared unto him that I would engage my ſelf no further than to be faithful unto him, and to comfort him, but not to further him in his paſſion.

Perhaps, Madam, you will ask me why I would urge Perinthus to confeſs his Love; to which I anſwer, Becauſe I thought it would be a conſiderable ſervice unto the Princeſs, if I could ſcrue my ſelf into the credit of a man who had ſuch a prevalency with the Prince her Father; and I could be an inſtrument to prevent any hurt to Abradates, whom I knew he did not love: Alſo I hoped that my advice might perhaps happily cure him of that diſeaſe which did ſo much torment him, and would be his Ruine: So that my ends were rather at the Princeſs ſervice, and the tranquility of Perinthus, than out of any curioſity that I deſired to know the ſecrets of his heart: however Perinthus confeſſed his paſſion unto me; related all his raptures, and told me all his thoughts: So that after he had expreſſed the grandure of his paſſion, his purity and conſtancy, Judge, Pherenice, ſaid he unto me, whether I had not good reaſon to deſire that my Name ſhould not be employed to make Abradates happy. Perinthus (ſaid I unto him with much ſweetneſs, to the end I might inſinuate my ſelf into his opinion) I am very much obliged to you for letting me know that from your own mouth which I ſo much deſired, and I aſſure you that I will conceal this ſecret wherewith you have entruſted me, as cloſely as you can your ſelf. Ah Pherenice (ſaid he unto me) perhaps you will keep it too cloſely; and I do not know whether at the ſame time I deſire you to conceal it, I ſhould not alſo entreat you to tell it unto the——At this word Perinthus ſtopt, not being able to pronounce the word Princeſs; then preſently reprehending himſelf, No, no Pherenice, ſaid he to me, do not mind my raving, but my reaſon, which bids me rather dye for my adored Panthea, and never to let her know I dye for her; therefore be as faithful as your promiſe, and let me only have the comfort to ſpeak unto her whom ſhe loves of the torments which my paſſion puts upon me: in the mean time, as I will not entreat you to render me any good office unto the Princeſs, ſo do not you entreat me to be ſerviceable unto Abradates. The caſe is not the ſame, replied I, for if I undertake to do you any good office to the Princeſs Panthea, I ſhould abſolutely ruine you, ſo you ſhould ask me a thing impoſſible: but if I entreat you to do a good office for Abradates unto the Prince of Claſomena, I do entreat you to do a thing which may eaſily be done. Eaſily (replied Perinthus haſtily,) ah Pherenice you do not know how difficult it is to do a good office for a Rival, and eſpecially a favoured Rival. But Perinthus, replied I, would you have the Princeſs marry a man ſhe hates? I would ſhe were contented, replied he, but for a comfort unto my miſeries, I would ſhe would marry none. As we were thus in diſcourſe, the Princeſs came out of her Cloſet, and went into the Garden to take the ayr, whither I followed her, but not Perinthus, but he retired as full of ſhame, as if the Princeſs did divine what he had told me. Doraliſa, who had obſerved the diſcourſe which we had together, did ask me what it was: but though ſhe and I had promiſed each other to render an account of what we ſhould diſcover concerning Perinthus; yet I did not think my ſelf obliged to tell her what I had vowed unto him to conceal; and indeed I told her nothing but what I knew before he had diſcovered himſelf unto me. After this, Perinthus ſpoke oftner unto me than he uſed, though he was ever one of my good friends: but what arguments and addreſſes ſoever he uſed to know of me upon what terms Abradates ſtood in Panthea's mind, I did not tell him one word; and as he was one day importuning me, Peace Perinthus (ſaid I unto him) and never ask me that which I would never tell you though I did know it: and be aſſured of this, that as I will never betray your truſt, ſo I will never betray the Princeſs, unto whom I owe a greater fidelity than unto you; and indeed from this time he durſt never ask me any more queſtions. Some few days after, he received a Letter from Andramites, which let him know that Mexaris had a little claſhed with the Prince of Claſomena, and that he was gone unto one of his houſes, ſome two daies journey from Sardis: ſo that Perinthus did not well know whether he ſhould be ſad or glad at it: for when he conſidered Mexaris as one that was in hopes to enjoy Panthea, he was very glad he was faln foul with the Prince of Claſomena; but when he conſidered him as an obſtacle unto the hopes of Abradates, he was ſorry that Mexaris was not in that Princes favour. Yet notwithſtanding all this, his hopes that Crœſſus would never conſent that Panthea ſhould marry either Mexaris or Abradates, did procure him ſome conſolation; yet it may well be ſaid that he never enjoyed any pleaſing hours: not only becauſe he had many real miſeries upon him, but becauſe he ſucked bitter poiſon out of every thing; and when the Princeſs was recovered, he grieved in lieu of rejoycing at it, foreſeeing that the return of her health would be her return to Sardis. Pherenice (ſaid he one day unto me, when the Princeſs had freſher Roſes in her cheeks than e're ſhe had ſince her ſickneſs paled them) am not I a moſt miſerable man to ſee that the Princeſs is a more poliſhed beauty by her ſickneſs? had it impaired her, Abradates perhaps would have leſſened his Love to her, and that if ſhe had perceived it ſhe would have had leſs good will to him: but alas, I am too unfortunate to ſee that, for ſhe will return to Sardis more gloriouſly fair than when ſhe came from it. You may eaſily imagine by this, Madam, how much that man was tormented, who grieved at the beauty and welfare of the Perſon he loved. Within a few days after we departed, and Perinthus appeared ſo melancholy, that if I had not known the ſecret of his heart, I ſhould have thought he had left the object of all his affections behind him: Doraliſa alſo began to chide him extreamly the firſt day of our Journey, and truly that helped us to paſs on with much more pleaſure: for as oft as Perinthus, who was on horſeback, came near the Princeſs Coach, from which he was never far off, ſhe told him of a thouſand pleaſant paſſages, unto which he would anſwer with ſuch a fretting chafe as made the beſt ſport in the world. The firſt days Journey being thus paſt, we continued the next; but alas, it was not ſo pleaſant: For be pleaſed to know, Madam, that being come into a thick dark Forreſt, in a place where was a great Pond, which we left upon the right hand, and which being ſhadowed with the thick Wood, was both a moſt pleaſing and a moſt terrible object: Be pleaſed to know, I ſay, that being come unto this place, we ſaw upon our left hand come from divers places of the Forreſt forty or fifty men on horſeback with Swords in their hands; one of which I preſently knew to be the Prince Mexaris; who commanded the Coachman of the Princeſs's Coach to ſtay; which accordingly he did, becauſe he thought he could do no other: for, Madam, you muſt know the Princeſs in this voyage had but one Coach full of women, beſides her own; fifteen horſemen, and ſome footmen, but very few: 'Tis true, Perinthus might well be counted for more than one man, conſidering the prodigious acts he did that day: he no ſooner ſaw Mexaris come with a Sword in his hand, and in the head of all his men (who in coming out of the Wood rallied about him) but he put himſelf in a poſture of defence, and calling all the Princeſs's men together, he ſtood between the Coach and the Prince Mexaris, who had no ſooner commanded the Coach to ſtay, but Perinthus advanced towards him with his Sword lifted up; Mexaris retreated a pace or two; and endeavouring to carry away the Princeſs without bloodſhed, or perhaps without expoſing himſelf: Perinthus (ſaid he unto him) do not force me to ruine you, nor make any vain reſiſtance againſt a man who is in a condition to force you unto obedience. No, no, Sir, ſaid Perinthus, I have but a life to manage, and you ſhall not take away the Princeſs as long as Perinthus lives. Whilſt Mexaris was keeping Perinthus in talk, four of his men went to the Coach, which Perinthus ſeeing, without any more ado he fell upon Mexaris, crying out he ſhould not find it an eaſie matter to carry Panthea away as long as he lived: and indeed he aſſaulted him with ſuch fury, as Mexaris ſtood in need of all his men to relieve him, as afterward we underſtood by one of the Princeſs's men. As for us, Madam, we were in ſuch a fright, that we knew not what we ſaw: For my part, I only ſaw a great confuſion, and heard a hideous noiſe. The moſt advantagious thing for us was, that thoſe men who Mexaris commanded to ſeize upon the Princeſs whilſt the reſt fought, ſeeing their Maſter engaged in a Fight, of which they knew not the event, notwithſtanding the inequality of number, they let us alone, and reſolved to ſtay till they ſaw the Victory more certain, contenting themſelves with keeping the Coaches from ſtirring away: but the longer they ſtayed, the weaker and fewer their Party grew: for Perinthus fought with ſuch magnanimous courage, that I have heard certainly reported, he killed ſix of Mexaris his men with his own hands, being wounded himſelf in ſeveral places: Thoſe who ſeconded him did play their parts very well: ſince of fifteen men which he had, three were killed, and four more out of fight, he had no other hope left but to dye in defending the Princeſs: ſo that fighting in deſperation, he did ſuch things as I know not how to relate unto you. As the poor Perinthus was thus engaged, he ſaw ſome Cavaliers galloping to the place where he fought, and ſince he queſtioned not but that they belonged unto Mexaris, he gave himſelf for loſt: yet deſiring to ſell his life at as dear a rate as he could, and to kill Mexaris before he was killed himſelf, he advanced towards him with ſuch a fury in ſpight of all his men which ſurrounded him, and engaged himſelf ſo amongſt theſe

Raviſhers, that if Abradates, in the head of thoſe Cavaliers which Perinthus took to belong unto Mexaris had not come in to his relief, the poor Perinthus had died there. But this Prince was no ſooner come up with twenty horſe, than the ſtate of things did put on a new face; foreſeeing Perinthus in danger, he made ſtreight to him, and clearly diſingaged him.

To preſent unto you, Madam, the aſtoniſhment of Mexaris, of Perinthus, of us, and every one, to ſee Abradates in that place, is more than language can reach unto, Mexaris then thought the Gods reſolved his ruine, Panthea hoped they would preſerve her, and Perinthus told me ſince, that when he ſaw Abradates ſave his life, he was ſo extreamly full of ſorrow, that he had a mind to fight againſt him as well as againſt Mexaris, who ſince the arrival of the Prince of Suſiana, thought it diſcretion to retreat, ſince he was wounded, and neither in a condition to carry away his Princeſs, nor fight with his Rival, yet he was hotly purſued: But ſince the principal deſign of Abradates and Perinthus was only to preſerve the Princeſs, they durſt not venture to ſcatter themſelves in the thick of the Forreſt: So that returning again towards her, ſhe called them her Deliverers, and rendred them a million of thanks for the ſervice which they had done her: Then, as ſhe obſerved, that Abradates by his arrival had ſaved the life of Perinthus, ſhe rendred him no leſs thanks for that, than for keeping her out of the power of Mexaris: And ſince ſhe did apprehend with abundance of tenderneſs all that Perinthus had done for her, ſhe did accept it with great acknowledgments. On the other ſide, Perinthus looking upon Abradates, as upon him that had reaped the fruit of all his pains, he almoſt repented of what he had done, and perhaps rather wiſhed Mexaris had carried away the Princeſs, than that Abradates ſhould ſhare with him in the glory of defending her, or that for his particular he ſhould owe his life unto him. Since that place was not very pleaſant for us to ſtay in, where nothing was to be ſeen but dead and dying men: After all theſe complements were tumultuouſly addreſſed, after the Princeſs had asked Abradates what accident brought him ſo happily thither, and after he had told her that it was, becauſe he was informed of Mexaris his deſign, by one of his Domeſticks, therefore he immediately mounted horſe to oppoſe him, then the Coach went on. Abradates leaving ſome of his men to take care of thoſe that were not yet dead, as well enemies as friends; alſo to relieve the one, and ſecure the other: But as they were going on, the Princeſs perceived that Perinthus was wounded in his left hand, and that he loſt blood enough to weaken him, and therefore ſhe cauſed her Coach to ſtay, and cauſing him to come in, I gave him a Scarf to bind up his hand. Thus the firſt Liberator of Panthea was in the Coach, and the Liberator of Perinthus and Panthea both rid by them, and could not chuſe but render thanks unto this ſecret Lover for ſo well defending the Princeſs: But alas, what hollow-hearted anſwers did the poor Perinthus return unto all the civilities of Abradates; The only conſolation he had was ſometimes to look upon me, and to let me ſee the ſorrows of his heart in his eyes: At the firſt habitable place we came at, the Princeſs ſtayed to dreſs the hand of Perinthus, the blood being not yet quite ſtanched; after which we went on. I had forgot to tell you, Madam, how after the combat was ended, we found one of Mexaris his men diſmounted, of whom we ſeized, and whom Abradates cauſed to be brought unto Sardis, that Crœſſus might be better inform'd of all paſſages. I will not tell you, Madam, how extreamly that Prince was incenſed againſt Mexaris, when he heard of his intentions to take away Panthea, nor how the Prince of Claſomena was ſurprized, grieved, and angry: But give me leave to tell you that which indeed is admirable, for Perinthus who did what he could to kill Mexaris, did now uſe all endeavours poſſible by the means of Andramites, to appeaſe Crœſſus, upon no other motive, but only to make him an obſtacle unto Abradates. Thus the miſerable Perinthus, (as generous as he was) was forced by the violence of his paſſion to further him whoſe life he would have taken away, and to hinder him unto whom he was a debtor for his own, yet was he not able to effect the one nor the other; for beſides that Crœſſus was highly incenſed againſt Mexaris, for offering not only to marry Panthea contrary to his commands, but to ſteal her away: There happened another oppoſition, for the Princeſs fearing leſt Mexaris ſhould return to Sardis, and make his peace, ſhe deſired Doraliſa to treat Andramites a little better, and to deſire him that he would keep the King in his angry mind againſt Mexaris, which accordingly ſhe did; and Andramites the next morning went unto Perinthus, and told him that he could not ſatisfie his deſires, becauſe Doraliſa deſired of him the quite contrary; therefore he told him, that where the caſe of a Miſtreſs and a friend comes in competition, he ſhould not think himſelf unjuſt, in giving the precedency unto Doraliſa before him: You may imagine, Madam, how ſad Perinthus was at this news; for he knew very well Doraliſa would never have made this deſire, but at the inſtance of the Princeſs: Seeing then he could not oblige his friend unto his deſires, yet he ſolicited him to keep Crœſſus ſtill unto his deſign of not conſenting that Abradates ſhould marry Panthea; and indeed Andramites did promiſe him to ſatisfie that deſire, provided Doraliſa did not move him to oppoſe that alſo. This tranſaction of Perinthus did not proceed from any willingneſs to prejudice a Prince unto whom he was ſo much obliged, but the conſideratiou that he was his hindrance from poſſeſſing the Princeſs, was above all other conſiderations whatſoever: He never acquainted me with this negotiation, but only with the miſeries which he endured. In the mean while, that dangerous poyſon which was in his ſoul, did ſo invenom his wound that it would not heal, and his hand was as ſore as his heart; he grew weak, pale and languiſhing, being in a gentle Fever, which never intermitted one moment: But whil'ſt he endured all theſe ſecret maladies. Abradates was much happier than he uſed to be, for the Prince of Claſomena knowing what he had done for the Princeſs his Daughter, did treat him incomparably better than ordinary, and could not in any civility forbid him the viſiting Panthea, with whom his hours were much more ſweet ſince Mexaris was not preſent. It ſeemed that Prince, (who was retired unto a Town, the Governour whereof was his creature) was dangerouſly wounded, ſo that there being no fears of his return, Abradates enjoyed as many pleaſures as Perinthus did ſorrows; yet had he this bitter ingredient amongſt his ſweets, that Crœſſus was no better diſpoſed than uſual to conſent unto his Marriage with Panthea, ſo that he had ſome Cloudy days as well as many Sun-ſhine. After he had lived thus ſome certain time, he underſtood that Crœſſus, having conferred with the Prince of Claſomena, at laſt gave him leave to return, and to carry the Princeſs his Daughter with him, to the end that abſence might extinguiſh the paſſion in Abradates his ſoul: Perinthus you may imagine did not oppoſe this deſign, but on the contrary, did ſo zealouſly prompt the Prince his Maſter unto it, and alſo ſet Andramites upon Crœſſus to haſten it, that the voyage was talked on as a thing certainly reſolved upon: So that when Abradates thought himſelf neareſt his happineſs, he feared to be furtheſt off it. The Princeſs was extreamly troubled at this reſolution, inſomuch as ſhe deſired Doraliſa to be extreamly urgent with Andramites to prevent this journey: For my particular, without either telling the Princeſs or Doraliſa, I ſpoke unto Perinthus, and told him, though I found no diſpoſition in him to ſatisfie my deſires: Then he told me at firſt, how knowing that both Crœſſus and the Prince of Claſomena, for ſome reaſons of State, would never ſuffer Panthea to marry Abradates; and therefore he thought it ſerviceable to the Princeſs to negotiate that ſhe might be further off him, leſt any longer converſation with this Prince ſhould too much ingage her heart. Moreover, the Prince his Maſter, deſired not to let ſlip this favourable opportunity to return into his own Dominions, and get out of that place where he had not liberty to retire himſelf without this reaſon: In ſhort, he told me ſo many things, and ſo handſomely, that any other beſides my ſelf would have believed that Love had no part in all his actions: But in the concluſion he ingenuouſly confeſſed, that to ſeparate Abradates and Panthea was his main deſign, which prompted him unto all he did; but he told me all this in ſuch violent raptures of Love, that as angry as I was againſt him, I could not quarrel with him, as I thought I ſhould. In the mean time, Doraliſa having ſolicited Andramites, and employed all the power ſhe had over him, to cauſe this voyage to be broken off, telling him it was meerly in conſideration of her own intereſt, becauſe ſhe was to loſe the Princeſs: Andramites told her, he could not do her the ſervice he deſired, for the voyage was ſo abſolutely reſolved upon, that it was impoſſible to prevent it. Now you may imagine Abradates all ſorrows, and Panthea was not without her ſhare, for ſhe perceived that the deſigns of thoſe that tranſacted her ſeparation from Abradates was, that they ſhould never Marry, and therefore not to ſee each other; yet ſince ſhe had a high and conſtant ſoul, ſhe did ſo hide her own ſorrows, that thereby ſhe augmented the ſorrows of Abradates; he conceived that his Love deſerved at leaſt a melancholy look from her, if perhaps not tears from her eyes: He ſighed and ſorrowed ſo exceſſively at her inſenſibility, that the Princeſs to pacifie him, was pleaſed to meet him at Doraliſa's houſe, leſt he ſhould run into ſome violent reſolution: for ſince the Princeſs had but two days to ſtay in Sardis, time was very precious with them, he came then to Doraliſa's houſe, and ſaw her ſo ſad all that day, as he had good reaſon to be ſatisfied at the tenderneſs of her affection, and more than himſelf had at the croſſneſs of his fortune: This Meeting was extreamly ſad, and the parting was inſupportable, not only becauſe they were to be abſent, but becauſe their abſence had no limits; and ſince the Princeſs would never be enduced to do any thing contrary to her duty, ſhe told Abradates, who did extreamly importune her, that ſhe would not ſuffer him to come and ſee her in a diſguiſe.

At laſt, Madam, after all was ſaid that could be, between two perſons who were reſolved to love for ever, and who feared never to meet again, they parted: For though Abradates was to make a ceremonious Viſit unto the Princeſs to bid her adieu, he valued that but as an empty ſuperſtition, ſince he knew he could not then talk in private with her; ſo that when ſhe left him at Doraliſa's houſe, he looked upon her like a Statue, and as if he would have ſunk with ſorrow: As ſoon as ſhe was gone, ſome of the ſervants of Abradates came to tell him that Crœſſus ſent all about to enquire for him: but ſince the mind of Abradates was much incenſed againſt that Prince, he bade them tell thoſe that looked for him, that they could not find him; and ſo he ſtayed above two hours with Doraliſa, talking of the Princeſs, and the miſerable condition he was in: after which, he went to Crœſſus, who carrying him into his Cloſet with extraordinary civility, told him, that his fortunes now looked with another face, and that he ſhould receive a Letter from the Queen of Suſiana, which would tell him that the Prince his Brother, and the King his Father were both dead, and that he was to be King: This News did extreamly ſurprize Abradates, and moved him unto much ſorrow; for though theſe two dead Princes had in their lives been both extreamly unjuſt and rigorous in exiling him, yet natural affection did produce ſuch effects in him as uſeth to be in generous perſons; ſo that he received the news of his being King of Suſiana with a mixture of ſome ſorrows; but yet ſuch ſorrows as were not above his Reaſon. Crœſſus told him, that the man who brought this news had a Letter for him from the Queen his Mother; who ſent this meſſage in particular, that ſhe conceived it expedient for him to ſtay yet in Sardis, until four Grandees of his Kingdom, who would ſet forth within three days, were come to deſire him in the Name of all his People, That he would pleaſe to come and take upon him that Scepter which the King his Father had left him, who the laſt hour of his life did expreſs his Repentance for exiling him, and did declare him his legitimate Succeſſor; ceſſor; ſince he lived three days after his eldeſt Son, who only cauſed that bad underſtanding between them. After Abradates knew all theſe things, he retired to his Lodging with a mind full of various apprehenſions, ſo that at firſt he could not himſelf well tell what he thought. Since it was now very late, very few did know this news that night: but the next morning there was not one which did not know that Abradates was King of Suſiana, and rejoyced at it: Perinthus himſelf was glad, becauſe he flattered himſelf with an imagination that Abradates would be forced to depart that very day, and that perhaps ambition and abſence might root out of his heart all thoughts of Love unto the Princeſs: ſo that I do verily think ſhe apprehended fewer joys at the good fortune of Abradates, than Perinthus did; becauſe ſhe feared leſt the change of that Prince's condition ſhould work any mutable effects upon his heart. In the mean while, though all the World rejoyced that he was King; yet was he forced to a ceremonious Mourning, and to go and grieve at the very ſame thing which they in his preſence rejoyced at: The Prince of Claſomena went to him, and ſo did Perinthus alſo, hoping always that as for Abradates in mounting his Throne, every ſtep unto it was a ſtep further from Panthea: The Princeſs for her part ſent to viſit him, and to teſtifie unto him the ſhare of joys ſhe took in the happineſs which had befallen him, and that ſhe her ſelf with the Princeſs of Lydia would come and congratulate with him. But ſince this Complement was only ſuch a one as Ceremony and Civility might exact from her, Abradates was not fully ſatisfied with it; but had rather ſhe had ſent unto him by ſome more truſty Meſſenger, who ſhould have told him ſomething in private from her. In the mean time, ſince the Princeſs was to depart within two days, his Soul ſeemed to be in a very Hell: for beſides, that it was not handſom for him to go ſo ſoon either to her Lodging or Doraliſa's, he thought it leſs handſome to talk of any Marriage before the Deputies from Suſiana had addreſſed themſelves, and ſo ſoon after the death of two Princes who were ſo near him;

this he conceived to be out of all reaſon. In the mean time, his Love to Panthea was ſo predominate, that he conſulted not a minute with himſelf what to do, for he was fully reſolved, as ſoon as he was King, to make her Queen; and not to accept of the Crown but to put it upon her head: On the other ſide, Perinthus did preſs the Prince of Claſomena with all his arguments to be gone from Sardis; but as good fortune for this Prince was, he fell ſo ſick that the Journey was deferred: This was no ſmall joy unto Abradates, who now ſaw there was no ſuch great haſte required in his Tranſactions. But Madam, as it is the cuſtom of the World to judge too raſhly upon the thoughts of others, ſo, for two days after this news was brought unto Abradates, one would have ſaid that he never had any thoughts of Panthea; and the conceit of it did ſo pleaſingly flatter up Perinthus, that he reſented real joys. Whileſt theſe hopes were ſmoothing his fancy, the Deputies from Suſa arrived; who after they had preſented unto Abradates the fidelity of all his ſubjects, rendered thanks unto Crœſſus from their Queen for the protection which he had given him during his unjuſt Exile, and aſſured him that ſhe would always reſent it as a great obligation upon her. After this Abradates, who had no mind to ſend either unto the Princeſs, or Doraliſa, or me, until he had brought things to ſuch a paſs as he deſired, went to Crœſſus in the morning, to tell him, that thinking he would never have been ſo averſe to the Marriage of Panthea and himſelf, but becauſe he would have no ſtranger Prince eſtabliſhed within his Dominions, therefore he came to declare unto him, that he was ready to renounce all the Rights and Intereſts this Princeſs had or ever ſhould have unto the Principality of Claſomena (if ſhe would conſent unto it as well as himſelf,) provided he would conſent unto his Marriage with her. Crœſſus hearing a Propoſition ſo advantagious for himſelf, was much pleaſed with it, and promiſed to motion it unto the Prince of Claſomena: After which, Abradates returning moſt hearty thanks, and conjured him to keep his word, he went the ſame day unto the Prince of Claſomena to motion the Marriage between the Princeſs his daughter and the King of Suſiana: and although he had not yet the conſent of the Queen his Mother, yet he believed ſhe would approve of any motion which ſhould have the Authority of Crœſſus to countenance it, who would never make the motion further than the Queen his Mother ſhould give her conſent, of which Abradates did make no queſtion: The Deputies of Suſa alſo, unto whom Abradates had imparted his deſign, did ſo confidently aſſure him he would find no oppoſition from the Queen his Mother, that he did not fear he ſhould incenſe her by it, and ſo much the leſs, becauſe theſe Deputies told him, that all his Subjects (conſidering there was not a Princeſs in all his own Kingdom, nor in any of his neighbour Dominions, whom he could marry) would be wondrous well ſatisfied, if he brought them a Queen every way ſo illuſtrious as the Princeſs of Claſomena. Crœſſus then propounded this Match unto the Prince of Claſomena, and it ſeemed ſo advantagious unto him, that without any further conſultation he accepted of it: ſo that Crœſſus, to loſe no time, ſent for Abradates, to the end they might diſpatch away in all Poſt haſte unto the Queen of Suſiana. Since this could not be ſo cloſely carried but ſome Reports of it would fly about, a ſervant unto the Princeſs came to tell me with great earneſtneſs, that all was concluded upon, the Match was made up, and the Princeſs was immediately to be Queen of Suſiana. Though I indeed hoped ſuch a thing might be ſo, yet I confeſs I was much ſurprized at the ſuddenneſs of it, ſo that in the firſt rapture of my Joy, after I had made the ſervant tell me how he came to know it, I writ preſently a Letter unto Doraliſa (who was with Perinthus at her own Lodging) to acquaint her with it, and as I remember theſe were the words:

Pherenice unto Doraliſa.

IF it be true (as I have often heard you ſay) that he who gives much, loves much, it muſt neceſſarily be concluded, that the King of Suſiana loves the Princeſs more than ever any loved; ſince in giving her a Crown which is deſcended to him, he has given her more than ever any did: If you have a reaſonable Soul, come and help the Prince to put it upon her head, and participate in the Joyes of

PHERENICE.

Doraliſa had no ſooner read this Letter, but never thinking of the conceit ſhe had, that Perinthus was in Love with Panthea, ſhe gave it him to read: See, Perinthus, ſaid ſhe, what Pherenice has ſent me, and go along with me immediately, for I ſhould be vexed to the Soul, if any ſhould have the ſtart of me in rejoycing with the Princeſs. Perinthus then read the Letter; but he read with ſo great a perplexity of Soul, and turbulency in his looks, that Doraliſa remembring her former conceits, How do you, Perinthus? (ſaid ſhe unto him) What troubles you ſo much? Is it poſſible that joy ſhould work the ſame effects in you that ſorrow and anger uſe to produce? For truly, I ſee at one time in you both ſadneſs, anger, and deſpair, but I do not ſee the cauſe, unleſs my ſuſpicions prove true, and that there be as much Love in your heart, as there appears melancholy in your eyes. Ah, Doraliſa (cryed he out) why was I not ſo happy as to dye in fighting with Mexaris, rather than live to ſee my ſelf in ſuch a miſerable condition? I would I could conceal my follies as hitherto I have from you; but ſince I cannot chuſe but teſtifie my paſſion by my grieving at the good fortune of the Princeſs Panthea, I had rather confeſs my crime, and have recourſe unto your diſcretion, than to deny a truth unto you which you know but too well. I do confeſs therefore, Doraliſa, that I do love the Princeſs, and have loved her with as much zeal, as I do now, ever ſince I was capable of loving; but with ſuch a violent zeal, as I wonder I have not dyed a thouſand times: yet notwithſtanding there was ever ſo much purity in my Love, that I never had the leaſt hope, no nor ſo much as wiſhed for any thing, but that ſhe ſhould never marry Abradates. Yet this Abradates who is going to marry her, is he who makes her a Queen , and ſends me to my grave, and happy were I if I were in it before that fatal day of ſolemnization. Perinthus pronounced all theſe words with ſo much vehemency, and in ſuch a concerning manner, that the heart of Doraliſa, who did infinitely eſteem him, was much moved unto pity , and ſhe began to comfort him : I ever imagined, ſaid ſhe unto him, that you were in Love with the Princeſs, but I do confeſs I never thought your paſſion ſo violent. Oh Heavens, ſaid he, could you ever think that one can love the Princeſs with any mediocrity ? And how was it poſſible you ſhould know (for know it you did) the Reaſon why I denied obedience unto the Princeſs's Commands, in applying my ſelf unto your ſervice, and not believe my Love of her moſt violent ? Did you not know that it was Panthea only that could hinder Perinthus from loving Doraliſa ? And there is no queſtion, but ſince I did ſo highly eſteem you, I ſhould alſo have loved you, if my heart had not been already engaged, and therefore without any accuſing me of inſenſibility towards you, I beſeech you pity me, and help me to conceal, for a few days which I have to live, that which I have with ſo much care concealed all my life. But can you not poſſibly ſuit your mind unto your fortune ? (ſaid Doraliſa :) Did you not ever know, that you could never hope for any thing from the Princeſs ? No not ſo much as to endure your paſſion ? Yes (replied the ſad Perinthus, and ſighed) Why then are you deſperate ? replied ſhe : Becauſe the only man who I would not have had happy, anſwered he, is now upon the point of being ſo. This ſeems to be rather a ſymptom of hatred to Abradates , replied Doraliſa , than any teſtimony of Love to Panthea. Ha, Doraliſa , cryed he out, how ignorant you are in the effects of Love ! for if I did not love Panthea, certainly I ſhould love Abradates : yes, Doraliſa, as predominate as my paſſion is, I muſt needs acknowledge him to be a moſt excellent qualified man ; but the more excellencies he hath, the more I envy his good fortune , and the more he renders me miſerable Time, replied ſhe, will happily cure you. Yes, if I live ſo long as to wait for its Remedies, medies, anſwered he; but I believe I ſhall not, nor is it my deſire. In the mean time, ſince I would not have my deſpair appear, and ſince it is impoſſible to hide my ſorrows, and ſince I cannot go to the Princeſs but I ſhall expreſs ſome ſigns of my Love, it is my beſt courſe to retire my ſelf. Since I have been a long time without my health, it will be an eaſie matter perhaps to make the world believe, that the indiſpoſition of my body is the cauſe of the indiſpoſition in my mind: this will hide the cauſe of my melancholy from thoſe few which I ſhall ſee.

Doraliſa hearing Perinthus ſpeak in this manner, did with all her arguments perſwade him to ſtrive with himſelf, and not to recluſe himſelf from the ſociety of the world: but ſhe found no poſſibility to divert him from the deſign he intended, and therefore ſhe left him: he deſired her at parting not to ſpeak a word of his paſſion unto the Princeſs, and I do not well know, whether he did not in his heart deſire ſhe would tell her ſomething; yet ſhe told her not a ſyllable, knowing very well that ſhe could not underſtand of the paſſion he had to her, and the condition unto which he was brought, without either anger or ſorrow, or perhaps both: But though ſhe would not diſturb her Joys in telling her of it, yet ſhe told it unto me in particular, and when I ſaw ſhe knew it as well as I, then I related unto her all that I did know; and truly both of us were ſo full of pity to him, and ſo ſorry ſuch a compleat man as he was ſhould be in ſuch a miſerable condition, that we apprehended the good fortune of the Princeſs with leſs ſatisfaction than otherwiſe we ſhould: Yet ſince we hoped that time would be a Comforter unto him, it did not keep us from being very pleaſant; and indeed Doraliſa had a hundred jolly conceits upon the avarice of Mexaris and generoſity of Abradates, which ſhe told unto the Princeſs; ſhe told her alſo that ſhe was much happier than ever ſhe hoped to be, in finding ſo ſoon that which ſhe had ſought for ſo long, and could never find, to wit, a compleat man which never loved any but her ſelf; then ſhe deſired the Princeſs that ſhe would not command her any more to be kind unto Andramites, ſince now ſhe had no more need of his ſolicitations unto Crœſſus: Since Andramites, (replyed the Princeſs) is a friend unto Perinthus, I ſhould be very unwilling to caſt him off. Doraliſa was about to anſwer her, but the Princeſs prevented her, by asking where Perinthus was? wondering he did not preſent himſelf, and his complements of joy: Doraliſa would not tell her ſhe came newly from him, but told her ſhe knew not where he was: Then preſently after, the Prince of Claſomena ſent for Panthea, to tell her what his reſolutions were, ſo that the reſt of the day paſſed on without any thoughts of Perinthus. But the next day when Abradates came to viſit the Princeſs, as one whom he was to marry, and when ſhe remembred that no news was heard all that while of Perinthus, ſhe began to wonder, and to ask me whether I knew what was become of him? and when I ſaid no, ſhe ſent one of her ſervants to him, and to tell him that ſhe took it ill, he ſhould not come to rejoyce with her, for the happy ſucceſs in her affairs; and that unleſs he were even at deaths door, ſhe ſhould have much ado to pardon this neglect. After he whom the Princeſs ſent unto Perinthus had delivered this meſſage; Tell the Princeſs, replyed he, that ſince I ſhall obtain a pardon at my death, I ſhall hope e're long to die in her favour, ſince certainly I ſhall not live long. Perinthus added unto this ſome complements of courſe, but with ſuch a weak trembling voice (as he who ſpoke unto him related unto the Princeſs) that ſhe did really believe him to be very ſick; and not doubting but the Phyſitian which belonged to the Prince her Father, had ſeen him, ſhe ſent unto him to know what Perinthus ailed, but ſhe wondered when the Phyſitian told her he had not ſeen him of late daies.

Doraliſa who was then preſent, would have excuſed the matter, and ſaid, that Perinthus happily had ſent for ſome other Phyſitian; but he who was there preſent aſſured the Princeſs that could not be: So that to be better ſatisfied in what condition Perinthus was, ſhe commanded that Phyſitian to go and ſee him from her, and to give her an account how he was. In the mean time, Abradates thought himſelf in a Heaven of happineſs, and hoped nothing could interrupt his joyes, yet did he not think his happineſs fully compleat, becauſe he had not yet met with Perinthus, and intended the next day to give him a viſit, and diſcourſe of his joyes unto him: But alas, this miſerable Lover cared as little for his viſit, as he did for the Phyſician whom the Princeſs ſent unto him, who in obedience unto her commands went the next morning to ſee him before the Sun was up, yet did he not find him aſleep, for his cares would not permit him to reſt one minute. Aſſoon as he came into his Chamber, he ſaw his face ſo altered, that he made no queſtion but he was more than ordinarily ſick; he told him then, that he wondred he would not ſend for him, and afterwards told him what commands he had received from the Princeſs, to render unto her an account of his health. At the name of the Princeſs, Perinthus ſtarted up, for he yet knew not he came from her; afterwards compoſing himſelf, he told the Phyſician, that he was infinitely obliged unto the Princeſs for her cares of him, and that he was much beholding unto any that would undertake his cure, but yet he deſired him to ſpare his labour, for he was perſwaded all remedies were in vain; and therefore he was reſolved to try what Nature alone would do, and let all Arts alone. Whilſt Perinthus was ſaying ſo, the Phyſician laid his hand upon his arm, do what he could, and found that his Pulſe was ſometimes weak and ſlow, and ſometimes quick and high; ſo that conceiving him to be in great need of helps, he did earneſtly perſwade him to uſe them ſo long that Perinthus was angry, and the Phyſician to ſubmit unto his will, intending notwithſtanding to acquaint the Princeſs with his condition. and of a great neceſſity he ſhould be looked unto: Then he left him, after Perinthus had deſired him to thank the Princeſs for the cares ſhe had of him, and conjured him to tell her, that he thought himſelf the moſt unfortunate man in the World, that he could not be a partaker of her joyes, but was forced to lament, when all the World rejoyced at her Marriage. This Phyſician coming to the Princeſs, aſſoon as ſhe was ready, ſhe no ſooner ſaw him, but ſhe asked how Perinthus did; For I muſt confeſs, ſaid ſhe, ſince he hath been ſick ever ſince he received a wound in my quarrel, I much deſire to know in what condition he is. Madam, replied he, Perinthus is very ill, and which is the worſt, he will neither tell what aileth him, nor take any remedies: What does he ſay unto you, replied the Princeſs? He ſays, that Nature only without all our Art ſhall be his Phyſician, replied he; but for my part, I conceive that both Nature and Art, and all are too little to cure him.

The Princeſs was much ſurprized when ſhe heard him ſay ſo, and cauſed him to make an exact relation of all he had obſerved concerning the diſeaſe of Perinthus, who indeed aſſoon as he went from Doraliſa's houſe, was conſtrained to go into bed; ſo much had the agitation of his mind augmented his gentle Feaver, which his wound firſt cauſed, and which altered all his conſtitution. As the Princeſs was thus very buſily enquiring concerning Perinthus, Abradates ſent a Meſſenger to know how ſhe did; and in return of his Complement ſhe ſent him word that ſhe was very well, were it not for her ſorrows to hear Perinthus was very ſick, and would not take any remedies. After which, ſhe dreſſed her ſelf, and went unto the Temple according to her uſual manner, where ſhe met Abradates, who preſented his hand unto her as ſhe came out of her Coach. Since the Princeſs did love Perinthus very well, ſhe ſpoke of his ſickneſs unto Abradates, at her coming out of rhe Church; and as he anſwered that he intended to go and ſee him, ſhe ſaid ſhe ſhould be much obliged unto him for it, and deſired him to uſe his beſt perſwaſions unto Perinthus to take ſome remedy, and to ask his Reaſons why he had refuſed; telling Abradates, that her reſpects of Perinthus moved her unto that which ſhe would not do for every one, and that his reſpects of her might perhaps move him to do that which he would not for another. Abradates, whoſe ayms were all to pleaſe the Princeſs, and who beſides did much reſpect Perinthus ever ſince he defended the Princeſs from being taken away by Mexaris, he no ſooner parted from us, but he went unto this languiſhing Lover, who paſſed only for a ſick man. You may eaſily imagine how the ſight of this Prince did diſorder his Soul, and what pains he took to diſguiſe his thoughts. As ſoon as Abradates was ſet by his bed-ſide, and that Complements of courſe were paſt; Is it poſſible (ſaid he unto him moſt obligingly) that even then when Fortune has ceaſed all her perſecutions againſt me, and when I am arrived at the height of my happineſs, that Perinthus ſhould mingle with my joys, ſo much ſorrow in refuſing to take ſuch Remedies as may make him able to be a partaker with me in my happineſs? Sir (replyed Perinthus ſadly) I perceive that the goodneſs of the Princeſs, who is pleaſed to intereſt her ſelf in the life of her moſt faithful ſervant, hath moved you to ſpeak thus: but if I be conſidered as really I am, I am moſt unworthy of this honour which I receive from you, ſo extreamly unworthy, that if I durſt I would entreat you to let me receive no more of it. You are much too modeſt Perinthus, replyed Abradates, for though you were not every way ſo compleat a man as you are in the eyes of all that look upon you, and were only the Defender of Panthea, yet your life deſerves to be moſt dear unto me; but then being both a man rarely accompliſhed, and the Defender of my Princeſs, and alſo much my friend, doubtleſs it is my duty to move you unto any thing that may make you live, to live happily. At theſe words Perinthus fetcht a profound ſigh, and lifting up his eyes towards Heaven, he turn'd his head the other way to hide the changing of his complexion. Abradates obſerving the action of Perinthus, began to ſuſpect, that his mind was more ſick than his body; yet not imagining the true cauſe, he conjectured, that perhaps it was only becauſe the Prince of Claſomena had yet done nothing for him, and that the Princeſs being to remove away, he ſhould thereby loſe his chief ſupport: So that deſiring to know whether theſe conjectures were rightly grounded, after ſome other diſcourſe unto which Perinthus anſwered very little, he told him, how ſtrange a thing it was to him, that he ſhould refuſe life now, when the Princeſs was more ſweet and gracious towards him than ever ſhe was. Ah Sir, cryed he out, you judge of others by your ſelf, but there is a great difference betwixt you and me, and ſo very great, that I am ſure the ſame which often makes you joyful, makes me ſad; ſo fatally oppoſite is your lot and mine. Whatever it be, Perinthus, replied Abradates, I am moſt certain that if you live (as with all my Soul I wiſh you may) you ſhall be more happy than ever you were: for whether your mind be to go with us unto Suſa, or to dwell in Claſomena, or to ſtay at Sardis, I do engage my promiſe to advance your fortunes unto ſuch a degree, as that your ambition ſhall deſire no higher. Were I a man of Reaſon, replied Perinthus, I ſhould render you a thouſand thanks, for giving ſuch generous language unto a man who owes his life unto you: but alas, Sir, there is ſuch a horrid black melancholy at this preſent upon me, which makes me ſo unlike my ſelf, that I cannot delight in any pleaſant things: every thing which is not fatally ſad incenſeth me, and makes me angry, therefore I beſeech you leave me to my ſelf, either to mend or die quietly: But, alas! how can you mend, replied Abradates, unleſs you will apply your mind unto it? If I do not mend (replied he ſharply) then I ſhall die, there's an end: But, dear Perinthus, replied Abradates, the Princeſs Panthea, and my ſelf ſhall grieve extreamly for you; therefore think it not ſtrange that I ſhould earneſtly perſwade you to live: It is from the commands of the Princeſs that I deſire you to have a care of your ſelf, and not thus obſtinately to refuſe all helps: The Princeſs (anſwered Perinthus, and qualified a little the agitation of his Spirits) does me a very great favour to remember me at ſuch a time, when ſhe hath better things to think upon: But alas, Sir, one hath not power always to live when one pleaſeth, no nor ſo much power as to wiſh it: I do confeſs, replyed Abradates, there are ſome who groan under ſuch heavy ſorrows as that ſometimes they are not Maſters of their own deſires: But for you Perinthus, Why ſhould you fall into ſuch deſpair? All the world honours your virtues, the Prince of Claſomena loves you, the Princeſs his Daughter eſteems you as much as is poſſible, and I promiſe you a moſt ſafe and welcome protection: If after all theſe your ſorrows do continue, I ſhall believe that Doraliſa had reaſon to think you were in Love: But ſuppoſe you were Perinthus, yet deſpair not, for truly could one be more unfortunate, or further from the enjoyment of his deſires, than I was of Panthea? and yet you ſee a happy turn has wheel'd about my Fate: I do ſee it (ſaid Perinthus, and ſighed) But I do not ſee which way it's poſſible I can be leſs miſerable than I am. However, Sir, may you enjoy your felicity in peace, but I beſeech you leave me to ſuffer thoſe miſeries for which I ſeek no remedy, and unto which if you offer any, your labour will be loſt. Abradates ſeeing, that the more he talked to him, the more he incenſed him, did riſe up to go away, telling him he was very ſorry that he was compelled to carry the Princeſs ſuch unwelcome news. Perinthus then conjecturing by the ſpeech of this Prince, that as ſoon as he was gone from him, he would go unto Panthea, he preſently changed his mind; for whereas before he did all he could to get him gone, now he endeavours to ſtay him longer, thinking it ſome ſatisfaction to keep Abradates from the pleaſure of ſeeing Panthea. It is moſt true, that all his language unto this Prince was ſo ill-compoſed and ſo little ſome times to the purpoſe, that he began to ſuſpect the true cauſe of Perinthus his deſpair; ſo that after he had anſwered three or four times unto thoſe queſtions which this languiſhing Lover uſed to keep him the longer with him, he left this Loveſick Lover, and went unto the Princeſs, but found her not at firſt, becauſe ſhe was buſie, yet he ſtayed with me until ſhe came unto him. Since his ſuſpitions of Perinthus his Love did much diſquiet him, he ſeemed unto me very reſerved, and taking upon me the liberty to ask him, why he was ſo melancholy at a time of ſo much happineſs towards him, he told me that the ſickneſs of Perinthus did much trouble him: Afterwards, repreſenting unto me the reſtleſſneſs which he obſerved in his mind, he perceived that I knew ſomething of the cauſe, not that I ſpoke a word which might make him think ſo; but becauſe it ſeems it was my misfortune to let my eyes often diſcover the ſecret of my heart: All this while Abradates would not ſpeak out his thoughts unto me, but we ſtood and ſpoke to each other very ſeldome, yet did perfectly underſtand the thoughts of one another. But after we had a while ſtood in this ſilent poſture, Abradates deſired me not to tell the Princeſs what he would tell me; and proteſting unto me that he would never reveal what I ſhould tell unto him; after which, he asked me whether I did not think Perinthus in Love with Panthea, and whether I did not believe as he did, that his Marriage with her was the cauſe of his ſickneſs? I know not, Sir, ſaid I unto him, whether, it be ſo or no, but I am ſure the Princeſs does not know of it: No, no, Pherenice, (ſaid he unto me) there is not the leaſt ſpark of jealouſie in me, but many of pity to him; the eſteem that I have grounded of Panthea is ſo fully rooted in me, that though ſhe had a whole thouſand of Lovers at her feet imploring favours, I ſhould never think her capable of the leaſt weakneſs; therefore I conjure you to tell me ingenuouſly, whether you think I have not reaſon for my conjecture? for if you ſhall confirm me in my belief, I ſhall endeavour to find out ſome ways to comfort poor Perinthus, at the leaſt, though I cannot cure him. But, Sir, (ſaid I unto him) there needs no thoughts of Perinthus his being in Love with Panthea, to prompt you unto any endeavours of his comfort or cure, ſince you eſteem him ſufficiently without that, to induce you unto that charitable office: I ſee Pherenice, ſaid he unto me, that you have no diſpoſition to be ſincere, yet I muſt tell you, Perinthus will die if he be not well looked unto: And I do confeſs, that ſince I am his debtor for the ſafety of Panthea, I ſhould be exceedingly troubled if he ſhould any way miſcarry. But, Sir, ſaid I unto him, ſuppoſe all you imagine were true, yet what remedy is there? Only this, replied Abradates, to perſwade the Princeſs, that ſhe will pleaſe to command him not to deſpair. As he ſaid ſo, Panthea came into the Chamber, and no ſooner ſaw him, but ſhe asked how Perinthus did? and what he thought of his ſickneſs? Madam, ſaid he unto her, Perinthus hath told me many things, and to ſo little purpoſe, that I conceive his mind is more ſick than his body; and for my part, I think he ſtands more in need of ſome comforts than any Phyſick. Yet I do not know, ſaid ſhe, that any misfortune hath happened unto him. It is moſt true, ſaid he unto her, there appears none unto us; but perhaps there is ſome happineſs which is befaln another which much grieves him. Perinthus, replied ſhe, is not of any envious diſpoſition, no not of his very Enemies, unleſs Mexaris, whoſe happineſs indeed I think he would envy. However it be, Madam, ſaid he, I am afraid Perinthus will dye, if you do not take a care of his life. Abradates ſpoke this in ſuch a manner, as let the Princeſs ſee there was ſome ſecret meaning in his words: ſo that not knowing what to think, ſhe changed colour and diſcourſe. All the reſt of the day her thoughts ran upon what Abradates told her: yet notwithſtanding after he was gone, not daring to tell us what ſhe thought of Perinthus, nor being willing to give over her cares of him, unto whom ſhe was obliged, ſhe deſired Doraliſa to go and viſit him, and appointed me to accompany her, hoping to be better informed at our Return than ſhe had been by Abradates. Doraliſa and I were glad of this employment, and went with joy, thinking we had ſo much power over the ſpirits of Perinthus. as might move him to chear up his ſpirits, and uſe all remedies to live: but, alas, Madam, we found our ſelves extreamly deceived; for the viſit of Abradates had ſo incenſed his ſorrows, and augmented his diſeaſe, that we could not look upon him without extream compaſſion; yet was he ſomething ſatisfied that he might talk with us, and commanded all to go out of the Chamber, that he might with more freedom expreſs himſelf: But aſſoon as we began to chide him for refuſing all helps; No,no,ſaid he unto us, I ought not think upon life; and provided I might but dye before the King of Suſiana married the Princeſs Panthea, I ſhould not at all think my ſelf miſerable; but I fear I cannot avoid this misfortune.

It is ſo far between Sardis and Suſa, replied I, that I hope you will be perfectly cured, both of your miſeries of mind and body before they can get thither; or before they can be married. Sure you do not know, replied he, that there arrived within this hour a Meſſenger from the Queen of Suſiana, who hearing of the affection which the Prince her Son did bear unto the Princeſs Panthea, ſent unto him to continue his Love, and that ſhe conſented unto his Marriage: So that Abradates having now no rub in his way, will infallibly marry her and make me abſolutely deſpair, if death do not ſpeedily deliver me. Doraliſa and I did much wonder that Perinthus, conſidering his condition, ſhould know the news before us, yet we imagined it not impoſſible but Andramites might be his Intelligencer, and therefore we doubted not of the truth. And after this (ſaid he unto us) I hope you are not ſo inhumane as to wiſh me live any longer; but if the Princeſs did command you to perſwade me, I pray you do not obey her: yet if the Princeſs did know my paſſion, and after that had ſo much goodneſs or cruelty (for I know not which of theſe two Epithetes to uſe) as to bid me live, perhaps I ſhould ſtrive to obey her, and uſe ſome vain remedies to prevent death: but, alas, you know very well that ſhe is ignorant I love her, neither dare I deſire ſhe ſhould know: yet if you ſhall think it expedient to let her know it when I am dead, and that ſhe will not hate my memory for it, I conjure you to tell her, and beg my pardon for not rejoycing at her happineſs: But ſince I limited all my hopes to endeavour ſhe ſhould love none, and ſee all thoſe hopes ruined, do not think it ſtrange if I tell you, that I cannot endure to live: Nor is it leſs expedient for the tranquillity of Panthea, than my own, that I dye:

For how is it poſſible I ever ſhould be Maſter of my Raptures and of my Paſſion: 'Tis true, I have been hitherto, but it is becauſe I did not ſee Abradates in his happineſs, nor in poſſeſſion of the Princeſs; Far better then had I dye, than diſturb her happineſs which I prefer before my own. Did ever any ſee more lamentable deſtinies than mine (did he ſay unto us,) for I deſire no other favour of Fortune to compleat my contentment, but that one of my Rivals may not be in favour, and I cannot obtain ſo much as it: I did reſolve to hide my paſſion as long as I lived; I maſtered my ſelf ſo far as not to deſire ſhe ſhould love me, but ſatisfied my ſelf with the bare eſteem of Panthea: but though I confined my ſelf unto more narrow limits than ever any Lover was able to do, yet I perceive Abradates becomes as happy as I am miſerable. However (ſaid I unto him) be ſatisfied with this, that you have no cauſe to complain either againſt your Rival, or your Princeſs whom you loved. Ah Pherenice (cryed he out) that which you think ſhould ſatisfie me, is it which ſends me unto black deſpair, ſince certainly I ſhould have leſs cauſe to complain, if I could complain with Juſtice of any but my ſelf. But ſince you are ſo full of Reaſon, replyed Doraliſa, why do you not follow it? Becauſe I have eyes, replyed he, yet am ſuch a ſlave as that I cannot ſee: I ſee the way which I ought to take for the recovery of my Liberty; but alas, I am chained too faſt to follow it; and nothing but death is ſtrong enough to break thoſe chains: And therefore if you be as much my friends as I believe you are, you will not blame me, nor deſire me to live; yet have I one favour to beg of you (ſaid he unto us in ſuch a manner as would have moved a heart of ſtone) which I conjure you not to deny me, and that is, to find out ſome expedient, if it be poſſible, that my adored Princeſs may not marry Abradates until the day after my death: The term will be but ſhort, ſaid he, for if I be not much deceived, four days is my longeſt limits. I ſhould deſire, ſaid he, a ſight of my divine Princeſs before I dye, but that were to deſire to be more miſerable, and is too much for a deſpicable Lover.

I confeſs, Madam, when Doraliſa and I heard Perinthus ſpeak thus, we were ſo exceedingly moved unto pity, that we could not refrain from tears; and ſo we wept with him, ſince we could not work any more upon him, and ſo left him with a promiſe to ſee him again: yet we uſed all poſſible arguments to cheer up his ſpirits before we parted, yet all in vain. Then did we return unto the Princeſs extreamly melancholy, and in the way conſidered what we ſhould ſay unto her, but could not reſolve whether or no it were beſt to tell her that ſhe was the cauſe of Perinthus his death. But the truth is, we were eaſed of that trouble, for ſhe her ſelf apprehended as much by the diſcourſe of Abradates; ſo that when we came unto her, and related the lamentable condition of Perinthus, I perceived ſhe underſtood the matter as well as we did: for when I told her, it would be very well if ſhe her ſelf would be pleaſed to go and bid him live; I know very well (anſwered ſhe and bluſhed) that I am obliged to take care of his life; but I know alſo, that if Perinthus has a Soul ſo full of ſorrow, he will not obey me. He will obey none then, replyed Doraliſa; but however, Madam, if you go unto him, and uſe your beſt endeavors, then there is no fault in you if he dye. After this, Panthea excuſed her ſelf as much as poſſible ſhe could from ſeeing Perinthus, not telling her true Reaſon, becauſe her modeſty would not permit her to ſpeak her thoughts: But at laſt Doraliſa, uſing her accuſtomed freedom with the Princeſs, told her all we knew, and with ſo much art, and obligingly for Perinthus, that the Princeſs was no leſs ſorry than angry to hear of his paſſion to her. Panthea at firſt ſeemed to hide her reſentments from us; but afterwards ſhe confeſſed that the death of Perinthus would trouble her, and would ſeem ſo bad an omen unto all the reſt of her life, that ſhe durſt not hope to paſs it happily. Then did ſhe chide us a hundred times becauſe we did not cure Perinthus of his paſſion, thinking that Reaſon were ſufficient Phyſick to cure that diſeaſe. Afterwards, ſince we did importune her unto a viſit of this languiſhing Lover, ſhe was as far from conſenting unto it, as we were urgent: Madam, ſaid I unto her, he knows not that we have revealed his ſecret; and queſtionleſs you would have done him this charitable favour, if you had not ſuſpected his Love. It is ſufficient that I now know it, ſaid ſhe, to keep me from ſeeing him: not but that I ſhould be extreamly ſorry for the death of a man unto whom I am much obliged for defending me from the power of Mexaris; yet I cannot do as you deſire me: Moreover, if he do love me, my ſight will rather haſten than prevent his death, ſince he cannot ſee me but with abundance of ſorrow. Since he deſires it (ſaid I unto her) methinks it would be too inhumane to deny him that favour. You do not apprehend what Abradates might think (replied ſhe) if he ſhould know Perinthus loved me, and that I ſhould viſit him. You may ask him leave if you pleaſe, replied I, for I ſee him enter: And Doraliſa, in purſuance of what I ſaid, no ſooner ſaw Abradates with the Princeſs, but ſhe addreſſed her ſelf unto him; Is it not true, Sir, ſaid ſhe, that the Princeſs is obliged to viſit Perinthus? There is no queſtion of it, replied he; and if to induce her unto it there want only an addition of my petition unto yours, I ſhall moſt willingly make it unto her; and I am verily perſwaded, that if he will not mend upon the ſight of her, he will dye within a few days. Since the Princeſs would not tell Abradates the true Reaſon which reſtrained her, ſhe ſpoke ſo faintly, that he perceived ſhe might be perſwaded, ſo that he became very importunate with her: But at the laſt his urgency and ours together prevailed, though it put the Princeſs to the bluſh, to think how Abradates would take it, and certainly none could carry it with more Generoſity than he did upon this occaſion: For ſince he had a high confidence of Panthea's heart, and her vertues, he was extreamly urgent with her to viſit Perinthus, and to uſe her beſt endeavours to ſave his life, yet he made this condition with her, which if Perinthus had known, certainly would have furthered his death, which was, that if he recovered, ſhe ſhould never ſee him again: After this, ſhe deſired Abradates would be preſent ſent with her at this charitable viſit, but he would not upon any terms. To relate unto you, Madam, all the paſſages of this Viſit, is impoſſible; let it ſuffice to tell you, that Perinthus did ſtrive to dye twenty times whilſt the Princeſs was preſent; ſometimes one might ſee him in the depth of ſorrows; preſently after, ſome ſparks of joy would glance in his eyes, as near death as he was; then in an inſtant, deſpair would ſo ſtifle his Spirits, that one could not underſtand what he ſaid; but for all this, he ſtill kept a moſt profound reverence unto the Princeſs, he thanked her for the honour ſhe did him, telling her, that ſince he had this honour once more to ſee her, he had nothing elſe to do in the World but dye: And when ſhe commanded him to take ſome helps, he ſtayed a while ſilent, then upon a ſudden lifting up his eyes unto her: Madam, ſaid he, If you did but know what you wiſh me, when you deſire I ſhould live, you would unwiſh it again: For indeed, Madam (added he in a languiſhing tone) when Doraliſa thought me to be in Love, ſhe was not miſtaken: I am in Love, Madam, and I ſhould not die at this time, but becauſe I am in Love: And ſince you were ignorant of my miſeries, you are excuſable in wiſhing me to live, becauſe you thought I might perhaps be happy. This is all, Madam, that the reſpects I owe you will permit me to ſpeak of my miſeries and misfortunes.

Perinthus pronounced theſe laſt words ſo weakly, that one would have feared he would immediately expire, for his ſorrows did ſo overwhelm all his faculties, that for a quarter of an hour together he was ſpeechleſs; but yet ſince he did not loſe his ſight and underſtanding, he had the conſolation to ſee ſome tears drop from the eyes of the Princeſs, yet did ſhe hide them as well as ſhe could, and not being able to ſtay any longer in ſight of ſo ſad an object, ſhe went forth: After ſhe had appointed all the Phyſicians, both of Crœſſus and others to come unto him, they did unanimouſly conclude he could not eſcape, but indeed would dye within a ſhort time, and truly it proved ſo: It was conceived, that the ſight of the Princeſs, which we procured as a remedy, was his diſpatch, and he died that night following, and was as univerſally lamented, as ever was any in the world: The Princeſs was ſo grieved, that ſhe could not hide ſome part of her ſorrows, leſt Abradates ſhould imagine that ſhe knew ſomething of Perinthus his paſſion, before ſhe told him: But this Prince had a greater confidence in her, than to entertain the leaſt unjuſt thought: and therefore he did not think it ſtrange; ſhe ſhould grieve for a man unto whom ſhe was much obliged, and for whom he grieved himſelf. Thus the poor Perinthus, had the honour to be lamented by his Miſtreſs with her tears, to be grieved for by his Rival, and his Maſter, who did viſit him in his ſickneſs, and had all imaginable care of him; and his death did for a time defer the Marriage of Abradates, for it did ſo exceedingly perplex Panthea, that ſhe was not well eight daies after, during which time, news was brought, that the Prince Mexaris was dead of his wounds and ſorrows, ſo that the Court went into mourning, though his death did not much trouble us: However, ſo many ſad accidents in ſo ſhort a time did diſquiet the Princeſs, yet notwithſtanding her cauſes of joy were ſufficient to ſweeten all theſe ſorrows; and fifteen daies after her Marriage with Abradates was accompliſhed without any ceremony, becauſe of the death of Mexaris, and all magnificence was deferred until we came to Suſa, whither within a few daies after we went, in an equipage ſuitable to the quality and liberality of Abradates: The Princeſs had the comfort to carry Doraliſa with her, notwithſtanding all the endeavours of Andramites, and the Prince Myrſiles, though the reaſons of this Prince was unknown unto us: So this pleaſant Lady did never forſake her, but could not meet with this accompliſhed Gallant which ſhe had been ſo long in queſt of, in Suſa no more than in Sardis. I ſhall not need to relate unto you, Madam, how the Princeſs Panthea was received by her fair Mother in Law, nor how Abradates lived with her ſince ſhe was married, until the day that Fortune parted them, and the fate of Arms brought her under the power of the illuſtrious Cyrus: For if I ſhould relate the whole ſtory, perhaps I ſhould not find belief, at leaſt in ſetting forth the King of Suſiana's paſſion, which certainly was more violent than any expreſſions can ſet forth, yet not more than hers to him; and therefore I will ſay no more, but moſt humbly beſeech your pardon for dreſſing the ſtory of two illuſtrious perſons of ſuch extraordinary virtues, with ſuch mean and common language.

The pardon you deſire (replied Araminta unto Pherenice) is eaſily obtained; and as juſt to deny it (ſaid Cyrus) ſince ſhe needs it not. Pherenice replied unto the complement of Cyrus with much civility; after which, Araminta and he began to diſcourſe of Panthea's virtues, of Abradates his liberality, and of Doraliſa's pleaſant humour: But ſince by this time it was late, Cyrus took his leave of this Princeſs, and went to Panthea's Chamber, to take his leave of her alſo, and to thank her, for that ſhe was pleaſed to let him know her adventures; he aſſured her, that Pherenice had made an elegant relation of them, and asked her pardon, that the Laws of War, his fidelity to Ciaxares, and his intereſt in Mandana, would not yet permit him to reſtore her unto the King her Husband, beſeeching her to believe, that it was not without extream ſorrow he ſhould ſo long ſeparate two ſuch illuſtrious perſons: after which, paſſing towards Doraliſa, unto whom Araſpes was talking, he beſtowed a complement upon her, telling her he wiſhed for the honour of Araſpes, that ſhe might find him to be the compleat man ſhe ſought after: At leaſt, ſaid he, he never yet was in Love with any: I aſſure you, Sir, (ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled) If you do think as you ſay, you do not know him ſo well as I do, for I never ſaw ſo many ſigns of Love in Perinthus, ſince the firſt time I knew him, as I have obſerved in him, ſince this ſhort acquaintance. Araſpes bluſht at this reply of Doraliſa, and made but a poor defence for himſelf: But ſince other things came into the mind of Cyrus, he ſtayed no longer, but departed with Ligdamis, and all the reſt of his company. Criſantes at that time came unto him, and rendred an account of all thoſe Warlike Engines, which by his orders were preparing; and ſince he aſſured him, that all the works were cloſely followed, he was exceedingly pleaſed in his conceipts, that ere long he ſhould be in a condition, either to vanquiſh his Enemies, or die for his Princeſs Mandana.

PART V. BOOK II.

CYrus was no ſooner come unto the Camp, but he ſent to tell the King of Phrygia, that the Queen of Suſiana, and the Princeſs of Pontus had writ ſo effectually in behalf of the Prince Artamas, that he hoped for a happy ſucceſs of Aglatidas his voyage: The day following, he diſpatched an Envoy unto Ciaxares, to acquaint him with all paſſages, and to beſeech him to ſend him more Forces, to the end, that if Thomiris ſhould attempt any thing againſt him, he might keep himſelf ſtill in a poſture of defence, until he had finiſhed the War wherein he was ingaged, and releaſed the Princeſs Mandana: After which, he thought upon nothing but taking the Field, and by ſome memorable exploit to repair the misfortune which lately he received: And in order to that, his daily buſineſs was to ſee how the Warlike Inſtruments which he had given orders for went on, and in what forwardneſs they were; he went from Quarter to Quarter, taking private Muſters of every particular Troop, before he came to a General Rendezvous, ſtill waiting impatiently for that happy day on which he ſhould ſet forward into the Enemies Country: Since he had made a promiſe unto Ligdamis, never to ingage him unto any thing which might be againſt his honour and generoſity, he would never motion it unto him, to move his Father for a paſſage over the River by the Caſtle of Hermes; nor would he in conſideration of him, think of rendring himſelf Maſter of it by force of Arms, but reſolved to force a paſſage nearer Sardis, at a place where there was a Bridge, and a little Town very well fortified, which he muſt of neceſſity take, before he could paſs over the River. In the mean time, he had daily intelligence that the Army of Crœſſus did much increaſe: He underſtood alſo, that the Ægiptians which Amaſis had promiſed unto Crœſſus, were arrived by Sea; that the Thracians alſo joyned with him, and indeed that his Army was grown very numerous, that the moſt firtil Country of all Aſia would have much ado to ſupply it. He underſtood alſo by his Spies, that this vaſt Army which was now upon the Banks of Pactolus aſſembled, would within theſe few days advance unto a place called Thybarras, whither all the Subjects of Crœſſus had orders to bring their victual for the accommodation of the Camp, every City and Town being taxed and rated at a certain quantity, which they were required to furniſh out. Cyrus then underſtanding that his Enemies would preſently come unto him, if he went not unto them, did forecaſt how to prevent them: and in order to that, he commanded a General Muſter of all his Army, which he found to conſiſt of about a hundred and forty thouſand Men: he held a Council of War, to conſult how he might aſſault the Town of Niſomolis, where he was to paſs the River; The King of Phrigia, the King of Hircania, the Prince Tigranes, Phraartes, Perſodes, Gobrias, Gadates, Hidaſpes, Aduſius, Chriſantes, Artabaſes, and many others, were of this Council: Where it was Reſolved, That they ſhould not make a formal regular Siege of it, but that it were better to loſe ſome Souldiers in ſtorming of it, than to lie lingering before it until the Enemy came to relieve it with his whole Army. This was no ſooner reſolved upon, but Cyrus thought how to execute it: ſo that the day following his Troops began to draw forth: yet the firſt day he made a falſe March, purpoſely to deceive the Enemy; and indeed they were much deceived: for making no queſtion but Cyrus intended to paſs the River at the Caſtle of Hermes, and thither therefore they ſent away the greateſt part of their Forces, contenting themſelves with as many only as would keep the Garriſon of Niſomolis.

As Cyrus never uſed to neglect any thing that was his duty, he went to take his leave of the Queen of Suſiana, and the Princeſs Araminta; Moſt of the Princes in his Company did the ſame, and amongſt the reſt Phraartes, whoſe paſſion did daily encreaſe, though the coldneſs of the Princeſs ſhould rather have leſſened it. The Conferrence of Cyrus with theſe two Princeſſes was upon ſome things of concernment; he did yet comfort them as much as he could, always aſſuring them that he aymed at nothing but Mandana's releaſement; and that if the Fate of Arms were ſo favourable to him, he would for their ſakes remember the perſons whom amongſt his Enemies were ſo dear unto them: After which he took horſe, and went on his Journey. In the mean time, maugre the remembrance of ſo many angry Oracles and fatal Predictions which might well have made the heart of Cyrus to tremble, yet he did gloſs his ſorrows ſo well, that all the Souldiers who were ignorant of them did march with as much alacrity, as they were wont to do when they went unto a certain Victory: And when they ſaw Cyrus put on his Arms, and take horſe, there appeared a moſt noble Fury in his eyes; and indeed this Prince was ſo unlike himſelf when he prepared to fight, or give out Military Orders, that there was not a greater alteration in the countenance of the Pithian when ſhe gave her Oracles, than in the face of Cyrus when the Sword was in his hand: One would have ſaid that a new ſpirit did animate him, and that he himſelf was become the God of War; his complexion grew high and lively, his eyes more ſparkling, his action more free, his voice more clear, and every way more majeſtical: ſo that at his leaſt beck, he ſtruck terror into the Souls of all about him: Yet did there always appear a calm ſerenity in his Soul, maugre this heroique agility, which made him perpetually change his place, and be in every place to give Orders throughout all; and certainly he did it with ſo much prudence, as never any could ever tax him with commanding any thing to an ill purpoſe: Alſo, he was always obeyed with moſt exact diligence, and blind obedience; as ſoon as ever he ſpoke the word, all were ready to execute; and his preſence had ſomething in it ſo divine and terrible both, that when he was in the head of his Army, only with his all-commanding Trunchion in his hand, one might very well ſay, he made both his Friends and his Enemies to tremble, and wrought different effects in the hearts of both: for his Enemies out of very fear did often fly; and his Friends out of fear to diſpleaſe him, became incomparably more valiant: and certainly that divine heat which warmed his heart, and ſparkled in his eyes, did communicate it ſelf throughout the Army, and begot ſuch an ardent deſire of fighting, as was often a great Cauſe of Victories.

Thus did Cyrus appear when he had a Sword in his hand, and in the head of his Army, when he went to ſtorm the Town of Niſomolis. Since it was very concerning to carry it in a ſhort time, do what the King of Phrigia and Hircania could, he himſelf would needs be the firſt that fell on; and many have aſſured me, that he carried the firſt Ladder, and was firſt upon the Enemies Rampart: This is without all diſpute, that had he not been there this little Town would have held out, maugre all our men, above eight days, yet by his incomparable valor it was reduced in leſs than twenty four hours, with the loſs of very few men; though half of the Garriſon was cut in pieces, and the reſt liſted themſelves under Cyrus. Thus did the King of Lidia in a little time loſe a moſt conſiderable Paſs over the River Hermes, and at leaſt three thouſand of his beſt old Souldiers. This good beginning put joy into the whole Army of Cyrus, and ſtruck ſuch a terror into all the Country along the River Hermes, as if all Lidia were conquered.

In the mean time after a Garriſon was put into the Town, Cyrus cauſed all his Forces to paſs over the Bridge at Niſomolis, ſo that in a day and half this great Army did over-ſpread all the Neighbouring fields, carrying with it ſuch a horrid fear, that from the banks of the River Hermes, unto the River Pactolus, there was not a Lydian heart which did not tremble, the Army of Crœſſus it ſelf was aſtoniſhed; yet ſince it was much more numerous than that of Cyrus, it preſently took heart again: But ſince ſome of their Forces were not yet come up, Crœſſus was not over-forward to take the field, but thought it moſt expedient, to let the fury of this ſtorm which made ſuch a noiſe to cool a little, conjecturing, that the Army of Cyrus would leſſen, whilſt his increaſed; yet he ſent 20000 men under the conduct ſo Andramites to check the over-forwardneſs of Cyrus his Army, until ſuch time as he was ready to march; and ſtill confiding in the Oracle which he received from Delphos ſo much, that though his Army had been weak, as it was ſtrong, yet ſhould he hope for Victory, and that he ſhould ruine the Empire which Cyrus was in expectation of. In the mean while, Cyrus poſſeſſed himſelf of all paſſages, became Maſter of the Field, and left not a Town on his back which could annoy him, but took all in his way, and terror was ſpread ſo far, that moſt did render themſelves as ſoon as his Forces approached: That which did moſt move them unto it, was becauſe Cyrus did treat all thoſe who did not reſiſt him with much ſweetneſs, not permitting a Souldier to offer the leaſt inſolency unto them; but on the contrary, thoſe who did reſiſt the progreſs he intended to releaſe his dear Mandana, they felt the weight of his Arm, and found too late, that it was no wiſdome to undertake more than they were able to make good, and by conſequence more than they ought to do: After then he had made ſure of all places which could any way annoy him, he intrenched himſelf, advantageouſly, within a daies march and a half of Sardis, as well to reſt his Troops, and refreſh his Army, as to enquire concerning the Enemy, alſo to expect the return of Aglitidas, yet did not a day paſs away without ſome skirmiſh or other; for ſince the 20000 men under the Command of Andramites were intrenched upon the Banks of a little River that was within 300 paces of us, there was skirmiſhes continually, the ſucceſs whereof was not always equal: Sometimes the Party of Crœſſus would have the better, yet commonly they were always beaten, ſo that priſoners were every day taken and brought unto Cyrus, who would always examine them himſelf, not only for better information of all advantages, but to ask them if they knew any thing concerning the Princeſs Mandana; for ſince ſometimes there was ſome Officers amongſt them, he pumped ſome things out of them which he deſired to know; he enquired not only of Mandana, but alſo of his Rivals. He underſtood alſo by them, that there was a ſtranger, a gallant Cavalier, and an admirable handſome man, who of late came into the Party of Crœſſus, who then was with Andramites, and had made himſelf very eminent in many ſmall skirmiſhes which had paſſed, yet could not any of theſe priſoners tell his quality, only he called himſelf Telephanes: And indeed every Party which went out, found that there was one man above all the reſt of the Lydians which was of an extraordinary valour, and made always a moſt gallant reſiſtance, ſo that the name of Telephanes was cried up, both amongſt his friends and enemies: Though Cyrus was not capable of any envious thoughts, yet the fame of this Telephanes made him often deſire to meet with him, ſo that he would often go out in theſe ſmall Parties, in hopes to incounter him, but he could not meet with him: But afterwards, checking himſelf for any ſuch thoughts, conceiving it a piece of weakneſs in him to deſire combat with any but his Rivals, he gave over all his thoughts of Telephanes, and his mind was imployed only how to haſten on his Victory or his Defeat, though he could not chuſe but after ſo many dire predictions put ſome doubts of a good ſucceſs. However, he underſtood the day following, that the King of Pontus was come into the Enemies Camp, and that it was he who was to command the Vanguard.

Cyrus no ſooner heard that this Raviſher of his Princeſs was was ſo near him, but he had a much more hot deſire of fighting, which prompted him to act ſomething, before it came to a main Battel: And though he knew that all theſe petty advantages which every day they got, were nothing to decide the matter, and that under a general defeat of this great Army, he ſhould never releaſe Mandana, yet he thought, that if he could either kill or take the King of Pontus, it would conduce much unto a Victory, and to the liberty of the Princeſs: So that to do both, he attempted the day following to force his Enemy, and make him quit that quarter wherein he was intrenched: But the Enemy, was ſo advantageouſly ſeated, that it would be a difficult task to drive them out under 10000. men, yet nothing was impoſſible to Cyrus, whoſe valour nothing could reſiſt, and if the night had not impeaded his Victory, he had carried it. His Enemy did loſe ſuch a number of men in this aſſault, that he might well be ſatisfied, though during the combat, he met neither with the King of Pontus, nor Telephanes, who was reported to carry one dead painted upon his Buckler, with this Motto, I have deſerved it; yet was Cyrus much perplexed that he could not meet with his Rival, and he was conſidering which way he might the next morning inforce the Enemy out of his Trenches, when he ſaw Aglatidas returned, and coming to him, he was no ſooner entred into his Tent, but with open arms he imbraced him: Well my dear Aglatidas (ſaid he unto him) How does my Princeſs? and how do they treat her at Sardis? Sir, replyed he, they guard her ſo ſtrictly, that it was impoſſible for me to give you an exact account how ſhe doth, yet I know ſhe is in health, and that they wait upon her with much reſpect: But ſince ſhe is in the Citadel, as well as the Princeſs Palmis, whom they guard as ſtrictly as the Princeſs Mandana, it is not in the power of Feraulas, as witty as he is, to find out any means of ſending any meſſage unto Marteſia, yet for all that I have ſeen the Princeſs: How, ſaid Cyrus, have you ſeen her, and not ſpoke unto her? I ſaw her, Sir, replied he, upon the top of a Tower in the the Cittadel, where ſhe came every evening to walk with the Princeſs of Lydea; but the ditches were ſo very broad, and the Tower ſo high, that I could only ſee her, and perhaps unſeen my ſelf, yet methought one of her Women which waited, made a ſign unto me with her hand, but I durſt not anſwer it. However Feraulas ſees her every day in the ſame place, for the place where the priſoners of War is lodged, is over againſt that Tower: Then it ſeems the King of Aſſyria (replied Cyrus very haſtily) does ſee my Princeſs, as the reſt do? And more than any of the reſt, ſaid Aglitidas, for he is perpetually in the Window of his Chamber, which opens that way. Ah Aglitidas (cried Cyrus out) What ſad news is this you tell me? Sir, replied he, Let it not at all trouble you, ſince certainly that Prince is not any thing the happier for it, becauſe by ſpecial Orders from the King of Pontus, who is in high favour with Crœſſus, he is ſo ſtrictly guarded, that this Prince cannot poſſibly have ſo much liberty as to ſend any Letters or meſſage unto the Princeſs Mandana. Cyrus then, calming the agitation of his ſpirits, by hearing a thing ſo agreeable to his wiſh, commanded Aglitidas to make an exact relation of all his journey, firſt asking him of the health of the Prince Artamas, and of all the reſt of the Priſoners, eſpecially of Feraulas in particular. After that Aglitidas had told him, that the Prince Artamas was out of all danger, and that the ſtranger Anaxaris, Feraulas, Soſicles, and Tegeus were all well, he told him, how he found Crœſſus at Sardis, who treated him very civilly: that after he had read his Letter, he told him, that his recommendations were dear unto him, excepting what related unto the Prince Artamas, aſſuring him, that he ſhould have his anſwer in the morning; that afterwards, he deſired permiſſion to preſent a Letter unto the King of Pontus from the Princeſs his Siſter, and another from the Queen of Suſiana unto the King her husband, unto which he accorded, cauſing him to be conducted unto thoſe two Princes by ſome of his guard: But I pray tell me, (ſaid Cyrus,) Were not the King of Pontus and Abradates in the Camp? No, Sir, replied Aglatidas, for they were at a Council of War, which was held near the Town, and the King of Pontus was ready to ſet forward to command the Vanguard: But to tell you, Sir, how Abradates received me is impoſſible; but I am moſt certain, he loves the Queen Panthea with a moſt extraordinary affection, and he had no ſooner read her Letter, but he aſſured me, that he would be a Protector, not only unto all ſuch Priſoners as were taken during the War, as well as thoſe now at Sardis, but he would be ready to do any thing that generoſity would permit him, with a hundred obliging and ſweet expreſſions unto me: After which, being deſirous to execute the orders of Panthea that very hour, he went unto Crœſſus, as I ſhall tell you, after I have related unto you how the King of Pontus did treat me: I am confident (replied Cyrus) that he hath not forgot to be generous: Certainly, Sir, replied Aglatidas, I was much ſurprized at his manner of behaviour; for, Sir, you never did any favour which he does not exactly remember, he calls you his Protector and Liberator, he proteſted that he hated ingratitude, and ſwore unto me, that he would protect the Prince Artamas, and all the Priſoners, more for your ſake; than for the Princeſs his Siſter: Then he carried me unto Crœſſus, and I was a witneſs of all that the King of Suſiana and he did plead in behalf of Artamas and the reſt: Crœſſus did obſtinately affirm, that the Prince of Phrigia ought not to be treated as a Priſoner of War, but to be proceeded againſt as a Delinquent to the State: And theſe two Princes did moſt zealouſly maintain the contrary, telling him, that he had no Right at all unto that Prince, but what the Fortune of War did entitle him unto.

However, the matter could not be that day reſolved, no nor the next day, though Crœſſus promiſed to diſpatch me: During which time, by the Kings permiſſion, I viſited all the Priſoners: I underſtood from Feraulas, that the King of Aſſyria was known before he came into Sardis; and that ſince his Impriſonment he is extreamly melancholy, that he ſhould not have the glory of ayding you in the Princeſs Mandana's Releaſment, and that he was forced to be obliged unto you for his Liberty; and he charged me to expreſs his ſorrows unto you, that he was not to be Partaker with you in the dangers of this War, and deſiring me to put you in memory of your Promiſes. As for the Prince Artamas, Sir, he charged me with a hundred obliging Meſſages unto you, as well as Anaxaris, Soſicles, and Tegeus. Whilſt I was with theſe illuſtrious Captives, Abradates and the King of Pontus finding Cræſſus very reſolute, told him, that there was two perſons who were infinitely dear unto them in your Power, and that they had great Reaſon to fear their uſage if Artamas was treated otherwiſe than as a Priſoner of War: Unto which he anſwered, that as long as Mandana was in his Power, there was no fear of either the Queen of Suſiana or the Princeſs Araminta. As Abradates was more earneſt in the buſineſs than the King of Pontus, he ſpoke ſomething home unto Crœſſus, telling him that he ſaw he was much deceived; for he believed that if he had deſired Prince Artamas to be exchanged for the Queen his Wife, he would not have denyed him that favour; but it ſeems he was ſo far from granting him that favour, as at his requeſt he would not let him be in the ordinary Conditions of War: Adding many other things, unto which Crœſſus anſwered ſo roughly, as I am very much miſtaken, if the heart of Abradates was not much exaſperated againſt him: For when I came to receive his Anſwer, I heard him relate the buſineſs unto one of his friends in a low voice, and in ſuch a manner as I conceive as much. However, at laſt the King of Pontus and he did bend Crœſſus unto their deſires; ſo that I received as good an Anſwer as I could wiſh. In taking my leave of Abradates, he charged me with a Letter unto the Queen his Wife; and appointed me to tell you, Sir, that if he were abſolute Diſpoſer of Affairs, he would not only protect the Prince Artamas, but releaſe him: Adding unto all this a Chain of Gold with a Medal, on which was the Picture of Panthea, which he deſired me to take, to put me in rememberance (as he ſaid) to tell you, Sir, That there was one man amongſt your Enemies, who infinitely deſires the honour to be your Friend. Sir, ſaid I then unto him, I beſeech you excuſe me from receiving ſuch a magnificent gift, as may render me ſuſpected unto the Prince I ſerve. Since your Maſters merit, replied he, is a ſtronger and more precious Chain to tye you unto his ſervice than any I am able to give, he will never ſuſpect ſuch a man as you of any ſubornation. At laſt, there was no remedy but I muſt ſubmit unto the liberality of Abradates, and accept it. Afterwards I went unto the King of Pontus, who gave me his Anſwer unto the Princeſs Araminta his Siſter, and who charged me to tell you, Sir, that you may ever expect any thing in the World from him which was not prejudicial unto his Love. After this, Aglatidas preſenting the King of Lidia's Letter unto his hands, he there found theſe words:

Crœſſus unto Cyrus.

What cauſe ſoever I have to treat the Prince Artamas as a Delinquent againſt my State, yet I aſſure you, that at your inſtance, and the deſires of thoſe two Princes who did ſecond you, I ſhall treat him only as a Priſoner of War; and that with much civility and ſweetneſs. I wiſh I may often be in a condition to do you the like offices; and that I may never be neceſſitated to receive the like from you.

CRESSUS.

Fortune ſhall then forſake me (ſaid Cyrus in anſwer to his own thoughts, and the King of Lidia's Letter:) After which embracing Aglatidas, he asked him whether he had heard of a ſtranger of high reputation in Sardis, whoſe name was Telephanes? Oh, Sir, ſaid Aglatidas, I had forgot to tell you, that the talk in Sardis is of nothing elſe but his valour and gallant importment; yet none knows who he is: However, added he, if the Lidians are to be believed, their Army is ſo vaſt and ſtrong, that Victory is made ſure of: However they will give us leave to diſpute for it with them, replied Cyrus. After which ſending Aglatidas unto the King of Phrigia, to give him an account of the ſucceſs in his Voyage, he ſpent the reſt of the day which he had deſigned for his own reſt, upon contemplation of the preſent ſtate of his fortunes; and to contrive ways how to releaſe his Princeſs. Doubtleſs it was a great conſolation unto him to hear that the King of Pontus was in the Army, and that the King of Aſſyria could not ſend unto Mandana. Nor am I altogether unfortunate, ſaid he, ſince my Princeſs is in a place where ſhe may think upon me with freedom: But how do I know, ſaid he, whether or no ſhe thinks well of me? Have I not more reaſon to fear that ſhe thinks upon me as the cauſe of all her misfortunes? and remembers me with horror in lieu of tenderneſs? Perhaps the ſame Gods which promiſed the King of Aſſyria that he ſhould ſee an end of all his miſery, and that he ſhould have the glory to hear Mandana ſigh for him, did make him a Priſoner purpoſely to haſten his happineſs; and it may be ſhe pities him whilſt ſhe accuſeth me, and at this very hour as I am ſpeaking of her, he has a greater ſhare in her thoughts and affection than I have. But moſt unjuſt man that I am (ſaid he, and reprehended himſelf) why do I accuſe the moſt perfect perſon upon Earth of any inconſtancy? She, I ſay, who hath given me a hundred moſt obliging teſtimonies of her unalterable conſtancy? She hath ſeen the King of Aſſyria, who was Poſſeſſor of a great Empire, and could command an Army of two hundred thouſand Men, lie proſtrate at her feet, and never be moved at his tears: Why then ſhould I now ever think, that ſince he is deprived of his Kingdom, and in fetters, and never ſpeaks to her, he can alter her mind? yet notwithſtanding, pity hath much power in it; ſhe can mollifie the moſt obdurate hearts, and ſoften the moſt fierce Souls, eſpecially ſuch as ſuffer for her; alſo ſhe delivered me, and retained the King of Aſſyria. Then afterwards when he began to conſider how the Gods had promiſed Victory unto Crœſſus, and yet ſince he entered into Lidia he had nothing but good ſucceſs againſt this Lidian King, he knew not what to think: Sometimes he feared the Gods did raiſe him only to throw him down again; and in a moment after, he thought that perhaps they did never intend it: So that when one glimpſe of any hope did but ſhine upon his heart, then all his thoughts were of fighting, and vanquiſhing his Rivals. After he had reliſhed the ſweetneſs of this laſt thought, he fell aſleep, and ſlept on with more tranquility than uſually he was wont, but his ſleep was not long, ſince he awaked by break of day. He was no ſooner up, but the King of Phrigia came to thank him, and expreſs his joy, that the Prince his Son was not expoſed unto the fury of Crœſſus Afterwards this Prince underſtanding from Aglatidas how infinitely Abradates loved the Queen his Wife, did adviſe Cyrus to carry her unto the Army, telling him, that ſuch an occaſion might preſent it ſelf, that her preſence and the preſence of the Princeſs Araminta might happily much advantage him: At the firſt, Cyrus did not much hearken unto the counſel of the King of Phrigia, thinking that he was to employ nothing but his courage in the Releaſment of Mandana; and remembering what ſmall effects the laſt meeting of the Princeſs Araminta with the King of Pontus produced, he could not fancy any advantage by them. Yet ſince the King of Phrigia, Chriſantes, Aglatidas, and Ligdamis, were not of his opinion, he yielded unto them. Then the very ſame hour he ſent Aglatidas unto the two Princeſſes, with the Letters which he brought for them, and to beſeech them they would be pleaſed to come unto one of thoſe Towns which he had taken, and which was cloſe by the place where he was encamped: But for more civilities ſake, he writ unto them both; and the more to oblige Ligdamis, he deſired him to go with Aglatidas, and conduct the Princeſſes, with whom was his dear Cleonice; giving orders unto Aglatidas for Araſpes, that he ſhould take his Troops unto Niſomolis. In the mean while Cyrus, whoſe conſtant cuſtom was to conquer all oppoſers, reſolved to enforce the Enemy, and to drive them from that quarter which they poſſeſſed, before all their Army came up; ſo that this being his full reſolution, he intended to aſſault them in ſo many places at once, that they being forced to divide their Forces, he might more eaſily vanquiſh them: yet this could not be executed in the morning, becauſe he thought it moſt expedient to fall on in the night, thereby to ſpare his Troops, and to avoid the arrows which they who guarded the Trenches might with more judgment aym if it were not in the dark. On the other ſide, the King of Pontus deſiring to put nothing to the hazard, would not fight until the whole Army of Crœſſus was arrived; and deſired that the Battel might be fought near Sardis, to the end that if Crœſſus was beaten, he might more readily retire into the Town to defend his Princeſs, ſo that he reſolved to diſencamp the night following; and in order to that, the day was no ſooner done, but cauſing many fires to be made as uſually was wont, he marched away with all his Troops towards the plain of Sardis. Cyrus was much ſurprized when going to aſſault his Enemy, he found none there: he made ready a great body of Horſe to follow them; and himſelf being in the head of them, he purſued a long while, yet the Enemy made ſuch haſte, that he could not overtake them: ſo that conceiving it not ſafe to engage himſelf too far, he returned back, and poſſeſſed himſelf of the ſame quarter which the Lidians quitted: Yet was he extreamly ſorry to underſtand by the ſick and wounded Enemies which the Enemy left behind in their Camp, that the King of Pontus was gone to quarter on the other ſide of the River Halis, which runs along the Plain of Sardis, over againſt Pactolus, which bounders the other ſide: And judging by this that the Enemy intended to protract the War, he fell into ſuch a ſad deſpair as is unconceiveable: ſo that, without imparting his deſign unto any but him he ſent, he diſpatched Artabaſes unto the King of Pontus, to tell him, that ſince it was not juſt the Princeſs Mandana ſhould continue ſo long a Captive, he conjured him to obtain permiſſion from Crœſſus, for a Duel between them two, and ſo to end all differences betwixt them concerning the Princeſs Mandana, offering that if he were Conqueror, to reſtore the Queen of Suſiana and the Princeſs Araminta, upon condition he would reſtore the Princeſs Mandana unto Ciaxares, if the Fate of Arms went on his ſide; adding further, that if Crœſſus would prolong the War, he might the better ſatisfie his deſire. In the mean time, ſince Crœſſus and Abradates did advance, as the King of Pontus retired, both met at the River Halis: ſo that when Artabaſes came to the Enemies Camp, he was carried immediately unto Crœſſus, in whoſe preſence he muſt needs acquit himſelf of his Commiſſion. At the firſt, the King of Pontus was much amazed; not but that this Prince was as valiant as any ever breathed; but when he remembred how he owed his life and liberty unto Cyrus, and that he unjuſtly retained the Princeſs Mandana from him, he was extreamly aſhamed; and all his Love and Valour could not move him to accept this Combat without extream repugnance: But he was not put unto the trouble of it, for Artabaſes had no ſooner ended his ſpeech, but Crœſſus told him, that he would not ſuffer the King of Pontus to fight with Cyrus for the Liberty of Mandana; and bid him tell his Maſter, that before this Princeſs was releaſed, he ſhould conquer him in ranged Battel, he ſhould take Sardis, ſubvert his Throne, and ruine his Empire.

The King of Pontus, even raviſhed that he was not put to anſwer, and ſeeing with what reſolution Crœſſus ſpoke unto this Propoſition, beſeeched him that he would permit him to ſee Cyrus; for, Sir, ſaid he unto him, though he be my Rival, yet I would preſerve my ſelf in his eſteem, and I ſhould be extreamly ſorry if he ſhould think it want of heart, that I will not fight with him; Alſo I ſhould be very glad to ask him pardon for my ingratitude, and to tell him my ſelf ſome part of my thoughts. At the firſt Crœſſus was unwilling to conſent: but after Abradates told him that it could be no ways prejudicial, Artabaſes was ſent back with one of the King of Lydia's Heralds to know whether Cyrus would conſent unto this meeting. Since this Prince did expect Artabaſes with much impatience, becauſe he hoped to obtain his demands, it may be eaſily conceived that his return did aggravate his ſorrows, ſince the Liberty of Mandana was yet deferred: yet he did conſent to ſee the King of Pontus, hoping ſtill to perſwade him either to reſtore Mandana, or to fight with him. The day of this Enterview being appointed, it was reſolved by both Parties that Cyrus ſhould come in the head of a thouſand Horſe unto a place where ran a little deep River about three paces broad; and that the King of Pontus ſhould meet him there with the like number; That theſe two Princes ſhould ſolemnly engage themſelves by Oath, not to aſſault each other, but to ſpeak unto each other only. The thing being then reſolved upon, the time and place appointed, and the hour come, each prepared to be at the place appointed: That which was moſt ſtrange, was the great deſire which every Commander of the Enemies Army had to know Cyrus; ſo that they were all importunate with Crœſſus for permiſſion to wait upon the King of Pontus: ſo that in lieu of common Troopers, all his Company, to prevent diſcontents, were Colonels and Captains.

You eaſily imagine, that Cyrus when he ſaw this ſuſpected a ſurprize, and that faith would not be kept, for he had all his men (except ſome 40 or 50 men of quality) out of common Troopers only: But with the King of Pontus it was otherwiſe, for Abradates himſelf was one, having asked leave of Crœſſus to give Cyrus thanks for his generoſity in treating the Queen his Wife ſo civilly: However Cyrus wiſhed, though he knew no reaſon for his curioſity, that Telephanes who was ſo cryed up, would be there alſo. Theſe two bodies of Cavalry, appeared then at an equal diſtance from this River, and advanced foot-pace to the ſide of it, where they, when they were within eight paces of each ſide, they both made a hault. In the mean while, both Cyrus and the King of Pontus, leaving their Troops at a time, came as near each other as the River would permit, and without alighting from their Horſes, they ſaluted each other with equal civility, yet their eyes did ſo ſparkle the agitation of their hearts, that they both ſtood ſilent a while, and could not ſpeak; and indeed Cyrus could not look upon the King of Pontus, but he muſt needs remember the care he formerly had of his preſervation, when he ſent to acquaint him with the conſpiracy againſt him, and how alſo he had ſaved the life of his Princeſs; yet he could not chuſe but remember at the ſame time, how he was the Raviſher of Mandana, and the ruiner of his felicity; nor could the King of Pontus look upon Cyrus without remembrance, how he owed both his life and liberty unto him, and how he had offered to reinveſt him in his Throne; ſo that both of them infinitely eſteeming each other, and ſo demeaned themſelves, as the greatneſs of their ſouls did ſufficiently appear. After all tumultuous cogitations of heart were allayed, and reaſon aſſumed Region in their minds: I am infinitely grieved (ſaid the King of Pontus unto Cyrus) that Fortune has ſo much obliged me unto you, and that Love ſhould make me ſo ungrateful: It is not for any ingratitude or obligations (replied Cyrus) that I accuſe you, but only becauſe you are extreamly unjuſt, in detaining a Princeſs unto whom neither Nature, nor Fortune, nor Love hath given you any right: As for that which relates unto my own particular, I was firſt obliged unto you, and all that which I have or would have done for you, ought to be conſidered only as effects of my acknowledgment: But that you ſhould deſire to obtain that by force, which ought to be acquired by ſubmiſſion, ſervices and prayers, this is a thing moſt horrid; yet if the captivity of the Princeſs Mandana had any limits ſet unto it, then hopes of liberty in the end might ſweeten her impriſonment: but to wiſh that ſhe ſhould not be releaſed, until I have defeated a puiſſant Army commanded by three great Kings, and by the conqueſt of a great Empire, this is ſuch a piece of high injuſtice, as I cannot believe you capable of; on the contrary, I think you ought rather to endeavour my defeat by your own peculiar valour, than by the bloud of two hundred thouſand men which are in the Army of Cræſſus; and therefore I hoped, that you would have accepted of that offer of combat which I ſent unto you: How infinitely does it concern the King of Lydia, that we ſhould terminate our differences our ſelves before a bloody War become the Arbytrator? Since if I have the good Fortune to vanqiſh you, I ſhall demand no more but the Princeſs Mandana, and if you vanquiſh me, the Queen of Suſiana and the Princeſs Araminta ſhall be reſtored. Oh ye Gods (added Cyrus) I beſeech you infuſe reaſon into the ſoul of this Prince, and let him help me to releaſe that Princeſs whom we adore. Would it were the pleaſure of thoſe Gods, whom you invoke, (replied the King of Pontus) that I were able to follow the Dictates of Reaſon; for if I could, I ſhould then reſiſt my paſſion, and overcome it, I ſhould then ſet the Princeſs Mandana at liberty, and then I ſhould make my Love ſubmit unto my ambition, and accept of all thoſe generous offers which you have made me, and by conſequence hope by your valour to regain my Kingdomes: Then though I could not conquer my paſſion, yet I ſhould at leaſt endeavour to overcome my unwillingneſs to fight with my Deliverer, and by fighting with you, I might find an end of my misfortunes, either by a glorious Victory, or an honourable death. But to ſpeak ſincerely unto you, I cannot do it, ſince I am neither Maſter of my own perſon, nor of Mandana's: When I came firſt unto Crœſſus, after I had loſt my Kingdomes, I brought him no Forces: all that I had, whereby to oblige him unto my protection, was to put the Princeſs Mandana into his power, ſo that ſince ſhe is not mine, I have no right to demand her of him again: She is ſo precious an Hoſtage, that it may be ſaid, that ſhe almoſt keeps his Empire and perſon in ſecurity: Judge I beſeech you after this what I am able to do, you have been my Deliverer, I confeſs, and ſuch a one, as unto whom I owe all I have; nor can it be denied, but Creſſus is my Protector alſo, and by the ſame reaſon I am as much his debtor. Never conſider, (ſaid Cyrus) what your debt is unto the King of Lydia, or unto me, but conſider what your debt is unto the Princeſs Mandana: Is it juſt, that ſince the Gods have deſtined her to wear the prime Crowns of all Aſia, you ſhould make her die in Priſon? Can your Love conſent unto that? And do you think, that to love Mandana truly, is to make her the moſt miſerable Princeſs alive? Recollect your ſelf generous Rival, here what reaſon ſayes unto you, and ſtrive either to overcome your ſelf, or me, I give you the choice of theſe two; if you make choice of the firſt, and will move Crœſſus unto a peace, to ſhew you that I deſire it not to ſave my ſelf the labour of a War, I do ſolemnly ingage my word to eſtabliſh you in the Throne of your Fathers, and to do as much for Crœſſus if he have any need of my aſſiſtance; but if you make choice of the other, then perſwade him that it would be very much more advantageous unto him to vanquiſh or intrap me, than to hazard it in a Battel; for truly, I cannot endure Mandana ſhould be thus a Captive, and I wonder how you can ſuffer it: I do not know (replied the King of Pontus) but there is ſuch a diſcord in my own thoughts, that every day I do both love and hate you, and am my own greateſt Enemy; yet there is not one minute in my life, in which I do not moſt deſperately love the Princeſs Mandana; I cannot fix upon any reaſonable reſolution, but am always both unjuſt and miſerable: No, no, (cryed out Cyrus) it is not ſo; for ſince you ſee Mandana every day, either angry, or with tears in her eyes, your heart muſt needs melt, or deſpair, whereas I never ſee her; therefore in all likelyhood I am more unfortunate (and not you) than ever I imagined: However, I beſeech you, be ſo ſincere as to tell me, upon what terms you ſtand with Mandana? I beſeech you do not deny me every thing; and ſince you will neither releaſe your Miſtreſs, nor fight with your Rival, however ſpeak free and ſincerely unto a Prince who would be your friend, if you would permit him: Alas, Sir, (cried out the King of Pontus) your rigour is too ſharp, in deſiring me to tell you with my own mouth, that you are as much in the Princeſs Mandana's eſteem as I am little, and content your ſelf with this, that though I cannot part with her, yet have I no hopes of ever being loved: What then do you hope for (ſaid Cyrus unto him?) To die, replied the King of Pontus, before you ſhall enjoy her. There is not a better way to hinder me from enjoying her, (replied Cyrus) than to fight with me: Sometimes I think upon nothing but that, replied the King of Pontus, when I look upon you as my Rival, and my Rival beloved; and ſometimes when I look upon my obligations, I cannot think of any ſuch thing: Forget them all for ever, replied Cyrus, ſince you will not render me the Princeſs whom I adore: However do thus much for me at the leaſt, ſaid he, that you will induce Crœſſus not to draw the War out at length, but that a deciding Battel may ſpeedily be reſolved upon, and let Victory fall where it pleaſe the Fates. This I will promiſe you (replied the King of Pontus) though I am angry with my ſelf, that I can grant no more, unto one that is not only my Deliverer, but alſo a Protector of the Princeſs Araminta: Do not make the reſpects which I pay unto that illuſtrious perſon any obligations unto you (replied Cyrus) ſince I pay them only in love of her and my ſelf, and not of you.

After this, theſe two Princes talked together of many things, with ſometimes generoſity, and ſometimes in anger, but Love did always appear in them both: When they were ready to part, Abradates advanced, and the King of Pontus naming him unto Cyrus, that Prince ſaluted him with much reſpect, as made appear how he treated Panthea. This firſt complement being over, and Abradates rendred him thanks for his ſo generous and civil treatments of the Queen his Wife, Cyrus began to ſpeak, and looking upon the King of Pontus, Have you no pity upon the King of Suſiana? (ſaid he unto him) and will you not put me into ſuch a condition as will make me reſtore him the only perſon which can make him happy? Oh I beſeech you, let me enjoy ſo much happineſs, as that I may break the Chains of theſe two great Princeſſes in pieces, by your breaking the Chains of the Princeſs Mandana. As much intereſted as I am, becauſe I know two well what it is to be deprived of her I moſt love (replied Abradates) yet I cannot joyn my prayers unto yours, Sir; and therefore without any inſulting upon the miſeries of a great Prince, I endure my own misfortunes, without any addition unto his; yet thinking my ſelf moſt happy, in meeting with ſo generous an Enemy as you, Sir, are. As Abradates was ſpeaking thus, and the name of Telephanes coming into the mind of Cyrus, he began to look amongſt the Lydian Cavalry, if he could ſpy the Buckler, which they ſaid he uſed to wear; for though there was no deſign of any fighting that day, yet every one had their Arms. Cyrus then looking very circumſpectly amongſt them, whilſt Abradates was ſpeaking unto him, he ſaw a man of an excellent garb, and well mounted, in the firſt rank, who turning his head then to ſpeak unto another which was in the ſecond Rank; would not at firſt permit him to ſee his face, yet his Buckler was plainly to be ſeen; ſo that he longing to have him look towards him, he hearkened unto Abradates, but ſtill kept his eye upon Telephanes, and though he knew no cauſe for it, yet his ſoul ſwelled with extraordinary agitations, and much more when this pretended Telephanes turning his head that way, he ſaw him to be either the Prince Mazares, or his Ghoſt; for ſince he had often ſeen this Prince at Babylon, before he ſaw him in a dying poſture near Sinope; and ſince the Idea of a Rival is always riveted in ones memory, he knew him at firſt ſight; yet ſince he certainly believed him dead, this ſight did ſo ſurprize him, that he could not chuſe but interrupt Abradates. I beſeech you (ſaid he, and pointed towards him) how long hath that Cavalier been amongſt you? and why doth he name himſelf Telephanes? The King of Pontus being very deſirous to know more of a man who had done ſo many gallant feats ſince he came into Lydia, anſwered, that he came to Sardis a little before the Princeſs Mandana; but as for his name, he knew no more of it than what himſelf told us: No, no, ſaid Cyrus, Telephanes (if my eyes be not much miſtaken) is not his name, but it is Mazares, one of the Raviſhers of my Princeſs, whom the Gods have raiſed from the dead to torment me the more: Mazares hearing him ſelf named by Cyrus (for it was really he) came nearer the river, and looking with a more melancholy than furious aſpect: Since you have diſcovered my right name, ſaid he unto him, I will not any longer conceal it, I do confeſs, that I am Mazares, the moſt culpable and miſerable man alive: But, Sir, ſince I am not revived, but only to die a ſecond death, do not repent that you left me alive: I left you alive (replied Cyrus in ſuch a tone, as manifeſtly ſpoke the turbulency in his heart) becauſe I could not then take it from you with honour: But now, ſince I ſee you in a condition able to anſwer him that ſhall call you to an account, I am reſolved not to do it as I did before: We ſhall meet perhaps (replied Mazares coldly) before this War be ended: Or elſe I would look for you all over the world (replied Cyrus;) and did I not know the rights of men to be inviolable, we would this very hour end all our differences. Abradates fearing that Mazares would reply ſomething that might make Cyrus not a Maſter of his own reſentment, broke off this diſcourſe, telling them both, that it was not permitted them to ſpeak unto each other at this time, ſince Cyrus obtained leave from Crœſus, only for the King of Pontus and himſelf to parly, yet did Mazares anſwer in ſuch a manner, as made both his courage and prudence to appear. In the mean time the King of Pontus, who loved him very well as Telephanes, yet now did not know how he ſhould look upon him; yet conſidering, that if Mazares had not carried away Mandana, ſhe had not now been in Lydia, then he had thoughts of him different from thoſe of Cyrus: And on the other ſide conſidering, that but for him, Mandana had been now either in the King of Aſſyria's power, or in the power of Cyrus, he could not have any ſuch reſentments of hatred againſt him, as uſually is againſt a Rival; yet was he ſo buſied in himſelf, what to think of Mazares, and how to behave himſelf towards him, that he medled not with their diſcourſe, which by the prudence of Abradates ended, every one retiring to his own party with different apprehenſions. Cyrus yet was the laſt that retreated, ſo unwilling was he to part from two men, whom he had ſuch a deſire to be fighting with, even both at once, rather than not at all; he was very ſorry, that he did not a little better inform himſelf, how it ſhould poſſibly be that Mazares ſhould ſtill live, and why he ſhould take the King of Pontus his part, who was his Rival, and why he ſhould conceal his name: However, return to the Camp he muſt, but he returned with ſuch furious reſentments of Spirit, that he was never ſeen ſo little Maſter of himſelf as at that time. When he came to the Camp, and had given all neceſſary orders, he had a longing impatience to be alone with Chriſantes, that he might with freedom deſcant upon this odd accident. Well my dear witneſs of all my misfortunes (ſaid he unto him) what do you ſay unto what you have ſeen (for Chriſantes was with him at this enterview) I ſay, Sir, (replied he) that ſince Fortune has been ſo forward in forging ſo many Prodigies to torment you, ſhe will at laſt work as many Miracles to eaſe you: For my part, (replied Cyrus) I am not of your opinion, but on the contrary, methinks I have cauſe to fear, ſince this accident, that Aſtiages as well as Mazares may revive to torment me; and that ſo many millions of men as have loſt their lives in the Armies of my Enemies in ſo many Battels as I have won, will alſo revive to recruit the Army of Crœſſus unto an incredible multitude, and that all thoſe whom I have ſo often vanquiſhed, will at laſt become my Conquerours: For truly, why ſhould I not think all theſe as poſſible as this I ſee? Did I not ſee Mazares dying in the Fiſhers Cabin? Or to ſay better, Did I not with theſe eyes ſee him dead? Did not theſe ears hear him pronounce with a feeble and weak tone thoſe ſad words concerning my Princeſs, when he gave me her Scarf, which remained in his hands after the ſhipwrack with her? Then did he loſe his tongue, and could not ſpeak one word more, when I left him, and they aſſured me moſt confidently the next morning that he was dead; yet for all this, Mazares I ſee is living; Mazares is in the ſame place where Mandana is, and fights for one of his Rivals: Was ever ſuch a prodigious paſſage known? Did the King of Aſſyria, whom he betrayed, know he is in Sardis, perhaps he would find out ways to know how all this came about, and hereafter acquaint me; but alas, certainly the Gods are reſolved to overwhelm me with all manner of misfortunes; and have I not good reaſon to think ſo? The Oracle aſſures the King of Aſſyria, that he may hope for the enjoyment of Mandana: The Oracle does affirmatively promiſe Crœſſus the Ruine of that Empire, which in all likelyhood I ſhould hereafter poſſeſs; and the Sibils anſwer pronounceth my death; yet did they conceal one part of my misfortunes, ſince they told me not that Mazares was alive.

But, Sir, (ſaid Chriſantes unto him) it is not Mazares who now keeps Mandana Priſoner, nor is it the King of Pontus, but it is Crœſſus. 'Tis true Chriſantes (replyed Cyrus) but they were my Rivals who put her into his Power: the King of Aſſyria began my misfortunes in carrying her away from Themiſſira: Mazares increaſed them in carrying her away from Sinope, and firſt from Babylon, both which I was ready to take and become Maſter of: But the King of Pontus exceeded them both, in ſaving her from ſhipwrack only to caſt her into a Sea of miſeries: 'Tis very true, that without laying the fault upon others, I ought to accuſe my ſelf the firſt: for indeed if Artamenes had known Philidaſpes when he met him in the Wood and ſaved his life, Mandana had been at liberty, the King of Pontus had been upon his Throne, Mazares had been innocent, and I had been the moſt happy man upon Earth. However, ſince things paſt cannot be revoked, I muſt think upon the preſent and future; and endeavour my own ſatisfaction ſo far as to ſacrifice ſome of my Rivals unto my Fury and Revenge, before all theſe menaced miſeries do fall upon me: Yet this Prince could not execute his deſign ſo ſoon, becauſe his Enemies were on the other ſide of the River, and he could not eaſily come at them: Alſo, having cauſed ſome Chariots of War to be made which were not finiſhed, he was forced to ſtay a while before he could attempt any thing conſiderable: yet there happened every day ſuch Encounters between Parties, as did ſharpen the violent deſires of both ſides to vanquiſh: For ſince Crœſſus kept one Paſs over the River Halis, and Cyrus another, both ſides were continually ſending out Parties.

In the mean while Aglitidas and Ligdamis did punctually obſerve the Orders of Cyrus, and waited upon the Queen of Suſiana and the Princeſs Araminta unto the Town which that Prince deſired they ſhould ſtay in, until the Battel was fought, which as he hoped would be very ſhortly: They were no ſooner there, but Panthea ſent Ligdamis to entreat Cyrus that ſhe might have ſo much liberty as to come and ſpeak with him, about a buſineſs which did much concern him: Cyrus then asked Ligdamis if he knew what it was? and he anſwered, No, but ſaid, he found Panthea ſo ſad and altered, that he was perſwaded ſhe grieved exceedingly: Cyrus, who had a natural diſpoſition to compaſſionate all in any miſery, without any longer delay, or putting her unto the trouble of coming to him, he went unto the place where ſhe was, which was not above thirty furlongs from his Quarter. When he was come into the Caſtle where ſhe lodged, he asked Araſpes very privately, whom he perceived very melancholy, how the Queen of Suſiana did ſince he ſaw her, and whether he knew of any new misfortune or diſtate which had befaln her of late? Araſpes bluſht at the queſtion, and anſwered Cyrus in ſuch a manner as made him think that he had promiſed fidelity unto Panthea, and would not confeſs all he knew: ſo that commending his diſcretion in lieu of chiding him, he went into the Queen of Suſiana's Chamber. Araſpes would have entered alſo as he uſed to do when Cyrus came, but he forbad him: When he was entered he ſaw Panthea, and none but Cleonice with her; but ſaw her ſo ſad, that he was ſurprized: Sir ſaid ſhe unto him, I ask your pardon, for putting you to ſo much trouble. 'Tis my part rather to beg a pardon, Madam (replied he) for making you ſo melancholy, though I do not know the cauſe of it: And truly, Madam, I think my ſelf reſponſable for all the miſeries which chance unto you, as long as I continue ſo unfortunate, as not to releaſe you. Sir, anſwered ſhe, I ſhould be very unjuſt if I ſhould charge you with the faults of another; and I have ſo much reſpect unto you, as not to aggravate the crime of one whom you honour with your affection: Therefore without telling you againſt whom I complain, I ſhall only entreat you — No, no, Madam (ſaid Cyrus, and haſtily interrupted her) you muſt not conceal either the Crime nor the Criminal, whoſoever he be; and I do proteſt unto you, that if there be any who hath offered you the leaſt cauſe of complaint, I will puniſh him ſo ſeverely, as you ſhall ſee I am as ſenſible of any injuries offered unto thoſe I honour, as if they were done unto my ſelf.

I ever did believe, Sir, replied Panthea, that your generoſity would prompt you to do as much, and therefore, though it be not the cuſtom for Captives to chuſe their Keepers, yet I moſt humbly beſeech you to forbid Araſpes from ſeeing me again, and to put ſome other of your Friends, whom you ſhall pleaſe, in his place.

You ſhall be moſt exactly obeyed, Madam, replied Cyrus; but if Araſpes hath been ſo bold as to offer you any diſpleaſure, he deſerves not only to be baniſhed out of your preſence, but out of the ſociety of men, as a moſt barbarous and wicked man; therefore I beſeech you, to tell me a little more preciſely what the crime is which he hath committed.

It is enough I tell you, Sir (ſaid ſhe and bluſhed) that Araſpes is fitter to be in the head of an Army, than to guard one of my quality and virtue: After this, Sir, ask me no more, for this is as much as my modeſty will permit me to tell you. It is enough, Madam (replied Cyrus,) and without putting you to the trouble of relating what his crime is (which cannot be little, ſince committed againſt you,) I ſhall make himſelf confeſs it, and proportion his puniſhment accordingly: In the mean time, Madam, to teſtifie that it is not my intention to expoſe you unto any diſlike of thoſe which are about you, be pleaſed to chuſe whom you will to ſerve you, but not to guard you; for I deſire no other ſecurity from you than your Princely word, and I give you abſolute authority to diſplace any which you diſlike to have about you. Ah, Sir, ſaid ſhe, your generoſity extends it ſelf very far. No, no, Madam, replied he, I will do any thing to ſerve you, and therefore I beſeech you accept of my humble offer; and ſince my impatience to puniſh him that hath offended you doth earneſtly invite me, I beſeech you give me leave to depart ſooner than I intended. Panthea raviſhed at the magnanimity of Cyrus, rendred him a thouſand thanks for his goodneſs to her, and asked him pardon for cauſing any new diſpleaſure in him: But, Sir, ſaid ſhe, ſince it is one of thoſe Crimes which Virtue will not permit me to relate, I hope you will excuſe me. Cyrus anſwered unto this with unequalled generoſity, and then retired; but meeting with Doraliſa and Pherenice in the outer Chamber, he ſtayed a while with them, to know more exactly what was the Crime of Araſpes, knowing that ſhe was pleaſed to impart her ſecrets unto them; and taking them aſide, I beſeech you tell me (ſaid he to them) what Araſpes hath done, which hath given the Queen ſome cauſe of complaint, after ſo many commendations of him? for I would gladly know wherein he hath failed, before I puniſh him. Sir, anſwered Doraliſa, and ſmiled, you may remember how I told you one day that Araſpes was not ſo inſenſible as you thought him; and that Perinthus ſeemed once as obdurate as he. I remember it very well replied Cyrus, but is it poſſible that Araſpes ſhould preſume to look ſo high as the Princeſs Panthea, and ſo inſolent as to expreſs any ſigns of his paſſion? It is moſt certain, replyed Pherenice, that he hath been ſo bold as to love her, and ſo unfortunate as to let her perceive it. This, Sir, is the Crime of Araſpes, which queſtionleſs is great enough to move you unto ſo much ſatisfaction, as to remove him from the Queen: Yet it is certain that of late he hath loſt his Reaſon, but it was apparent he did not ſhew his paſſion with any deſign that ſhe ſhould know it: A Virtue leſs ſcrupulous than hers might have diſſembled it, but the Queen was ſo incenſed againſt him, that ſhe cannot endure his preſence. She ſhall never be troubled with it, replied Cyrus, and I ſhall ſo fully ſatisfie her, that ſhe ſhall have as much cauſe to commend me, as to complain againſt Araſpes. After this, Cyrus went out, and made a ſhort viſit to the Princeſs Araminta, whilſt Araſpes was ſought for, but could not be found in any place of the Caſtle: for when he heard that Panthea had ſent unto Cyrus, he thought ſhe would complain againſt him, knowing better the Crime he had committed, than either Doraliſa or Pherentce, becauſe Panthea out of her modeſty and greatneſs of Soul, did partly hide it from them. Araſpes then was in a terrible perplexity; but conſidering with himſelf that he could not long avoid the ſight of Cyrus, he reſolved to go and confeſs his fault, and ſubmit himſelf unto his goodneſs: Then did he preſent himſelf before him, but with ſuch a baſhful countenance, that he was ſcarce knowable: Cyrus was then in a Gallery at the end of Araminta's Chamber, from whence he came: As ſoon as he ſaw Araſpes, he made a ſign as if he would be in private with him, ſo that every one who were then preſent did withdraw, and left him the liberty to ſpeak his mind.

Since Cyrus loved Araſpes, and was well inclined to excuſe all errours of Love, and ſince both Doraliſa and Pherenice did not much aggravate his fault, he did not at firſt break into any anger; ſo that Araſpes not doubting but Cyrus did exactly know his Crime, grew ſomething more confident, and reſolved to confeſs ingenuouſly all that he ſhould ask him: Is it not enough, Araſpes, ſaid he unto him, that I ſhould be perſecuted by my Enemies, but my friends muſt alſo lay their loads upon me? And muſt you whom I ever loved, contribute your Faggot to the fire of my anger? Might you not well apprehend by thoſe reſpects which I rendred unto the Queen of Suſiana, what your duty was, which I would have you render her? I took you for a wiſe and ſtayed man, and yet you were ſo inconſiderate, as to expreſs ſigns of Love unto ſo great a Queen, who is more illuſtrious by her virtues, than her high quality: 'Tis true, Sir, replied Araſpes, I muſt confeſs my ſelf culpable, if it be a crime to do that which is not poſſible for me but to do: However (ſaid Cyrus unto him) tell me ingenuouſly how it is, and why you did not avoid her preſence as ſoon as you perceived your ſelf firſt in Love with her? You may remember, that once when I obſerved you very ſad, and thinking that employment was irkſome unto you, I offered you another: Why then did you not accept of it, if you perceived in your ſelf any inclination to ſuch an unſuitable and unreaſonable paſſion? 'Tis true, Sir, replied he, I ought to have done ſo; but it is as true alſo, that this imperious paſſion would never permit me ſo much power over my ſelf, as to be far from Panthea; and my hopes were, that I ſhould only love her, and ſhe never perceive it: Why would you carry it ſo? replied Cyrus, for as long as ſhe had been ignorant of it, I ſhould never have known it; or if I had perceived it, I ſhould have pitied in lieu of accuſing you: Ah, Sir, (cried Araſpes) it was chance that made my crime, for truly I did repent of my intention to diſcover my paſſion, and the Letter which ſhe ſaw was much againſt my will.

Cyrus then conjecturing that there was ſomething which the Queen of Suſiana had not told him, and which Doraliſa and Pherenice did not know, or elſe ſeemed ignorant, he urged him to relate all the paſſage betwixt her and him: Then he told him, that he loved her ever ſince he firſt ſaw her; that he reſiſted his paſſion as much as he could, and not being able to overcome it, he concealed it with great diligence; but of late, he could not poſſibly chuſe, but much againſt his will diſcovered it, by a hundred unthought of paſſages which eſcaped him: that he had an intention either to ſpeak or write ſomething unto Panthea, but of the two, he rather fixed upon writing. How Araſpes, (ſaid Cyrus) Did you write a Letter of Love unto Panthea?

thea? Yes, Sir, (replied he) but afterwards I repented, and intended ſhe ſhould never ſee it, yet notwithſtanding I kept it, not knowing any reaſon why, and carried it in my pocket, reading it very often, and found ſome comfort in reading that unto my ſelf, which I durſt not ſpeak unto Panthea. A while after, this fair Queen having a great deſire to have a ſight of the Oracle which Crœſſus received from Delphos, and which ſhe knew I had, ſhe ſent a ſervant one evening when ſhe was retired unto me for it, I being all zeal to obey her, unhappily miſtook papers, and ſent that Letter, which I repented of, and reſolved ſhe ſhould never ſee: He unto whom I gave this Letter, was no ſooner gone but I found my error; it vexed me to the ſoul, I ſent my ſervants to call him back, but preſently a rapture of Love ſeduced my reaſon, and I recalled them; then commanding and countermanding them four or five times, my laſt order was to call him back in good earneſt, but it was too late, for he was entred into the Queens Chamber. It is impoſſible for me to relate unto you, Sir, how I paſſed away that night, but I aſſure you it was with the moſt reſtleſs agitations of mind that ever any had. Has ſhe the Letter yet? replied Cyrus: Although ſhe have, replied Araſpes, I can eaſily relate it, for I think I have read it a thouſaud times, and it was in theſe terms.

THis is not to beg a pardon for my preſumption in loving you, nor is it to ask you any recompence, that I let you underſtand how Love has made me more your captive, than the war hath made you; but it is, becauſe I think it juſt you ſhould not be ignorant, that in your captivity you have an abſolute Soveraignty over my heart: If I do not ask a pardon for my raſhneſs, it is rather becauſe I am ſincere, than becauſe I am preſumptuous, ſince certainly I cannot repent of loving you: and if I do not ask any recompence, it is becauſe I know very well, that I rather deſerve puniſhment: Thus, Madam, pretending unto unto nothing but to die in your Fetters, be ſo good I beſeech you, as not to ruine me, in making them ſo intollerable, that I cannot wear them. This, Madam, I have had a longing deſire to tell you, and maugre the violence of my paſſion, I ſhould think my ſelf ſufficiently favoured, if you could without hatred only believe, that I love you more than ever any did.

ARASPES.

This Letter (replied Cyrus after he had repeated it) had been reaſonable, if it had been addreſſed unto Doraliſa or Pherenice: But to ſpeak thus unto a Queen, and a Queen in miſery, is a boldneſs ſo unexcuſable, that I cannot expreſs how infinitely you have diſobliged me: I was moſt cruelly puniſhed for it the next morning, replied Araſpes; for when I came unto her Chamber, according to my uſual cuſtome, to wait upon her unto the Temple, ſhe told me I ſhould not go that day: But the moſt cruel torment of all to me, was, when ſhe ſent for me in the evening, and cauſing me to come into her Cloſet: Araſpes (ſaid ſhe unto me, with ſuch a Majeſty as made my heart tremble) Since it concerns my honour not to publiſh how you have failed in that reſpect which you ought to have unto me, I will not let my reſentments againſt you appear, until I meet the illuſtrious Cyrus in ſuch a place where I may entreat him to remove you further from me. In the mean time, ſince I cannot endure the ſight of you, after your extream boldneſs, I pray come no more into my Chamber, unleſs you have a mind to exaſperate my reſolutions of hatred. Then I had a mind to proteſt unto her, that I was infinitely ſorry for what I had done, that I repented of ever writing the Letter, and that it came into her hands contrary to my intention, but ſhe would not hear me, and expreſſed ſo much anger in her aſpect, and ſuch an odious averſion to me, that I retired with an unconceiveable ſorrow in my ſoul; Since this, Sir, I never had my reaſon clear, and this, Sir, is my crime, do unto me as you pleaſe; and yet methinks, a Prince who is ſo well acquainted with the power of Love, ſhould be ſomething indulgent towards a man, whoſe crime is only being in Love; and ſo I am very much (replied Cyrus) for I pity you infinitely, and I would do any thing to revoke what's paſt if it were poſſible, and that you had not offended Panthea: But for all that, Araſpes, ſatisfaction muſt be given, it concerns my honour as well as hers, therefore, though I eſteem you never ſo much, I muſt baniſh you, not only from her, but my ſelf alſo. Alas, Sir, replied Araſpes, Is not the ſeparation from her I adore puniſhment enough, but I muſt be deprived of the honour to die for you in the head of your Army? Conſider, Sir, that Panthea will be better revenged in my death, than in my Exile: So ſhall not I, replied Cyrus, for I rather wiſh your Exile, than your death. But Araſpes, reſiſt me no more, retire your ſelf, and ſay nothing, but go either into Medea or Cappadocia, or any other place you like beſt, until the Queen of Suſiana be out of my hands: Araſpes would have replied, but Cyrus ſeemed angry at his refuſal, and ſpoke in ſuch a tone, as intimated he would be obeyed; and ſo Araſpes departed the ſame hour, though Cyrus was very loth to want a man whom he loved ſo well: He ſent then unto Panthea, to tell her that he had baniſhed Araſpes; and that if ſhe approved of it, Artabaſes ſhould wait upon her in his room. Panthea was raviſhed at the generoſity of Cyrus, and ſent him thanks; and not content with that, ſhe diſpatched one of her ſervants (which came from Suſa with her, and whom ſhe eſteemed very much) unto her dear Abradates, giving him a Letter to deliver unto him, which intimated her great obligations unto Cyrus: As for Araſpes, before his departure, he writ a Letter unto Cyrus, and ſent it by a Souldier, but this Prince did not then ſhew it, and it was a long while after before any knew he had writ unto him: The diſgrace of Araſpes made a great noiſe in the Army, the cauſe alſo was quickly known, and there was none which did not commend Cyrus, and pity Araſpes. In the mean time, this illuſtrious Conquerour, being perſwaded that thoſe who ſeek their Enemies, have the advantage of them who wait for them, though inferiour in number, he quitted the Quarter where he was, and took up another ſo near the Army of Crœſſus, that if the River Halis had not ſeparated them, doubtleſs he had forced that Prince to a Battel. There was not a day paſſed, but Cyrus knew by his Spies what his Enemies did; but that which perplexed him worſt was, that he did not perfectly underſtand what they intended to do; He knew, that by reaſon of the great number of Ægyptians which were in his Army, they muſt change the order which they were uſed to obſerve in drawing their Troops into Battalia: ſo that he had an extream deſire to know preceiſely what form they would uſe, but he conceived it a thing impoſſible, yet he ſent out every day freſh Spies, and took new Priſoners; he underſtood by them, that Crœſſus found himſelf not well, and returned to Sardis, which was not far off and that the King of Pontus went every day thither: Since Cyrus thought it a more glorious ſight to ſee Mandana than himſelf victorious, he reſolved rather to loſe many men in forcing a paſſage over the River Halis, than to linger away any longer time: Yet notwithſtanding the King of Phrigia, the King of Hircania, Gobrias, Gadates, the Prince Tigranes, and Phraartes, perſwading him that it was better to wait a few days for a Victory, than to hazard it, he reſolved upon a courſe of patience: yet he was every day on horſeback; ſometimes to ſtop victuals from going to the Enemies; ſometimes to face them, ſometimes to skirmiſh in Parties: But what ere he did, or where ere he was, Mandana or his Rivals were always in his thoughts, eſpecially Mazares whoſe Adventure ſeemed moſt prodigiouſly ſtrange unto him.

Some days being thus ſpent, he had intelligence that Crœſſus was well again, and was reſolved to give Battel: Cyrus then burning with impatient fury to ſhorten this War, and to be at handy blows with his Enemies, reſolved to ſend a Herald unto Crœſſus to tell him, That if he would, he would retreat from the River as far as was neceſſary to give him room and time enough to paſs over his Army, and to draw them up into Battalia, upon this condition, he would reſolve not to decline fighting, as hitherto he had done. This Project was no ſooner reſolved upon, but Cyrus did put it in execution: and Crœſſus no ſooner heard this Propoſition, but he accepted of it; and ſent back the Herald which Cyrus ſent, with a promiſe that within four days he would look the Prince his Maſter in the face, and exchange ſome blows with him according to his deſire: After this, Cyrus aſſumed freſh vigour, and hoped for Victory, in ſpite of all the angry Oracles: This hope alſo was infuſed into the hearts of all his Souldiers; who at this time did reſemble the Saylers which followed a famous Pilot, who never were aſtoniſhed at the fury of any ſurging Waves, but when they ſaw him aſtoniſhed: So likewiſe the Troops of Cyrus did never conſult with any thing but the face of their General to prognoſticate the Victory: ſo that they always finding there a ſerene tranquility amidſt the greateſt dangers; they fought like Souldiers who thought their General could commit no fault, or ever be vanquiſhed: but whileſt this Prince prepared himſelf for fight, many things fell out which did for a while keep back that glory which he expected, and which did extreamly puzzle Crœſſus. When this Prince returned anſwer by the Herald which Cyrus ſent unto him, he was at Sardis; and the King of Pontus and Abradates were at the Camp: ſo that theſe two Princes hearing of this Anſwer, thought ſtrange, that Crœſſus ſhould ſo peremptorily determine upon the day of Battel without ever acquainting them: Since it was they principally who were reſponſible for the good or bad ſucceſs of this great Enterprize. The Prince Myrſiles being by reaſon of his imperfection incapable of any ſervice but his perſon; and the Prince Mazares, though it was known who he was, yet he had no authority to do any thing but ſhew his valour. Theſe two Princes then being much incenſed, did highly complain againſt Crœſſus, eſpecially Abradates, who at the ſame time received a Letter from Panthea, which did ſo highly extol Cyrus, that it did diſpoſe him more to complain againſt the King of Lydia: Alſo conſidering with himſelf, that it would be a greater difficulty to get Panthea out of the power of Crœſſus, after the Battel, what e're the ſucceſs be, than before, he reſolved to entreat Cyrus, that the Prince Artamas might be exchanged for Panthea: But for the more expediency of his Deſign, he did communicate his deſires unto Andramites, whom he knew to be in Love with Doraliſa, who was with the Queen of Suſiana: So that Andramites intereſting himſelf in the Deſign, did promiſe Abradates to be preſent and urgent with Crœſſus when he ſhould motion it unto him. As for the King of Pontus, he never oppoſed his Project: for ſince Abradates did not demand the Princeſs Mandana in exchange for Panthea, but only Prince Artamas, he durſt not be ſeen he approved of it: Abradates then went unto Crœſſus in the morning; and after he had acquainted him with his diſcontent, that he ſhould fix upon the day of Battel without acquainting him, he deſired him, that he would ſuffer the Prince Artamas to be be exchanged for the Queen his Wife before the Battel was fought. If we get the Victory (replied Crœſſus) we ſhall releaſe her more glorioully, than by any negotiation of exchange. You may get the Victory, replied he, and yet I not get Panthea, ſince certainly the weaker a Party is, the more carefully they keep their Priſoners: The truth is, Sir, added he, ſince I do not fight to conquer Provinces, but chiefly to releaſe Panthea, and next to oppoſe the over-ſwelling Power of Cyrus. I know not why I ſhould hazard the loſs of that Lady for ever, who is ſo infinitely dear unto me, for want of a reaſonable Propoſition, therefore I beſeech you take it not ill if I be very urgent with you to make this Propoſition unto Cyrus. Negotiations of this nature, replied Crœſſus, are not to be made in ſo ſhort a time as we have remaining before the Battel. I have ſuch hopes in the generoſity of Cyrus, anſwered Abradates, that I believe he will not deny a Truce for ſome days, if you will be pleaſed to ask it. I am not uſed unto any ſuch compliance with my Enemies (anſwered Crœſſus very ſharply) and therefore I know not how to make any ſuch motions, neither do I conceive your deſires of an exchange juſt upon the very point of giving a Battel, to be very juſt, or much to any purpoſe, for you will bring a Princeſs into Sardis, and ſend one of the moſt valiant men upon earth into the Enemies Camp to fight againſt us: No, no, Abradates, I cannot conſent unto this: He who can fear one ſingle man (anſwered the King of Suſiana) and is in the head of 200000 men, can never truſt the valour of his Souldiers: However it be (ſaid Crœſſus very fiercely) ſince Artamas is a Delinquent againſt the State, as well as a Priſoner of War, he ſhall not be exchanged for the Queen your Wife: Then you ſhall fight without me, Sir, (replied Abradates:) Sir, (ſaid Andramites, and addreſſed himſelf unto Crœſſus) I beſeech you do not deny this requeſt which is made unto you: I will always deny any thing that is unjuſt, anſwered Crœſſus, and therefore preſs me no more. Andramites uſed many other perſwaſive arguments, but all were to no purpoſe: Then Abradates went from Crœſſus exceedingly unſatisfied, and fully reſolved not to fight, unleſs this Propoſition was firſt made unto Cyrus: Andramites after Abradates was gone, did ſpeak many things unto the King of Lydia which did much offend him. The King of Pontus fearing that this diſorder would make a mutiny amongſt the Soulders, did do all he could to perſwade Crœſſus to conſent unto the King of Suſiana's deſires, and alſo uſed his beſt perſwaſions unto Abradates, that he would not impead the main buſineſs, though Crœſſus ſhould not ſatisfie him, but all his arguments and perſwaſions would not work upon either of them. At the ſame time, the Father of Panthea came from Claſomena unto Sardis, where he had been levying ſome Forces; ſo that finding things in this ſtate, he joyned with Abradates and Andramites, and was more importunate with Crœſſus than they; and ſince he had a great conſiderable Province under his power, his ſolicitations did more perplex Crœſſus than any of the reſt, out of his fears that his refuſal might cauſe a Civil War in his own Dominions, at a time when he had his hands full of a very conſiderable Enemy upon him. The Prince Myrſiles alſo, none knowing his true reaſon for it, did patronize Abradates as much as he was able, expreſſing his earneſt wiſhes that the Queen of Suſiana were releaſed by Treaty; and he made it known unto all his creatures, that they could not any way more ſenſibly oblige him, than by their endeavours of perſwading the King his Father unto it.

Things then were in ſuch a confuſion, both at Sardis and in the Camp, that when Crœſſus would have given Battel at the day appointed, it was not in his power. However he would not conſent to releaſe the Prince Artamas; but ſeeing himſelf extreamly importun'd, he purpoſed the exchange of the King of Aſſyria for the Queen of Suſiana: But Abradates replied, that he would never conſent unto that Propoſition, becauſe it would more incenſe Cyrus, than induce him to the ſatisfaction of his deſires to have any Propoſitions of releaſing his Rival and his Enemy made unto him. Moreover, the King of Pontus did much rather deſire the Prince Artamas ſhould be ſet at liberty, than the King of Aſſyria.

Thus this conteſt growing ſo high, and fearing a revolt in an Army which was compoſed of ſo many ſeveral Nations, Crœſſus reſolved to ask a Truce for ſome days, in order to a Treaty for the liberty of ſome Priſoners, not yet telling who they were, becauſe he was not yet reſolved upon them. Then he diſpatched a meſſenger unto Cyrus, importing as much, who was much ſurprized at the demand, and certainly had denied it, if upon ſerious deliberation he had not found, that he could not force his Enemy to fight, but with the loſs of many men. Cyrus therefore conſented unto a Truce for eight days, upon condition, that ſuch of his men as would go into Sardis, might go with as much ſecurity, as his Enemies might come into his Camp, and deſired that this condition might be ſpecified, for all the advantage which he hoped for by this Truce, was to hear how Mandana, his Rival, and his Friends did fare: And alſo knowing of the diviſion which was amongſt theſe Princes, he hoped to make the gap wider.

So that this Truce being reſolved upon, it was publiſhed the next morning, both in Sardis , and in the Camp: So that after this, there was a pleaſant mixture of friends and enemies in both Camps and Town, and ſo that one could not make any difference of ſides. All the ſtreets of Sardis, as well as the Camp of Cræſſus, was full of Perſians, Medes, Armenians, Aſſyrians, and Hircanians; and the Camp of Cyrus was as full of Lydians, Myſſians , Grecians , Thracians , and Ægyptians. In the mean time , Cyrus ſent Ortalgues into Sardis , to ſee if he could find out any poſſible means for him to have a ſight of his dear Mandana. Ligdamis diſguiſed himſelf to that intent alſo, having no deſire to ſhew himſelf publickly in that Town, becauſe he was very well known, but he was informed by them both, that it was a thing impoſſible, and that ſince the Truce, the Princeſs Mandana did not walk upon the top of the Tower as ſhe was wont ; ſo that if he were at Sardis ; he could ſee nothing but the Walls which ſhut her up : Yet had this Prince much ado to forbear, and I believe indeed he had gone, if ſome of his friends, who obſerved him not Maſter of his reaſon, had not diſſwaded him, not that they feared Cræſſus would violate the Publique Faith , but their fear was, leſt if he ſhould have met with Mazares, or the King of Pontus, there might have been ſome jars between them, which might have cauſed a general diſorder. In the mean time, Abradates ſent unto Cyrus, to deſire that he might ſee his Panthea , in the preſence of whom he pleaſed , leſt it ſhould be ſuſpected he ſpoke unto her concerning ſome affairs of War, or to know from her the affairs of the Camp. Cyrus, who experimentally knew how ſweet it was to ſee her one loved, and hoped that perhaps Abradates would retaliate the favour in letting him ſee Mandana, did very willingly conſent unto his deſire : So that giving all requiſite orders for this meeting , which was to be the ſame day, Abradates was conducted unto Cyrus, who received him with extraordinary civility; after which, he himſelf conducted him unto the Town where Panthea was, and into her Chamber, where ſhe was alone, only with Doraliſa and Pherenice: as ſoon as they entred, Madam, (ſaid Cyrus unto her) I hope you will pardon me for all the hardſhips which you have indured, during the abſence of Abradates, ſince now I bring him unto you: But leſt during your diſcourſe, the ſight of a Prince who was forced to keep you a Captive ſhould moleſt you, I will leave you in freedom to diſcourſe of all your misfortunes.

Panthea was ſo over-joyed at the ſight of her dear Abradates, that ſhe did not half underſtand what Cyrus ſaid; yet after ſhe had ſaluted her illuſtrious Husband with as much reverence as affection, ſhe entreated Cyrus to be a witneſs of their conference, yet notwithſtanding he left them together, and went to viſit the Princeſs Araminta, telling her how he left the King of Suſiana with Panthea. As ſoon as ever this Princeſs heard this, ſhe had an extream deſire to be acquainted with him, yet would ſhe not by any means interrupt ſo ſweet a conference ſo ſoon; ſo that ſhe kept Cyrus company, who to pleaſe her ſaid, that ſhe would one day be as much joyed to ſee Spitridates, as Panthea was to ſee the King of Suſiana. Whilſt they were thus entertaining each other, Panthea to publiſh the high generoſity of Cyrus (after Abradates and ſhe had expreſſed their affectionate ſouls to each other) called Cleonice, Doraliſa, and Pherenice to witneſs her aggravations and obligements unto Cyrus, and grieved that it was the King her Husbands ill fortune to be ingaged in ſo unjuſt a quarrel as that of Crœſſus, who was ſo ungrateful, as to deny him a Priſoner for her exchange. In concluſion, ſhe expreſſed her ſelf in ſuch eloquent terms, as ſhe moved Abradates earneſtly to deſire, that Crœſſus would diſoblige him, and give him a juſt occaſion of changing ſides. Then did ſhe again aggravate her obligations unto Cyrus in puniſhing Araſpes. At the name of Araſpes Abradates ſtarted, and told her, that he who ſhe named was with Crœſſus, and well entertained, and that he much complained againſt Cyrus:

If it be ſo, ſaid Panthea, I have taken a valiant man from Cyrus, and given him unto Crœſſus; But however, I do conjure you, if you have an opportunity for it, to perſwade the Prince my Father to incline Crœſſus unto a Peace, at leaſt, that he would not ingage himſelf in this War with him. Abradates loved Panthea ſo extream dearly, that he could deny her nothing, and told her, that if he could not procure the Prince Artamas to be exchanged for her, he would then quit Crœſſus, and whatſoever became of it, he would ingage his word to be preſently with her: As they were thus diſcourſing, Cyrus brought the Princeſs Araminta unto Panthea, that ſhe might ſee Abradates, who returned her ſuch civil thanks for the honour ſhe did him, as ſhe perceived he was a man of no leſs Generoſity than Courage. The Conference of theſe four illuſtrious Perſons did much augment the eſteem each one had of another, principally between Cyrus and Abradates; for though they were never together before this day, yet there was no ſuperſtitious Ceremonies or Complements of Vanity paſſed between them, but they ſpoke ſincerely to each other, and with a civility ſo full of freedom, as it was apparent Fame had before made them acquainted.

But whilſt the Princeſs Araminta was congratulating the Joys of Panthea, Cyrus asked Abradates, whether he could obtain ſo much favour for him from Crœſſus, as that he might ſee Mandana during this Truce? I ſhould not deſpair of doing you that ſervice, if the King of Pontus and perhaps Mazares would not oppoſe it: However, I will paſs you my word, that I will uſe all my arguments to perſwade them that you may ſee her. If they be afraid that I ſhall ſpeak any thing which may be prejudicial to them, ſaid Cyrus, I will promiſe to ſtand ſilent all the while I look upon her. However, I beſeech you, believe this of me, that if Mandana were not the cauſe of the War, you ſhould not return alone to Sardis, for then I would freely give Liberty unto the Queen of Suſiana: But ſince it is to do Mandana ſervice that I came into Lydia, I hope you will not take it ill, if I take all advantages to do her ſervice and by conſequence keep one that is ſo conſiderable as Panthea is: yet I do proteſt unto you, it is not without much ſorrow that I ſhould be any cauſe of your diſcontent. I ſhall not call to memory how you gave a Retreat unto the Raviſher of Mandana, and engaged your ſelf in the ſide of Crœſſus: for as it is not fitting I ſhould blame ſo gallant an Enemy for it, ſo it is rather fit I ſhould think it the Will of the Gods that I ſhould obtain the Victory at a dear rate: for certainly, if you were but engaged on our ſide, that of Crœſſus would not long hold out: But however, though it be the will of Fate to diſpoſe otherwiſe of you, yet I conjure you not to deny this favour which I ask of you, ſince it does not at all contradict your duty unto Crœſſus: I will promiſe it as far as in my power, and I am very ſorry that I cannot aſſure you of good ſucceſs in my endeavours. After this, theſe Princes and Princeſſes were above an hour in diſcourſe of their paſt and preſent misfortunes; and afterwards they parted: Cyrus waiting upon Abradates as far as the further quarter of his Camp, did ſhew him part of his Troops drawn up in Battalia: And it being a very gallant ſight, Abradates told him, It was no wonder to ſee ſuch good Souldiers under ſuch a Commander: for truly (ſaid he unto him) methinks your preſence has infuſed ſuch heroique ſparks into me, that I make no queſtion but I ſhall return more valiant unto Sardis, than when I firſt came to you. The caſe is not ſo with me, replied Cyrus, for as valiant as you are, you have infuſed an unwillingneſs in me to fight againſt you ever ſince I knew you. Abradates anſwered his obliging language with as much civility and ſpirit: And afterwards both theſe mighty Princes parted extreamly well ſatisfied with each other. Abradates in purſuance of his promiſe beſeeched the King of Lydia to let Cyrus ſee Mandana, as Cyrus had given him the liberty to ſee Panthea: Crœſſus at the firſt did make no difficulty of it, yet added ſuch a condition unto it, as did render it impoſſible; for he conſented unto the enterview, provided the King of Pontus would approve of it: Abradates then went unto the King of Pontus to beg the favour; And what inconveniency (ſaid he unto him) can it be unto you? You know he is in Mandana's favour as much already as he can deſire to be, and therefore though this Princeſs ſhould give him any obliging language, that makes him no more happy than he was before: but it may prove an advantage unto you; for if ſhe tell him, how obſequious and reſpective you are unto her, it may chance take off the edge of his Animoſity, and make him fight with leſs fury. If I did not think you ſpeak this (replied the King of Pontus) purpoſely to do that Prince a courteſie, who may do her you love another, I ſhould ſay you are the moſt unjuſt man in the world to deſire any ſuch thing from me: for I pray know (ſince I muſt diſcover the bottom of my heart unto you) that I am arrived at that paſs, as I will never endeavour again to enjoy Mandana: I have ſighed and wept a thouſand times at her feet, but all in vain: ſhe hath thus far confeſſed unto me, that ſhe believes I love her, and that if I were not her Lover ſhe would not deny me her eſteem: But for all that, ſhe hath ſo reſolutely and conſtantly told me, that ſhe will never love me, and hath without telling me, let me perfectly underſtand, how ſhe will love Cyrus for ever, that I am fully perſwaded Mandana is for ever inexorable to me, and for ever faithful unto my Rival: therefore I will ſtrive no more to win her heart, or to enjoy her; but I will, if it be poſſible, look upon her eternally, and keep her out of ſight of all my Rivals; and will ſee them all periſh in a long War, or elſe periſh my ſelf, before I will part from Mandana, the Princeſs of my Soul. I know very well, that I am unjuſt in it, and that the act is contrary to reaſon and generoſity, and that I deſerve the blame of all the World: But on the other ſide, I know that it is not in my power to overcome my ſelf: I muſt ſubmit unto the ſoveraignty of Love and my evil deſtiny, and never think any more of any reſiſtance: therefore I do conjure you, not to put me unto ſuch a cruel neceſſity, as to deny any thing unto that Prince who protects me in his Court: and conſider, that I enjoy no other pleaſure in my life, but only in that my Rivals are not bleſſed with the ſight of my Princeſs: As for the King of Aſſyria and the Prince Mazares, ſince they cannot ſee but incenſe her, I do not much value them: But as for Cyrus, whoſe eyes do always attract affection and tenderneſs from her heart, I cannot endure he ſhould have the leaſt glimpſe of her.

Abradates hearing theſe expreſſions from the King of Pontus, did think he ſhould never obtain his deſires: yet his obligations unto Cyrus moved him to be further importunate; I perceive (ſaid he unto the King of Pontus) that there is ſome difficulty in obtaining my demands: But if you ſeriouſly conſider, that I had not loſt the only Object of my affections but for the love of you; and that Panthea had not been now a Captive, but only becauſe I received you into my Court; and that if you refuſe me this requeſt, Cyrus will revenge upon her the ſeverity you uſe unto him, I conceive you may well think I have juſt cauſe to importune you unto a grant of my deſires. Cyrus is ſo generous (replied the King of Pontus) that you never need fear any rigour upon Panthea. Why then do not you ſtrive to be more generous than he (if it be poſſible) replied Abradates? It is ſufficient that I endeavour to ſurpaſs him in Love (replied the King of Pontus) and not in Generoſity, ſince I ſee it an abſolute impoſſibility to ſtrive againſt the ſtream of my Paſſion; I know very well, that ſince I am the cauſe of Panthea's Captivity, I ought to ſatisfie you in your requeſt: But oh Heavens, how far I am from any capacity of doing what I ought? and therefore I beſeech you pity me, and do not tax me with ingratitude if I deny you any thing, ſince it is not I, but the vigour of my inſulting Paſſion. Abradates, ſeeing he could not perſwade the King of Pontus, did leave him with a very cold Complement, and took it very ill, that ſince himſelf had loſt Panthea only for the love of him, he ſhould deny him ſuch a favour as would not take Mandana out of his Power. He writ then unto Cyrus, and excuſed himſelf, that he could not obtain his deſires: but before he ſent his Letter, he put Creſſus in mind of his word, and beſeeched him to propound unto Cyrus, an exchange of Prince Artamas for the Queen of Suſiana. Crœſſus anſwered him, that he would ſend Andramites to negotiate the matter, yet he ſaid he would not releaſe that Prince, but upon condition he ſhould promiſe never to think any more upon the Princeſs his daughter: This Qualification ſeemed ſo ſtrange unto Abradates, that he concluded Crœſſus would never have made that Propoſition, but purpoſely to break off the exchange: for what probability was there that Prince Artamas, to recover his Liberty, ſhould engage himſelf to quit his affection unto a Princeſs whom he had long loved, and whom he was reſolved to love as long as he lived, and from whom he had received ſome expreſſions of Love? Therefore beginning to ſpeak very fiercely in the preſence of the Prince Myrſiles and Andramites, who were both intereſted in the buſineſs; Sir, (ſaid he unto him) when you promiſed me to propound this exchange, it was to be according to the common Laws of War, and not according to politique ſhifts, to render the Propoſition ineffectual: When you were to releaſe the Prince Artamas, it ſhould be as he was your Enemy, and not as a Lover of the Princeſs Palmis: Love had no ſhare in this Negotiation, and I will never conſent any ſuch Propoſition ſhall be made unto Cyrus. What doth it concern you who is releaſed, or how releaſed, ſo Panthea's Liberty be procured? (replied Crœſſus.) Doubtleſs it does not concern me, replied Abradates; but that which I moſt inſiſt upon, is, that no ſuch Propoſition ſhall be made, as will only incenſe him unto whom it is made: Therefore knowing what a value Cyrus ſets upon Prince Artamas, I thought him ſooner than any other to be propounded in exchange. As for the King of Aſſyria, you may very well imagine, that Cyrus, as generous as he is, does not wiſh his Liberty ſo ſoon as the Prince Artamas: And as for any other of the Priſoners, they are not of fit Qualities to be exchanged againſt Panthea? Anaxaris is none knows who; Soſicles and Tegeus are your Subjects; and Feraulas is a ſervant unto Cyrus: And ſince ſo, Sir, who ſhould I propound in exchange for Panthea but the Prince of Artamas? The Truce was concluded upon to that end, and yet it ſeems you will not releaſe him, but ſtand upon conſultation about it. I do conſult upon it indeed, replied he, and that with good Reaſon; for except Cyrus himſelf, there is not a man in all his Army who would be ſo advantageous to have in my power as the Prince Artamas, and you would have me to releaſe him for your intereſt only: However (ſaid Abradates, with ſuch an aſpect as made it appear he was much diſpleaſed at Crœſſus) I pray tell me directly what you reſolve upon, and why you conſented unto the Truce, if it were not to ſatisfie my deſires? I conſented unto the Truce, replied he, to endeavour the releaſe of Panthea, by releaſing the King of Aſſyria, or all the other Priſoners, or elſe the Prince Artamas upon ſuch conditions as I told you.

After this Abradates retired, and ſo did the Prince Myrſiles and Andramites, and they went unto their Quarters, and the Prince of Claſomena went alſo with Abradates, inſomuch as Crœſſus fearing theſe three perſons ſhould make a mutiny in the Army, he reſolved in the end to make the Propoſition in exchange for the Prince Artamas, and ſent in all haſte to advertiſe Abradates of his intentions, who in the interim had diſpatched his Letter unto Cyrus, to excuſe himſelf in that he could not obtain his deſires, and his expreſſions were ſo effectual, as Cyrus did really believe he had ſincerely done his endeavour, and complained more againſt his own misfortune, than againſt any neglect in Abradates. In the mean time Crœſſus did ſend unto Cyrus; his deſire was, that Andramites ſhould be employed to go in that Negotiation. He ſent unto Abradates to move Andramites to go unto Sardis, but firſt he moved Abradates to go himſelf, yet he would not go, but ſtayed in the Camp, where he was much more terrible unto Crœſſus, than if he had been in Sardis, as well becauſe he had a body of four thouſand men, the beſt in all the Army, as becauſe he was more conſiderable, and beloved of the Souldiers in general, than any other. Andramites then negotiated as a Lover of Doraliſa, and by conſequence as one much concerned in the liberty of Panthea, and therefore he omitted nothing that might render his tranſaction effectual; for he did not only addreſs himſelf with much eloquence and prudence unto Cyrus, but he did chuſe his time ſo diſcreetly, as that the King of Phrygia was preſent when he propounded from his Maſter, the exchange of Prince Artamas for Panthea: So that though Cyrus had a good pretence to retain that Queen until Mandana were releaſed, yet he would not inſiſt upon it, leſt he ſhould diſoblige ſo great a King as he of Phrygia, and leſt in ſtriving to be very prudent, he ſhould fail in point of Generoſity. Moreover, he thought that the exchange of Panthea for Prince Artamas, would be very advantageous to him in the ſequel of the War, ſince he was as wiſe and valiant a man as any was in the Univerſe, yet could he not reſolve upon this exchange, unleſs he drew ſome ſatisfaction unto his Love by it; ſo that he told Andramites in the King of Phrygia's preſence, that though it was very advantageous for him to keep the Queen of Suſiana in his power unto the end of the War, yet he ſo much honoured the King of Phrygia, and loved the Prince Artamas ſo well, alſo reſpected Abradates and Panthea both ſo very much, that he would conſent unto the deſires of Crœſſus, upon this condition only, that during this Truce, it might be permitted him to ſee Mandana. Andramites hearing him ſay ſo, beſeeched him not to inſiſt upon that, becauſe the King of Pontus had ſo reſolutely denied that unto Abradates when he was moved in it, as it is thought impoſſible he ſhould ever conſent unto it: Since Crœſſus is Maſter in his own Dominions, replied Cyrus, he ought to be obeyed, and therefore I cannot conceive, that the conſent of the King of Pontus is ſo abſolutely neceſſary: Doubtleſs it is not, replied Andramites, but yet I have ſome reaſons which induce me to think, that he will not make uſe of his Soveraign Authority in this buſineſs, but will rather break off the Truce: I conſent unto it (ſaid the King of Phrygia moſt generouſly) and had rather the Treaty were broke, than a Prince unto whom I am ſo much obliged ſhould not receive this poor ſatisfaction: No, no, replied Cyrus, I cannot believe the King of Lydia is ſo weak a mannager of his Intereſts, but that he muſt think it more dangerous for him to diſoblige Abradates than the King of Pontus, ſince the one hath a Kingdom and Forces on Foot, and the other hath neither; therefore Andramites, I pray tell the King your Maſter what I ſay, and let me know his reſolution. In the mean time, Andramites (added Cyrus, being very glad to perceive ſome ſparks of his affection to kindle towards Doraliſa, which might make him more zealous with Crœſſus) it ſhall be your own fault, if you carry no commendations from the illuſtrious Abradates unto his Wife the Queen of Suſiana, for if you pleaſe, you ſhall be conducted unto her. Andramites hearing this acceptable offer, could not refuſe it; ſo that he was conducted thither by Ligdamis, being raviſhed with joy that he ſhould ſee Doraliſa, who was with this Princeſs, and for whoſe freedom he did equally ſolicite: Andramites was welcomed by this Queen with much civility and ſatisfaction; for ſince ſhe was ignorant how Crœſſus did only ſeek for a pretence to break off the Treaty, ſhe made no doubt but ere long to ſee her dear Abradates. Doraliſa, for her part was not uncivil towards Andramites, yet he found to be as much as formerly ſhe uſed to be, very fair, infinitely lovely, and a little too ſubtil; and indeed, in lieu of thanking him for the pains he took for the liberty of the Princeſs, which included hers, ſhe told him with a ſmile, that ſhe could not ſet any great value upon this Propoſition which he brought, ſince if it take effect, we ſhall but go out of one Priſon into another: For to tell you truly, (ſaid ſhe, whilſt Panthea was writing unto Abradates) I think we are more ſafe in the Camp of Cyrus, than if we were at Sardis, ſince in all probability Cyrus will ere long take it, for he having both Juſtice and Fortune on his ſide, he will infallibly be victorious over all his Enemies. But what then will become of the Oracle which Crœſſus received from Delphos (replied he) if what you ſay ſhould come to paſs? Truly Andramites (ſaid ſhe unto him) it is much raſhneſs to think that men ſhould ſo well underſtand the language of the Gods, ſince ſometimes men cannot ſo much as underſtand the language of men: I do confeſs it (ſaid he unto her) that ſometimes you would not underſtand the language of men, but to tell you truly, I think the reaſon was becauſe you had not a will to underſtand it; nor do I know very well whether you will underſtand me now, if I ſhould in plain language tell you, that I never did nor ſhall love any comparably as I do you. I underſtand you, Andramites, replied ſhe, much leſs than heretofore, for ſince I hear of late no language but Perſian, Hircanian, Aſſyrian, Arminian, and Medean Tongues, I have forgot the Lydian language; and therefore before you ſpeak unto me of any thing which concerns your ſelf, I muſt learn that Tongue, or at leaſt be a year or two in Lydia. As Andramites was ready to reply, and beſeech Doraliſa to ſpeak a little more ſeriouſly, Panthea, having writ her Letter, came to give it unto him, ſo that it being time to return, he could receive no other ſatisfaction from Doraliſa, but that ſhe was as fair as ever, yet did his flames of Love burn hotter than ever, and he returned unto Sardis, with reſolutions to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to move the King of Lydia that Cyrus might ſee Mandana: And in order to that, he went unto the Camp before he went unto Sardis, and adviſed the Prince of Claſomena and Abradates not to ſtir, though Crœſſus ſhould ſend for them, till the Treaty was accompliſhed, and to tranſact with the Prince Myrſiles, whom he knew was a well wiſher to this Treaty, yet did he not think this Prince had any other end in it, than the ſatisfaction of Abradates, and the releaſement of Artamas, whom I alwayes wiſhed might marry his Siſter the Princeſs. Theſe two Princes then taking his counſel, let him go unto Sardis alone, whither he was no ſooner come, but he gave Crœſſus an account of his voyage: But as ſoon as he had ended his relation, Crœſſus told him, that Cyrus demanded a thing which was not within the compaſs of his will to grant, for he had reſolved never ver to contradict the King of Pontus in that buſineſs: Then it is impoſſible to conclude this Treaty (replied Andramites) for Cyrus is ſo fully reſolved to obtain his demand, that the King of Phrygia himſelf, to ſatisfie his deſires, would perſwade him to inſiſt upon it, though Cyrus ſhould otherwiſe be contented: Though the Treaty ſhould break off, replied Crœſſus, it ſhould not trouble me at all: Yet believe it, Sir, replied Andramites, it is ſomething dangerous to incenſe the King of Suſiana, and the Prince of Claſomena.

Crœſſus apprehending this reply of Andramites (whom he knew to be their friend) for a kind of threatning, was much offended at him; and without any direct anſwer, only told him, that he would e're long let Cyrus know his mind. Andramites alſo being angry at this, the King of Pontus came in, and did ſo importunately preſs not to conſent his Rival ſhould ever ſee Mandana, that he confirmed him in his reſolution, to make his colour for rendring the Negotiation of Andramites ineffectual; yet the King of Pontus was very angry, that he thus diſobliged Abradates, unto whom he was ſo much ingaged; but this tyrannical paſſion did ſo diſturb his Reaſon, and uſurped power over his Soul, that he could not do any otherwiſe, nor was he Maſter of his own mind. In the mean while, Abradates and the Prince of Claſomena, hearing of Crœſſus his denial, and the King of Pontus his oppoſition, ſpoke high, and like Princes that could not brook ſuch uſage. Andramites and the Prince Myrſiles did alſo cajole with the people in Sardis, and gave out, that Crœſſus refuſing this deſire of Cyrus, would infinitely incenſe him againſt them, if he ſhould become victorious; and therefore it were but juſt to ſeek for their own ſecurity: So that both in Town and Camp, things grew into great diſorder; for as it is the eaſieſt matter of a thouſand, to make the herd of people do any thing; ſo upon this ground, divers that were very intimate friends unto Prince Artamas, whoſe virtues had purchaſed him thouſands of ſecret ſervants who would venture life and all for him, began to ſpeak very high, that Crœſſus never cared for the ſafety of his people, but would let all run to ruine, ſo he could ſatisfie his own private ambition: The memory of all the Victories which Artamas brought made all the Inhabitants of Sardis murmur extreamly, and ſay one to another, that if he had never been a Priſoner, they ſhould never have cared for any foreign War: but to ſee an Army of above a hundred thouſand men at their doors, and to have never an Artamas to defend them; this was ſuch a miſery as they could not endure without much murmur; and their thoughts were ſo forward, that they did both ſay and think, it would be more advantageous for them if the Prince Artamas were on the Party of Cyrus, than thus to be perpetually mewed up in a Priſon; for they knew that he being in Love with the Princeſs would never deſtroy Crœſſus, and that he was ever of a ſweet mild diſpoſition in all things; and they ſaid openly, that the Injuſtice which was done him in his firſt Impriſonment, could be no way repaired, but by releaſing him from his ſecond fetters: thus were Camp and Town all in diviſion.

Cyrus knowing all this was exceedingly joyed at it; for ſaid he, If they do as I deſire them, I ſhall ſee my Princeſs, & her looks will infuſe freſh zeal into my Soul, and make me able to releaſe her, maugre all the fatal Predictions: If on the contrary they will not do as I would have them, then I ſhall have this ſatisfaction at the leaſt, that their Souldiers will be divided, and ſo I ſhall get the Victory more eaſily: yet was he much aſtoniſhed to hear that Mazares did not ſtir in the buſineſs; and every one who came from Sardis reported, that this Prince kept his Chamber by reaſon of ſome ſlight indiſpoſition in his body: But he heard every moment that the diſorder did increaſe both between Princes, and People, and Souldiers. In the mean time, ſince the Truce had a day prefixed, and Cyrus could not break his word, he was much vexed that he could not take any advantage by this diſorder, and did with much impatience expect a poſitive anſwer from Crœſſus: yet ſometimes he would go and viſit Panthea; and as it is the cuſtom even of the wiſeſt men, eſpecially thoſe that are in love to diſcourſe of all accidents which befall them, ſo Cyrus did ſpeak unto Panthea and the Princeſs Araminta of nothing elſe but of this buſineſs now in tranſaction: Sometimes he would ask Panthea whether ſhe thought her husband could brook this Injuſtice of Crœſus? Other time he would deſire the Princeſs Araminta to tell him, whether ſhe thought the King her Brother would for ever obſtinately perſiſt in his reſolutions of never ſuffering him to ſee Mandana? Yet he aſſured the Queen of Suſiana, that though Crœſus ſhould deny him his deſires, yet he would releaſe her, beſeeching her to pardon him if he deferred it until the laſt hour of the Treaty, in hopes thereby to obtain his deſires; and he expreſſed himſelf in ſuch obliging terms, that Panthea her ſelf deſired him to defer her Liberty as long as he could. As he was with theſe two Princeſſes, Ortalques came in to tell him, that Orſanus was arrived at the Camp, and ſaid he had ſome buſineſs of conſequence to impart unto him: The name of Orſanus made Cyrus bluſh, ſince when he heard it, he could not chuſe but think upon Mazares, and that he had ſent him unto him, though he could not well comprehend how Orſanus, who went from Sinope to return into his own Country, ſhould be now in Lidia. This alteration in the face of Cyrus begetting a great curioſity in both thoſe Princeſſes, they asked him the cauſe: yet he would not then tell them, not knowing what buſineſs Orſanus had with him: So that without giving them any direct Anſwer, he left them, and went unto him, wiſhing with all his heart that Mazares had ſent by him to meet him with his Sword in his hand. Since he was much beholding unto Orſanus, for the ſervices he had done Mandana and Marteſia, he did not confound innocence and guilt together, but notwithſtanding the agitation of his ſpirits, and his hatred of Mazares, he received Orſanus very kindly After which, addreſſing his ſpeech unto him; As I did at firſt receive you as a friend unto Marteſia (ſaid he unto him) I muſt hearken unto you as a Meſſenger from my moſt mortal Enemy. Sir, replied Orſanus, before you know well what appellation to give my Maſter, I muſt beſeech you to give me an hours patience, for if you did but underſtand the end of my Relation, perhaps it would ſtrike you into wonder; and therefore it is requiſite I prepare your ſpirits a little to hear of Miracles: Cyrus hearing Orſanus ſay ſo, began to deviſe with himſelf, what it ſhould be he had to tell him; but being not able to imagine, he reſolved to give him audience, and therefore carryed him into a convenient place for that purpoſe. But ſince the Queen of Suſiana and the Princeſs Araminta had heard that he who came to ſpeak with him was from the Prince Mazares, they feared leſt it ſhould be ſome Challenge, and the King of Pontus and Abradates engaged in it: So that they ſent unto him, beſeeching him that they might ſpeak a word with him. As impatient as this Prince was to hear Orſanus, yet he went unto the Princeſſes; who expreſſed ſo much tenderneſs over him, and were ſo troubled to hear that Orſanus came from Mazares, as they importunately forced him to offer them to be partakers of what Orſanus had to ſay, ſince he perceived by the manner of Orſanus his diſcourſe there was no fighting matter in it: So he ſent for Orſanus, and told him he might ſpeak with as much freedom before thoſe two Princeſſes, as if he were in private with him: After which, every one taking their places, Orſanus began his diſcourſe thus.

The Hiſtory of Mazares.

WEre I to ſpeak of my Maſter only unto the illuſtrious Cyrus, my Relation ſhould then be much ſhorter than now it muſt: And before I entertain two great Princeſſes unto whom he is unknown (though Perſons of their Quality do commonly know, though they have not ſeen one another) I conceive it is expedient to recite in few words the beginning of his Life, to the end they may better know the Sequel.

It is not at all requiſite (ſaid the Princeſs Araminta) that you ſhould trouble your ſelf in telling us any Adventures which have chanced unto the Prince Mazares

Mazares ſince the time he came from Babylon, until the time he was left for dead at Sinope in a Fiſhers Cabin: for we know how he could not force himſelf to love the Princeſs Iſtrina, though the King of Aſſyria uſed all arguments to perſwade him: and that he became in love with the Princeſs Mandana, whether he would or no, at the ſame time when ſhe triumphantly entered that great Town: Nor are we ignorant how he demeaned himſelf when he was there: We know alſo how, prompted more by the dictates of his Love than either his Reaſon or Generoſity, he invented to come out of that Town clothed in white when it was a Snow; and afterwards being in Sinope, how the ſame paſſion was predominate over his generoſity, did prompt him to deceive her, and carry her away both from the King of Aſſyria and the illuſtrious Cyrus; and how to puniſh him for that raſh act, the Gods permitted him to ſuffer ſhipwrack.

Madam, replyed Orſanus, when you ſhall know what I intend to relate, I know not then how you will interpret the intentions of the Gods, ſince at the ſame inſtant when they brought him to the very brink of Ruine, then they rather ſaved him: But before I explain this Riddle unto you, I muſt tell you that it was the greateſt and moſt admirable effect of the Princeſs Mandana's Beauty ſo to diſturb and pervert the Reaſon of this Prince, as made him capable of doing any unjuſt act; ſince certainly there was never any of his Quality, whoſe birth, inclination, and education was better: Moreover, the diſpoſitions of Nature drawn from his Parents could not chuſe but be moſt excellently good: ſince it is moſt certain, that never Prince was more virtuous than the Prince of Saces, nor any Princeſs more heroique than the Queen Tarina, my Maſters mother: But ſince her virtue was famous throughout all Aſia, I will ſpeak no more of it; only ſay this, that if the Prince Mazares her ſon be not as victorious as any, it is ſtrange: But as an addition to all you know or poſſible can know of him, it is requiſite I tell you that the night preceding the Princeſs Mandana's ſhipwrack, and whileſt the Prince Mazares, out of his reſpect, durſt not come into her Cabin, he was ſenſible of as much ſorrow as a generous heart could poſſibly comprehend: and let me tell the illuſtrious Cyrus, that I am moſt confident, if he underſtood the ſorrows which he apprehended after that ſad accident, he would ſooner pity than accuſe him; he repented of his crime, though he could not of his paſſion, above a hundred times, and reſolved as oft to expiate it; afterwards when he looked her in the face, and obſerved what alteration in her complexion ſo ſhort a time had produced, his heart was ſo ſtrucken with remorſe, as he went in all haſte to the Pilot, for fear he ſhould alter his mind, and commanded him to take the way of Sinope, with intentions to reſtore the Princeſs either into the hands of Ciaxares or the illuſtrious Cyrus: But oh Heavens, how fatal was this Order, as juſt as it was, unto him that commanded it, and unto her for whoſe ſake it was intended! For as ſoon as the Pilot received it, and in obedient order thereunto, intending to carry Mandana unto Sinope, he turned the Rudder, but overturned the Ship, and left us all in a periſhing condition: Never ſince did I think it permitable to cenſure the intentions of the Gods when they do either good or evil unto men: But that it is much ſafer to admire their Providence, than to dive too far into their Reaſons: And indeed, to ſpeak according unto meer natural Reaſon, who would not think that a Prince in love, who had her he loved in his power, and who had ſo much virtue as to repent the taking her away, and reſolved to ſet her at liberty again, that ſuch a one, I ſay, did rather deſerve a Recompence than Puniſhment: and yet the Prince Mazares ſuffered ſhipwrack: he thought himſelf the cauſe of that Princeſs death whom he adored; and ſuffered more torture of Soul than ever any did; and the violence of his deſpair was much more like to be his ruine than his ſhipwrack; and doubtleſs it had been his death had not the Gods moſt prodigiouſly ſent him relief.

Be pleaſed to know, Madam, that the owner of the Cabin (where the illuſtrious Artamenes ſaw Mazares dying, and where he received from his hand a rich Scarf, which was the Princeſs Mandana's) being gone to fiſh a little before the ſtorm did riſe, and adventuring ſo far into the Sea that he could not recover the ſhore, he was conſtrained to let go his Boat unto the mercy of the Wind and Waves, was at laſt driven to the foot of a Rock which riſes up in the Sea, and where a Ship had been ſplit, but where his Boat being light did ſafely arrive, ſo that he got upon the Rock, and holding his Boat with a Rope, he reſolved to reſt there till the ſtorm was over, and ſo he did, until the Tempeſt beginning to calm, he diſcovered an old man upon a plank which kept him above water, and who endeavoured to gain that Rock, but he was ſo weak, and ſo far off, that needs muſt he periſh, unleſs the Fiſherman relieve him. Plain pity then moving the heart of this Fiſherman, he made unto his aſſiſtance in his Boat, and took up this man, whoſe name was Tyburtus, by Nation a Greek, who was always with Mazares as a Tutor to read all Sciences befitting his Quality unto him. He was no ſooner in the Boat, but ſo weak he was, that ready he was to fall into a ſwoon: Yet when he was recovered, he told how he had been ſhipwracked, but told him not how it was in carrying away the Princeſs Mandana, leſt it ſhould abate his zeal to ſerve him: So that this Fiſher-man cheering him up after his homely manner, he offered him his Cabin to retreat unto, which Tyburtus accepted of, in hopes to hear ſome tydings of ſome that were ſhipwracked with him, or whether his Maſter periſhed among the reſt: The Sea being then ſmoother then before, this Fiſher-man began to row about: but ſince he had loſt one of his oars in the Storm, he was a long time before he recovered his ſhore, and ſo long indeed, that he came not to his Cabin until Artamenes was gone away. You may imagine Madam, how Tyburtus was amazed to find the Prince Mazares there, and in that caſe, for he was not yet recovered out of his ſwoon wherein the illuſtrious Artamenes left him: as ſoon as he ſaw him, he was extreamly joyed; but when he ſaw him in that pitiful caſe, his extream joys were converted into extream ſorrows: yet ſince he was a man of an univerſal knowledge in all things, and reaſonably well verſed in Phyſick, he endeavoured to try whether any life yet remained in that Prince, and whether there were any poſſibility of helping him: and upon his careful obſervance, he diſcovered his heart did beat: ſo that uſing all the helps which the poverty of that place would afford him, he imployed them ſo well, that Mazares revived, but with a ſpirit ſo little of himſelf, that ſpying Tyburtus at his bed ſide, he asked him where Mandana was? Afterwards he pronounced the name of Artamenes four or five times: and being for an hour after in a confuſed diſtraction of Reaſon, he knew not whether or no Artamenes was his Rival, or whether Mandana was alive or dead, or indeed whether himſelf was living. But at laſt Tyburtus endeavouring by his diſcourſe to reduce his Reaſon into its right Region, he began by degrees to know things as really they were, and by conſequence to fall into his firſt deſpair; Yet had he the comfort to ſee Tyburtus near him, whom he ever loved; In ſeeing him, his hopes revived alſo, that happily Mandana might eſcape as well as he, but his hopes of ſo much happineſs were ſo weak, that they could not induce him to take any care of himſelf, or to receive any thing: In the mean while, Tyburtus conſidering how near he was unto Sinope, and in a place where the illuſtrious Artamenes had been, and might come or ſend again, he took the Maſter of the Cabin aſide, and conjured him, that as he had ſaved his life, ſo he would do him another good office, without which the firſt was all to no purpoſe: But leſt there ſhould not be prevalency enough in his prayers, he charmed him with a great Medal of gold hanging in a Chain of the ſame Mettal which the Queen Nitocris gave him when he was waiting upon his Maſter at Babylon.

The very ſight of ſo rich a Preſent, ſo dazled the eyes of the poor Fiſher, that he did abſolutely promiſe to do what ere he would have him, though it were with moſt deſperate hazard of his life: So that Tyburtus without any loſs of time cauſed him to take the Prince Mazares into his Boat, and to cloath him very well, leſt the ſharpneſs of the ayr might do him harm. The Prince Mazares at firſt was very unwilling unto what Tiburtus deſired, ſaying he was loth to part from that place near which his Princeſs periſhed, and that he had rather dye there than in any other place: But Tiburtus promiſing he ſhould not be carryed very far; and that it was to ſuch a place as where it was more probable to hear of his Princeſs, and where he was in leſs danger of falling into the hands of Ciaxares, he began to ſubmit unto his will: Yet not at the firſt; For Tiburtus (ſaid he unto him) ſince death is that I look for, why may not the King of Medes or Artamenes give it me as well as any other way? Although it be all one to you (ſaid Tiburtus to him) yet it concerns the King your Father, and the Queen your Mother, and all the people over whom you are deſtined to Reign; therefore I beſeech you, follow my advice, and hearken unto Reaſon. Alas Tiburtus (ſaid he) that man who cares not for life, cares not for a Kingdom: However, replied Tiburtus, though you do not care for either, yet grieve not them that are intereſted in you, and who would be much concerned if you ſhould fall into the power of a Prince who would treat you as a Delinquent: And truly I am ſuch a one, replied he, upon whom they would act no Injuſtice, though they proceeded never ſo rigorouſly againſt me: but Tiburtus, do what you will with me. After this Mazares was carryed into the Boat; and all the people in the Cabin had orders to ſay, If Artamenes ſent to enquire of him, that he died as ſoon as he left him. In the mean time, the lamentable condition in which the Prince Mazares was, would not permit Tiburtus to carry him far off, and all their proviſions in the Boat were ſo ſmall, as they would not laſt above two or three days. This wiſe old man being not of that Country, knew not what Courſe to ſteer; and ſince he was far off his own Country (for be pleaſed to know it is a great diſtance between Simpe and the Country of the Saces which borders upon the Aſiatique Scythians) he could not tell where he ſhould recruit himſelf any nearer: He had about him but ſmall matters to ſubſiſt upon, the ſhipwrack having left him only that Chain of Gold which he gave the Fiſher-man, and one other Jewel of a very conſiderable value; yet the Prince Mazares by chance had ſome rich things about him, ſo that by them he hoped to find ſubſiſtence for a while, but the difficulty was where to land in a ſafe place: Not knowing then what to reſolve upon, they put off from Sinope, unreſolved what courſe to ſteer: Yet the Fiſher-man ſeeing Tiburtus in ſuch a perplexity, told him, that if he would truſt him he would carry him into ſuch a place where none ſhould find them: Then acquainting him how he was not born at that place where he dwelt, but in a little Iſle which was inhabited by none but Fiſhers, amongſt whom he had many kindred, Tiburtus conſented he ſhould carry them thither: And this Fiſher-man promiſed my Maſter, to tell him in that place, whether any news was heard of the Princeſs Mandana, or whether they had found her body: So not being able to take any other Courſe, they came to this little Iſle, which indeed was no more than a huge Rock, not above a days journey from Sinope: He who was their Guide lodged them with a Siſter of his, whoſe husband was a Fiſher like himſelf, and who entertained them very humanely: In the mean while, ſince it is the pleaſure of the Gods to preſerve Mazares whether he would or no, he lived when as he hated life, ſince he believed Mandana dead, but it was a life ſo lamentable, that death was much more ſweet than it unto him: The little hopes he had of Mandana's eſcape, did now begin to dye; for the Fiſher-man, according to his promiſe, went the day after to enquire, but could hear no news either of her or her Corps: yet this laſt circumſtance leaving ſome far-fetched hopes in him, which induced him not to depart from that barbarous place; Tiburtus deſired the Fiſher-man to tell him once more that the Corps of Mandana was found: For as Tiburtus did verily conjecture, that this Princeſs was really dead, and that though ſhe were living, yet it were good to wear her out of Mazares his memory; therefore he conceived it expedient not to leave any more ſuch uncertain hopes in him, which might aggravate his ſorrows, and much multiply his perplexities.

The Fiſher-man at his requeſt did tell this officious lye, and the Prince Mazares grieve ſo, as it was eaſie to ſee the difference between an undoubted misfortune, and one in which there was ſome incertainty: When the firſt raptures of his deſpair were paſt, he told Tiburtus, that he would go and dye over the Tomb of Mandana, and continued in this mind many days, but at laſt the perſwaſions of Tiburtus did alter his mind; but all his perſwaſions could not prevail when he moved him to return unto the King of Saces his Father: No, no, Tiburtus (would he ſay) you ſhall not have your mind in every thing, nor will I live as you would have me: It's well I ſatisfie you ſo far as not to kill my ſelf, without publiſhing my crime and my misfortune unto all Aſia: Live I will, Tiburtus, becauſe you would not have me dye, but I will live only to lament that Princeſs whoſe life I deſtroyed: Oh unfortunate Prince (would he cry out) if thou hadſt any deſign to betray any one, why didſt thou not betray the Aſſyrian King in favour of thy Princeſs? and why didſt thou not really releaſe her? Why didſt thou not convey her into the hands of the invincible Artamenes, who only is worthy of her? Then would ſhe at the leaſt have had an eſteem or friendſhip for thee: and though thou wert the moſt unfortunate man that ever breathed, yet it is better being ſo, than being her Raviſher. Oh moſt inſenſible Sot that I was, couldſt thou ever hope to be loved, by doing that which was moſt likely to procure hatred? Had I not an illuſtrious Example of this before my eyes on one of the greateſt Kings in all Aſia? who carried her away, and got nothing by his violence but her hatred: and yet I muſt carry her away alſo, but the Gods have moſt ſeverely puniſhed me for it: If my death would have ſatisfied that Juſtice, certainly I ſhould have periſhed in the ſame place with her: but ſince they knew that her death would puniſh me moſt ſeverely, they keep me alive to puniſh me with moſt horrid torments. Thus, Madam, did the Prince Mazares argue with himſelf: It was in vain for Tiburtus to tell him he muſt ſubmit unto the Will of the Gods; for his ſorrows were too great to ſuffer him: All endeavours to put him in memory of honour and glory were alſo in vain: Ambition was dead in his Soul, and he thought nothing in this World now more glorious than eternally to lament the death of Mandana: yet did Tiburtus ſtill importune him to return unto his Father, and did ſpeak of it ſo much, that this unfortunate Prince ſeeing he could not perſwade Tiburtus to let him live an unknown ſolitary life, reſolved to ſteal away from him, and to go into ſome Cell, and lament his miſeries alone: In order unto this, he hired a young Fiſherman to let him paſs in the night time over the Water, which was not above fifty furlongs from the Iſle; and left a Letter with him for Tiburtus, to this effect.

The unfortunate Mazares unto the wiſe Tiburtus.

SInce I ſee all your ſapient admonitions cannot infuſe Reaſon into my Soul, which is ſenſible of nothing but its own ſorrows, I thought it beſt to part from you, leſt my miſeries ſhould infect you: But to the end that you may juſtifie your ſelf, unto the King and Queen, let them ſee by this Letter, that ſince I do not think my ſelf worthy to be their Son, nor to write unto them, I will for ever renounce all civil ſociety: yet tell them, that it was Love only which made me a Criminal; and that if I had never loved the divine and unfortunate Mandana, I had never done any thing unworthy either of them or you, who have given me a million of good advices, which this paſſion only did keep me from following.

MAZARES.

This Prince then having given this Letter unto the young Fiſher-man, who carried him over the River, and bought him a Horſe, alſo cauſed a very poor ſuit of Cloaths to be made for him at a little Town whither he uſed to go and ſell his Fiſh, he took the next way that he found; for his ſorrows made him not care which way he went. In the mean while the young Fiſher-man returned to the Iſle, and gave Tiburtus the Letter which the Prince did ſend him, and which did drive him into ſuch exceſſive ſorrow, as never was greater: But all unprofitable Lamentations were but loſs of ſo much time, and therefore he immediately left the Iſle to ſeek his Maſter, and went unto the next Town to buy a Horſe, and to take that way which the young Fiſher-man told him he took: but it being a good while ſince the Prince did go away, he could not overtake him; yet had he the comfort as he rid on a day and a half together to hear two or three times that he travelled that way; but his grief was, that they who ſaw him paſs, reported that he kept no high ways. Tiburtus being very old, was not able to travel ſo long without reſt, unleſs he ſhould fall ſick, ſo that age and wearineſs compelled him to ſtay twelve or fifteen days. As good fortune was, he found a little Church, dedicated unto Ceres, ſtanding in the midſt of a field, without any other building about it but only the Prieſts houſe which joyned unto it, ſo that finding himſelf very ill, he ſtayed there, and deſired help: Indeed the Prieſt had a great compaſſion and care of him; for Tiburtus being a man of great ingenuity and parts, made himſelf ſoon known unto this charitable Hoſt to deſerve relief, yet could he not recover any health; all that could be done unto him, was only to prolong his miſerable life until a prodigy conducted me to the place where he was, as I ſhall relate unto you. You know, Sir (ſaid Orſanus unto Cyrus) that when you went from Sinope into Armenia, I asked leave of you to return unto the King my Maſter, though I was extreamly ſorry I could not carry the Prince Mazares with me; ſo that parting from you, loaded with your gifts, raviſhed with admiration, and charmed with your virtues, I took the beſt way to go unto the place at which I aimed. The third day of my journey, when I was wandring out of my way, I diſcovered a great Plain, in the midſt of which I ſaw a little Church, and a very pleaſant houſe: It being now very late, and I weary, I went thither, not only with intentions to enquire of the way, but to deſire the favour of a nights lodging, and I was received in with as much humanity as I could either expect or deſire:

The Prieſt made ſome excuſes; that his accommodation was not ſo good as other times it might have been, telling me, that thoſe few ſervants he had were ſo buſie about a ſtranger that was ſick in his houſe, and ſo ill, that they thought him a dead man, as his entertainment would not be ſo good as he wiſhed it were.

As he was thus ſpeaking unto him, one came to tell him, that the ſtranger was very ill, and deſired to ſpeak with him, that he might impart a ſecret of ſome concernment unto him: I hearing this, did deſire to ſee him, and not knowing well why, I went unto the Chamber of this ſick man: But, oh heavens, how was I amazed, when I ſaw him to be Tiburtus, whom I thought drown'd with the Prince our Maſter? My wonder was ſo great that I could not expreſs it by my words: But after a little recollection of my ſelf, I went unto his Beds-ſide, and the ſight of me ſurprized him no leſs than he did me: The Prieſt alſo perceiving by our actions that we knew each other very well, and that we much rejoyced at the ſight of each other, was amazed as well as me: Tiburtus holding out his hand unto me, gave thanks unto the Gods for affording him ſo much happineſs as to imbrace me before he died; then did I endeavour to perſwade him his diſeaſe was not ſo bad as he thought it, but he knew the greatneſs of his pain better than I did. No, no, Orſamus, ſaid he unto me, let me not flatter my ſelf, the Gods do not work miracles every day, and I have rendered my ſelf ſo unworthy of them, that I ought not to murmur at their wills; I know that all remedies are in vain, and I perceive the end of my doleful days is at hand, therefore I ſent unto this wiſe and charitable Clergy-man to receive a ſecret from me, which was not fit to be buried with me in my Tomb: But ſince the Gods have ſo fitly brought you hither, I ſhall not trouble him with it, ſince it does not at all concern him to know it, but ſhall in few words reveal it unto you. The Prieſt hearing Tyburtus ſay ſo, did withdraw, purpoſely to leave him liberty to ſpeak what he pleaſed: Tiburtus firſt aſſuring him, that he changed his mind not for want of any eſteem of him, but only becauſe the buſineſs concerned one which I did know, and which he did not. After that the Prieſt was gone, I began to condole with him the death of our dear Maſter; but Tyburtus ſtopping me very ſhort, told me all that I have told you: After this (ſaid he) you may well know, that the Gods, in bringing you hither, did intend I ſhould acquaint you, that the Prince Mazares is not dead, to the end you may go and ſeek him, as I intended, all the days of your life, until you have found him out. This, Orſanus, was my deſign, and this ought to be yours, if you love your Maſter; if you had not happily arrived, I had ingaged the Prieſt by oath to acquaint the King of Saces, that the Prince his Son was not dead: But ſince you are here, I thought it not expedient to let any Subject of the King of Medes know that he was living; for he hath procured unto himſelf ſuch terrible enemies in the perſons of Ciaxares, the King of Aſſyria, and the invincible Artamenes, by carrying away the Princeſs Mandana, that I think it good none know it but your ſelf. Tyburtus having done ſpeaking, and I promiſing him to ſeek our illuſtrious Maſter throughout all Aſia, he ſeemed to be a little more chearful, ſo that we talked at leaſt two hours concerning the Prince Mazares. And as he underſtood, ſince he came to that place, that the Princeſs Mandana was not dead, but that ſhe was in the power of the Pontean King, and that it was thought he carried her unto Armenia, he gave me advice, that after I had ſought a while in Cappadocia, to go thither alſo, it being to be ſuppoſed that Mazares would either be there, or elſe be neer the Princeſs whom he adored. But, Madam, why ſhould I trouble you any longer with relations of Tyburtus, who only languiſhed in life till he ſaw me? For as ſoon as he had imparted his troubled ſoul unto me, he grew worſe, and the next day died: I took his loſs with much grief, ſo that my joys at my Maſter's being alive were mixed with ſorrows. In the mean time, after I had payed my laſt duties unto dead Tyburtus, and rendred a thouſand thanks unto the Prieſt for his charitable cares of him, I went and wandred I knew not well whither, yet I conceived it my beſt courſe would be, to be near the place where Mandana was ſaid to be, ſince in all probability that Prince who was in Love with her, and believed her to be dead, would ſeek all opportunities to ſee her riſen from the dead as ſoon as he ſhould hear of it: I reſolved therefore upon two courſes, the one, to ſend a ſervant which waited upon me, who was both faithful and witty, unto the Queen of Saces, to comfort her with her Son's being alive, and to tell her, that I thought it expedient not to publiſh it until he was found. The other was, that after I had wandred a while about Sinope, where I feared he remained ſick, I would then wander towards Armenia, where it was reported the Princeſs Mandana was carried: and according to theſe reſolutions, I diſpatched my ſervant, then enquired with all poſſible diligence whether I could hear any thing of Mazares, but could not meet with the leaſt intelligence of him in all Cappadocia: After which, I went unto Artaxates, whil'ſt the Army of Ciaxares believed Mandana to be kept up cloſe in a Caſtle upon the River Araxes: And as I believed, as others did, that if the Prince Mazares were alive, he would be alſo at Artaxates, I went from place to place, and from Temple to Temple in queſt of him: Then when I heard of any general Muſter of Souldiers, I looked every Souldier in the face, in hopes to find him: Then it came into my phancy, ſeeing I could not hear any thing of him, that perhaps he was ſo ſubtil, as to find out means to get in to the Caſtle, where the Princeſs Mandana was ſuppoſed to be, and the Princeſs of Pontus, before whom I ſpeak, then was; ſo that I reſolved to ſtay in that place, and wait for the event of the War, having no manner of other hopes to find him I was in queſt of. And indeed, Sir, (ſaid Orſanus unto Cyrus) I ſtayed there, until you by your incomparable valour did take that Caſtle with a few Forces, in the ſight of an innumerable number of armed enemies. It is impoſſible for me to tell you how ſad my ſoul was, when I ſaw that the Princeſs Mandana was not in the Caſtle; and I may ſay it without any diſſimulation, that you, Sir, were not more grieved not to find Mandana there, than I was not to find my Maſter, nor knew where to ſearch either for her or him, for I ſought for her only in hopes to find him there: However, patience is my beſt remedy; and ſince I knew you took all imaginable care to diſcover where that Princeſs was, I reſolved to follow the ſame courſe you ſteered: But ſince I would not be known unto you, though you treated me very favourably at Sinope, becauſe I would not acquaint you with the true reaſon which brought me into Armenia, nor had any mind to diſſemble with you; therefore I ſhunned your ſight with all poſſible care, I remained therefore kept cloſe in Artaxates, till I underſtood you thought the Princeſs Mandana was at Suſa, and that ſhe would croſs the Country of Matenes, which joyns upon Armenia and Cicilia, and then I deſigned to take that way: And having found a guide, who was very well verſed in the ways, he conducted me ſo ſhort a cut, that I overtook Abradates, and the King of Pontus, as they conducted this Princeſs, before they ſeparated, and by conſequence before you fought with the King of Suſiana: 'Tis true, I did not think it convenient to ſhew my ſelf unto the Princeſs Mandana, but contenting my ſelf with looking upon her, and the Troops which paſſed by and guarded her: But ſince I could not find him I ſought for amongſt them, I thought that happily he might follow at a diſtance; and underſtanding that this Princeſs was to imbarque at a Cicilian Port to ſail unto Epheſus, I got thither before hand, enquiring in every houſe where ſtrangers uſed to lodge, whether ſuch a one was not there. I went alſo into every Ship which was to put forth, to ſee whether any Paſſengers were to imbarque; but do what I could, both before the Princeſs Mandana came thither, and when ſhe was there, and after ſhe was gone, I could not meet with the leaſt knowledg of him; ſo that I ſtayed ſtill by the water ſide, after I had ſeen the Princeſs Mandana imbarque, as ſad a ſoul as ever lived; and truly my fear was, that he had either took ſome deſperate courſe with himſelf, or at leaſt was dead of extream melancholy, in ſome obſcure place where none knew him; for ſince I underſtood by ſeveral perſons which I had ſeen in the Armenian Army, that the Prince Mazares was not returned unto the King his Father, and ſince I could not find him about the Princeſs Mandana, I could conclude no other but that he was dead; all hopes being then quite extinguiſhed of ever meeting with him, I reſolved to return into my own Country; for though I promiſed Tiburtius to wander all my life long until I found him, yet ſince no hope was left of finding him, I thought it was in vain to be over-ſtrict in keeping that promiſe: Thus then I reſolved to return, and in order to that I enquired the beſt and ſafeſt Ways: and I was informed that the ſhorteſt and beſt way was to go along the River Cydne, and to leave that great Mountain in Cicilie, which is called the black Mountain, on the left hand: That afterwards I muſt paſs into Armenia, and get into the River Araxes, where I ſhould need no Guide, ſince I knew the Way very well from thence into my own Country.

But as the Gods are ſometimes pleaſed to make a Tempeſt drive a Ship unto a Port, in lieu of daſhing it againſt the Rocks, ſo they cauſed me to wander out of my way moſt happily; and in lieu of taking that way which conducted unto the River Cydne, I took another Rode, which led me ſo far into that prodigious Mountain whereof I ſpoke, that I knew not which way to go back again: Yet ſince it was extream hot Weather, and all other parts of Cicily was an open Country, I was not at the firſt ſorry I had miſtaken my way for another where the tops of the Rocks which did hang one over another was a great ſhadow unto me in my travel: But at laſt, when I ſaw no living creature, but a ſort of little wild Beaſts, which the Inhabitants of that Country call Squillaques, which naturally are apt to ſtealing, and which follow all them that paſs this way to filch ſomething from them, I confeſs that I repented my going ſo far in this Way, principally out of fear leſt I ſhould wander ſo far in this hideous Mountain, that I could not get out again when night came on: ſo that conceiving eaſier for me to turn back by the paths I came, than to follow an unknown Rode where I could meet with none to enquire of, I faced about, returned the ſame way I came: but coming unto a place where there was ſeveral beaten paths, I miſtook the right, and went into one by which I did not come: I went ſtreight forward a long while, thinking I had been right, and yet methought I ſaw many things which I obſerved not before; and other times methought I knew where I was: but ſometimes hoping I was right, and ſometimes fearing I was wrong, I ſtill went forward, impatiently deſiring to be from amongſt thoſe Rocks: for often I had a huge high Mountain on my right hand, and a horrid Precipice on my left, and the beſt way I had rough and rocky. I ask you pardon, Sir, for inſiſting ſo long upon a deſcription of theſe things: But I muſt needs confeſs they made ſuch a deep impreſſion in my mind, that I could not chuſe but deſcribe them as they were. After I had travelled in this manner a long while, and came unto a place where there was no track, I was forced to ſtay, becauſe the night coming on apace, I was in ſome danger of falling into ſome Precipice, if I had continued on a little longer: I lighted then from my horſe, and putting the bridle upon my arm (for there was no tree in that place to tye him unto!) I ſat down under a Rock; and leaning upon another little one, I reſolved to take up my Inn there, and to keep my ſelf, if poſſible, from ſleeping, leſt my Horſe ſhould break looſe, or ſome wild beaſt come unto me; And indeed I paſſed away almoſt all the night without a wink of ſleep, or having any deſire unto it, as well becauſe the obſcurity of that deſart place, which carries a kind of terror with it, that moves not much unto ſleep, as becauſe I heard a great multitude of thoſe filching Cattel continually paſs by me: But at laſt, being a little us'd to the noiſe which they made, and being very weary with travelling amongſt thoſe rugged Rocks without one bit of meat, about an hour before day I fell aſleep againſt my will, and waked not before Sun riſe, and I believe I had ſlept longer, if one of theſe crafty beaſts, following their natural inclination, had not awaked me, by drawing out of my pocket the Table-book, in which I had writ down the Ways by which I was to go; ſo that though they ſay theſe Squillaques are commonly as cunning at thieving as are any Lacedemonians, yet he which ſtole my Table-book did awake me: I no ſooner opened my eyes, but ſeeing this Animal running away with my Table-book in his mouth, I got on horſeback and rid after him, crying as loud as I could to affright him and make him let it fall, and after I had chaſed him a long while he turned ſhort behind a great Rock, and I made all poſſible ſpeed leſt I ſhould loſe the ſight of him, and when I turned where he did, I ſaw he had let fall what he had ſtoln from me, and ran away as faſt as ever he could. But, Sir, I was ſtrangely amazed, when following this little Animal I found it had conducted me into a little Plain about 15 or 20 furlongs in length, and ten or twelve broad, boundered with the moſt pleaſant Wood that is in the whole World; beyond which was a huge and ſterile Mountain, which ſeemed to touch the Clouds, and made the moſt terrible and moſt pleaſing object both that ever was beheld; for Nature had ſo moulded it from top to bottom, that without a ſight of it, it is impoſſible to conceive how well the greenneſs of this pleaſant Wood, oppoſite to this ragged Mountain, did pleaſe all beholders: when I firſt eſpied it, I ſtopt, not knowing whether I ſhould venture into a Wood whoſe paths were unknown unto me: yet ſince I knew no ſafer way than that, I thought it better to wander in a pleaſant ſhade than amongſt a heap of rubbiſh Rocks: where not a pile of graſs did grow. I went over then this little Plain, in the midſt of which I ſpyed an Arbour, which the rays of the Sun could never penetrate though never ſo hot, and the Trees of it were perpetually green, being compoſed of Cedars, Pines, Mirtles, Ews, and ſuch like Trees, who keeps thoſe leaves all Winter green which the Spring time gives them; and the Wonder of the Object was, that theſe Trees did grow amongſt the Rocks, and all the Rocks were covered with ſuch variety of all ſorts of Moſs, and of as many ſeveral colours, as that the Rainbow had not more nor more delighting: The variety of theſe Trees, and the perpetual freſhneſs of the Leaves, made this Wood incomparably pleaſant. I wandered then through this great and pleaſing Wood, where a thouſand ſeveral ſorts of pretty Birds did make a moſt harmonious eccho, teſtifying by the little fear they had of me, that the place was but ſeldom frequented: After I had gone five or ſix hundred paces, I eſpied on my right hand a very pleaſant Fountain, which boiling up amongſt a heap of Pebbles, covered over with a pretty Moſs of Emerald colour, did make a little Rivulet, and ran turning and winding it ſelf along the ſide of the Wood, oppoſite to that aſpiring Mountain of which I ſpoke before. As I ſtood by the ſide of this Cryſtal Fountain, I obſerved a little path which parted from the great Road, and did lead towards the thick of the Wood; and after I had reſted my ſelf a while by this Fountain, I followed that path, which always aſcended, ſometimes inclining towards the right hand; and ſometimes towards the left, becauſe the Hill was too ſteep to go ſtreight up: When I was in the midſt of this woody Rock, O Heavens, how was I amazed, when I diſcovered a great Cave which went into the Rock, and by it the Prince Mazares ſitting upon a ſtone! who at the noiſe I made turned his head towards me, and preſently knew me, and gave me demonſtrations to know him: I was ſo exceedingly ſtartled at the ſight of him, that I was a while and knew not what I did, nor alighted from my Horſe: my eyes were ſo full of tears, and my heart ſo full of ſorrows, that I ſtood like a ſtone, and knew not whether what I ſaw was real. But at laſt, my dear Maſter riſing up, and naming me with a great cry; I revived out of my aſtoniſhment: ſo that lighting from my Horſe, and tying him unto a Tree, I went and caſt my ſelf at his feet: But he immediately took me up, and embraced me with extraordinary tenderneſs; My dear Orſanus, ſaid he unto me, is it poſſible I ſhould ever have a ſight of you again? and will you force me whether I will or no to have ſome minutes of conſolation in my life? Sir (ſaid I unto him, with eyes ſwimming in tears, to ſee the melancholy in his looks, and to imagine how ſadly he had lived ſince I ſaw him) I do not intend to add minutes, but an age of conſolation unto you. The ſight of you indeed is moſt dear unto me (replied he) but Orſanus, ſince I have been the cauſe of my divine Mandana's death, no conſolation can comfort me. But, Sir (replied I haſtily) if I ſhould tell you that the Princeſs Mandana lives, would not that be a comfort unto you? No, Orſanus, replied he, it would not, ſince I could not believe you: I ſhould think it only your plot to draw me out of this ſad ſolitude, wherein I live, and in which I am reſolved to dye. Yet let me tell you, replied I, that what I ſay is moſt certainly true, for this Mandana, who both you and I thought dead, I ſaw her alive with my own eyes. Ah, Orſanus (cryed he out) I would I could believe this, and dye immediately after; that I might not be deluded by ſo pleaſing a lye, and be for ever delivered from all the miſeries which I endure. But, Sir (replied I) is it poſſible this Deſart ſhould be ſo little frequented, and this Cell in which you inhabit ſo unknown unto all men, that not one of them ſhould come and tell you how all Aſia is in Arms for the Princeſs Mandana; that the illuſtrious Artamenes is no more Artamenes, but known to be Cyrus, Son to Cambiſes King of Perſia; That Ciaxares after he had impriſoned him, did releaſe him, and made him General of his Army; That the King of Pontus, after he had loſt all his Kingdoms, and flying away in a Ship, did ſave the Princeſs Mandana's life, immediately after the fury of the boiſterous Waves had ſeparated her from you; That the invincible Cyrus, thinking that Prince had carried her into Armenia, drew the War thither, and became Maſter of it; That in lieu of releaſing the Princeſs Mandana, he releaſed only the Siſter of his Rival, that is, the Princeſs of Pontus; That afterwards the King her Brother being reported to be at Suſa with the Princeſs Mandana, and that ſhe was to imbarque for Cicilie, conducted by the King of Suſiana, and by the Queen Panthea, Cyrus followed Abradates, defeated him, and took the Queen his Wife a Priſoner, in lieu of releaſing the Princeſs Mandana, that the King of Pontus, according to his deſign, imbarqued with the Princeſs of Medea, and ſteered towards Epheſus.

Whilſt I was ſpeaking thus, the Prince Mazares hearkned unto me with extraordinary attention, and by his quick and piercing looks endeavoured to penetrate through my eyes into the bottom of my heart, to know whether what I ſpoke were ſincere and really true; ſo that I perceiving that fain he would, but could not believe me: No, no, Sir (ſaid I unto him) do not ſuſpect me of any falſhood, ſince the truths which now I tell you are ſo generally known, that there is not ſo much as a Shepherd in all Aſia who knows not that Mandana is living, and that there is two hundred thouſand men in Arms ready to releaſe her. This Princeſs (added I) hath alſo paſſed ſo near you, that certainly ſhe hath ſeen the Cedar-tops which grow in this your Deſart: I am confident that I am not miſtaken, for ſhe might diſcover them as ſhe went to imbarque: How, Orſanus, ſaid he, can I poſſibly believe Mandana not dead? Can I think thoſe eyes of yours, which now look upon mine, hath ſeen her alive, and that ſhe looked upon the tops of theſe Mountains? Ah, Orſanus, if this be true, I am not ſo miſerably unfortunate as I thought my ſelf.

As this Prince was thus talking, I ſpyed coming out of the Wood a man admirably handſom, of a pleaſant Phyſiognomy, but ſeemed ſomething melancholy, who being alſo as much ſurprized to find the Prince Mazares in conference with me, as I was to find my Maſter in ſuch a ſolitude, we gazed upon each other with equal amazement: But the Prince Mazares calling him, Come Beleſis (ſaid he unto him) help to know whether Orſanus (of whom I have ſpoke ſo much unto you, and whom I reckoned amongſt the loſſes which I thought I had ſuſtained) do really tell me the truth. Then he whom my Maſter called Beleſis, hearing my name, came forward, and ſaluting me with ſuch civility as let me know that all which Mazares loved was dear unto him, I returned him a ſalute with much reverence; after which, my Maſter commanded me to relate all that I had before told him, obliging me very often to aſſure him, that I would ſpeak in all ſincerity: Afterwards, asking me how I eſcaped the Shipwrack? how I came into Sicily? how I found out his Deſart? and whether I knew what was become of Tyburtus? I fully ſatisfied his curioſity in all things, and acquainted him with the death of that wiſe old man Tyburtus, conceiving that he would apprehend his death with leſs ſorrow at this time when he heard Mandana was alive, than if I ſhould have deferred it; yet was he much perplexed at it, and did exceedingly lament him: And ſince Beleſis and he did nothing elſe, ſince they were together, but make relations of their lives, and continually diſcourſe of their misfortunes, he lamented the poor Tyburtus as much, as if he had been perfectly acquainted with him, though he knew him not at all, but only by the report of the Prince Mazares. In the mean time, ſince I had a great deſire to know how my Maſter came unto that place, and to learn who that ſtranger was; alſo when they met, I took ſo much freedom upon me, as to ask him, beſeeching him to pardon me if I were too bold, and to believe it proceeded from my very great affection to him: It is but juſt, Orſanus, ſaid he unto me, That a Prince of whom you have had ſo much care, and ſought ſo long, ought to render you an account of himſelf: But that I may the more conveniently do it, follow Beleſis and me, and we will ſhew you our habitation: Alas, Sir, (ſaid I, and followed them) I believe your Palace is more beautiful without than within, and that there is a great difference between your Grot and the Wood beſides it. You ſhall be a Judge of that preſently, anſwered Beleſis, and entring in with them, I was exceedingly aſtoniſhed at the ſight: For, Sir, all Art and Nature together did never make a place ſo beautiful in any place of the World, as Nature alone did in this: I found this Grot to be very deep and large, and yet not obſcure, for the Mountain being very ſteep, there were ſeveral Windows pierced through it, and gave light enough to diſcern all the rarities both without and within it; a thouſand admirable congealations were the ornaments of this place, where one might behold Pillars, Arches, Trees, Flowers, Leaves, Moſſes, Urns, Tombs, and a thouſand other ſuch things, all of a ſubſtance as clear and tranſparent as ever was any Cryſtal in the world: At two ſides of this wonder I ſaw two Fountains, which neither ſwellings nor diminiſhing, kept conſtant at the ſame level, the water certainly having ſome undicernable courſe through ſome crannies of the Rock, according to the meaſure they received from others. When I ſeriouſly had viewed theſe rare and delightful wonders, I could not chuſe but admire at the providence of God, who had brought the Prince Mazares into ſo pleaſant a Wilderneſs. Well Orſanus (ſaid Beleſis unto me, and ſeeing my admiration) Do you think the Prince Mazares did err when he called this Grot a Palace? No, Sir (ſaid I unto him) But I muſt confeſs, I do not underſtand how you live for want of Victuals: You ſhall know that immediately, ſaid he unto me: Then going unto the entry of this Cave, he called a ſervant which he had there, who came out of another little and leſs beautiful Room which joyned to the other, and commanded him to give me ſomething to eat, to let me ſee their garden, and to have a care of my horſe, which was ſet in a little Cave further off, for all this Mountain was full of them; and accordingly, this ſervant unto Beleſis, whoſe name was Arcas, after he had given me a good Dinner, did carry me ſome fifty paces further unto the foot of the Rock, and ſhewed me a garden ſo full of all manner of Herbs, Roots, Peaſe, Beans, and ſuch like, and Arcas told me, that ſometimes he went to Hunt, that I wondred how men who ſought for death ſhould find ſubſiſtance in ſuch a place. Arcas alſo told me, that his Maſter by reaſon of ſeveral diſaſters, had renounced all civil ſociety, and having found out this admirable place in the black Mountain, he reſolved to dwell in it all the remainder of his life: So that he, whether his Maſter would or no, had provided ſuch things as were abſolutely neceſſary for the life of a man. Afterwards he told me, that after they had been ſetled a while here, the Prince Mazares came accidentally into this ſolitary place, and Beleſis and he became ſuch intimate friends, as they promiſed never to part, but die together in this Deſart: But (ſaid I unto him) How do they imploy themſelves every day? In condoling, walking ſometimes ſingle, ſometimes together (replied he.) Some books they have alſo, for I told you already, that at firſt when my Maſter made choice of this Cave for his habitation, I brought hither every thing which I thought might be ſerviceable unto him; and truly I think theſe two illuſtrious melancholy companions are now ſo accuſtomed to the life they lead, that they would hardly change it; yet truly, I do not think they can live long thus, or rather indeed I wonder they have lived ſo long, conſidering the extream melancholy which poſſeſſeth them.

Arcas having told me all theſe things, and ſhewed me his Garden, I went unto the place where I left my Maſter with Beleſis; and he went to take care of my horſe which was put with another, which my Maſter brought into that Wilderneſs. I was yet unſatisfied what they did when night came upon them, but was not long ſo; for when it began to be dark, I perceived in divers places about this vault there were ſeveral pieces of tranſparent Rock in divers places, all which were filled with a kind of Oyl which Arcas had extracted out of Fir Trees, which grew in great abundance within that Wood, and that faithful ſervant of Beleſis, with help of a kind of Cotton, made abundance of Lamps, that gave a moſt glorious light within the Cryſtal Grot; ſo that it ſeemed incomparably more luſtrious and ſplendant when all theſe ruſtique Lamps were lighted, than it did in the day. The Beds of theſe two retired melancholy men, were ſuitable to the reſt, and were made of Moſs, Reeds, and Ruſhes, for they did not ſeek for any Downy Beds of eaſe. The Prince Mazares was grown to ſuch a habit of melancholy, that he could not rejoice at any thing; and Beleſis as ſad as he was, had a greater ſhare in that ſatisfaction which he ought to have in hearing Mandana was alive, than he himſelf had; ſuch a cuſtomary habit of ſorrows had ſeized upon his ſoul; yet finding ſome ſatisfaction in relating ſad ſtories, he told me what his thoughts where when he ſtole away from Tyburtus; how having a deſign to ſeek out ſome place where he might paſs unknown, he reſolved to imbarque for Sicily, and ſo to paſs into Arabia the Deſart, and there end his days: Yet having conſulted with an Oracle, the Gods did by their anſwer forbid him that courſe, and directed him to dwell in the black Mountain in Sicily, where he ſhould find ſome conſolation: Thither I went then (ſaid he unto me) and at firſt believed that the conſolation which the heavens had promiſed me was death: For paſſing a day and a half in theſe Mountains without ſeeing any body, I made no queſtion then but death would ſoon be my lot. But at laſt, the Gods being my guide as well as Commander, I met Beleſis walking in the Wood, and ſpoke unto him; preſently we grew acquainted, and the ſame day did begin ſo great a league of friendſhip, that we promiſed never to part from each other: Yet I am very ready to diſingage you from your word (ſaid Beleſis, and interrupted him) for ſince the Princeſs Mandana lives, it is not juſt you ſhould be tyed unto the fortunes of a miſerable man, who is out of all hopes to better himſelf; yet I ſhall have this advantage, that the end of your miſeries will ſhorten mine, ſince certainly I ſhall dye as ſoon as I am deprived of the ſweetneſs which I find in your company. Alas, alas, Beleſis (ſaid the Prince Mazares) you are not acquainted with the malignity of my fate, if you imagine I can ever be happy: I muſt confeſs it is an extraordinary comfort unto me to hear that Mandana is alive, and that though I was her Raviſher, yet I was not her Executioner: But for all that, ſince I cannot leave loving her, and knowing it to be impoſſible I ſhould ever get my ſelf ſo high in her eſteem as I was before, it may be ſaid that I do nothing but change miſery for miſery: and which way ſoever I look upon the matter, I find my ſelf the moſt unfortunate Prince upon Earth: for ſince I was the cauſe that this Princeſs fell into the power of the Pontean King, that ſhe hath been hurried from Kingdom to Kingdom, and that all Aſia is in War about it, I am moſt confident ſhe hates my memory every minute in the day, and thinks the Gods moſt juſt in drowning me, as a puniſhment of my crime: And I may aſſure my ſelf, that as ſoon as ſhe hears I am not dead, ſhe will be as ſorry for it as I am glad to hear ſhe is living: Moreover, I am ſo unfortunate as to have ſuch Rivals, as in any reaſon I cannot hate them, but ſuch as I ought rather to lament: The King of Aſſyria is cruelly betrayed by me, and I carried away from him, her whom he infinitely loved, for whoſe ſake he hath loſt the greateſt Kingdom in all Aſia: As for the King of Pontus, how can I complain againſt him? Since I ruined Mandana, and he ſaved her, muſt I not rather accuſe my ſelf than him? Can I in any juſtice quarrel with a Prince who reſcued my Princeſs from her grave which I layed open for her? What can I alledg againſt the illuſtrious Cyrus? What Crime can I tax him with? or to ſay better, How may he accuſe me? for I made uſe of his Name to deceive the adored Mandana; under that illuſtrious Title I ſeduced her, and have eternally loſt that eſteem and friendſhip which I might have for ever enjoyed: Do you remember Orſanus (ſaid he to me) the time when this illuſtrious Princeſs was at Babylon? how ſhe called me her Protector: alas, how undeſerving was I of that glorious Title? I have juſt cauſe to believe that of all her Lovers and Adorers, ſhe hates me the moſt: the King of Aſſyria, as violent as he is by Nature, has not ſo much affronted her as I have done: The King of Pontus, in keeping that only which fortune gave him is not ſo culpable as I am; for I, miſerable I, am not only an unjuſt, raſh and inſolent Lover of this Princeſs, but alſo a perfideous Friend and wicked Cheater, whoſe memory ſhe may juſtly hate: Why ſhould I trouble my ſelf about her Liberty? (ſaid he,) for if the illuſtrious Cyrus do not recover it for her, none elſe can.

The Prince Mazares was ſo vehement in ſuch expreſſions as theſe, that I thought it not convenient to contradict him, leſt I ſhould more confirm him in his reſentments, by too much oppoſition; But granting him ſome things, and diſputing others, our Converſation laſted till faithful Arcas brought in Supper, which was more neat than magnificent, as you may well imagine: After which, my dear Maſter asked me, how I came to ſee Mandana, whether Marteſia and Araminta were with her? And as in my anſwers I phraſed Abradates King of Suſiana, Beleſis interrupted me, asking how it was poſſible Abradates ſhould be King, ſince when he entered into his ſolitude, the King his Father and the Prince his elder Brother were alive, and he himſelf was an exile at Sardis? The Reaſon is (replyed I unto him) becauſe thoſe two Princes are both dead, and conſequently Abradates is King by ſucceſſion. The Gods are worthy to be praiſed for it (replyed Beleſis,) for Abradates is much more worthy to were a Crown than the Prince his Brother, who has been my greateſt Perſecutor.

Pray Orſanus (ſaid Panthea and interrupted him) is this Beleſis of whom you ſpeak the ſame I have ſo often heard ſpoken of at Suſa when I came there, and one who of all men living is one of the moſt accompliſhed Gallants, whom Love hath puniſhed with all his tortures? I know not whether he be the ſame you mean (replyed Orſanus,) but I know that Beleſis is of Mantiana, and hath dwelt at Suſa a long time; That Love hath been the misfortune of his life, and that the Prince of Suſa elder Brother of Abradates hath made him complain much of his violence towards him. There is no queſtion (ſaid Panthea) but he is the ſame I mean; ſo that I can aſſure you the Prince Mazares is in company of one of the beſt loved men in all Aſia, as thoſe who have known him tell me, even by her whom he moſt loved, though ſince ſhe moſt hates him: But Sir, ſaid ſhe to Cyrus, I pray pardon me for interrupting him in his Relation, and therefore I beſeech you let him continue it: Cyrus then returned a Complement unto Panthea, and commanded Orſanus to proceed, and accordingly he went thus on with his Story.

You ſee, Sir, how the firſt day of my being in the Wilderneſs was ſpent; Truſty Arcas giving me his bed, and making another for himſelf as well as he could. It was ſo late before I went to bed, that the Birds at break of day did awake me within three hours after I began to ſleep; yet was I not ſo ſoon awake as my Maſter; for though he was unimaginably joyed that Mandana was alive, yet was it a kind of an interrupted joy and mingled with ſo many perplexed thoughts, as he could not ſleep that night: As ſoon as I came out of my little grot, I found him gone out of his, ſo that finding Beleſis alone, I beſeeched his help in perſwading the Prince Mazares to quit this kind of life which then he lived: But alas, Sir, ſaid I unto him, the better to move him unto it, It were requiſite you did quit it your ſelf, and to peſwade him rather by your Example than your reaſons. Ah Orſanus, cryed Beleſis, the deſtiny of the Prince Mazares and my ſelf are much different, and that which is good for him, is not for me. Sir, replyed I, ſince I am ignorant of your misfortunes, and dare not be ſo bold as to ask what nature they are of, I cannot ſo well convince you, as perhaps I ſhould if I knew them; but to ſpeak in general, there can be no misfortunes ſo bitter, but a man of your ſpirit and wiſdom may ſweeten them. 'Tis true, reply'd he, thoſe miſeries which Fortune doth cauſe, may be overcome, but ſuch as Love doth load a man withal, there are no comforts ſo cordial as to ſweeten them, eſpecially ſuch as mine are; however I will promiſe you to uſe my beſt arguments to move the Prince Mazares unto a removal from hence in the morning, I would ſay to day (ſaid he and ſighed) if my affection unto him did not need ſome time of preparation before I be ſeparated from ſo dear a friend. Whileſt I was thus talking with Beleſis, the Prince Mazares was rather wandering than walking in the Wood; and the diſorder of his mind was ſo great, that he talked as he walked, and in lieu of walking far off from the Grot, he was turned upon it again ere ever he was aware: he found Beleſis and me together, as we were going out to look him: No ſooner were we met, but Beleſis in purſuance of his promiſe, began to intreat him that he would ſtay this day with him, ſeeming as if he made no queſtion but that he had intentions to leave him: As ſoon as he ſaid ſo, my Maſter looking upon Beleſis, told him, that the alteration in his fortune ſhould not alter his manner of living; for ſaid he unto him, It is miſery enough unto me that I can never pretend unto Mandana's eſteem, to make me forſake the ſociety of men, although ſhe be not dead; yet it was the deſpair which her death did cauſe in you, and that made you take up a reſolution of forſaking the ſight of men. 'Tis true, replyed Mazares, but why would you adviſe me unto a life which will bring more bitter ſorrows unto me than this I live? Conſider well, Beleſis, what you adviſe me unto, and tell me truly what you think to be my beſt courſe. Sir, replyed he, a man that is not in love would adviſe you to endeavor to forget the Princeſs Mandana, and to return unto the King your Father and the Queen your Mother, who would infinitely rejoyce at it: But ſince I too well know the power of that Paſſion over thoſe who are captivated with it, I muſt ingeniouſly tell you, that though I think it expedient for you to quit your Deſart, yet I know not what to ſay, therefore I adviſe you to be your own Counſellor, and to follow your own inclination. I have muſed away all this night replyed the Prince my Maſter) in contemplation of my preſent condition, but cannot reſolve what I ought or what I would undertake; yet I muſt confeſs I find in my Soul ſuch a violent deſire to ſee the Princeſs Mandana, that I cannot tell whether or no I am able to reſiſt it: And yet at the ſame time, I find my ſelf ſo extreamly aſhamed of my Crime, that I think I ſhall never be able to ſhew my ſelf: ſo that my fears and my deſires will not ſuffer me to reſolve what courſe to take: Moreover, though I ſhould reſolve to ſee her, yet how can I bring it to paſs? If I go into Lidia where ſhe is, and preſent my ſelf unto Crœſſus, who fights againſt Cyrus, then it may be ſaid that I fight for the King of Pontus, againſt a Prince who would releaſe the Princeſs: If I ſhould go into the Army of Cyrus, and think to have the honour of fighting for Mandana, then perhaps I ſhould only fight for Cyrus and the King Aſſyria, and dye before I have expiated my Crime by any conſiderable ſervice. What ſhall I do then? I cannot reſolve to fight neither for the King of Pontus, nor for the King of Aſſyria, nor for Cyrus; and yet my deſtiny is ſo odd, that I cannot engage my ſelf on either ſide, but I muſt ſerve ſome of my Rivals; and it is abſolutely impoſſible to imagine any way which can be advantagious to me. Moreover, ſince the Princeſs Mandana loved Cyrus when he was only Artamenes, and in her fidelity to him did ſcorn the greateſt King of all Aſia: what likelyhood is there, that now ſince Artamenes is become Cyrus, the King of Perſea's Son, who hath ſince conquered many Kingdoms, that ſhe ſhould change her affection to him: No, no, ſaid he, ſhe will never change: and I muſt needs confeſs, ſhe has no reaſon to change; nor can I ever hope to obtain the Love of this Princeſs, the height of my ambition is, That ſhe would not hate me: Yes Mandana, ſaid he, could I but let you ſee my real repentance, and could do you any ſuch conſiderable ſervice as would force your generoſity to pardon me, and admit me unto your eſteem again, I ſhould deſire no more, but take all my miſeries with content: But, alas! how is it poſſible for me to obtain this my deſire?

Sir, (ſaid I unto him, in hopes to make him quit his Deſart) you may obtain what you deſire, if you will contrive ways how to releaſe the Princeſs of Medea, and reſtore her unto the King her Father: But to effect that, you muſt renounce your ſolitude, and go where Mandana is, and ſeek all occaſions of doing as I adviſe you: Oh Orſanus (ſaid he) you would not adviſe me thus, but only to make me leave this Grotto; for you know well enough, that what you adviſe me unto is not eaſie to compaſs: If you were once in the way, replied I, I ſhould then anſwer you more affirmatively; but this is moſt certain, that as long as you bury your ſelf alive in this

Wood, you can never do any ſervice unto the Princeſs whom you love, who yet hates the very thought of you, and who cannot know how you repent the carrying her away as long as you are here? Moreover, if things ſo fall out, that you cannot effect what I adviſe you unto, and that you abſolutely reſolve to renounce the world, and enter into your Tomb alive, you may when you pleaſe find this Cave always open to receive you, and always find Beleſis there (replied that other illuſtrious ſolitary man who over-heard us) if death have not put an end unto all his miſeries before your return: No, no, Beleſis, replied the Prince Mazares, We will never part, and if Orſanus do perſwade me to quit this Wilderneſs, it ſhall be upon condition that you ſhall quit it alſo, elſe I will never quit it. Beleſis hearing my Maſter ſay ſo, anſwered him as one that was extreamly unwilling to quit the place, and there grew a moſt generous conteſt between them; Beleſis deſiring him to depart and leave him in his ſolitude, and Mazares reſolved not to depart, unleſs he would with him, and ſo the matter reſted that day without any reſolutions upon it. The next morning I had induced my Maſter to leave this Salvage habitation if Beleſis would go with him, and with my prayers and tears I had prevailed with Beleſis to accompany my Maſter, until he was in a more happy condition. Both of them being thus reſolved, I importuned them to depart immediately, leſt their minds ſhould alter, yet we were forced to ſtay a while, becauſe neither of them would be ſeen in ſuch habits as then they did wear. Since I had enough left of what, Sir, you were pleaſed to give me for our equipage; and moreover Beleſis had good ſtore of Jewels, which his truſty ſervant kept carefully for him, we ſent him unto the next Town with my horſe to buy another horſe, and to provide cloaths for my Maſter and Beleſis. Within three daies after he returned with all things neceſſary for our voyage, which we undertook in an odd kind of manner, for I obſerved that the Prince Mazares and Beleſis did leave their Deſart, as men that had a deſign to return again, yet I ſeemed as if I did not obſerve any thing, hoping that time and company might happily make them change thoughts. In the mean time Arcas was to be our guide out of this Woody Mountain, and indeed did very happily conduct us: For my part, though the place was the moſt beautiful of any in the World, yet I was very glad to be out of it: Always when I looked upon Beleſis, I ſaw him look upon this Mountain with a ſigh: But ſince we wanted yet many accoutrements for our voyage, we ſtayed at the firſt Town we came at to furniſh our ſelves, where my Maſter cauſed a Buckler to be made, which he hath carried ever ſince, and and whereby you may ſee, Sir (if ever you obſerved it) how ſeverely he cenſured himſelf, ſince therein he expreſſeth himſelf worthy of death for carrying away Mandana. Beleſis alſo furniſhed himſelf with ſuch Arms as ſuited beſt to his liking: And during all the voyage, I uſed all my beſt arguments to perſwade the Prince Mazares rather to return unto the King his Father, than to go unto Mandana, for he could never hope for the leaſt favour: But his anſwer was, that he would never have left his Cave, but only in hopes to releaſe her, and with full intentions to return thither again, if he could not effect his deſign. When I ſaw then with what reſolution he ſpoke unto me, I thought it better to yield unto him, than to conteſt any longer. Then we enquired concerning the ſtate of things, and were informed that your Army, Sir, had quitted Armenia, and made towards Cappadocia, to go from thence unto the Frontiers of Phrygia which joyned upon Lydia. We underſtood alſo, that Abradates would ſhortly depart from Suſa, and engage himſelf in the behalf of Crœſſus. Then did we conſider whether we ſhould go unto Epheſus by Sea or by Land, but the Prince Mazares had no fancy to truſt himſelf unto the inconſtancy of the Winds and Waves, ſince it was further by Water than by Land; and the King of Pontus would not have carried Mandana that way, but becauſe he feared the illuſtrious Cyrus would then follow him, therefore it was reſolved we ſhould not go by Sea; adding further unto other reaſons, that we ſhould never hear any news of the Princeſs Mandana in a Ship until we came at Epheſus; whereas on the contrary, we ſhould hear all by Land, ſince there was not a place in all Aſia which could not inform us. I ſhall not trouble you, Sir, with a relation which ways we went, for that would be too tedious, only this, that we were compelled to make long journies, and not to ſtay in any part of Paphlagonia which joyns upon Cappadocia: But ſo it was, whether by change of Air or Diet, Beleſis fell ſick, and ſo very ſick, that the Prince Mazares thought he would have dyed there. Beleſis did intreat him a hundred times to let him dye there, and follow his journey, yet he would not by any means; but on the contrary, proteſted he would never forſake him as long as he lived. In the mean time, the ſickneſs of Beleſis was not only dangerous, but like to laſt long: The greateſt comfort to Mazares was, that he heard the Princeſs Mandana was in the Temple of Diana at Epheſus, and that as the ſeaſon of the year was, you, Sir, could not draw your Forces into the field; and alſo, though he were at Epheſus there was no poſſibility of ſeeing Mandana: nor any thinking of getting her out of ſuch a ſacred place as that was, yet did he endure the ſickneſs of Beleſis with much impatience; but at laſt he began to grow better and better, and made us to hope he would eſcape, and indeed ſo he did. When he was quite out of all danger, and had quitted his Bed, his Phyſician adviſed him to walk and take the freſh Air: Beleſis being very deſirous to be in ſuch a condition as he might not be any ſtay unto Mazares, took his Phyſician's advice; ſo that after he had walked ſome days on foot, he found himſelf ſo ſtrong as to ride; then for a tryal whether he was able to travel, my Maſter and he deſign a journey of fifty Furlongs to walk in a great Wood, and I waited upon them: But, Sir, we had no ſooner entred a hundred paces in the Wood, than my Maſter riding alone by himſelf, ſome twenty paces before Beleſis and me, who were talking together, and returned with much alteration in his aſpect, and addreſſing himſelf unto me, Come hither, Orſanus, ſaid he, and tell whether my eyes deceive me not, for ſince I never ſaw Cyrus but once, and then I was not in a very good condition to obſerve his face; therefore I dare not aſſure you, that it was he who ſaluted me, and asked me whether I met not ſuch a man as he deſcribed unto me; yet certainly, if my imagination do well retain the memory of his Idea, he who I ſaw was Cyrus: Sir, (ſaid I unto him) Do we not hear every where as we paſs, that Cyrus is in the head of his Army? Yet I am the moſt deceived that ever man was, if I do not ſee him yet at the root of yonder Tree, replied he. In ſaying ſo, he ſhewed me the Tree where you, Sir, was leaning.

Oh, Orſanus, replied Cyrus, I muſt needs interrupt you in your ſtory, that I may undeceive you, and tell you that I was not in Paphlagonia when you paſſed through it. I eſteem you ſo much (anſwered Orſanus) that I will rather believe your words than my own eyes: Your eyes (replied the Princeſs Araminta, and bluſhed) are not ſo as you think them, ſince in all likelihood it was the Prince Spitridates whom you ſaw, who reſembles the illuſtrious Cyrus ſo much, that it is no wonder if you were miſtaken. But I beſeech you tell me the direct time when you ſaw him you ſpeak of. Orſanus in obedience to the Princeſs Araminta did tell her the exact time; ſo that by the computation of Cyrus and her ſelf, it was concluded that Orſanus met the Prince Spitridates three weeks after the ſtranger Anaxaris left him wounded in Paphlagonia, and in ſuch a Wood as Orſanus preſcribed; ſo that by this, the Princeſs Araminta had ſo much conſolation as to know certainly that he was not dead of the wound which he received; but on the other ſide, ſhe wondred to hear no news from himſelf. After ſhe had received all the ſatisfaction which Orſanus could give her, he continued his diſcourſe in theſe terms.

The Prince Mazares had no ſooner ſhewed me him whom I thought to be the illuſtrious Cyrus, but I told him (out of prudence, leſt an angry accident ſhould happen) that it was not Cyrus, though he much reſembled him. Mazares yet had much ado to believe me, and I think he would have asked this ſuppoſed Cyrus whether it was he or no, had not Beleſis (whilſt we were in the conteſt) told Mazares, that certainly I muſt needs know him better than he could, and therefore by conſequence he ought to believe me: mean while, he who was the ſubject of our diſcourſe, ruſhed preſently into the thick of the Wood, and was quite out of our ſight: So the Prince Mazares was forced to continue on his Walk. It is impoſſible for me, Sir, to relate his thoughts unto you; for they were ſo tumultuouſly diſordered, that he could never tell them unto us: Sometimes he was glad it was not you, and ſometimes again ſorry, without any reaſon either for his joys or ſorrows: But ſince all his pretenſions were only to releaſe Mandana, and obtain her pardon, we never met with any, but he enquired both concerning her and you, Sir.

That which wondered me moſt in the buſineſs was, that all thoſe with whom we ſpoke, told us, that you, Sir, was towards the Frontiers of Lydia; and comparing my belief that it was you I ſaw, with theſe reports, the thought of it did ſo take up my mind, that I could not chuſe but expreſs it unto my Maſter two days after the ſight of him who reſembled you; I told him that I diſſembled my real thoughts before, and that I did believe it was you which we ſaw in the Wood: So that we travelled a whole day reaſoning why you ſhould be there; and not being able to reconcile our own ſights and theſe reports, which were ſo contrary to each other, we ſtill paſſed on unſatisfied: But ſince I could not give my own eyes the lye, I conceived, that you had ſome ſecret Voyage unto ſome Neighbour Prince, to negotiate ſome buſineſs or other; and that though reports went you were in your Army, yet it was not impoſſible but you might be ſome days abſent: Thus believing that we had ſeen you, and that you knew not my Maſter, we arrived at laſt at Epheſus. The Prince Mazares then changed his Name for that of Telephanes; but Beleſis never altered his, becauſe it was unknown in Lydia. I ſhall not relate unto you, Sir, what agitation of Soul was in the Prince Mazares (whom now I will call Telephanes for a while) when he ſaw the Temple wherein Mandana was; for I would (if poſſibly I could) conceal his paſſion from you, leſt I ſhould too much exaſperate your ſpirit againſt him: yet ſince the greatneſs of his Love does make his Virtue appear, I muſt needs have ſo good opnion of you, Sir, as to believe, that at the end of my Relation you will admire, and perhaps become a friend unto ſuch a Rival as he is, although I do ſet forth his paſſion unto Mandana to be infinitely high: And the truth is, Sir, it is impoſſible a paſſion ſhould be more violent: but the Wonder is, that ſince he came out of his Deſart, he never entertained one thought but how to make ſatisfaction for his fault, and obtain a pardon for it, and I am moſt confident, that never any poor Peccant was fuller of repentance than he, nor did I ever ſee more cruel remorſe of mind: As oft as he conſidered, that it was through his treachery that Mandana was now incloſed within that Temple, his Soul was ſo ſadded with ſorrows, that I wonder he dyed not; and I verily think, that had not the King of Pontus been ſo ill when we came to Epheſus, that he kept his bed by reaſon of a wound in his thigh, ſo that he was not able to oppoſe thoſe who would have taken away the Princeſs Mandana and the Princeſs Palmis; I am confident, I ſay, that if he had been there, though he had ſaved the life of the Princeſs, yet in the firſt raptures of his ſorrows, my Maſter had then aſſaulted him: But afterwards conſidering that the King of Pontus his death would not have releaſed Mandana, ſince as the ſtate of things were, Crœſſus would not part with her, he conceived it more expedient to break her chains by Policy: And conſidering that it was impoſſible to make any attempts upon that place for her Releaſement, he thought it better to go unto Sardis, whither ſhe was to be conveyed aſſoon as Crœſſus and the King of Pontus were agreed upon their conditions; which were not yet concluded upon, though the Negotiation had been tranſacting ever ſince the King of Pontus came to Epheſus: for aſſoon as he came thither, he ſent to demand protection from Crœſſus, upon condition that what Treaties ſoever there were between him and Ciaxares or you, Mandana ſhould never be reſtored. Since this Propoſition ſeemed very hard, becauſe by granting it, ſuch a War would enſue, as would never be ended till one ſide was ruined, ſince it was not probable that Ciaxares would ever ceaſe unleſs his daughter was declared, therefore the negotiation was very long before it could be concluded; and nothing was done in it, till Crœſſus having received a ſmiling anſwer from the Oracle, and then he conſented unto the King of Pontus his deſires: yet to find out a plauſible expediment wherewith to colour Juſtice, he engaged himſelf never to render the Princeſs Mandana in any Treaty without the King of Pontus his conſent; ſo that after ſeveral ſendings the one to the other, the buſineſs was concluded between them when we came to Epheſus.

Then did we reſolve for Sardis, and when we had put our ſelves into a handſome equipage, we went unto that ſtately Town, where the Prince my Maſter never feared being known: For though Crœſſus had heretofore been on the King of Aſſyria's ſide as well as himſelf, yet they never ſaw each other, as well becauſe Crœſſus was not in Babylon, as becauſe they were alwayes parted in ſeveral bodies, ſo that he went boldly unto him, and offered him his ſervice, Love telling him, that it was not directly againſt the Rules of Generoſity, to conceal his deſign of releaſing Mandana, by ſuch aſſurances of fidelity, which he would never have failed in, but only for her: And ſince Towns are commonly taken by craft, he thought he might without any baſeneſs deliver Mandana by ſubtilty, ſince I could not by force. To get ſome reputation with Crœſſus, he made himſelf known unto him for what he was, to wit, a man of a great ſpirit and able parts in Martial matters; ſo that his deſign taking effect, Crœſſus received him very well, and treated both Beleſis and me with much civility; and the better to diſguiſe our ſelves, there ſeemed to be no difference of quality lity between us all, but yet the inclination of Crœſſus did prefer the ſuppoſed Telephanes Firſt, though Beleſis was very handſom, of much ſpirit, and a gallant deportment: It is very true, that ſince he did only ſurmount his ſorrows out of his affectionate friendſhip unto the Prince Mazares, and ſince that Prince did ſurmount his own ſorrows only to releaſe his Miſtreſs, therefore they acted differently, the one ſeeming much more forced than the other: However it was, in a few days Telephanes was well known both in Court and Camp, Crœſſus offered him imployment, but he would take none upon him, leſt then perhaps he could not lay hold of any fit opportunity which might offer it ſelf; his only care was, not to be ſuſpected, and to inſinuate himſelf with divers perſons: When he underſtood that they would lodge the Princeſs Mandana within the Citadel when ſhe came to Sardis, his deſign was to make him that was Governour his friend, and he brought it ſo handſomly to paſs, that he got a great ſtroke with him. In the mean time, ſince the negotiation between Crœſſus and the King of Pontus could not be compleated without any enterview, it was reſolved they ſhould meet near Sardis, and ſince all conditions were agreed upon, and they feared that in conveying the Princeſs Mandana, and the Princeſs Palmis, ſomething might be attempted for their releaſement; therefore Crœſſus would have them depart from Epheſus, whilſt the King of Pontus was not there, purpoſely becauſe the Spies which Prince Artamas might have amongſt them, might the ſooner be deceived. The King of Pontus was extreamly againſt it, ſaying, That ſince the River Hermes was between your Camp, Sir, and the way which theſe Princeſſes was to go, there was no fear at all: But Crœſſus told him, that the Prince Artamas had ſo many creatures in his Dominions, that he ſtood in fear of his own Subjects as well as of his Enemies, and therefore the King of Pontus was forced to conſent, that orders ſhould be ſent unto Andramites to guard theſe Princeſſes, and conveigh them with thoſe Forces which he had unto a certain place where the King of Pontus would meet him with others, and accordingly it was put in execution. In the mean time, ſince it was the will of Crœſus that my Maſter ſhould wait upon him when he went to meet the King of Pontus, he was then put to an extream puzzle, ſince that Prince intended to preſent him unto his Rival, as a man from whom he expected great ſervices: And the King of Pontus perceiving by the proceedings of Crœſus, that he valued this Telephanes at a high rate, and his handſom preſence ſpeaking him to be a man of much merit, he received him with great civility, and my Maſter did anſwer it with ſo much turbulency in his countenance, that I have admired a hundred times, Crœſus and the King of Pontus did not perceive it: It is true, that preſently after he recollected himſelf, and carried the matter with as much cunning as a man in Love could, who had a plot to deceive his Rival, and releaſe his Miſtriſs.

The King of Pontus then was as well pleaſed with my Maſter as my Maſter would have been with him, if there had not been ſome ſecret reaſons which took the edge off all thoſe civilities which that Prince expreſſed unto him, and diſobliged him; yet ſometimes when he conſidered him as one that ſaved Mandana's life, he could not chuſe but acknowledge himſelf obliged in his heart. In the mean time, as much as Telephanes deſired to ſee the Princeſs whom he adored, yet he durſt not go with the King of Pontus, who as I told you, Sir, was to meet Andramites that guarded her; For ſince it was not ſo eaſie for him to diſguiſe his face as his name, he made no queſtion but if ſhe ſaw him ſhe would know him; and if ſhe knew him, before ſhe was informed of his real repentance for carrying her away, her extream averſion to him would diſcover him, and ſo his deſign of reſtoring her that liberty which he had taken from her, would quite be defeated; therefore he made a handſom excuſe for not accompanying the King of Pontus, as he deſired him, but returned unto Sardis exceedingly diſquieted, becauſe he was not able to regulate his deſires; for when his repentance and his generoſity had the upper hand in his heart, then he wiſhed that the Prince Artamas might attempt ſomething for the liberty of theſe Princeſſes, and in lieu of conducting them to Sardis, they might be brought unto your Camp, Sir: But then, when Love was Queen-Regent in his ſoul, he could not chuſe but deſire a ſight of Mandana, and zealouſly wiſh that it might be himſelf who ſhould releaſe her, and reſtore her unto you, rather than any other ſhould have that honour from him: yet notwithſtanding he had no mind to be ignoraut of all paſſages between the King of Pontus and the Princeſs Mandana at their meeting; ſo that for better information of himſelf, he deſired Beleſis to accompany that Prince, not daring to ſend me, becauſe the Princeſs knew me. But ſince he could not accord, being ſeen by the Princeſs, becauſe ſhe was to paſs into the Town where he was, he deſigned to ſee her out of a Window as ſhe went through the Town unto the Citadel; ſo that he waited for the return of the King of Pontus, and the Princeſſes Arrival with much impatience. About two days after, the news was brought, that the Prince Artamas attempting the liberty of the Princeſſes was taken priſoner, and wounded in ſeveral places, and that all his Party were either killed, defeated, or taken priſoners. About two hours after this, another Poſt came from Andramites, who told Crœſſus, that the King of Aſſyria was amongſt the priſoners, being known by a Captain that was in the Babylonian War.

This news, which extreamly rejoyced Crœſſus, grieved my Maſter; for though the King of Aſſyria was his Rival, yet to ſee ſo great a King in ſuch a caſe, moved much ſorrow in him, eſpecially conſidering that this laſt accident had not been, if he had not carried away the Princeſs Mandana: Alſo fearing that this Prince might know him, as well as the Princeſs might, he was moved to conceal himſelf with much care, leſt all his deſigns ſhould be ſpoiled; and indeed I did much confirm him in his reſolution of keeping himſelf unknown, eſpecially as the Princeſs and the priſoners paſſed through the Town, and that day he kept in the place where I lodged, and as good luck was, the ſtreet where we were, proved to be that through which Mandana was to paſs, and ſo ſhe did. It is impoſſible I ſhould tell you, Sir, what operation this ſight had upon the heart of my Maſter; the truth, and the wonder is, that it did not ſo much augment his Love as his repentance; for when he ſaw her ſo fair and ſo ſad both, he imagined himſelf to be the cauſe of that ſadneſs; his ſorrows were ſuch, as I can deſcribe them no otherwiſe, than by telling you that I cannot deſcribe them. As ſoon as the Chariot wherein both the Princeſſes were was out of ſight, and as he was ready to go from the Window, he ſaw the King of Aſſyria appear, guarded with Souldiers, who conducted him and all the reſt of the priſoners, except the Prince Artamas, who was not brought unto Sardis until ſome daies after, by reaſon of his wounds: My Maſter then ſeeing at the ſame time both the Prince whom he had offended, and the Princeſs whom he carried away, fell into ſuch an extaſie of ſorrow, that it was long before he was able to anſwer unto what I ſaid unto him, and I believe he had not ſo ſoon given over his ſad thoughts, if Beleſis had not entred; his inquiſitive deſire to know the meeting between the King of Pontus and Mandana was quite cooled, and the ſight of this Princeſs had ſo troubled his ſpirits, that he heard Beleſis, but underſtood him not: I ſhould have thought, Sir, (ſaid I unto him) that ſince your belief of the Princeſs being dead did move you unto ſuch a deſperate ſorrow, the ſight of her alive ſhould move you to a ſenſible conſolation, and yet I perceive you are as much grieved as ever: Do you think Orſanus (ſaid he to me) that I can look upon Mandana as a Captive, and ſee her ſad, but I muſt be ſo alſo? Alas, alas, Orſanus, I am not capable of any joy until I have made ſome reparation for all the injuries I have done her; methinks when I looked upon her, I ſaw her ſigh, and ſaw in her heart that juſt meaſure of hatred towards me by her ſorrows: I perceived in her innocent ſoul ſuch a horrid memory of the Prince Mazares, that I am perſwaded ſhe thinks upon me perpetually, and her hatred of me reigns in her reſentments, according to the meaſure of all freſh diſgraces which befals her: Judge then, Orſanus, whether I can look upon this Divine Princeſs without diſturbed joyes, yet I would not but have ſeen her, and ſeen her ſad; for ſince I ſee her fair eyes ſo full of tears and melancholy, I am become an abſolute Maſter of my Love, and I would releaſe Mandana only for her ſelf, and not for me; whereas if I had not ſeen ſo ſad an object, my virtue is ſo weak, I ſhould perhaps have thought only upon my own intereſt: No, no, imperious Paſſion (ſaid he) thou that prompted me to commit the greateſt ſins of my life, yet thou ſhalt never move me to commit any more, my virtue is now too ſtrong for thee, and thou canſt not vanquiſh me: But what do I ſay? (added he;) Let me not aſcribe that unto Virtue, which appertains only unto Love; and to ſay the very truth, It is my being extreamly in love, that prompts me to act as I intend: Hitherto (ſaid he unto us) I loved Mandana only for my ſelf; but now I will begin to love her for her own ſake only: Indeed I know not whether I am able to love her without any deſires; but I am certain I will love her without any hopes, and by conſequence without offence. Let us then labour my dear Beleſis (ſaid this generous Prince) to releaſe my Princeſs, and for our greater encouragement let us never think of releaſing her for our ſelves, but for a Prince much more happy than we are; and though I know he deſerves all his good fortune, yet perhaps I ſhall have much ado not to murmur; but I am moſt abſolutely reſolved never to moleſt him.

Theſe, Sir, were the thoughts of the illuſtrious Mazares, who ſpent the reſt of that day and all the night following in the extremity of ſorrows: yet not to conſume himſelf in unprofitable ſighs, he began to obſerve very circumſpectly what Guards they kept about the Citadel, and to nouriſh that friendſhip which he had obtained with the Governour, and all with deſign to ſee what ways might be deviſed for the Releaſement of the Princeſs Mandana: The better to procure friends and creatures unto himſelf, he was always ready to do any good office for the meaneſt

Souldier, either unto the King of Lydia, or the King of Pontus, or unto Abradates who loved him very well: He courted Andramites alſo for his favour, whom he obliged preſently after the Princeſſes were brought from Epheſus to Sardis; For reports being ſpred about, either by the Priſoners, or ſome other unknown way, that he had taken you, Sir, as well as the King of Aſſyria and the Prince Artamas, and that at the requeſt of the Princeſs Palmis he had releaſed you, Crœſſus was ſo angry with him, that he was a while in ſome diſgrace: But ſince it appeared clearly that Andramites did it ignorantly, every one lamented him: And my Maſter, who in order to his deſign did endeavour to ingratiate himſelf with all men of Quality which were both powerful and male-contented, did do Andramites very good ſervice in this buſineſs, ſince Crœſſus did harken more unto his Reaſons, than unto any others that were alledged in his behalf, which ſervice did ſo ſenſibly oblige him, that he vowed eternal friendſhip. But though Crœſſus did reſtore Andramites into his former favour, yet there reſted in his heart a ſecret grudge againſt that Prince for ſuſpecting him who had given ſo many teſtimonies of his fidelity. As for the King of Pontus, he was the ſaddeſt man in the World that you, Sir, was not taken; conceiving that if you had been a Priſoner, then the conſequence would have been moſt happy for him; becauſe he could have payed the debt which he owed in reſtoring you, Sir, your liberty, and have ſatisfied himſelf and his paſſion in keeping the Princeſs Mandana.

As things were in this condition, we underſtood that Tegeus ſon unto the Governour of the Citadel was amongſt the Priſoners of War which were taken: And as we underſtood at the ſame time that he was in love with a Lady called Cyleniſe, who was in the Citadel with the Princeſs Palmis, the Prince my Maſter deſired Beleſis, who had a quick wit to find out an opportunity of ſeeing him, and to know of him whether or no he had any intelligence with any in the Citadel, and whether there was no poſſibilities of releaſing his Miſtreſs, and perhaps himſelf. Beleſis undertook this employment, for my Maſter could not employ me (becauſe Feraulus being a Priſoner with Tegeus, did know me) and he would not go himſelf, leſt the King of Aſſyria ſhould ſee him; ſo that Beleſis was the only fit Man for the ſervice, and certainly it was a difficult matter to make a better choice; for he tranſacted the matter admirably well, as you ſhall hear by the ſequel of my Diſcourſe. For my part, I endeavored to tamper and gain ſome Souldiers of the Citadel, not telling them wherein I intended to employ them. Thus every one of us being buſie, though we yet ſaw no great likelyhood of any happy ſucceſs in our enterpriſe, yet we lived in a little leſs anguiſh of mind. In the mean time, ſince the King of Pontus did infinitely eſteem the ſuppoſed Telephanes, he courted him and his friendſhip very much, although he found but cold returns: yet ſince Telephanes durſt not but keep within ſuch terms of civility as were fitting for a man of his Quality, the King of Pontus perceived it not, but loved him exceedingly, and ſo much, that meeting him one day in the King's Garden, as he came out from a Council of War held in the Cloſet of Crœſſus, he began to ſpeak unto him of his misfortunes, and of his Love: But amongſt all the reſt of his ſad diſaſters which ever had happened unto him, he did not grieve ſo much for any thing as that he had ſuch a Rival as he could not chuſe but love, and as he was infinitely obliged unto: For truly (ſaid ſhe unto him) is it not a moſt miſerable condition to be unjuſt and ungrateful unto the greateſt Prince in the World? unto whom I am a debtor both for my life and liberty; unto whom I am beholding for that Scepter which belongs unto me, if I would take it from him: but yet I cannot; my Love to Mandana is ſo violent, that I am not Maſter of my Reaſon. Telephanes hearing the King of Pontus ſpeak thus, did think it beſt to confirm him in his generoſity, ſo that perhaps he might induce him to releaſe Mandana: So that being prompted by the ſpurs of Love which would not let him loſe a minute of time, he repeated unto him all that he had ſo often hinted unto himſelf ſince he repented the carrying away of the Princeſs Mandana. Do you not conſider, Sir, (ſaid he unto him) that every moment you retain the Princeſs whom you love, ſhe hates you the more for it? I know it very well, replied the King of Pontus; but Telephanes, if ever you were in love, I pray you imagine how difficult a thing it is to part with a Princeſs, who as ſoon as ſhe is at liberty will be in the Arms of another? Alas, Telephanes, if you adviſe me to part from her, certainly you were never in love. I wiſh the Gods, Sir, (replyed he, and ſighed, having ſo much diſorder in his Spirit, as it was to ſee he ſpoke as he thought) that what you ſay were true. No, Sir, I know what love is; and I ſpeak as I do, becauſe I know the power of that Paſſion; for if you love, ſhould you not do any thing to procure the love of her you love? Yes doubtleſs (replyed the King of Pontus.) Why then do you take that courſe, replyed Telephanes) which will procure her greater hatred? Becauſe I can do no otherwiſe (replyed he,) for what courſe can I take to avoid her hate? By giving the Princeſs whom you love her liberty (anſwered he,) ſince it is not poſſible but ſhe muſt needs infinitely eſteem you, if your Virtue do ſurmount your paſſion: Then, Sir, would your glory ſpread over all Aſia; all your Subjects would rebel againſt him that uſurps your Kingdom; every Prince would arm in your behalf, and reconquer your Dominions for you: Cyrus himſelf would ſet you upon your Throne: And indeed, Sir, I find ſo much glory in the act I adviſe you unto, that I would do it, though I were ſure to dye the next day. Ah Telephanes, cryed the King of Pontus, alas, you do not know the ſoveraignty of that Paſſion which commands my Soul, although you have been in love; Love is either great or little, either according to the beauty which doth cauſe it, or elſe according to the ſenſibility of that heart which is touched with it, and therefore all the world does not love alike: But, Telephanes, I have a Soul the moſt ſenſible of all men living, and Mandana is the faireſt and moſt raviſhing Beauty upon Earth: Come, Telephanes (ſaid he, and would have carryed him by the arm towards the Cittadel) come and ſee the Juſtification of my Crime in the eyes of that Princeſs whom I adore: for though they are always incenſed when they look upon me, at leaſt very melancholy, yet you ſhall ſee it is impoſſible to be deprived of them and live. Telephanes was much ſurprized at the Propoſition, and ſo much diſordered, that if the King of Pontus had not been blinded with his over-zeal, he would have perceived it: And what deſire ſoever my Maſter had to ſee Mandana, yet he would never ſee her with the King of Pontus; ſo that to excuſe himſelf, Sir, (ſaid he unto him) If there need no more to juſtifie you but the ſight of her Beauty, you ſhall be ſo in my opinion; for I ſaw her when ſhe came firſt to Sardis; and the more ſad I ſaw her, the more I accuſed you: all this would not ſatisfie the King of Pontus, but he ſtill importuned my Maſter to go with him unto the Princeſs.

Pardon me, Orſanus (ſaid Cyrus) if I interrupt you in your Story, to ask you, Whether the King of Pontus did ſee the Princeſs Mandana every day? Ever ſince ſhe came to Sardis (replyed he) none had the liberty to ſee her but himſelf, but truly he is not at all the more happy; for I have heard one of his ſervants ſay, that he never viſits her, but both his Love and Deſpair is augmented, for he finds her always more fair, but more rigid every day than other. Cyrus then asking pardon of the two Princeſſes, Orſanus went on with his Story thus.

The King of Pontus being very importunate with my Maſter to go unto Mandana, did preſs him ſo far, that the poor Telephanes could find but bad Reaſons to excuſe himſelf; but he was forced to leave him, and go into the Cittadel without him, and went by a great Walk of Cypreſs, cloſe by the ditch of that place, and oppoſite to the Garden door. After Mazares ſaw him enter, he walked above two hours in that Walk, thinking upon the adventure which had happened: Ry chance Beleſis and I found him there, and he acquainted us with the paſſage: Afterwards making a ſtand, and looking earneſtly upon us; Muſt it not needs be confeſſed (ſaid he unto us) that Fortune is very ingenious to torment me, ſince I muſt be continually both culpable and miſerable? For I ſee, that to do one good act, as to releaſe the Princeſs whom I took away, is, I muſt commit a hundred bad ones; I muſt, I ſay, diſſemble and deceive them that truſt me; I muſt always ſpeak contrary to truth, I muſt be of one ſide, and ſeem to be of the other, and all this to put the perſon whom I moſt love and adore into the power of a beloved Rival: For my dear friends (ſaid he unto us) with tears in his eyes) to put Mandana into ſuch a condition as ſhe would be, is certain to deliver her unto Cyrus: This I have promiſed unto my ſelf, and this I will either do or die.

Sir, replyed Beleſis, I do not queſtion but to find out ways how to do the firſt of thoſe two, for by ſuborning ſome of Tegeus his Guard, I can ſpeak with him as oft as I pleaſe, and can diſpoſe him to endeavour the utmoſt of my power that the Citadel may be ſurprized: He hath given me a Letter unto an old Officer in it, who, he ſaith, is very covetous, and who indeed I have found very ready to receive gifts, and by conſequence, ready to do what I would have him, ſo I will feed him with gifts. Moreover he told me, that when I had found out ways to releaſe the Princeſſes, and his dear Celenice, he knew how to eſcape his priſon without trouble to any; for he who commands the Guard over the priſoners of War is ſo abſolutely his, that if he deſired it, he could get them all releaſed, except the Prince Artamas, who hath a particular Guard by himſelf: But why is Tegeus ſtill a priſoner (ſaid my Maſter) if it be in his power to have his liberty? Becauſe in the condition he is in (replied Beleſis) he is not ſuſpected, and he hath a deſign to find out ways how to releaſe the Princeſſes, and thereby ingage two great Princes, and alſo to releaſe Celenice for his own ſatisfaction; ſo that I perceive it ſticks but upon two things, to wit, ſome men for the execution of his deſign, which I have promiſed him, and one to acquaint the Princeſſes that their liberty is ready for them, and that they would prepare themſelves ſelves to follow their Releaſers; and this is the effect of that Letter which I have unto the old Officer whereof I ſpoke, that he ſhall let the Princeſſes underſtand how there are preparations for their releaſment: But he told me, that this would be difficult for him to do, and that it would be much more eaſie for him to deliver us a Port, and we to carry them away, than for him to ſpeak unto them: But, Beleſis, replyed Telephanes, why did you not tell me any thing of your negotiation? Becauſe I would have the buſineſs more ripe, (replyed he) and had it not been to comfort you a little, I ſhould not have told you ſo much, becauſe the buſineſs cannot be executed ſo ſoon. Moreover, a Captain of greateſt power in the Citadel, next the Governour, who is an intimate friend unto Tegeus, is not in Sardis, nor will he return this fifteen days. Telephanes perceiving then that Tegeus was Maſter of the Guards, that he had very powerful intelligence in the Citadel, that I had gained many of the Souldiers, and that there wanted nothing but a Convoy, and one to acquaint the Princeſſes, did not think upon any thing, but how to remove theſe two obſtacles. A while after, news being brought to Town that Nyſomolis was taken, and that your Army, Sir, ſtruck a terror into all Lydia, it was requiſite that Telephanes, (to keep himſelf unſuſpected, and to preſerve that advantageous opinion which they conceived of him) ſhould go into the Wars, and ſhew that he deſerved it; he went out therefore with Andramites, and in ſeveral ſmall encounters did notably behave himſelf; yet his mind was, that Beleſis and I ſhould ſtay in Sardis, to keep Tegeus, and all thoſe of his correſpondency in a diſpoſition to execute the enterpriſe when it was ripe, with orders to advertiſe him ſpeedily of it when the time came, to the end, he might find out a pretence for his coming to Sardis. Thus, Sir, did things ſtand at Sardis, whilſt you were taking Towns, and forcing the Lydian Troops to quit their Quarters.

But to ſhorten my diſcourſe as much as I can, upon theſe tearms, Sir, did the enterpriſe concerning Mandana's releaſment ſtand, when after you deſired combat with the King of Pontus, there was an enterview between you and that Prince, when you knew the Prince Mazares amongſt the reſt which came with him. I doubt not. Sir, but you deſire to know why my Maſter would come unto that meeting, for I wondred at it my ſelf, but he would give me no other reaſon, than that ſince you had met him, and ſpoke to him in Paphlagonia, yet then knew him not, he thought that certainly you would not know him in Lydia, and therefore he might boldly, without fear of diſcovery, accompany the King of Pontus, who was very importunate with him, and alſo might ſatisfie his deſires of being preſent at an enterview, wherein he had a ſecret intereſt, which none knew of but himſelf: For indeed he told me in going to that place, where you and the King of Pontus were to ſee each other, that ſometimes he wiſhed that your perſwaſions might not prevail with the King of Pontus, concerning Mandana's releaſement, but that he himſelf might have the glory of it: And ſometimes again, when he ſuſpected the happy ſucceſs of his enterpriſe, he wiſhed the King of Pontus might be moved by your reaſons. However it was, Sir, the Prince Mazares, (who I will now call Telephanes no longer) did go with the King of Pontus, upon reaſons ſo different and oppoſite, that he could never reconcile them himſelf. In the mean while, Sir, I beſeech you do me the honour to confeſs, that there is never any true judgment to be given upon appearances; for indeed I know, Sir, that when you ſaw the Buckler whereon my Maſter repreſented a dead man, and his Motto, teſtifying, that he thought himſelf worthy of it, and knew him who bore it to be the Prince Mazares: Then, I ſay, you were angry, and hated him, and that you expreſſed as much by ſuch viſible marks, both in your words and actions, as any one might ſee the thoughts of your heart; Yet, Sir, this man whom you thus hated, was then thinking upon nothing elſe, but how to render the Princeſs Mandana unto you, and for ever to deprive himſelf of her, and indeed he anſwered you with as much moderation as a man of courage poſſibly could. I ſhall not need to tell you, Sir, what his thoughts were upon that occaſion, for you may eaſily imagine them; but give me leave to tell you, that after (by the prudence of Abradates) this dangerous conference was ended, and that every one took the way unto his own Quarter, the King of Pontus knew no more how to behave himſelf towards Mazares, than Mazares knew what to ſay unto him. After they had marched forty or fifty paces without a word paſſing amongſt them, Abradates came to my Maſter with much civility: Generous Prince (ſaid he unto him) I am ſorry that I muſt render you more reſpect than hitherto I have, for ſince it was your pleaſure to be unknown, I ſuppoſe you had rather have ſtill been Telephanes, than the Prince Mazares, ſince you have made that name ſo famous, that you cannot leave it off unleſs you wrong your ſelf: Sir, replyed he, I have been ever ſo unfortunate under the name of Mazares, that it is no wonder I ſhould deſire to leave it off for a time; but for ought I ſee, the name of Telephanes is not more proſperous unto me.

All this while the King of Pontus ſpoke not a word; but calling to memory how Mazares lived at Sardis, and how he refuſed to go with him unto Mandana, though he importuned him, and conſidered that he had inſinuated himſelf into the friendſhip of the Governour in the Citadel, and with all the men of Quality in Court, he thought that he would at laſt put all theſe into ſome deſign; but not being able to comprehend the myſtery, yet being very deſirous of further ſatisfaction, without any further delay he went to the King of Suſiana, and the Prince Mazares, and looking upon my Maſter; I beſeech you, Sir, ſaid he unto him, though you be my Rival, yet deny me not one favour which I ſhall ask you, as if you were Telephanes my Friend, and my extreamly loved Friend: Although I am your Rival, Sir, (replied the Prince Saces) and by conſequence Telephanes could never be very much your friend, no more than Mazares could; yet let me tell you, that there are very few things which you are not able to obtain of me: For truly, ſince you ſaved the life of the Princeſs Mandana, whom I moſt unfortunately cauſed to periſh, your Prayers muſt needs be very prevalent with me, and indeed, ſo they ſhall be for ever: If ſo, (replied the King of Pontus) tell me what opinion I ought to have of you, for I profeſs unto you I do not know; when I call to mind all I have ſeen you do, I know not where I am, and I yet doubt whether you be Telephanes or the Prince Mazares: Certainly I am the laſt of theſe, replyed he: If you be, ſaid the King of Pontus, why do you engage your ſelf on the ſide of Crœſſus? Why did you conceal your name? And what motives had you to act as you have done? Is it for your ſelf or for me that you have fought? It was neither for you nor my ſelf, (replyed my Maſter, with as much ſubtilty as wit, to diſguiſe the reality of his thoughts) but it was againſt Cyrus: Yet it does not ſeem to me, replyed the King of Pontus, that you ſpoke unto him with any ſuch ſymptoms of hatred as ſhould induce you to fight in favour of one Rival to ruine another. But tell me ingenuouſly, I beſeech you, what ought I to think of your Actions? And how muſt I conſider you? As a Man, (replyed Mazares, and ſighed) that does not pretend unto the leaſt hopes or aims of ever enjoying Mandana; and I would it were the pleaſure of the Gods, that I could inſpire you with the ſame bitter repentance which I have for carrying her away, and cauſing the greateſt parts of all the miſeries which have befallen her. How's this, Mazares, ſaid the King of Pentus, do not you pretend any thing to Mandana, and yet come diſguiſed unto the place where ſhe is? You fight againſt the Forces of the other ſide; you ingratiate your ſelf into friendſhip; you ſeem to be my Friend; and is all this without any pretenſion? No, no, it is impoſſible; you can never perſwade me to believe it. It is not an eaſie matter to imagine, (ſaid the King of Suſiana) what the intention of the Prince Mazares ſhould be: Yet he hath one, (replyed the King of Pontus) of what nature ſoever it be. That which doth moſt trouble me, (added he, in ſpeaking to Abradates) is, that he hath hath uſed all his endeavours and arguments to perſwade me to render the Princeſs Mandana unto Cyrus; and indeed how is it poſſible (added he, and ſpoke to my Maſter) if you yet love her, you ſhould adviſe me to put her into the power of a Prince that adores her, and for whom ſhe ſcorns all thoſe that love her?

To teſtifie unto you, ſaid Mazares, that I have no ſecret intereſt at all, I ſhall give you the ſame counſel now when you know what I am, and conjure you, with all the faculties of my heart and Soul, to give freedom unto the Princeſs Mandana: And I will engage my word, that in acknowledgment of your ſaving her life, and giving her liberty, I will divide the Kingdom which hereafter I ſhall poſſeſs, and give half of it to you, if you cannot reconquer your own. No, no, ſaid the King of Pontus, you wiſh not what you ſay; for if you did, I muſt not look upon you as my Rival, but as my friend. I know not well, replied Mazares, whether I am your Friend or your Rival, my reaſon is ſo rafled: but yet I know that I love Mandana more perfectly than you do, ſince I know how to limit my hopes, and ſeek no further then her ſatisfaction: Did you know how to love ſo well as I, you would be more ſenſible than you are of the ſufferings which the perſon beloved endures: But in the name of the Gods, Sir, let me perſwade you to repent as I do, and let not one of your Rivals have that advantage over you: Moreover, I beſeech you, do not think, that I only ſay I will not pretend any thing unto the Princeſs Mandana, out of any fear to make you my Enemy, as valiant as you are; for I care ſo little for my life, that if I conſidered none but my ſelf, I would ſeek ſuch an occaſion to dye the ſooner and more glorioully: but I do really ſpeak as I think; and it is not more true, that you do love the Princeſs Mandana, than it is true that I pretend nothing unto her; but I wiſh with all my heart and ſoul that you would ſet her at liberty, and put her into the hands of Cyrus, rather than let her continue miſerable ſtill. If what you ſay be true, replied the King of Pontus, of all men living you are the moſt virtuous, or elſe the leaſt amorous; and I ſhould much wonder if it ſhould be the laſt of theſe; and that a corner paſſion ſhould cauſe you to carry away the Princeſs Mandana, and forget your duties to the King of Aſſyria. As the greateſt Crimes, replied my Maſter, do cauſe the greateſt repentance; ſo it is no wonder, if ſince I have committed a double injuſtice, I ſhould be extreamly aſhamed. It is true, replied the King of Pontus, but yet it is very much that one ſhould love, and yet be able to render his Miſtreſs unto a Rival whom ſhe loved Yet truly (ſaid the King of Suſiana) the Prince Mazares does expreſs himſelf ſo emphatically, and with ſuch an ayr, as is apparent that his tongue ſpeaks the very thoughts of his heart; and therefore I conjure you both, whatever both your deſigns are, not to diſunite. For my part, ſaid the King of Pontus, if the Prince Mazares will engage his word, that he will never pretend any thing unto the Princeſs Mandana, and that he has no concealed deſign to carry her away both from Cyrus and my ſelf, I ſhall carry my ſelf towards him as if he were not my Rival. Abradates then asked Mazares whether he would engage himſelf unto ſuch Conditions as the King of Pontus deſired? ſince he himſelf profeſſed he had no pretenſions unto Mandana. Whilſt this Prince was ſpeaking thus unto him, Mazares did conſult with his mind upon the matter; and finding that if he ſhould promiſe what was required, yet he did not thereby engage himſelf unto any thing which was contrary to his deſign, ſince his intentions were not to carry away the Princeſs Mandana for himſelf, therefore he conſented unto thoſe Conditions, though with much repugnancy; and I verily believe, that if he had not certainly known the death of the King of Pontus would not have furthered the liberty of Mandana, in lieu of making this promiſe, he would have decided the controverſie by his Sword, and fought with this Prince.

Thus, Sir, did this conference paſs; after which, Abradates acquainting Crœſſus with my Maſter's condition when he came to Sardis, and relating all paſſages as much in my Maſter's advantage as I could, Crœſſus had not ſo many jealouſies in his Soul as the King of Pontus had, who after did circumſpectly obſerve all my Maſter's actions, ſo that we had much ado to hold thoſe intelligences which formerly we did without diſcovery. In the mean while, the Prince Mazares had ſuch an extream abhorrence of all diſſimulations, that if Beleſis and I had not perſwaded him that the glory of an enterpriſe of this nature, did conſiſt only in the execution, and not in the means by which it was concealed; and that the Conſpirators, the more they diſſemble in a juſt cauſe, the more commendations they deſerve: I think, that rather than he would have done as he did to conceal his deſign, he would have undertaken a more violent reſolution. After this, Sir, you know how high diſcontents were grown amongſt all the Princes, concerning an exchange of Prince Artamas; and the Queen, before whom I ſpeak; and how Andramites, and the Prince Myrſiles took the King of Suſiana's part: But you do not know, Sir, how my Maſter making uſe of theſe diviſions, did ſecretly and frequently viſit the generous Abradates and Andramites, and ſo wrought upon their Spirits, as they promiſed him, that if matters were further exaſperated, they would attempt nothing without him; but yet my Maſter ſtill kept his deſign cloſe unto himſelf. After this, Sir, the Truce being publiſhed, the Captain who was friend unto Tegeus, being returned unto the Cittadel, my Maſter did make a ſhew as if he were not well, to the end he might the more conveniently endeavour to ſpeak with Mandana, or at leaſt with Marteſia; and we did negotiate the buſineſs ſo happily, that by the aſſiſtance of this friend unto Tegeus, who had the Guard of the Chamber where the Princeſſes did lye, we had permittance to enter into the Cittadel in the night, and he promiſed to help me to the ſpeech of Marteſia. As I knew that Marteſia had a very friendly opinion of me ever ſince I was her guide in bringing her to Sinope, ſo I hoped to effect my buſineſs very well; but do what I could, I could not perſwade my Maſter to ſtay behind, for he thought that I could not ſo well ggravate his bitter repentance, as himſelf could do; ſo that I was forced to ſubmit unto his deſires, and I had ſo ordered the buſineſs, that juſt at nine of the Clock, the friend of Tegeus would let my Maſter and me enter, undiſcovered by any; and ſo bringing us by a back pair of ſtairs into his own Chamber, he went unto Mandana's, where finding Marteſia, he deſired her that ſhe would be pleaſed to let him have an hours diſcourſe with her; ſo that Marteſia, being as complaiſant as any judicious perſon would be unto one that kept them priſoners, conſented; and paſſing from the Chamber of her Miſtreſs unto her own, which was very near, the Captain came to us, and according to the plot between my Maſter and my ſelf, I only went unto Marteſia, to the end I might the better deceive her, as afterwards I ſhall tell you; for we knew very well, that the Princeſs Mandana did not think my Maſter to be alive, or that he was at Sardis, becauſe Crœſſus and the King of Pontus had given expreſs charge; that no news whatſoever ſhould be carried unto the Princeſſes, and therefore we feared not that Mandana could know of his being there.

Then did this Captain conduct me to Marteſia's Chamber, and left me there; ſhe no ſooner ſaw me, but ſhe broke out into a hundred expreſſions of joy and tenderneſs. Ah Orſanus (ſaid ſhe unto me) Can you not carry me once again to Sinope, and bring the Princeſs with me? Yes ſweet Marteſia (ſaid I unto her) that I can, and I came hither purpoſely to make the Propoſition unto you. Alas, replied ſhe, I ſee ſo little poſſibility in it, that I fear they will ſooner keep you a priſoner with us, than you can ſet us at ſo much liberty; and therefore to conſume no time in telling me any pleaſing lies, I pray tell me, how the ſtate of things in general does ſtand? For we know nothing here but what pleaſeth the King of Pontus, who will tell us nothing but that he is in Love; therefore pray tell how the illuſtrious Cyrus does? And where is his Army? Tell me whether Artamas be recovered of his wounds? For the Princeſs of Lydia is much grieved for him, and if it were not too much to ask you at once, you would do me a pleaſure in telling me what is become of poor Feraulas? Marteſia having put all theſe queſtions unto me, I ſatisfied her curioſity in them all; after which, I aſſumed the diſcourſe wherewith I began, and aſſured her confidently, that I knew of an infallible way to releaſe the Princeſſes, and to put Mandana into the hands of Cyrus: ſo that ſhe believed there was ſome truth in my words: But ſhe told me, that as for the Princeſs Palmis ſhe would never go out of priſon, but by the hand of the King her Father, eſpecially ſince the Prince Artamas would remain a priſoner of War; and leſt this ſhould keep the Princeſs Mandana from going out, I pray tell me (ſaid ſhe unto me) What are the beſt courſes to be taken; Firſt it is requiſite, ſaid I unto her, that I have the honour to ſee the Princeſs; and ſecondly, the ſame honour is deſired for him, that is the chief actor in the enterpriſe, who is now in the Captains Chamber, who brought me hither, and who deſires to receive his orders from her own mouth: There is no difficulty in all this (replied Marteſia) provided you will have a little patience, for I believe the Princeſs of Lydia will leave her preſently: But in the interim (ſaid ſhe) I pray tell me who is this generous Liberator? How can he get us out from hence? And when ſhall it be? For I wiſh it were this very hour, if it were poſſible: You ſhall know the two firſt of your queſtions in good time (replied I) and as for getting you out from hence, it ſhall be within this three days, if the Princeſs pleaſe: If ſhe pleaſe (replied ſhe) Ah Orſanus, I warrant you it will pleaſe her, ſince though the King of Pontus be as reſpective to her as he is unjuſt, I am confident ſhe would do any thing to get out of his power. In the mean time, ſaid ſhe, that we may the ſooner ſee whether the Princeſs of Lydia be retired, and the ſooner ſee our Deliverer, I pray you follow me.

In ſaying ſo, ſhe carried me unto a little Cloſet over againſt the Princeſs Chamber, but ſo near it; and the partitions ſo full of crannies (for you muſt know the places of War are not built like Palaces) that any thing might be heard which was ſpoken. Being then in this place where we could hear all the diſcouſe which paſſed between the two Princeſſes, we began to hearken, in hopes they would end their diſcourſe quickly, and preſently I heard a voice which was unknown to me, and which Marteſia ſaid was the Princeſs Palmis, who complained extreamly againſt the malignity of her Fortune: For my part, replied the Princeſs Mandana, I hardly dare complain againſt mine; for ſince the conformity which is in our misfortunes did make you love me, and in ſome ſort cauſed the friendſhip which is between the Prince Artamas, and the illuſtrious Cyrus, methinks I ought to endure it patiently: Ah, Madam, ſaid the Princeſs Palmis, I beſeech you do not give ſo bad a foundation unto the affection which I bear you, and ſeek not for that in the ſuitableneſs of our miſeries, which cannot be found any where but in your rare merits; and if you pleaſe to look a little nearer into things, you will find a notable difference between the misfortunes of Cyrus, and thoſe of Artamas, and alſo between yours and mine: Yet in many things they reſemble very much, replied Mandana, for as one hath been expoſed to many dangers, ſo hath the other; as one changed his own name for that of Artamenes, the other aſſumed the name of Cleander in lieu of his own, both of them are brave and gallant, both of them have been Conquerours, both of them in Love, and if there be any difference, it is in that the Prince Artamas loved by reaſon, and Cyrus only by inclination: Had you changed the name of Artamas for Cyrus, ſaid the Princeſs Palmis, your diſcourſe had been juſt: I beſeech you let me end it (ſaid the Princeſs Mandana) and ſee whether I have not reaſon to attribute unto the likeneſs of our miſeries, the pity which you have of mine: Beſides all that I ſaid before, theſe two Princes have had the favour and affection of theſe two Kings whom they ſerved, they have both of them been impriſoned by them, for whom they have hazarded their lives a thouſand times; as Crœſſus was diſpleaſed with you, becauſe you favoured Cleander; ſo Ciaxares hated me, becauſe I eſteemed Artamenes: Indeed what ſhould I ſay? Cyrus and Artamas brought us hither; ther; Have they not perſecuted you as well as me? And as Adraſtus and Arteſilias dyed for you, did not the unfortunate Mazares periſh for me? Are we not now both Priſoners together? And muſt it not needs be confeſſed, that ſince you cannot love me for any reſemblance of thoſe admirable qualities which are in you, and not in me, Heaven has a deſign to make you love me, becauſe I reſemble you in your misfortunes: To ſhew you (replied the Princeſs Palmis) that the Love I bear you proceeds from nothing but your merits, and not at all from any reſemblances of our adventures, I muſt needs let you ſee that they are infinitely different; ſo that in reaſon it cannot be ſaid they have any reſemblance, and by conſequence you ought not to believe, that the affection I bear you hath any ſuch cauſe: The adventures of Cyrus and Artamas are much different; for when Cyrus was only Artamenes, he knew that he was Cyrus, and was not ignorant of his own Quality: whereas on the contrary, the unfortunate Cleander did not ſo much as know who himſelf was, but thought himſelf ſo far below my Quality, that he did condemn his Love no leſs than I ſhould if I had then known it: Artamenes had nothing elſe to make his condition known to be equal unto yours, but only to ſay he was Cyrus: But Cleander for a long while durſt not ſo much as wiſh to know who he was, leſt his condition ſhould prove diſadvantageous unto him, if it were known: Theſe falſe Names under which both of them did paſs was given them variouſly, for Cyrus took the Name of Artamenes upon him to diſguiſe himſelf; and Artamas not knowing his true Name, received that of Cleander from Thimettes, who gave it him, not thinking he ſhould ever leave it: 'Tis very true, both of them are moſt gallant men, and both Conquerours, but with a notable difference, ſince Fortune hath almoſt confined the Victories of Artamas to the Kingdom of his Father, whilſt ſhe hath ſtretched the Conqueſts of Cyrus over all Aſia. The original of their Paſſions is alſo as different as the merit of thoſe two perſons who cauſed them:

The priſons alſo in which both of them were, are very unlike, and proceeded from ſeveral cauſes: The jealouſie and wickedneſs of Arteſilas cauſed the Impriſonment of Cleander; and the prejudicate opinion of Ciaxares was the cauſe of Artamenes his Impriſonment; though I muſt needs confeſs there was equal injuſtice in them both. Moreover, the hatred which Ciaxares bore unto Cyrus, proceeded only from a miſunderſtanding of the Menaces of the Gods; but the King my Father hated Artamas becauſe he thought I loved him, and by conſequence the cauſe of his hatred cannot ceaſe, as the cauſe of Ciaxares his hatred did. Moreover, you cannot in reaſon ſay, there was any equality in their laſt impriſonment, ſince that of Cyrus laſted not above an hour at moſt, whereas that of Artamas laſts yet, and he was dangerouſly wounded beſides: But I beſeech you, let us cloſe up all theſe reſemblances which we find in our fortunes in this one, which is, our Impriſonment: Is there not a vaſt difference between us? for you know there are two hundred thouſand men in Arms for your Liberty: That the moſt valiant Prince upon Earth, and the greateſt Captain commands this Army, and fights only for you: Moreover, it is juſt in you to wiſh him Victory, and to make prayers unto Heaven for it: But as for me, I am not only deprived of all hopes of relief, but of all other conſolations, except your friendſhip, Madam, which truly is a great one: For truly I muſt not deſire my Liberty, ſince it cannot be but by the Conqueſt of the King my Father, by the loſs of his Crown, and by his being a Slave: all which will be, if Cyrus be a Conqueror; and if he be not, then Prince Artamas will periſh in Priſon, and I dye where I am: ſo that ſince I cannot deſire any thing which would be advantagious to me, I muſt endure my miſeries, and never wiſh for an end. After this, I beſeech you, judge whether I am at all a debtor unto my misfortunes for your affection, but rather for your pity. However it be, replyed Mandana, I am confident, that the Gods have a deſign Prince Artamas ſhall love and do Cyrus good ſervice, and that Cyrus ſhall protect and comfort Artamas. After this, theſe two Priſoner Princeſſes ſpoke much more unto each other which I could not underſtand, becauſe Marteſia hindered me, and I had much ado to get her let me hear as much as I have related to you, for ſhe was continually asking me queſtions, unto which I returned ſhort anſwers, and ſometimes only with my head; becauſe, ſince ſhe named my Maſter once, I deſired to hear whether ſhe would name him any more: But if I did not certainly know that the Prince Mazares my Maſter would never pretend any more unto the Princeſs Mandana, I ſhould not have been ſo perfidious unto him, as to acquaint the illuſtrious Cyrus with all thoſe advantageous expreſſions which ſhe uſed towards him.

But to return unto my Diſcourſe, Be pleaſed to know, Madam, that at laſt the Princeſs of Lydia left Mandana, and went unto her Chamber, which was ſeparated from hers only by a withdrawing Room which was common to them both. She was no ſooner gone, than knowing there was none with her but Arianita, I went unto my Maſter to bring him unto Mandana's Chamber; the Captain who let us enter into the Cittadel brought us to the door, and there left us, to the end he might take more care that none ſhould diſcover us. As Marteſia prepared the Princeſs to receive a man who would releaſe her, and told her that it was I who would conduct him, ſhe wondered who it ſhould be that would be ſo generous as to be her Deliverer: And I knew afterwards by Marteſia, ſhe did think it no other than the illuſtrious Cyrus: So that her extraordinary fears, in thinking what dangers he expoſed himſelf unto for her ſake, did cool all her joys when ſhe thought upon her hop'd-for Releaſement. Then, Madam, you may eaſily imagine how infinitely the Princeſs was amazed, when in lieu of ſeeing the illuſtrious Cyrus enter, ſhe ſaw the unfortunate Prince Mazares caſting himſelf at her feet, whom ſhe imagined to be dead: She turned haſtily towards Marteſia, to ask her, whether what ſhe ſaw was real?

and if it was, why ſhe did deceive her? Marteſia, who was no leſs amazed than the Princeſs, looked upon me with ſo much Wonder, that ſhe could not ask me why I diſſembled with her? In the mean while, my Maſter, who was upon his knees before the Princeſs, he began to ſpeak thus unto her: You ſee here at your feet, Madam, a man that is riſen from the dead; but riſen as innocent as he was culpable before your ſhipwrack; Therefore, I beſeech you, do not treat me as I deſerved when I was ſo unjuſt as to carry you away, ſince I am not the ſame man now as I was then. I do not beg of you, Madam, to let me love and adore you; for I am moſt fully reſolved in the very reality of my heart, never to have any ſuch thought as long as I live: All the whole ſum of my Petition is, that you would be pleaſed to pardon my Crime, and give me leave to leſſen it a little, by procuring you that Liberty which I took from you. Ah Mazares, ſaid the Princeſs, I will not be deluded at Sardis as I was at Sinope, and I have no ſuch thoughts of you at this preſent as I had at that time. Yet I am now leſs worthy of your friendſhip (replied he) than ever I was; for truly, Madam, when I was at Babylon, I did nothing but ſtrive againſt that Paſſion which you had created in me: and truly though I did reſiſt it with all my force, yet it was far too weak; for I was overcome by this imperious Paſſion; all the Virtue I had ſubmitted unto it: it expelled all Generoſity and Reaſon out of my Soul; and at Sinope forced me to commit the moſt unjuſt act that ever was: I carried you away, Madam; I deceived you, and carried you away; in telling you that I would deliver you into whoſe hands ſoever you pleaſed: But, my divine Princeſs, I was not long culpable, ſince my repentance was almoſt as ſoon as the Crime was committed; and the Command which I gave unto the Pilot to ſteer his courſe towards Sinope, was that which put us in a periſhing condition. No, no, Mazares, ſaid the Princeſs, you can never perſwade me to truſt you, ſince you ſo extreamly deceived me: For to let you ſee how horrid your Crime ſeems in my eye, I do profeſs, that, excepting Cyrus, I will not truſt any man upon Earth: I eſteemed you as much as I could eſteem any, and more than that, I loved you as well as I could do my Brother: Then I pray you judge, whether I have not reaſon to paſs from one extremity unto another, ſince you have ſo cunningly deceived me, and have cauſed ſo many miſeries to fall upon me. Truly, Mazares, I do admire at the pleaſure of the Gods in ſaving your life, ſince you have not only been the cauſe of my miſeries, but of all Aſia, which had not been up in Arms if you had not carried me away. Ceaſe, Madam, (replied this ſad Prince) ceaſe I beſeech you, from any further aggravations of my Crime, ſince I ſee how great it is; for without the conſideration of the miſeries of others, I need think upon none but what I have cauſed unto you: But, Madam, my repentance is ſo ſharp, that if you did but know the bitterneſs of it, I believe you would pity me; and though it be not proportionable to the greatneſs of my Crime, yet I cannot impoſe a ſharper pennance upon my ſelf, than that I ſhould my ſelf put you into the hands of Cyrus, that happy Rival, whom the Gods do favour in ſo high a manner, that his very Rivals themſelves are ready to releaſe unto him that Princeſs whom they love as well as he doth: For this, Madam, I have quitted my Deſart, unto which I had confined my ſelf: To this end I came into Lydia, under a diſguiſed Name; and ~~it is~~ my real reſolution to get you out of Priſon: And the Gods have ſo far ſmiled upon my Project, that if you will, Madam, you ſhall be releaſed from hence, and carried into the Camp of Cyrus.

As ſoon as Mazares had ſpoke theſe words, he ſighed ſo ſeriouſly, and in ſuch earneſt manner, as one might ſee his repentanee was real: but yet for all that, the Princeſs Mandana could not believe it; yet ſometimes the feeling expreſſions of this ſorrowful Prince would ſomething ſtagger her thoughts, but then immediately after, diffidence would wholly ſeize upon her heart, and ſhe could not poſſibly believe, that the deſign of Prince Mazares was really to ſet her at liberty: She perceived he had a great and powerful intelligence in the Cittadel, and ſhe was well enough perſwaded, that he who could ſo cunningly come in, could as well get out: But her belief told her at the ſame time, that his end was to carry her away the ſecond time, and not really to releaſe her, ſo that all his perſwaſive arguments could not move her, but ſhe reſolutely told him, ſhe had rather ſtay where ſhe was a priſoner ſtill, than to be fooled in following him: Alas, Madam (ſaid he unto her) Will you not believe me when I proteſt repentance, and to expiate my crime, would ſet you at liberty? I muſt ingenuouſly confeſs, that I have not power to ſay I do not love: And, Madam, I am reſolved not to make a mixture of any lyes and truths together, but I do moſt ſolemnly proteſt, in the preſence of thoſe Gods which muſt make all my projects proſperous, that this paſſion is without the leaſt ſpark of any hope, or any pretenſion unto you in the world: I deſire no more but a pardon of my crime, and to ſet you at liberty, if it be obtained, I ſhall not murmur at my death: It is but juſt that this tormenting paſſion be ſtill in my ſoul, as a more ſevere penance for my fault, and ſo be pleaſed to look upon it, and queſtionleſs you will allow it, eſpecially conſidering that I ſue for no other recompence: However, be not ſo prepoſterouſly reſolute, as to believe me when I told a prejudicial lye, and not to believe me when I tell you a moſt real truth, which ſhall ſet you at liberty: No, no, Mazares, ſaid the Princeſs, neither you nor any elſe ſhall deceive me twice: I truſted you before, becauſe I thought you incapable of deceiving me, but ſince you have deceived me once, I will never truſt you again: Do not think, Madam, replyed he, that it is now poſſible I ſhould have any ill deſign upon you: How, if I had any ſuch? How could I put it into act? 'Tis true, I can get you out of priſon, becauſe the Camp of Cyrus is near, and a ſafe place of retreat: But ſhould I have any deſign to carry you for any ends of my own, how is it poſſible I ſhould effect it? Sardis would be no ſafety to hide you in it, all the Country is full of Forces belonging unto Cyrus, what therefore could I do with you? I know not, ſaid ſhe, neither where Cyrus is, or what courſe you would take, but I know very well I cannot truſt you: Why, Madam, ſaid he unto her, Will you refuſe your liberty, becauſe it is offered by a Prince whom you do not love? The reaſon why I love him not (replyed ſhe) is becauſe I do not believe he has any intention to releaſe me, and deſigns no further than to make me change my Chains; and truly I had rather (ſince I think you only intend to remove me from priſon to priſon) be with the Princeſs of Lydia than with you!

To make make it apparent, Madam, ſaid he, That I have no ends of my own in it, be pleaſed to know, that my deſign is not only to releaſe you, but the Princeſs Palmis alſo, and that it is by a devoted ſervant unto a Woman of hers that I have this intelligence in this Citadel; and therefore, Madam, you need not doubt the ſincerity of my intentions; I doubt all, replyed ſhe; For I had rather ſuſpect your words, than that they ſhould deceive me again: But, Orſanus, (ſaid ſhe, and turned towards me) I did not think it poſſible that you ſhould ſecond your Maſter in ſuch a piece of ſervice as this, and I have always known ſo much virtue in your mind, that I rather will think he deludes you, than that you have any intentions to delude me, as he hath: Madam, replied I, give me leave to aſſure you, that the Prince Mazares hath no intentions to deceive you.

Alas, Orſanus (ſaid ſhe) it ſeems you are not ſo wiſe as as I am, if you think ſo: Truly Madam (ſaid Marteſia, ſpeaking to the Princeſs) Since Orſanus ſays it, methinks credit ought to be given to his words, becauſe he is not in Love, and by conſequence more to be believed than the Prince Mazares: To teſtifie unto you, Madam (ſaid my Maſter, ſpeaking to Mandana)

Mandana) I will remain in your Priſon after you are gone out, and an illuſtrious friend, who I met with in my ſolitude, ſhall conduct you to the moſt happy Cyrus, whilſt I ſtay here, and patiently endure the death which Crœſſus ſhall give me; and I promiſe you to accept it with much joy, ſo you will pleaſe to promiſe me a favourable memory: And I will do more than that alſo, if you pleaſe (ſaid he, being tranſported with the violence of his Love and deſpair, to ſee ſhe would not yet believe him) for I will kill my ſelf before you go out of that priſon which I will open unto you: If I could believe what you ſpeak, (replied the Princeſs) I ſhould tell you, that your death in that manner would extreamly trouble me, but in truth I cannot believe you: However, I beſeech you acknowledge thus much at the leaſt, that if hereafter you once believe me, you will then leſſen your hatred towards me: I ſhall do more than that, ſaid ſhe, For if ever I once believe you, I ſhall be able to forget what's paſt, and to pardon you, and I think liberty ſo ſweet, and your act ſo generous, that I ſhould afford you my eſteem and friendſhip: But the worſt is, I neither do nor can truſt you; and looking upon you as a Prince, who would deceive me once more, I look upon you with anger and hatred. Was ever miſery comparable to mine? (cried he out.) You tell that you would pardon me, and afford me your friendſhip, if what I ſpeak were true; and yet you are ſo unjuſt, as to look upon me with anger and hatred, though truth it ſelf is not truer, than that I would releaſe you: I beſeech you tell me what I ſhould do to perſwade you of this truth, and to lay open my heart unto you: I know not, replied ſhe, but I am ſure I cannot believe what you ſay; therefore go and move thoſe that let you in, to let you out preſently, and content your ſelf that I am ſo generous as not to ruine you, by advertiſing the Guards who I am ſure you have not corrupted, that you are here: Do not think that the reaſon why I do it not, is becauſe I make any doubts whether what you ſay be true or falſe; but my reaſon is, becauſe I am not cruel, and becauſe your firſt ſervices were ſo conſiderable, that I will not be the cauſe of your death: For Heavens ſake, Madam, (ſaid he unto her, with great trouble in his looks) do not drive me to deſpair, but believe me: For Heavens ſake, replied ſhe, trouble me no more, but leave me in quietneſs: I beſeech you, dear Marteſia (ſaid this Prince) perſwade your illuſtrious Miſtreſs to credit my words: Sir, (replyed the wiſe Lady) I profeſs unto you, that for my part, I do believe you, but truly I dare not adviſe the Princeſs to do ſo, becauſe it is not fitting for me to give her counſel in any thing: What ſhall I do then? (replyed he paſſionately) Or indeed what can I do but dye? For ſince I quitted my ſolitary life only to deliver you (ſaid he to Mandana) and ſo to obtain my pardon, and am not able to obtain either, I will never look for any thing further but death, and I will ſeek for it upon all occaſions, in all places, where there is any poſſibility of finding it: Indeed, Madam, ſince you cannot endure me, neither as your Lover, nor as your Friend, nor I am able to make you believe my repentance, I muſt and will find out ſuch dangers, as ſhall certainly rid you for ever from the ſight of that Prince whom you hate, and from whoſe hand you will not receive your liberty.

The Princeſs hearing my Maſter ſpeak ſo violently, did believe this peril and danger whereof he ſpoke, was, that he would fight with the illuſtrious Cyrus; ſo that ſhe expreſſed ſome fears that he would make ſome attempts againſt this Prince: He no ſooner underſtood her meaning, but not giving her time to expreſs her thoughts: I underſtand you, Madam, ſaid he unto her, I underſtand you very well: You would have Cyrus have the advantage of me, becauſe you would not have me fight with him: But never fear, Madam, that I will ever entertain any ſuch thoughts againſt him, I owe more reſpect unto you than ſo, and I am ſo obliged unto that Prince, as I cannot do it with honour: Therefore, Madam, if it be my fortune to dye by the hand of the Illuſtrious Cyrus, he muſt ſeek me out, and kill me without any defending of my ſelf, which I know is infinitely below him. Theſe, Madam, are the thoughts of him, whom you think would deceive you: And I beſeech you believe, that when I meet Cyrus, I ſhall beg my death from his hand, as a recompence for that ſervice which I would have done you, as being the only remedy againſt all thoſe evils which I indure: And when all this is done, Madam, will you hate Mazares both alive and dead? Whil'ſt this Prince was ſpeaking thus, the Princeſs looked ſeriouſly upon him; and ſometimes I was in hope his perſwaſions had wrought upon her, but yet they did not; yet notwithſtanding ſhe uſed ſuch ſweet expreſſions to him, after he had declared himſelf concerning Cyrus, that if the conference had laſted a little longer, I know not whether this virtuous Princeſs had not been overcome.

But the Captain who let us enter, coming to tell us that it was full time to go out of the Cittadel, a neceſſity compelled us to retire, without any further perſwaſions upon the Princeſs Mandana, and with deep ſorrows, that ſo great an enterprize ſo near execution ſhould be uneffected: And when my Maſter came to his own Lodging, and related the ſtory unto Beleſis, I could not chuſe but admire at the greatneſs of his Paſſion, by the horrour of his deſpair: Death and nothing elſe was his thoughts; he could not imagine why he ſhould or how he could live: ſo that Beleſis and I had much ado to moderate the fury which he conceived againſt himſelf.

My greateſt admiration was, that the ſight of Mandana ſhould more augment his repentance, and confirm him in his generous deſign: The Guards upon the Princeſs; her Lodgings, and a thouſand other circumſtances, which he obſerved at his entrance, and coming out of the Cittadel, though it was very dark, were ſo many additions to his ſorrows: 'Tis I, would he ſay, only I that am the fatal cauſe of her Impriſonment, that ſhe meets with all theſe horrid objects, and that ſhe enjoys not a minutes reſt; and ſhe hath rightly proportioned her hatred, according to thoſe miſeries which I have cauſed upon her; for I think it is impoſſible to be hated more than ſhe does me; if ſhe did not, ſhe would never chuſe an Impriſonment under a Prince who hath a potent Army to oppoſe Cyrus, rather than hazard her ſelf upon that danger which ſhe fears: Certainly ſhe hates me more than ſhe doth the King of Pontus; for if ſhe did not, though I ſhould carry her away the ſecond time, yet it were an eaſier matter for Cyrus to force her out of my hands, than from two Princes who have all Aſia engaged in their Intereſts: But queſtionleſs it is the Will of the Gods, that ſhe will not only not love me, but infinitely hate me: Yet for all this, I underſtand, or think I underſtand (for my reaſon is ſo ravelled, that I dare not credit my own intellectuals) that if Mandana could believe me really penitent, ſhe would then eſteem me, and be my real friend: For Heavens ſake (ſaid he) go to Marteſia once more, and ſolicit her to do more than I my ſelf can: Bid her perſwade her incomparable Miſtreſs, not to refuſe her Liberty, and let her contrive what ſecurity I ſhall give her, that my only end is her Releaſement: The matter requires haſte; for if our enterprize be not executed while the Treaty laſts, it will never be effected, ſince if it do break off, I muſt go into the Army, and conſequently cannot ſtay here unleſs ſuſpected: The counterfeiting my ſelf to be not well at this time, that I may have more liberty to negotiate the buſineſs, does already begin to perplex the King of Pontus; therefore, dear Orſanus, try once more what may be done, that our enterprize may not be fruſtrate.

You may imagine, that I was not able to deny ſuch a requeſt unto a Prince who had ſo much prevalency with me, and who required nothing that was unjuſt: But for a more colourable pretence of the buſineſs, I took the Letter which Beleſis was to deliver unto Celeniſe, and intended to deſire Marteſia to deliver it unto her: ſo that ſoliciting the Captain who was of our Intelligence, he permitted me the next night to enter into the Cittadel, and helped me to the ſpeech of Marteſia, unto whom I uſed my beſt arguments, that ſhe would let the Princeſs know how much ſhe did prejudice her ſelf in refuſing her Liberty: and indeed I was ſo importunate with her, that I am confident ſhe believed me: but as for the Princeſs, ſhe told me, that ſhe was very miſtruſtful ſtill. Afterwards, when I told her I had a Letter for Celeniſe, ſhe replied upon me, that it would be to no purpoſe, becauſe the Princeſs Palmis would certainly never go out of Priſon but by the hand of her Father; and that Celeniſe would never leave her Miſtreſs; yet I beſeeched her to ſend for her, to the end I might give her Tegeus his Letter, which Marteſia did. When ſhe came, ſhe told me with tears in her eyes, that ſhe was much beholding unto Tegeus, but ſhe could not perſwade her Miſtreſs to go out of the Cittadel, nor could ſhe poſſibly leave her. When I found that the aſſiſtance of theſe two Ladies, Marteſia and Celeniſe, were ineffectual: I was ſo urgent with Marteſia to let me ſpeak unto the Princeſs Mandana once more, that at laſt ſhe permitted me; and I followed her into her Camber, after ſhe had asked leave, and aſſured her Mazares was not there: But all my Rhetorical Reaſons were not able to raiſe one grain of credit unto what I deſired ſhe ſhould believe; all that I could poſſibly obtain from her, was, that I brought her to make a doubt upon the matter, which ſhe never did till this laſt time: yet ſince ſhe would not hazard her going out upon doubtful terms, it did not alter her reſolution.

Madam (ſaid I then unto her) ſuppoſe that what I ſay be true, were it not a piece of Injuſtice in you not to accept of his intentions to repair the fault which he hath committed? For my part, Madam, methinks it is not ſuitable to your uſual goodneſs; for what would you have my Maſter do? I know his very thoughts; and do aſſure you, his coming unto Crœſſus was only with a deſign of releaſing you; and that his only aims in fighing for him, was only to ſet you at Liberty: But you, Madam, will not accept of that Liberty which he offers you; he will not ſtay any longer on that ſide which is not yours, nor dare he go on to the ſide of Cyrus, unleſs he carry you with him: What then, Madam, ſhould he do? I beſeech you ſuffer not ſo great a Prince to periſh, as queſtionleſs he will, unleſs you afford him ſome hopes of being juſtified in your opinion, and believe that his Virtue tranſcends his Love, and his Repentance his Crime.

Truly, Madam, I am in more then half a mind to tell you, that I will never go from this place, until my humble prayers have obtained what I deſire in my Maſters behalf. Orſanus, ſaid ſhe unto me, your expreſſions do both trouble and affright me; for how can I think you ſpeak ſincerely? and yet how can I think you can deceive me? and how can I ever imagine that a Prince, who was ſo unjuſt as to carry me away, ſhould afterwards be ſo generous as to repair his faults? yet to ſpeak ſincerely unto you, I begin to think it not impoſſible: But my greateſt difficulty is, that I cannot credit the Prince Mazares: I perceive there is a way to get out of Priſon, but all perſwaſions cannot move me to follow it: and the truth is, the act of the Prince Mazares, and the act of the King of Pontus, makes me to ſuſpect every thing, and I dare not truſt any thing; therefore I pray you importune me no more unto a thing which I cannot do.

What then will become of my Maſter (ſaid I unto her) if you be not pleaſed to ſhew him a way how he may manifeſt it unto you, that his real intentions are to releaſe you? I beſeech you, Madam, think upon it, and do not procure unto your ſelf hereafter the name of a murtherer of the moſt virtuous Prince upon Earth. To ſhew you, Orſanus, ſaid ſhe unto me, that I will not deny you every thing, but that I ſhould be glad the Prince Mazares had ſome opportunities to expreſs ſome convincing teſtimonies of his real penitency, and an infallible way to recover my eſteem and friendſhip, tell him, that I would have him go and fight for my liberty, in fighting for Cyrus, which if he do, I ſhall then believe that his real intention was to releaſe me. But, Madam, ſaid I unto her, Cyrus perhaps will not give my Maſter any good entertainment. Queſtionleſs he will receive him as his Friend, replyed Mandana, if he be perſwaded that his deſign was to releaſe me. To make a better way for his acceptance, I will write a Letter unto Cyrus, which Mazares ſhall give him, which ſhall teſtifie how I eſteem him if he become as virtuous as formerly he was. Then did I accept of her offer; not only becauſe I had a great deſire my Maſter ſhould be out of Sardis, leſt our Plot ſhould be diſcovered by Crœſſus, or the King of Pontus; but alſo becauſe I conceived it would be an infinite advantage unto my Maſter, if he were once the Friend of the illuſtrious Cyrus. In concluſion, Madam, this great Princeſs did write her Letter unto Cyrus, and told me in good earneſt, that if Mazares took this courſe, ſhe would think his aims were honeſt, and ſhe would let him have her eſteem and friendſhip; ſo that in this aſſurance I left her: yet I did attempt a little further in my Maſter's behalf: but do what Marteſia and I could, this was all we could obtain. After this, I went unto my Maſter, who expected me with great impatience, though he had no hopes in the World of my effecting any thing; and truly it was happy his hope was ſo low, for it induced him to accept of this Propoſition which the Princeſs made with better reſentments: and when I aſſured him that if he took this courſe, the Princeſs would then freely pardon him, and admit him into her eſteem, he could not chuſe but rejoyce: yet was he ſorry to ſee he could not obtain any thing from the Princeſs, but by turning on the other ſide, without any colourable pretence: and he made a doubt, whether or no he ſhould deliver this Letter unto Cyrus, but after a ſtrong conteſt of two hours with his own heart, his Virtue did at laſt overcome his Paſſion : and after all this time of contemplation with himſelf, he returned unto Beleſis and me with much melancholy in his face, but yet with more tranquillity in his eyes, than we had ſeen of many days. Well, my friends (ſaid he unto us) my Paſſion hath ſubmitted ; I have got the Victory, and ſince I cannot releaſe my Princeſs, I am reſolved to do whatſoever ſhe commands me : But ſince I am a Delinquent to the King of Aſſyria, as well as unto the Princeſs, and deſire to expiate that crime as well as the other, I wiſh we could by the means of Tegeus, and the reſt of our friends, releaſe him.

As he was ſpeaking this, Andramites came unto him, and ſaid that things were all in a mighty confuſion, that Crœſſus and Abradates were quite out, and that Abradates and the King of Pontus were declared enemies, that all the Princes and people alſo began to ſide, that one whoſe name was Araſpes, and who had formerly quitted the Party of the illuſtrious Cyrus, and came unto the King of Lydia, did moſt cunningly foment theſe diviſions ; that according to his promiſe he came to tell him, how the King of Suſiana (knowing Crœſſus ſought for nothing but a pretence to break off the Treaty, concerning the exchange of Prince Artamas for you, Madam) was reſolved to quit his ſide: And moreover (ſaid Andramites) I am ſure for my part that I ſhall be clapt up in priſon, ſo that I am abſolutely reſolved to follow your fortunes, which will be, (and the beſt courſe) to go unto the party of Cyrus : Nor am I to be blamed, if for the ſecurity of my perſon, and releaſement of my Miſtreſs, I go and take ſide with the Enemy. The Prince Mazares hearing Andramites ſpeak thus, was very glad of it, becauſe he ſaw a convenient way for his revolt, and that it would be much more eaſie for him to get out of the Camp of Crœſſus with others, than if he went to Cyrus by himſelf, for the King of Pontus did keep many vigilant eyes upon him, as long as he was at Sardis. After then he had lent an attentive ear unto all that Andramites told him, who did aggravate the injuſtice of Crœſſus with as much zeal as poſſibly could be in a man, who longed to be with his fair Doraliſa, he told him, that all his intereſts ſhould ever be his, and that he would do whatſoever pleaſed him: Yet (ſaid he unto him) If we could deviſe a way to releaſe the Priſoners, we ſhould be more acceptable unto Cyrus, and I have a moſt infallible way to effect it, if you will leave the whole matter unto me: In concluſion, Madam, Andramites conſented unto all my Maſters deſires; and Beleſis and my ſelf did ſo negotiate with Tegeus, that the buſineſs was ready for execution the next day following: But we could not poſſibly deviſe which way to releaſe the Prince Artamas, becauſe he had a particular Guard over him, with whom thoſe of Tegeus had no acquaintance; and the reaſon why he was more ſtrictly guarded than the reſt, was, becauſe he had a hundred thouſand friends in Lydia: So that the ſame which was his happineſs, turned at this time to his miſery.

And thus we were contented to endeavour only the liberty of the King of Aſſyria, of Soſicles, of Tegeus, of Feraulas, and of the ſtranger Anaxaris: Since he who commanded the Guard over them was an intimate friend unto Tegeus (though Crœſſus was ignorant of it) there was no great difficulty in the buſineſs; therefore about two hours before day, the Prince Mazares, Beleſis, with ſome other of their friends, and my ſelf, went together unto the Captain who ſtayed for us, and as it was agreed upon amongſt us, he carryed us unto the King of Aſſyria's Chamber, who waking at the noiſe which we made at our entrance, was extreamly amazed to ſee, (by the help of a great Candle which hung in the middle of the Room) that it was the Prince Mazares (whom he thought dead) which approached towards him.

This Prince being naturally of a violent temper, knew not well whether he was awake, or dreamt, or whether it was a man or a Ghoſt: But he raiſed himſelf upon his Bed, and drawing the Curtain which was of Tyrian Purple; What do I ſee (ſaid he in a furious and loud tone) Did you come from the ſhadows of death to pronounce the end of my life? Or are you yet amongſt the living, that I may puniſh you for your Treaſon againſt me? Sir, (replied the Prince my Maſter, without any turbulency) you ſhall know from whence I came when you are out of your Priſon, from whence I came to releaſe you, that I may thereby make ſome ſatisfaction for the wrong which I have done you: How Mazares (replied he) Muſt I be beholding unto you for my liberty? You muſt, Sir, (replied my Maſter) But I beſeech you make haſte and follow us: No, no, (replied that violent Prince) I will never owe my liberty to that man, who took Mandana from me: When I have releaſed you (replied Mazares) I ſhall never think you beholding to me for it, ſince in giving you liberty, I have given you nothing but what I took away from you: Yet if you will help the illuſtrious Cyrus to releaſe Mandana, you muſt accept of that liberty which I offer you, and accept of it preſently, for time is precious. Ah Mazares, ſaid the King of Aſſyria, Have you found out a way to releaſe me? Yet if I do accept of it, I will not promiſe you to forget what's paſt, becauſe then I ſhould forget Mandana and my ſelf both: All that I will ſay is, That I will uſe all the faculties in my power that my Friends, my Rivals, and my Enemies ſhall not exceed me in generoſity; and therefore it may be ſuppoſed, that I am not leſs generous than you are, and that I ſhall be Maſter of my own thoughts: However, Sir, (replied the Prince Mazares) I beſeech you make all the haſte yon can: Then the King of Aſſyria's Guards, who were all of our intelligence, helped to dreſs him: Then Mazares offering him a Sword, with the ſame reſpect he uſed to him when he was in Babylon: Here, Sir, (ſaid he unto him) take that, and puniſh Mazares with it when you have releaſed Mandana, if you think your ſelf not ſatisfied: Oh, I wiſh to the Gods (replied the King of Aſſyria, in accepting the Sword very civilly) that we could releaſe that Divine Princeſs whom we have made ſo miſerable, and againſt whom both you and I have been ſo culpable and unfortunate.

After this, ſtriving with himſelf, he cooled his fury and anger, and thanking Andramites, whom he knew to be the ſame which guarded the Princeſs, and brought him to Sardis, he followed Mazares and him, or to ſay better, we all followed Tegeus and the Captain, who guarded the Priſoners, who by a back pair of ſtairs did let us out ſo ſecretly, that thoſe Souldiers who were not of the Guard never perceived us. After this we met with no rub in the buſineſs, becauſe Andramites, who was Lieutenant-General of Crœſſus his Army, had cauſed a Captain, who was his Creature, to guard a Gate of the Town, towards Abradates his Quarter, whither we intended to go, and as we did, without any obſtacle at all. Aſſoon as we came unto the Tent of Abradates, we adviſed upon our beſt courſe; and it was reſolved, Sir (ſaid Orſanus, addreſſing his ſpeech to Cyrus) that to prevent all danger, theſe Princes ſhould not yet come into your Camp, becauſe the day began to break, and becauſe the Brother of Andramites, who kept the paſs over the River Halis, would not have been to order things ſo ſuddenly to let us paſs. Alſo ſince the Quarter of Abradates was in a very advantageous Trench, he did not fear that Crœſſus would fall upon him. Moreover it was imagined, that Crœſſus could not ſo ſoon recover his aſtoniſhment, into which the departure of the Prince of Claſomena, and the eſcape of the King of Aſſyria had put him: And in the mean time, leſt you, Sir, ſhould be too much allarm'd, and that you might give order that the Forces of Abradates might paſs with leſs difficulty, I obtained leave, Sir, to come and acquaint you, that your Army was to be ſtrengthened with three of the moſt valiant Princes upon earth, with many other men of Quality, and with four thouſand of the beſt Souldiers in all the Army of Crœſſus. Feraulas did think to have the honour of this employment from me; but ſince he was not able to make ſo perfect a relation of all things unto you, Sir, as I could, therefore I oppoſed his deſign: He will not long be deprived of the honour of ſeeing you, Sir, for the King of Suſiana reſolves to diſingage this evening, aſſoon as it is dark, to paſs over the River Halis before day, and to be with you at Sun-riſe.

This, Sir, is the ſubſtance of what I have to tell you, moſt humbly beſeeching you to believe, that I have truly related the generous alteration that is in my Maſter's mind; and therefore I conjure you to look upon him as your friend, and not as your Rival: But ſince my prayers are too inconſiderable to obtain my deſires, I moſt humbly beſeech theſe two great Princeſſes to intercede for me, making no queſtion, but they are able to obtain them for me.

Orſanus having ended his Speech, Panthea and Araminta did ſecond his deſires, and intreated Cyrus to bury all paſt paſſages in the pit of Oblivion, and not to doubt of the Prince Mazares his repentance. Cyrus would not let them go on: I beſeech you, ſaid he unto them, Do not take from me the glory of vanquiſhing my ſelf, and let not Mazares be a debtor unto your Generoſity, for that which he expects from mine: Though I muſt confeſs it is no ſmall difficulty to admit a Rival for a friend, and ſuch a Rival eſpecially as carried away the Princeſs Mandana; and therefore my virtue may be beholding unto ſuch examples as your ſelves: But ſince the Prince Mazares is not now my Rival, and can become my friend, I ſhall eaſily admit him ſo, and by his example, ſhall perhaps become as generous in forgetting the wrongs he hath done Mandana, as he hath been in his repentance: But, Madam (ſaid Cyrus, and ſpoke unto Panthea) doubtleſs it is to you I am a debtor for theſe great Auxiliaries which the valiant Abradates brings, ſince he would never have ſo ſharply reſented the injuſtice of Crœſſus, but for the Love which he bears unto you: I would it were as you ſay, Sir (replied ſhe) for I ſhould be glad that I were able to pay any part of that debt which I owe you: I would it were the will of the Gods (replied the Princeſs Araminta) that I had the ſame advantage you have, and that the King my Brother would be moved unto repentance by the excellent example of the Prince Mazares: However it be, Madam, (ſaid Cyrus unto this Princeſs) I beſeech you do not let it trouble you to ſee the Forces of Crœſſus weakned, and mine ſtrengthened, ſince I will engage my word, that the ſooner I am Conquerour, the ſooner ſhall the misfortunes of your houſe end. In the mean time, ſince it is requiſite ſome orders ſhould be given for the reception of thoſe who are coming to help us to conquer, I beſeech you give me leave to depart from you.

After this, Cyrus retired, leaving the heart of Panthea full of joy, and carrying Orſanus with him, of whom he asked a thouſand queſtions, in returning to his Quarter.

As ſoon as he came there, he made choice of ſome Troops which he would ſend to receive Abradates, and the reſt, with whom Orſanus returned, to aſſure his Maſter that Cyrus would protect him. After this, Cyrus ordered all things himſelf, even to the very Lodgings of the King of Suſiana, of Mazares, of Andramites; of the reſt of any Quality who came with them, and of all the reſt of the Regiments which they brought, for he would not fail in the leaſt circumſtance of what was fitting: In returning to his Tent, he met Aglatidas and Ligdamis, and carried them with him to acquaint them (as men of tender and paſſionate Souls) with what had happened: Do you not admire (ſaid he unto them, after he had related the ſubſtance of what Orſanus told him) at the oddneſs of my phantaſtical Fate, which always differs from all other Deſtinies in the World? Do you not ſee how I have found a Rival whom I cannot look upon as an Enemy, nor hate, unleſs I go againſt the Laws of Generoſity, but I muſt admit him into the degree of a Friend, and protect him in my Army, who perhaps will help me to releaſe Mandana, that he may carry her away the ſecond time? Not but that I do believe all Orſanus told me, whoſe honeſty I cannot ſuſpect; yet for all that, I have much ado to underſtand how it is poſſible one ſhould love, and never pretend to be loved again. If you had offended as Mazares hath (replied Aglatidas) as amarous as you are, I believe you would think it enough if you were pardoned, and be contented with it: I think ſo too, ſaid Cyrus. But I think alſo, that aſſoon as I was pardoned, I ſhould deſire ſomething further, for the very Nature of Love is to deſire it; and it muſt neceſſarily be concluded, that if Mazares deſire no more, he is not in Love: However, I know it is impoſſible to leave loving Mandana, and therefore I am certain Mazares will be my Rival for ever: Yet it appears plainly (replied Ligdamis) that Generoſity hath at this preſent a great power upon the heart of this Prince, otherwiſe he would never have releaſed the King of Aſſyria, who is his Rival as well as you are: What would you have me to ſay, ſaid Cyrus, but that all accidents unto me are are ſo full of wonder, that they deprive me of my Reaſon. After this, Cyrus was very ſorry that Mandana would not let Mazares releaſe her: and immediately after he would be very glad of it that he had not, thinking it a ſhame any ſhould releaſe her but himſelf: yet however he was very unquiet in his thoughts, but his unquietneſs laſted not long, for the conſtancy which he found in Mandana's mind, did diſſipate all manner of other fears, or doubts, or perplexities, 'Tis true, he had many cauſes of vexation otherwiſe; yet he found his Party ſo conſiderably ſtrengthened, that his hopes of Victory did ſweeten every thing elſe; ſo that he paſſed away the reſt of the night with Aglatidas and Ligdamis in much ſerenity of mind: Yet he ſlept very little that night, as well becauſe the ſight of Mazares would trouble him, as in expectation of his new addition of Forces. He was no ſooner advertiſed by his Spies which he had purpoſely ſet, that Abradates had paſſed over the River Halis with his Troops; but he took Horſe, after he had ſent to acquaint the Kings of Phrygia and Hircania, and other Princes of his Army: ſo that in a very ſhort time having abundance with him, he went to meet theſe Princes ſome thirty furlongs from his Camp. He was no ſooner come on to a little riſing ground, but he ſaw the Troops of Abradates appear, and theſe which he had ſent out meet with them; ſo that marching forward with about 500 Horſes only, he met Abradates and his Rival. When theſe two Bodies were ſo near, that the firſt Ranks might know each other, the King of Aſſyria, Abradates and Mazares (out of the reſpect which they owed unto Cyrus as their ancient Conquerour, and as now to be their Protector) did leave their main Body, and advanced towards him: Cyrus no ſooner ſaw their action, but he did the ſame, both ſides alighting from their Horſes at the ſame time ſome twenty paces from each other. Abradates, as it was agreed between the King of Aſſyria, Mazares, and himſelf, did advance the firſt, and preſented the reſt unto Cyrus. Sir, ſaid he unto him, If I had come alone unto you, I ſhould have feared my reception; but ſince I bring with me two ſuch valiant Princes, and ſo many gallant men which follow them, I dare hope you will not deny us protection, eſpecially when you conſider, that I have brought a Prince, who would have brought the Princeſs Mandana to you, if ſhe would have given credit to him, and who would have brought the Prince Artamas alſo, if it had been poſſible. Upon his ſaying ſo, the King of Aſſyria and Mazares ſaluted Cyrus: the firſt of theſe with a kind of angry civility, and the other with a moſt melancholy reſpect: Cyrus returned theſe ſalutes very civilly, though with more coldneſs than he reſolved; yet he ſpoke unto them with incomparable generoſity aſſoon as he had overcome his natural repugnancy to embrace his Rivals, and the Raviſhers of Mandana; and aſſoon as this averſe Ceremony was over, I make no doubt at all of Victory now (ſaid he unto them) nor can Fortune, as powerful as ſhe is, prevent the Releaſement of Mandana. You may ſee by this, Sir, (ſaid Mazares unto him, and gave him Mandana's Letter) that the adored Princeſs you ſpeak of might have been out of Priſon had ſhe pleaſed, and that I did my beſt to obtain my pardon. Cyrus then taking Mandana's Letter from the hand of his Rival, with as great an agitation of ſpirit as Mazares had in giving it; he opened it, and after a civil Complement unto the Princes, he read theſe words.

Mandana to the Invincible Cyrus.

IF the Prince Mazares be ſo generous as to give you this Letter, and will ſight for you, then receive him as if he had releaſed me, ſince it was long only of my ſelf, that I was not releaſed by him; Render therefore unto his Virtue that which I have refuſed him; and be aſſured he will merit your friendſhip, if it be true that his repentance be real: Therefore without any remembrance of his carrying me away from Sinope, think how he protected me at Babylon, and would have releaſed me out of Sardis; Live therefore with him as if he were always your Friend, and as if he had never been your Rival; And be aſſured that you will ſenſibly oblige her who is the moſt juſt and moſt acknowledging perſon in the World. Adieu; Extract out of the laſt words in this Letter all the conſolation that ſhe can give you, whoſe Name is with a true Epithete, Unfortunate

MANDANA.

Whilſt Cyrus was reading this Letter, the King of Aſſyria's mind was full of unimaginable torment; and ſpeaking unto Mazares in a low voice, You are a happy man (ſaid he unto him) that can with ſuch a calm and moderate Paſſion give Mandana's Letter unto your Rival. I do not think my ſelf to be in any condition of envy (replied Mazares ſadly) and I believe you would think ſo as well as I, if you did but know my heart. As they were thus talking together, Cyrus having read this Letter which infuſed much calmneſs into his ſpirit, he looked upon Mazares with much mildneſs; and aſſured him moſt obligingly and generouſly both, that he would eſteem him as the Releaſer of Mandana, and never remember his act at Sinope: So that Mazares, maugre the paſſion of his Soul, was raviſhed with admiration as well as the King of Suſiana. But ſince the King of Aſſyria did impatiently reſent this diſcourſe, Cyrus did end it very handſomly: And Abradates did preſent Andramites unto him; Alſo Mazares preſented Beleſis, telling him, that this his illuſtrious Friend could well teſtifie his repentance: Alſo Anaxaris, Soſicles, Tegeus, and Feraulas coming up towards him, Cyrus embraced them with much joy, eſpecially the laſt of theſe: After which, taking horſe, he rid towards the Camp; where Cyrus was no ſooner arrived, but according to the Orders which he had given, a Council of War was held in his Tent, to conſult whether the Truce ſhould ſtill be obſerved, or whether this accident ought to move them to break it off? Mazares gave there his voice as freely the firſt day, as if he had been an ancient Friend of Cyrus: The queſtion was a while in doubt: ſome gave their votes to break off the Treaty, and take advantage of the diſorder in the Army of Crœſſus; and others affirmed, that it did not ſuit with the glory of Cyrus to do ſo. Thoſe who were of this opinion, ſaid, that this which happened was an advantage which could not be attributed unto Cyrus, ſince he had yet done nothing but receive his Priſoners, and give retreat unto an ill treated Prince, and unto ſome other Malecontents of Quality; that therefore patience was to be uſed, ſince the Truce would not laſt above three days. In concluſion, the buſineſs being well debated, how great a deſire ſoever Cyrus had to fight, eſpecially having now got the Paſs over the River Halis free, by the means of Andramites his Brother, yet notwithſtanding he would never violate the Laws of War: So that this being the Reſult of the Council, all the Princes retired unto their Tents which were prepared for them, except Abradates, whom Cyrus did wait upon unto a little Town where his dear Panthea lodged, giving Orders unto Artabaſes to withdraw, to the end there might be no ſign of any Captivity. Cyrus would have Andramites alſo to follow Abradates, that he might have a ſight of Doraliſa, thinking the Gods would one day reward him for having commiſeration upon unfortunate Lovers like himſelf; and for his care in ſweetening the bitter Pills of their miſeries, though he ſaw no remedy for his own.

PART V. BOOK III.

AFter Cyrus had done every thing, that the dignity of his place, expediency of Affairs, Civility, Generoſity, and tenderneſs of Soul could exact from him in ſuch a Juncture of Accidents, he had a great deſire to talk in private with his beloved confident Feraulas, concerning Mandana, for he underſtood by the relation of Orſanus, that he ſaw her walk upon the top of the Tower where ſhe was kept Priſoner: ſo that commanding him to be called for, he welcomed him with as much tenderneſs as an Amorous Prince could poſſibly expreſs unto the only Confident of his paſſion, and unto ſuch a Confident as had done him many extraordinary ſervices, and given him much comfort in his miſeries. He talked with him above two hours, and could not get any thing out of him concerning his Princeſs; for Feraulas had ſeen Mandana at ſuch a diſtance, that he could not draw any ſatisfaction from any thing he could tell him. But Love hath ſuch a quality, that thoſe who are captivated by it, cannot diſcourſe of any thing but what concerns the Perſon loved. Therefore, though Cyrus had ſpoke as much as could be thought upon of the laſt accidents of his Life, yet he repeated all the firſt alſo with as much earneſtneſs, as if they were yet to fall upon him. 'Tis very true, that at that time, there was no need of far fetch'd things to help out diſcourſe: for the King of Aſſyria's return, and the arrival of Mazares, was ſubject enough: Moreover Mandana's Letter was enough to talk on for him; ſince he thought it was a piece of great difficulty to endure that the Princeſs ſhould write ſo obligingly in behalf of Mazares. But yet the laſt words of her Letter did make amends for all the reſt: and when he conſidered how ſhe allowed him to explain her words in the moſt favourable ſenſe for himſelf, the joys of his ſoul were eaſier to be imagined than expreſſed: Oh, my divine Princeſs, would he ſay, will you permit me to interpret your words unto my own advantage? Do you know, moſt excellent Princeſs, how far a Lover may flatter himſelf? And do you not fear that I will make your words ſpeak more than ever you intended? When you ſay that you are juſt, and full of acknowledgment, do you not think to ſhut juſtice and acknowledgment within ſuch narrow limits, that you cannot underſtand what I have done to releaſe you? No, no, divine Mandana, this is not the gloſs which I will put upon your words; never reckon, I beſeech you, upon the Combats which I have fought, nor the Towns which I have taken, nor the Battels which I have won, but, I beſeech you, reckon my violent and reſpected Paſſion for ſomething, if you pleaſe. It is for that only for which I deſire you ſhould be obliged unto me, and do me juſtice in: never make any account of the dangers which I have run into, nor of the wounds which I received, but I moſt humbly beſeech you, to ſet a value upon my ſighs, which I have oft ſent out of a ſad ſoul, and upon my tears which I have ſhed ſince firſt I began lo love you: and I beſeech you (ſaid he, as if ſhe were preſent to underſtand him) let the raptures of my love, make me put ſuch a favourable interpretation upon what you have writ, as may make me believe, that when you ſay you will be juſt, you mean by it, you will love me, as well as I love you; but alas, what do I ſay? were it not injuſtice to wiſh Mandana ſhould love me as well as I love her? yes doubtleſs, it were; and therefore let us call that grace and favour, which we have very improperly Called Juſtice, for it can be no other.

For my part, Sir, (ſaid Feraulas, and interrupted him) I do not think the Princeſs Mandana will do as you deſire ſhe ſhould; for your Victories are as great ſigns of your love, as your ſighs and tears are: and therefore if ſhe joyn all theſe together, as I make no queſtion but ſhe will, I am perſwaded ſhe will one day love you as well as you do her: Ah Feraulas, ſaid he, how far is that day off? and how many things have I to do before I can be ſo happy? A battel muſt be fought and won, afterwards a conſiderable Siege will continue: and after that, I muſt fight with the great King of Aſſyria.

Theſe, Feraulas, are but the leaſt of difficulties that I am to meet with, before I muſt come and caſt my ſelf at the feet of Mandana, and beg ſo much favour as to be loved. Judge then whether I have not more cauſe of fears than hopes, eſpecially after ſo many ominous Oracles.

Whilſt Cyrus was thus entertaining himſelf; the thoughts of his Rivals were no ſmoother than his: Beleſis and Orſanus did Cheer up the Prince Mazares, as much as they could, and commending the generoſity of his reſolution, did endeavour to confirm him in his repentance: They had alſo ſo much courtſhip as to flatter his paſſion, though they would not cure it; and therefore they told him that Mandana would infallibly give him her friendſhip and eſteem, if he continued his courſe as he had begun: were I ſo happy as to obtain that (ſaid he) I ſhould never deſire more: and certainly I ſhall endeavour my utmoſt for it: But if I cannot obtain that happineſs, then I know my courſe, which is to return unto my Deſart again, and there hide my ſufferings, and ſigh out my ſorrows till I die. No, no, Sir, replyed Beleſis, 'twill never come to that, for Mandana will reſtore you to her former eſteem, and your Virtue ſhall for ever be Miſtreſs of your Paſſion. It is therefore I that muſt return into my ſolitude, I, who can never hope for any thing. The hopes I have, replied Mazares, are of ſuch a ſhallow nature, that they can never afford me any ſweetneſs; becauſe they are ſuch only as my reaſon adviſeth my will unto, and not ſuch as my heart doth really wiſh for: and ſince (Beleſis) felicity doth chiefly conſiſt in the ſatisfaction of deſires, I am certain to be the moſt miſerable Man alive; ſince I muſt never enjoy mine: yet, I beſeech you, do not think I ſpeak this, as if I did repent of my repentance: no, Beleſis, I do not, but am abſolutely reſolved to fight for Cyrus till the Princeſs Mandana be releaſed, and never to ask any other favour from the Princeſs Mandana, but her eſteem and friendſhip; and I do not think it poſſible that all the force of my love and deſpair can make me alter my reſolution. Yet for all this, my heart will be full of tumultuous cogitations, and I muſt prepare for a continual War with my ſelf, and let me tell you further, that I am not like unto moſt Men, who out of Love's reſentments do think all their Rivals unworthy Men, how accompliſh'd ſoever they be: but on the contrary, methinks I ſee Cyrus ſo much above the rate of other Men, and ſo worthy of Mandana, that I think it a ſtrange injuſtice if he did not love her, and ſhe him: ſo that judging by the greatneſs of that Prince's merit, and the greatneſs of the affection which that Princeſs ought to bear him, I muſt conclude, that no other ought to pretend any thing unto her: and therefore I have nothing to do in the World, but to ſeek for a handſome death, as doubtleſs I ſhall if I cannot obtain my pardon. On the other ſide, the King of Aſſyria is not without his perplexities; yet was he glad to be releaſed, becauſe Cyrus ſhould not have all the glory of fighting for Mandana; but it vexed him that he ſhould be obliged unto Mazares for it. Yet ſince the ſight of a loved

Rival did ſet a ſharper edge upon his ſpirits, than a Rival hated could: all the King of Aſſyria's malice was againſt Cyrus. Yet did he much eſteem him, maugre all his malice; and the virtue of this Prince did ſhine in ſo much luſtre, that this malignant Jealous Prince could not chuſe but look upon him as one of the greateſt Princes of the world, and the moſt worthy of Mandana. But whilſt theſe three illuſtrious Rivals were entertaining their melancholy thoughts, Abradates and Panthea did ſolace themſelves in the joys of each other. Andramites alſo was pleaſed with the ſight of his adored Doraliſa, whoſe jocund and indifferent humours, did yet not a little perplex him. Ligdamis and Cleonice thought their hours ſweet, ſince they were together: But the Prince Phraartes thought time more tedious, ſince he thought it impoſſible to ſee the Princeſs Araminta not incenſed. The Prince Tigranes bewailed the abſence of his dear Oneſila, as Aglatidas did of Ameſtris: Tegeus and Feraulas alſo grieved at the captivity of Celeneſa, and Marteſia. The truth is, one would have ſaid, love was the very ſoul of this Army, ſince there was not any conſiderable perſon in all the Camp of Cyrus who had not a ſence of this paſſion. But whilſt it took up the thoughts of ſo many illuſtrious perſons on the party of Cyrus, the King of Lydia and his ſide was all thoughts of anger and revenge, the eſcape of his priſoners of War much troubled him. The departure of the Prince of Claſomena did trouble him more; and the King of Suſiana and Andramites revolting ſides, did put him into a ſtrange fury; The Prince Myrſiles alſo ſeemed malecontent, and was much troubled that Andramites ſhould do as he did: though he did much aggravate all diſcontents, none knowing his reaſon why.

As for the King of Pontus, he had variety of apprehenſions upon the matter, for he was very angry that Abradates, the Prince of Claſomena, and Andramites ſhould adhere unto Cyrus; but he was not ſorry that the King of Aſſyria and Mazares were out of Sardis: for though the firſt of theſe two was a priſoner, yet he feared leſt he ſhould have ſome ſecret plots alſo ; a natural antipathy againſt a Rival,made him glad of his abſence,and he was not angry at both their departures: and not being ſo much perplexed as Crœſſus was, he did what he could to perſwade him that the loſs was not ſo great as he did apprehend it: The worſt was, that the truce was near an end, and ſince there was no negotiation in hand,becauſe the King of Suſiana had changed ſides, they not knowing upon what ground to deſire a prolonging of the treaty. In the mean time, this alteration had put all Sardis in ſuch a fright, and ſo much diſordered the Army of Crœſſus, that there was an abſolute neceſſity of more time to appeaſe both people and Souldiers. Moreover, ſince the paſſage over the River Halis was in the power of Cyrus, he might be forced to give battel if that Prince pleaſed: and he plainly ſaw, that if he did fight before things were better compoſed, the day would be loſt: Therefore, as extream maladies have always recourſe unto extream remedies, ſo Crœſſus reſolved to begin another negotiation, though he had no intention to end it; but only to gain time. He told then the King of Pontus, that he intended to propound unto Cyrus an exchange between the Princeſs Araminta, and the Prince Artamas; but it was upon ſuch odd conditions, as was apparent he aimed more at drift of time, than any real exchange, ſince one qualification was, that the Prince Artamas ſhould promiſe never to pretend unto the Princeſs Palmis: and demanded further a releaſment of all the priſoners which had been taken ſince Cyrus entred into his dominions. The King of Pontus approved of all that Crœſſus did propound unto him: for though in reality he was very willing to get his ſiſter the Princeſs out of the power of Cyrus; yet he durſt not tell the King of Lydia, that all his propoſitions could never take effect; becauſe being his protector, it was fit he ſhould comply with his opinion: Crœſſus therefore, becauſe he had no other way, ſent to deſire a prolonging of the Truce for eight days more, to the end there might be a treaty concerning the releaſment of the Prince Artamas, aud the Princeſs Araminta. As ſoon as ever this propoſition was made unto Cyrus, he knew very well the real deſign of the Lydian King: and if he had follow'd his own inclination,he would abſolutely have rejected it, and took advantage of the diſorder which was in the Army of Crœſſus : But ſince it was propounded in the preſence of the Phrygian King (who hoped to have his ſon at liberty by this negotiation) Cyrus perceiving the thoughts of this King, would by no means diſoblige him, nor make the Princeſs Araminta, whom he highly eſteemed, to think that he was more careleſs of her liberty than of Panthea's. And ſince he thought it concerned Crœſſus more to keep the Prince Artamas, than it did himſelf to keep the Princeſs Araminta, he conſented unto the Truce deſired; and the ſooner, becauſe, being aſſured of the paſs over the river Halis, he could force Crœſſus to fight when he would: So that not inſiſting upon eight days, he reſolved to ſatisfie the King of Phrygia, and not to incenſe the Princeſs of Pontus. Moreover, theſe eight days were as expedient for him as for Crœſſus, for ſince the Lydians had made great waſte in all the Country along the river Halis towards Sardis, he could in that interim provide ammunition and proviſion enough for his Army in all the neighbour Towns. The Truce then being renewed, the Prince Phraartes began to plot how to render it ineffectual: not out of any diſaffection unto Prince Artamas, but becauſe he was deep in love with Araminta, and could not conſent ſhe ſhould go into the Country of his enemy, ſo he might loſe the ſight of her for ever. In the mean time, ſince the firſt days of this treaty were ſpent only in receiving Propoſitions from Crœſſus, which paſſed under the name of the King of Pontus, Cyrus was not ſo buſie but he went to viſit Panthea, and partake of her joys in Abradates : the King of Aſſyria alſo went thither ſometimes, and ſo did all the reſt of the Princes in the Army : ſo that during this Truce, the Court of Panthea might very well be called the moſt glorious Court in the World, ſince no place upon earth had ſo many gallant men together as it had. The ſtranger Anaxaris, (during this little peace, if I may tearm it ſo) did make it appear that he was a man of Civility as well as Courage. The Prince Mazares, though very melancholy, yet his ſolitude had not rendered him uncivil, but he alſo viſited the Queen of Suſiana: He ſaw the Princeſs Araminta alſo*:* but all his viſits, were viſits rather of Civility, than any pleaſant Company. In the mean time the King of Suſiana conſidereng the ſeveral intereſts of Cyrus and Mazares, and of Mazares and the King of Aſſyria, did ſo prudently compoſe their ſpirits, that they agreed together almoſt as well, as if all paſt paſſages were forgotten. Yet the King of Aſſyria, did often let ſlip ſuch language as ſpoke his memory of them, but the wiſdom of Mazares did ſo diſcreetly temper the impetuous humour of the Aſſyrian King, that there happened no diſorder amongſt them. All three would diſcourſe together of their paſſions, and not quarrel, but it was in the preſence of Abradates: for an extraordinary care was taken, never to let them be alone together, leſt ſome violent paſſion of ſoul ſhould produce ſome ſad event. In the mean while Beleſis, though in the midſt of an army of 150000. men, and in a Town wherein were two great Princeſſes, and many Ladies of quality beſides, yet melancholy did ſit ſo heavie upon his ſoul, that he never ſaw any but the Prince Mazares with whom he lodged. Things ſtanding upon theſe tearms, upon a day when Cyrus was with the Queen of Suſiana, with whom the Princeſs Araminta was preſent, Beleſis went to a little town with the Prince of Saces, to get ſomething mended about the caſe of a Picture which he prized infinitely dear, and would not truſt it with any one: as he was ſpeaking unto the workman, and took out the Picture which he would not forſake, the workman having ſome knowledge in that Art, and finding it to be a rare piece, could not chuſe but look upon it; whilſt he was thus looking upon it, both with admiration and delight, a ſtranger of a handſome garb lighted from his horſe cloſe by the houſe where Beleſis was, and accidentally caſting his eyes upon this Picture, he knew it: and did ſo wonder to find it in Lydia, that he could not chuſe but ask him who held it, how he came by that Picture, telling him, that it was his, for he could ſpeak the Lydian language: he had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but Beleſis underſtanding him, and knowing ing the voice, he turned and haſtily took the Picture: and turning towards the ſtranger, he perceived that he was not miſtaken, but that it was really him whom he thought it to be, ſo that falling a pace back, Oh Hermogenes (cryed he out, being tranſported with grief and deſpair, and drawing his Sword) durſt you follow me as far as Lydia to take the picture from me, whoſe original you did ſo cruelly ſteal away? Hermogenes was ſo ſurprized to meet Beleſis, and ſo many ſeveral things coming into his thoughts at once, it was a long while before he could get himſelf into a poſture of defence; or conſider if what he ſaw was poſſible: But he had not leiſure to deliberate upon the matter: for Orſanus paſſing by chance by, as Beleſis ſtood upon his guard, and as Hermogenes knew not whether what he ſaw was true or falſe, called company to help him, and he ſeized both upon Beleſis and Hermogenes as two men that were quarrelling, ſending immediately to acquaint Mazares with it, who as ſoon as he heard of it, beſeeched Cyrus to take order in the buſineſs: The Queen of Suſiana hearing the name of Beleſis did add her prayers unto his, accuſing her ſelf of forgetfulneſs, ſince Orſanus ſpoke unto her of him: yet to repair her fault, ſhe acquainted the King of Suſiana with the merit of the man, and aſſuring Cyrus that he was a man of great quality and much ſpirit, all the Princes went into another chamber to ſee Beleſis and him who quarrelled with him, but the Queen of Suſiana having an earneſt deſire to ſee Beleſis, entreated Cyrus to let them be brought before him: ſo that he commanded them to be brought in. As ſoon as ever they entred into the chamber, Panthea did know Hermogenes to be of Suſa, and of good quality, and who intending to get into Sardis, did by good fortune hear that Abradates had changed ſides, ſo that he altered his courſe, and came to this little town, which was the ſame where the Queen of Suſiana quartered: Abradates and Panthea highly eſteeming Hermogenes did much welcome him and Beleſis both: after they had ſpoken unto theſe two quarrellers with all poſſible civility, they beſeeched Cyrus to favour them, and oblige them to tell what their difference was: It is of ſuch a nature, (ſaid Beleſis) that it is impoſſible it ſhould ever be rightly told, and therefore I think it better to leave us enemies ſtill, than to conſume ſo much time in troubling two great Princes with relation of ſuch things as are indifferent unto them. The intereſt of perſons of ſuch merit(anſwered Cyrus) ought never to be indifferent unto the greateſt Princes upon earth; Therefore if to render juſtice, nothing be wanting but a hearing the relation of your lives, we ſhall hear them with much delight: Alſo, I cannot think we can better employ our vacant time during this Truce, than in making Hermogenes and you friends: and I ſhall have ſome advantage by it (added Cyrus with a ſmile) ſince if I do reconcile you, I ſhall hope you will fight with more courage in the day of Battel, therefore I moſt humbly beſeech the Queen of Suſiana, that ſhe would be pleaſed to command Hermogenes to tell me his adventures, if Beleſis will not do it himſelf: Hermogenes (replied Beleſis) is too much intereſted in the buſineſs, to relate his ſtory and mine; for, Sir, he muſt needs make a partial relation, ſince he would perſwade me that I am in the wrong, and he in the right. To make it appear that I ſtand not in need of any diſguiſements of the truth, ſaid Hermogenes, I am contented that he himſelf relate all the paſſages betwixt us: I cannot do it, replied Beleſis, for it is impoſſible I ſhould make a relation of all my ſad adventures, and not return into my firſt deſpair. To compoſe the matter betwixt them, ſaid Abradates unto Cyrus, it muſt neither be Beleſis nor Hermogenes that muſt relate their adventures, but ſome one who is an equal friend unto them both, and who is acquainted with the perfect ſtory: Oh, Sir, replied Beleſis, there is none in the World can do it, but Alcenor: 'tis he whom I intend to ſpeak of, replied Abradates, and I wonder you ſaw him not, ſince he came to Sardis two days before I left it, and therefore did certainly follow me hither. It is rather to be wondred, if he did ſee him, replied the Prince Mazares; for Beleſis almoſt never ſtirred abroad ſince he left his Deſart, but when he thought to aſſiſt me in the delivery of the Princeſs Mandana: After this, Cyrus deſired theſe two enemies to refer the relation of their difference unto him whom Abradates named, ſince they could not agree to do it themſelves : and they conſented unto it ; yet deſiring to ſee Alcenor before he ſpoke ; ſo that without loſs of any longer time, the Queen of Suſiana ſending to look for him, he was immediately found, and was ſhewed unto both thoſe his friends, who joyntly willed him to ſpeak the truth, both of them ſuppoſing there needed nothing elſe to juſtifie themſelves : After which, retiring into another Chamber, Alcenor began the relation in theſe terms : Panthea appointing him to addreſs his Speech unto Cyrus as Judge of the Controverſie, for ſhe had already been informed of the adventure, though ſhe was deſirous to hear it over again.

The Hiſtory of Beleſis and Hermogenes, and of Cleodora and Leoniſa.

Doubtleſs, Sir, it will ſeem very ſtrange unto you, that I ſhould be ſo equal a friend unto two enemies, as I ſhould even to the leaſt circumſtance, know the events of both their lives, even to their moſt ſecret thoughts ; and that both of them ſhould have ſuch a good opinion of my ſincerity, that they are contented I ſhould relate the adventures of their lives in their own preſence, tho' they are of that nature, that the leaſt circumſtance omitted doth extreamly alter the caſe : yet notwithſtanding I hope to render my ſelf worthy of the favour which they do me, being fully reſolved to diſguiſe nothing, but will ingenuouſly relate all their imbecillities as I found in them. But, Sir, ſince I conceive it requiſite, you know who they are : give me leave to tell you, Sir, that Beleſis is a Mantianian, and of the Prime quality in his Country, and that Hermogenes is a Suſianian, and of a very high quality alſo, beſides the advantages of birth, they had that of excellent education, not only in ſuch Arts as are eſſentially requiſite to make compleat men ; but alſo in other inferour trifles, which yet do infinitely poliſh the ſpirits of them who know them, and are delightful to thoſe that know them not : It was the pleaſure of their Parents they ſhould travel together at one time ; and as if the Gods deſigned their meeting, and that they ſhould love each other, they met both at Babylon, not only at the ſame time, but alſo in the ſame Houſe, though one of them came from Suſa, and the other from Mantiana, ſo that though both of them were of ſuch a garb as might move equal curioſity of knowing who they were, yet they ſought for occaſions of being talked of, and they eaſily found them. For ſince they had got moſt of the Aſiatick Languages before they ſet out to travel, and ſince the Suſian and Mantinian Tongues reſembled one another, they diſcourſed familiarly together, the firſt time they met, and went together to view the wonders of this proud and ſtately Town: they were ſo well acquainted at this very firſt encounter, that they affected the ſame pleaſures, practiſed the ſame Arts, knew the ſame things: at firſt, their intentions were to aſſociate together as long as they ſtayed in Babylon, where they ſojourned about a Month; but ſince in that time they grew more intimate, and loved each other better, they could not part ſo ſoon, and in concluſion, agreed to travel together; thoſe two loving Friends kept cloſe together a whole year in travelling from Court to Court, and from Country to Country, in much delight, not the leaſt conteſt ever happening between them: after they had ſeen all that was worthy of ſight, Hermogenes moved Beleſis in lieu of returning home, to ſpend ſome time at Suſa: and certainly his curioſity to ſee ſo ſtately a Town was grounded upon good reaſon, for I do not think there is a Town in the whole Univerſe ſo full of all delights: Beleſis then being eaſily perſwaded to ſee the moſt goodly place in the World, and to go with a Friend, from whom he could not part without extream grief, arrived at Suſa a little while after the illuſtrious Abradates was baniſhed: But that he might not repent of his coming thither, Hermogenes, who was well acquainted with all the Avenues, did ſo guide him, that they entred in at the moſt pleaſant quarter, which indeed is one of the moſt delightful objects that eye can behold. For, Sir, in coming to Suſa this way, there is a little Hill from whence one views a great valley, containing above a hundred furlongs, in the midſt of which paſſeth in a ſerpentine manner, the River Choaſpes, the Water whereof is ſo clear and pure, that the moſt Cryſtal freſh Spring is not comparable to it; upon the banks of this River ſtands the Town of Suſa; and the great number of magnificent Fabricks makes it ſeem as fair without as it is within: that which makes the place moſt pleaſant, and dwelling there moſt healthful, is, that all this great Valley is diapered with a million of ſeveral colours in Flowers, which by their admirable enamel, does charm the eyes with variety, and perfume the Air with odour, infinitely ſurpaſſing the Rainbow, or any other proſpect whatſoever: alſo, from this abundance of fragrant Flowers the Town of Suſa takes its name; for in that language they ſignifie alike; and therefore this Valley or Meadow is called the Rainbow of Suſa, throughout all Aſia. Moreover, in coming that way which Hermogenes did bring Beleſis, there are along that pleaſant River four great Walks, ſo large, ſo ſtraight, ſo even, and ſo ſhady, by the height of the Trees which grow by the ſides (though Wood is very ſcant in all that Country) that a more pleaſant Walk cannot be imagined. Unto this place all the Ladies every evening reſort in their Coaches, and where the Men rendezvous on Horſeback: ſo that having liberty to go ſometimes into one Walk, and ſometimes into another, it is a place of the greateſt pleaſure in the World. Hermogenes intending to let the firſt time of Beleſis his coming unto Suſa, to be a time of Pleaſure; and the more to ſurpriſe him, he never told him that he would bring him this way: yet, becauſe he would not diſpleaſe his Friend, by bringing him into a place of ſo much reſort in a negligent habit; he deſired him that Morning to dreſs himſelf as one that was to lodge in a houſe where he ſhould ſee many Ladies, as indeed there was at the houſe of Hermogenes; his Mother and his Siſter being there: ſo that Beleſis not foreſeeing the harmleſs deceit of his Friend, did habit himſelf in a very rich handſome Suit, above the cuſtom of Travellers: but he eaſily perceived the cunning of Hermogenes, when he found all theſe great Walks full of gilded Coaches, in which were all the prime Beauties of Suſa:

and after them an infinite number of Men of Quality, admirably well mounted, and richly habited, who came and ſaluted them. Then did Beleſis thank him for his pleaſant fallacy, in letting him ſee ſo many Beauties together in one place, and in ſuch a gallant manner. After which, ſending all their Train another way, Beleſis and Hermogenes began to enter into the Walk, as if in lieu of travel, they were newly come out of Suſa. For my part, I being an intimate Friend unto Hermogenes before he was acquainted with Beleſis, I was extreamly ſurpriſed to ſee him arrive whilſt I was talking with ſome Ladies; for I did not yet expect him. I no ſooner ſpied him, but ſhewing him thoſe unto whom I talked, (to the end they ſhould not take it ill that I left them ſo abruptly) I went to meet him: and ſince it was not the cuſtom of that place to alight from Horſes, becauſe it would interrupt the walk of Ladies; we embraced each other on Horſeback: After the firſt raptures of joy to ſee one another, Hermogenes deſired me to love Beleſis, as he deſired Beleſis to love me: After this, Beleſis and I ſaluted each other with much civility, and ſo much freedom, as made it apparent we were both of us diſpoſed to obey Hermogenes in his deſires. All our Complements being performed, Hermogenes deſiring to divert Beleſis, and deſired his travel unto Suſa might pleaſe him, asked me whether all the Beauties of the Town were that evening in the Walks? Wiſhing that his Friend ſhould all at once ſee what Suſa had fair. And as he named all that were there, and all that were not there, it chanced that one Lady of Quality called Cleodora, who doubtleſs was one of the brighteſt Stars in all Suſa, was not there, whereat Hermogenes was very ſad; and as I asked why he ſhould be ſo ſad, ſince I knew he was not in love? The reaſon is, Alcenor, (ſaid he unto me) becauſe I would have all the Beauties in Suſa here, to the end, ſome of them might captivate Beleſis, and ſtay him here amongſt us: If ſo, replyed Beleſis, you would not be oblig'd at all unto me for my ſtay in Suſa; and therefore I had rather ſtay here upon terms of Friendſhip than Love. After this, we began to look upon the Ladies, and to ſalute them: Every one wondering to ſee Hermogenes, bidding him welcome home, and asking who Beleſis was. After many turns, well, Beleſis, (ſaid Hermogenes to him) do you find any of our Beauties worthy of the honour to captivate you? I find their beauties to be admirably rare, replyed he: but to tell you truly, I have not met with any yet who makes my heart and my ſpirits to tremble, as commonly beauty uſeth to do unto one that is deſtined to love, and which ever precedes that love he owes her: So that if this Cleodora, who you ſay is not here, have no other Charms than theſe have, you, and none elſe ſhall thank me for my ſtay in Suſa, ſince in all likelihood I ſhall uot fall in love. As Beleſis ſaid ſo, we ſaw a Coach appear at the end of the Walks towards Suſa, which ſeemed to be Cleodora's Aunts, with whom ſhe lived: I no ſooner ſpied it, but I ſhewed it unto Hermogenes, who knowing it as well as my ſelf, told Beleſis, and ſmiled, that he would go meet his Captivator: I am not yet conquered, (replyed he, and ſmiled alſo) however, he followed, and Hermogenes carried him to that ſide on which Cleodora was uſed to ſit: But when they came near the Coach, Beleſis, found her the faireſt that he ſaw. Since it was late before ſhe came into the Walks, and the Sun low, her Face was unmasked, ſo that Beleſis ſaw her, as if Fate had a deſign to fetter him, as indeed really he was: Cleodora was that time in a white dreſs, trimmed with Diamonds and Rubies, having upon her head many feathers of White and Carnation dye, which hung down ſo low behind, that they reached to her Arms when ſhe turned her head: As part of Cleodora's beauties was to have Eyes admirably fair, Complexion white and ruddie, and her ſtature tall, there did not need any ſearch to be made for the diſcovery of it; for ſhe always ſeemed fair at firſt ſight: and ſo that all beholders were perſwaded they ſhould find fairer features upon further conſideration: ſo that it was no wonder if Cleodora did that which many others could not: Beleſis no ſooner ſet his Eyes upon this evening Star, but he preferred it before all the reſt, and deſired Hermogenes to take the other turn: when we heard him ſay ſo, we ſmiled, and asked him whether he found trembling of heart heart and ſpirit, which he ſaid always preceded Love? he anſwered us with a ſmile again, that he was not yet fettered, but feared he ſhould be: if you fear it, ſaid I unto him, why do you follow your enemy, and not rather fly from her? It is becauſe I had rather truſt to my reſiſtance (anſwered he) than to my flight: ſince he ſaid ſo. Beleſis, Hermogenes, and my ſelf met Cleodora the ſecond time, who then knew Hermogenes, for at the firſt time ſhe did not perceive him, becauſe ſhe fixt her eyes ſo faſt upon Beleſis, that ſhe minded not any thing elſe for a long time; As it is very ordinary in ſuch places to look upon ſtrangers, more than upon their old acquaintance, though happily not ſo handſome, and that's the reaſon ſhe did not ſee Hermogenes; but knowing him this ſecond time, ſhe called him unto her, ſeeming to be glad to ſee him, but gladder of the occaſion to aſk the name of that ſtranger whom ſhe ſaw was of his acquaintance. And therefore ſhe no ſooner ſaw him, but calling him, as I told you before, How long Hermogenes (ſaid ſhe unto him) is it ſince you returned? It is ſo lately, Madam, (replied he) that I need not make any excuſe for not having the honour to ſee you before, although you be ſhe whom of all the world I owe moſt reſpect unto, ſince I have not yet been in Suſa. 'Tis very gallant, replied ſhe, to finiſh a years travels with ſuch a walk as this: and if you had been thought in Love when you departed, I ſhould have believed this to be the place where you had appointed to meet your Miſtreſs; To tell you truly, Madam, (replied he) the affection which I have unto this ſtranger whom you ſee here, is the cauſe that I have the honour of ſeeing you here this day, for ſince I had a great deſire he ſhould ſtay here amongſt us, I did what I could to fetter him,and therefore, fair Cleodora, I conjure you, to do me this favourable office. You are a wicked friend (anſwered ſhe) to deſire any ſuch thing; but indeed I cannot think you do deſire it: But Hermogenes, to ſpeak a little more ſeriouſly, tell me this Stranger's Name; his Quality; and his Countrey? I ſhall tell you more than all this (replied Hermogenes) for when I have told you that his Name is Beleſis, of a high Quality, and that he is Mantianian, I ſhall tell you further, that he thinks you the faireſt he ever ſaw; and if you will not believe me, I will move him to tell you as much himſelf. As ſoon as he had ſaid ſo, not giving Cleodora time to anſwer, he turned towards Beleſis, and calling him aloud; Come hither Beleſis (ſaid he unto him) come and confirm what I have told Cleodora; Provided you have told her that I think her the faireſt upon earth (ſaid Beleſis, coming near the Coach which went very ſoftly, and ſaluting her with a low Congie) I ſhall moſt Joyfully confirm your words, and that with an oath, if need be. Doubtleſs, Generous ſtranger (anſwered ſhe, and ſmiled) you think you do Hermogenes a curteſie in commending any thing he ſhews you; and indeed I receive your flatteries rather as a mark of your friendſhip to him, than of any good opinion you have of me If it were ſo, Madam, (replyed Beleſis) I ſhould have commended every beauty which I ſaw in this place before you came, purpoſely to oblige Hermogenes, But I can aſſure you, I commended none but your ſelf: and I muſt add, ſaid Hermogenes, that if Beleſis Love any in Suſa, it muſt be the Fair Cleodora: for he told Alcenor and me, that he perceived in himſelf ſuch a kind of heart-trembling as uſeth to precede Love alwaies; as ſoon as Hermogenes had ſaid ſo, ſo many Coaches met in that Place, as of neceſſity the diſcourſe muſt break off; Beleſis telling Cleodora with his eyes that all Hermogenes ſaid was true, and Cleodora made ſuch ſigns by the actions of her head and hand, as made her thoughts ſomething apparent. After which, all the Ladies retired to their homes, and ſo did we. In our way thither, Beleſis asked us of what diſpoſition Cleodora was: and whether ſhe had many Servants? Since I was better able to inform him than Hermogenes, who had been abſent a whole year, I took upon me to anſwer and ſatisfie his Curioſitie, which indeed was better grounded than he imagined: So that to content him, I told him in general, that there was not one of her Sex in Suſa, who had more or a finer ſpirit than ſhe had: I perceived that already (replied he) both by her Phyſiognomie, and the aire wherewith ſhe ſpoke: But that which I deſire to know, is, of what kind of ſpirit that is? Since that is your deſire (replied I) I muſt tell you that Cleodora hath in appearance more ſweet affabilitie, than ever any had; yet thoſe who know the bottom of her heart, do ſay ſhe is a little more ſevere: but however it be, it is moſt certain, that very many ſtrive to pleaſe her, though ſhe diſlikes all; yet notwithſtanding all this, there is much tenderneſs and goodneſs in her ſpirit: and that there is a mixture of complacence and ſeverity both in her ſoul, which makes her not always of an equal temper, though ſhe be always affably pleaſant. Moreover ſhe is extreamly nice and delicate in choice of her friends, which is commended by ſome, and much blamed by others: for if thoſe who viſit her, be not very compleat men, of admirable Parts, ſhe cares not for their company, nor whether they eſteem her or eſteem her not. You do very much perplex me, ſaid Beleſis; for you tell me ſuch a ſtory as makes Cleodora very dreadful to me; and yet I cannot chuſe but think it much pleaſure to engage the heart of ſuch a one as you deſcribe her. If you dare attempt it (replied I) you are more bold than many compleat Gallants of our Court, who queſtionleſs have a great inclination to love Cleodora, but dare not attempt it: Not but that, as you ſee, ſhe is civil and affable enough; yet it is ſo difficult a task to pleaſe her, that few men have ſo good an opinion of themſelves, as ever to go about it. Moreover this muſt be ſaid in her commendations, that ſhe is never deceived in her choice, and whoſoever ſhe eſteems, does certainly deſerve to be ſo: yet for all that, it were to be wiſhed ſhe would be more indulgent than ſhe is to the imperfections of others; not that ſhe doth ever ſpeak of them; but becauſe ſhe will never ſpeak unto them who have them; or if ſhe do, it is with ſuch a cold indifferency, as makes them deſpair who have ſo much wit as to diſcern it: yet for all this Cleodora is admirably complacent, eſpecially unto thoſe whom ſhe has a deſire to be acquainted with: and therefore ſince you merit to be in the Catalogue of thoſe whom ſhe eſteems, I adviſe you to ſee her, and ſee her often whilſt you are at Suſa. Though it be but out of meer curioſity (replied Beleſis) certainly I will ſee her: let me give you this advice, ſaid Hermogenes, for you muſt know that if Cleodora have not changed her humour, ſhe is yet very fantaſtical, and puts a great difference between the compleat Gallants of the Court, and others; therefore if you deſire to pleaſe her, you muſt not live as a ſtranger that would never be known: perhaps the reaſon is (replied Beleſis) becauſe ſhe is perſwaded it is impoſſible to be compleat unleſs one have ſuch a garb and aire, as is very rarely gotten any where but in Court; beſides that (added I) Cleodora knows not what to ſay unto ſuch as are ignorant of the news which is in the world, and which ſhe knows admirably well. To pleaſe Cleodora then (replied Beleſis) it ſeems I muſt furniſh my ſelf with a hundred thouſand things of diſcourſe: doubtleſs you muſt (replyed I, unleſs you have a priviledge above others) if you would have her talk long with you: Thus, Sir, did Hermogenes and I make Cleodora known unto Beleſis: who was entertained at his friends houſe with much magnificence. The next day following Hermogenes went to the King, and to the Prince of Suſa who then was, and carried Beleſis with him, whoſe name was not unknown unto theſe Princes, for his father had formerly been a long time together at Suſa. After this, two or three days were ſpent in receiving viſits which were rendred unto Hermogenes, and in letting Beleſis ſee the rarities of the town. After this he asked Hermogenes when he would carry him unto Cleodora? for (ſaid he) though I am not yet well furniſhed with ſuch diſcourſe as will divert her, yet I have a great deſire to viſit her. Hermogenes ſent immediately to know whether Cleodora was at home: and anſwer was brought, that about an hour ſince ſhe was gone into the country, and would not return this fifteen days.

Since I intend to ſtay three months in this place (replied Beleſis) to comfort my ſelf, I muſt imagine that it is a delight deferred, not loſt. During the abſence of Cleodora, Hermogenes ſhewed Beleſis all the beauties both in Court and Town, but his heart was not at all moved by them: and being of a pleaſant and quick wit, he made himſelf acquainted with all the friends of Hermogenes in a ſhort time, and knew the ſeveral intereſts and buſineſſes of all the Court, as well as if he had been bred in it all his life. After the expiration of fifteen days, the fair Cleodora returned: and hap would have it ſo, that Beleſis, Hermogenes, and I being in the Walks, we ſaw her return, and ſaluted her: and knowing of her return before-hand, we were there the firſt; and ſince it was yet very timely, we might without any incivility viſit her; but firſt we gave her time to conſult with her Glaſs, and make her ſelf fit to entertain Company. When we were come thither, Hermogenes preſented Beleſis to her Aunt and her alſo; and to compleat his civility unto his friend, he kept the Aunt in diſcourſe, and left Cleodora unto Beleſis and me. In the mean while, as flatteries are ſeldom forgotten when they are handſomly applied; ſo the language of Beleſis unto Cleodora in the Walks, the ſame day he came firſt to Suſa, did now move her unto more affability than ſhe ordinarily uſed, and ſhe ſpoke unto him much more than to any other: yet ſhe treated him as a ſtranger, unto whom ſhe thought it not fit to ſpeak of any thing but in general; therefore beginning her diſcourſe, I do not ask you (ſaid ſhe unto him) whether Hermogenes hath ſhewed you all the Beauties of Suſa, for I make no queſtion but he carried you to all places where you might meet with any delights; therefore I pray you do me the favour to tell me, what you think of our publick places, of our Temples, of our Walks, and of every thing in Suſa? all theſe, Madam (replied Beleſis) ſeem admirably beautiful unto me: but to tell you ſincerely (ſaid he, and laughed) I do not think theſe queſtions proper to divert you: therefore I beſeech you do not uſe me like a ſtranger, unto whom nothing is to be talked on, but the Cuſtoms of his own Country. If I had had the honour to have ſpoke with you the day after I firſt arrived, I ſhould have been patient at ſuch diſcourſe as this: But now, fair Cleodora, it is fifteen days ſince I came to Suſa; ſo that if you think I know nothing yet, but that your ſtreets be large and neat; your Temples beautiful; your Palaces magnificent, and ſuch things, you treat me too cruelly: but I beſeech you, if you love me, do not force your ſelf unto ſuch diſcourſe, but ask me what news, as if I were a Suſianian, and a Courtier. Cleodora hearing Beleſis ſay ſo, began to laugh, not thinking he could tell her any private news: and imagining he would not have ſpoke ſo, but becauſe he had known ſomething of her humour; ſo that beginning to talk again, I ſee you know (ſaid ſhe unto him) that I am afraid of any new acquaintance, nor care for the company of men who are ignorant in the affairs of the World: But Beleſis, I am not ſo unjuſt as they report me: for that which I wonder at, is at the men of Suſa, who are ignorant in all things: but as for you, who are not ſo, nor have dwelt amongſt us, I ſhould be very unreaſonable if I ſhould blame you for not knowing all the ſecrets of our Court, and uncivil alſo, to ſpeak unto you of ſuch things as you underſtand not. For my part (ſaid I, and ſpake unto Beleſis) I conceive you have reaſon to commend Cleodora: on the contrary, replied he, perhaps I have more cauſe to complain of her, than you think I have: but however (ſaid he, ſpeaking unto her) will you be pleaſed to promiſe me, that you will not let me paſs under the notion of a ſtranger, if I do tell you ſome news? I do not mean ſuch (ſaid he, and ſmiled) as is ſpoke aloud in the ſtreets, or ſuch as is whiſpered from ear to ear four days together before it bolt out. Ah Beleſis (ſaid ſhe) you will make me the moſt aſhamed, and do me the greateſt favour in the World, if you can do as you ſay: yet I ſee no likelihood of it, for excepting yeſterday, I have every day received Letters from Suſa, which acquainted ed me with all news that was ſtirring, (however, ſaid he unto her) if I acquaint you with ſomething ſince, you ought not to tax me with ignorance: After this he began to tell her of a hundred paſſages; and to ſpeak unto her, as one that knew all the factions, and ſeveral intereſts of every perſon of Quality, whether it were his Ambition or his Love, or any thing elſe in all the Court and Town: ſo that Cleodora and he came to that paſs, before the Conference ended, that they often whiſpered unto each other, and induced me to change my place, and addreſs my ſelf unto the Aunt of Cleodora, and Hermogenes: And ſo that from this firſt day Beleſis was very intimate with Cleodora, who openly confeſſed that he had told her many things which were never written unto her: Truly (ſaid ſhe unto him, as they were ready to go away) I believe you have been a long time concealed in Suſa: for it is impoſſible you ſhould come to the knowledge of all theſe things (which you have told me) in fifteen days. I know ſomething more, replied he, which doubtleſs, you do not know: Oh I beſeech you (ſaid Cleodora unto him) go not away before you impart it to me: I will (ſaid Beleſis to her) then whiſpering in her ear, Certainly you do not know, ſweet Cleodora (ſaid he unto her, that I am extreamly in Love with you.) I do not indeed (ſaid ſhe aloud and bluſht) and more than that, I do not believe it, or think it poſſible. Time will tell us both more certainly, anſwered Beleſis, and retired: after which we went out, and went unto the houſe of Hermogenes. When we were with Beleſis in his Chamber, we asked him what he thought of Cleodora? I will not tell you, replied he, for perhaps you are not now the cauſe of my ſtaying here; I do not wonder (replied I) that you ſhould be well pleaſed with this beauty, ſince ſhe hath treated you otherwiſe than ſhe uſed to do any that were not her friends, yet her behaviour, ſaid he, would coſt me many an angry hour, if I in earneſt love her: for notwithſtanding her ſweet affability, I diſcover a kind of rigid pride in her, which would grieve me to the ſoul; and notwithſtanding all this, ſhe hath ſuch attracts in her eyes, as I know not how to defend my ſelf againſt them, though I have a great deſire unto it: For my part, ſaid Hermogenes, I ever defended my ſelf againſt her: for though ſhe have many alluring beauties, yet there are many things obſervable in her humour, which are ſo many antidotes againſt the poiſon of her charmes, ſo that I am in no danger of ever dying for love of her. It is not ſo with me, ſaid Beleſis, for I am afraid I ſhall one day complain againſt you for making me acquainted with her. Theſe were the effects, Sir, which the beauty of Cleodora wrought in the heart of Beleſis: and now I will tell you what effects Beleſis produced in the heart of Cleodora. But to let you ſee how even very trifles do often purchaſe great eſteem amongſt Ladies. Be pleaſed to know that Beleſis underſtanding there was a great league of friendſhip between the ſiſter of Hermogenes and Cleodora, he expreſſed much civility towards her, and ſhe to him, her name was Praſſilla: Beleſis being one day with her, he intreated her to ſhew him what rare Gardens there was in Suſa: I ſhould have asked this favour of Hermogenes (ſaid he) but I confeſs unto you I cannot think any Gardens, or walks pleaſant, unleſs in the company of Ladies; and therefore you will much oblige me, if you will do me this honour. Beleſis had no ſooner pronounced the laſt word, but Cleodora entered, who came to viſit Praſſilla: ſhe was no ſooner ſet down, but Praſſilla acquainted Cleodora with the deſire of Beleſis, who the ſooner to compaſs his deſire, ſeemed to hinder Praſſilla from ending that which ſhe had begun to tell: I beſeech you, (ſaid he unto her) do me not ſo bad an office, as to make me paſs yet for a ſtranger unto the fair Cleodora, with whom I am not yet thoroughly acquainted. The reſiſtance which Beleſis made, wrought his deſired effect, and infuſed a great deſire in that Lady, to know what Praſſilla would tell her: ſo that being very urgent, Praſſilla told her, and withal deſired her aſſiſtance in ſetting forth the glories of Suſa. Cleodora being glad of an occaſion to complement with Beleſis, told him, that ſhe was much pleaſed to ſee he was not like moſt travellers, who hardly uſe to know who it is that reigns in the Countrey which they paſs thorow: and who content themſelves onely with the memory of the temples which they have ſeen, of mountains, of rivers, and ſuch things; but never enquire of the manners, cuſtomes, and people, which dwell in thoſe Towns; whoſe ſtreets and publick places, they only uſe to obſerve: But I perceive you are better acquainted with all the Gallants of our Court, than you are with our Gardens: and therefore I am very willing to aſſiſt Praſſilla in letting you ſee them, and if ſhe pleaſe, to morrow ſhall be the day, when with ſome other Ladies that are our friends, we will go unto the moſt pleaſant place in the world, not far off our river. I am very well contented with it, ſaid Praſſilla. And then Beleſis could do no leſs concur with the deſires of two ſuch pleaſant Ladies; always ſeeming to be ſorry Cleodora ſhould treat him as a ſtranger. The matter being thus reſolved upon, and the morrow being come, Hermogenes, Beleſis, and I went to wait upon the Ladies, who were to be preſent at this walk: And Cleodora being in the pleaſant humour, as ſoon as we came unto the place, and came out of the Coach, ſhe held out her hand unto Beleſis, Come hither generous ſtranger (ſaid ſhe unto him) come and ſee the beauties of our Countrey, that you may talk of them when you come into your own. For heavens ſake, Madam, ſaid he unto her, Call me me not ſtranger: I muſt needs call you ſo this day, replied ſhe, and laughed, ſince I ſhall ſhew you a thouſand things you never ſaw before, and ſince you are in a place where you have no acquaintance. I am contented, ſaid he, to be a ſtranger until this day of walking be ended: and ſo am I ſaid ſhe. At the coming into the Garden ſhe willed him to obſerve all the beauties in it: the reſt of the company followed, and mixed diſcourſe. At the firſt Cleodora carried him into a great

Walk of Cypreſs Trees, at the end of which was a Fountain, the waters whereof, riſing up in great ſpouts one upon another, ſeemed as if it were a Rock of Cryſtal, unto which the rayes of the Sun gave colours like to the Bow of Heaven. Afterwards we went to ſit down in a great Arbour of Myrtle, wherein there were twenty four Statues; in the midſt of this Arbour there was a Fountain, whoſe waters were caſt out by twelve Sea Monſters, ſo that half of their bodies were only viſible; in the midſt of which was a Neptune with his Trident. Becauſe this Arbour was exceedingly pleaſant, and had ſeveral ſeats in the midſt, we ſtayed there a long while; Cleodora was always diſputing with Beleſis, and would needs perſwade him he had ſuch things as thoſe he ſaw in his Country: ſhe named all the Flowers and Herbs (that were generally known) unto him; and ſhe was ſo witty upon every ſubject, that ſhe infinitely delighted all the Company: Beleſis did contribute as much as poſſible to augment the mirth: but after we had been a long while there, Beleſis told Cleodora that to compleat all her favours, it would be a great addition, if ſhe would be pleas'd to let him ſee the Houſe unto which the Garden belonged. You will not find it ſo pleaſant as what you have ſeen already, ſaid ſhe; for excepting one Parlour, and a Vault, which are exceedingly cool in Summer, all the reſt are inconſiderable: yet, if you will, we'll go: In ſaying ſo, Cleodora roſe up, Beleſis continually leading her, and all the Company following until we came to the Parlour door: Then did Cleodora ſend unto the Porter to open the door: But, Sir, there was no need to ſtay long for him; becauſe as ſoon as Cleodora and Beleſis came to the door, it was opened: and Cleodora ſaw that there was a very magnificent Banquet prepared. She was ſo ſurprized at the ſight, and ſo little imagining it could be Beleſis who prepared it, that ſhe retired, and would her ſelf have ſhut the door, ſuppoſing there might be ſome ſecret piece of gallantry of other Men: But ſhe was not long in that errour, for Beleſis thruſting open the door, there was heard a conſort of rare Muſick: after which, turning towards Cleodora, he beſeeched her to excuſe him as a ſtranger, if he did not treat her ſo handſomely as he would do. How, Beleſis (ſaid ſhe unto him) do I ſhew you the Garden, and is it you that gives us this coſtly Banquet? At leaſt, confeſs that Hermogenes and Alcenor have ordered the buſineſs. I will not ſhame them ſo much (replied he) by telling ſuch an untruth, to excuſe my ſelf withall for your no better entertainment: Then did Hermogenes and I declare that we knew nothing of it: So that after this, every one was raviſhed with admiration, acclamations and commendations of Beleſis: Cleodora asked pardon for treating him as a ſtranger, and promiſing never to do ſo again as long as ſhe liv'd. The truth is, we praiſed Beleſis ſo much, that every one forgot there was ſuch a thing as ſilence in Nature: And the company was ſo highly ſatisfied with this pleaſant ſurprize, that it wrought no ſmall effect in the heart of Cleodora: For there is nothing ſo prevalent with a growing affection, as to act ſome high piece of gallantry as may cauſe many perſons to commend one in the preſence of her he loves. Thus, Sir, did Beleſis ceaſe to be a ſtranger with Cleodora; who after this did viſit her very often, and with whom he fell ſo deep in love as he intended to ſtay as long as he could in Suſa. He carried it out ſo very well, his Parents ſending him wherewith to put himſelf in Equipage, that there was not one man of his condition in all the Court, who lived at a finer rate than he. In the mean time, he knew ſo admirably well how to take the height of Cleodora's ſpirit, that he was in very favourable eſteem with her; yet durſt never ſpeak ſeriouſly of his paſſion to her: for he knew it was a dangerous buſineſs to ſpeak unto her of any love: At firſt ſhe declared, that ſhe ranked him in the Catalogue of her friends in general: A while after, ſhe did him the favour to acknowledge publickly, that he was in the number of three or four whom ſhe preferred before all the reſt: and a while after that, I believe Beleſis knew, without her telling him, that he was the prime of her friends. In the mean while he durſt not diſcover himſelf to be her Lover, but only her friend : for he being very intimate with her, ſhe confeſſed one day unto him, that ſhe ſhould be the moſt ſatisfied woman in the World, if ſhe could once ſee, how far the patience of an ill treated Lover could go : You may well think, ſaid ſhe unto him, that I am in no humour of any gallantry : but if ever I chance to run out of my wits ſo far as to take any pleaſure in the folly of another, and that the fantaſtical Fate of Love do ever ſend me a Lover, certainly I ſhall not take any greater pleaſure in the World, than in tormenting him. And truly I do not think any thing ſo ſweet, as to make ſuch a ſort of men to ſuffer, as make little mole-hills to be great mountains of miſery. But is it poſſible (ſaid Beleſis to her) that you ſhould be capable of any ſuch thoughts of cruelty ? If I ſhould (ſaid ſhe, and laughed) cut the throat of a man with my own hand; poiſon another; ſet a Town on fire; and a thouſand ſuch things, doubtleſs theſe would be horrour unto me, and I ſhould rather dye than think of any ſuch things; But Beleſis, ſince in making a man miſerable, I am only a little partial, a little angry, and a little inſenſible : I ſhall not much ſtart at it, though it purchaſe me the name inhumane, inexorable, and cruel : yes, a Tygreſs if you pleaſe, or any thing rather than to come puling with finger in eye, and tell me that I am fair, that I am amiable, and that I am charming. Therefore it is a great happineſs, that I was not born with beauty enough to make many Conqueſts: for certainly my Reign would have been tyrannical. Yet I can hardly believe it, replied Beleſis : for thoſe who live under your power, methinks have no mind to rebel : 'Tis then becauſe I do not know they are my Subjects, replied ſhe; for if I did, I ſhould quickly make them ſlaves, and ſlaves ſo loaded with Irons, that perhaps they would endeavour to break them. Cleodora ſpoke this with ſo much earneſtneſs of ſpirit, as Beleſis was amazed, and durſt not be ſo bold as to declare himſelf, as he once intended; becauſe he thought ſhe ſpoke it purpoſely that he ſhould not engage himſelf to ſerve her: and indeed this thought did ſo damp his ſpirit, as from that day he became very reſerved and melancholy; and ſo much, that he never enquired after any thing: ſo that in lieu of furniſhing Cleodora with news, and acquainting her with all paſſages before any knew it, he did enquire of her, for he did not know ſo much as the common news of the ſtreet. This lovely Lady, perceiving his change, began one day when he was alone with her, to chide him, and alſo to oblige him, for as good hap for him was, ſhe was not then in an humour ſo to hide her anger, as none could diſcover it. Is it poſſible (ſaid ſhe unto him) I ſhould ever ſee ſuch an alteration? for indeed, you do not leſs aſtoniſh me now you are ignorant of all that is done in Suſa, than you did when you came firſt, and yet knew every thing: Is it becauſe you are weary of your complacency towards me? Is the reaſon, becauſe you are weary of Suſa? or is it becauſe you think news not fit for diſcourſe, and intend to reform the World by your example? It is not any of theſe you have named, Madam, replied he; But the reaſon is, becauſe there is ſomething ſo choaks my mind, that I can think of nothing elſe for it. The only remedy for ſuch an humour, anſwered Cleodora, is to frequent no places but where one hath ſome buſineſs, which may drive it out of your thoughts: The reaſon why I am now ignorant of every thing (replied Beleſis) is, becauſe I cannot go unto the place where I have any buſineſs: and in that place, I do not hearken to what people ſay. But Beleſis (replied Cleodora, not gueſſing at what he would ſay) I ſee you continually here: 'Tis true, Madam (anſwered he) but the reaſon why I am continually here, is, becauſe no other place pleaſeth me: It ſeems then (ſaid ſhe craftily) that you have no deſire to pleaſe your ſelf: for of late you are always muſing, and never ſpeak. The reaſon is, Madam, replied he, becauſe I am afraid to ſpeak that which you have no deſire to know. Provided you do not ſpeak of any thing wherein I have any intereſt, anſwered ſhe, there is nothing which you can ſpeak that will offend me. Methinks, replied Beleſis, your curioſity would be more rational, if you deſired to know that which concerns you, than that which concerns you not: however it be, ſaid ſhe unto him, it is my humour, and all thoſe that deſire to pleaſe me, muſt conform themſelves unto it. But, Madam (replied he, with a very ſerious countenance) if I ſhould tell you there is a perſon who complains againſt you, a perſon whom I have heard you ſay you eſteemed, would you not deſire to know of what he accuſeth you, to the end you might juſtifie your ſelf? No, replied ſhe, for if I be accuſed wrongfully, it is not worth my juſtification: and if I be culpable, it is as I would be, and be both incapable of repentance or excuſe. I cannot believe you ſo unjuſt (replied Beleſis) but ſince you will neither juſtifie nor excuſe your ſelf, may I not think you would not have others juſtifie or excuſe themſelves? No, ſaid ſhe; for by the ſame reaſon that I would not give an account of my actions unto others, do I deſire that others ſhould do that which I will not do my ſelf. If this be ſo, Madam, replied Beleſis, then I hope you will not be offended when I tell you, that the reaſon why I am ignorant of all the paſſages of the World, is, becauſe all my endeavours are employed to know your heart; and the reaſon why I ſpeak ſo little, is, becauſe I am afraid to ſpeak too ſoon, eſpecially when I ſhall tell you that I love you in ſuch a fatal minute, as ſhall for ever purchaſe your hatred. I aſſure you, replied Cleodora, all times are alike for that, and there is not one minute in which I ſhould allow you to ſpeak of any ſuch thing, therefore I pray you never do it; you are ſo far engaged in an odd diſcourſe, but you may turn it into a Raillery. No, no, Madam, ſaid Beleſis, I ſpeak moſt ſeriouſly: and I had rather incenſe you by diſcovering the violent paſſion of my heart, than that you ſhould be for ever ignorant of it: I have heretofore heard you ſay, that you had rather be called cruel, inhumane, and inexorable, than be commended; therefore methinks you ought not to think it ſtrange, that I had rather you would call me raſh, preſumptuous, and inſolent, than that you ſhould commend me only as your beſt friend: Since you would have it ſo, replied Cleodora, I will do what I can to ſatisfie you, though till now I was never put to the neceſſity of it. I beſeech you, Madam, ſaid Beleſis, do not treat me with the extremity of your rigour and anger. I was ſo far from it (replied ſhe, and laughed) that if I had been now in an angry humour, I am confident you would not have ſpoken thus, but I ſhould have impoſed ſilence ſtill upon you, though I muſt ingenuouſly confeſs, that within this quarter of an hour, I endeavoured to be angry with you, but could not: and the reaſon was, becauſe I did not believe any ſuch thing as you ſpeak of: Ah, Madam, cryed Beleſis, I will have none of your ſweetneſs upon ſuch hard conditions; yet what probability is there, that the fair Cleodora ſhould know what is done in every place where ſhe is not, and be ignorant of what paſſeth in my heart, where continually ſhe is? Moreover, Madam, who is able to keep me at Suſa, unleſs your ſelf? The friendſhip of Hermogenes, replied ſhe, who brought you hither: 'Tis true, replied he, I came hither for the Love of him; but yet more true, that I ſtay here for the Love of you, Madam. If what you ſay be true, replied ſhe, I adviſe you to depart from Suſa aſſoon as you can; for Beleſis, to tell you truly, I am a better friend, than I ſhall be a Miſtreſs, though I ſhould ſuffer you to love me: but indeed I cannot do that; and you cannot do me a more ſenſible diſpleaſure, than to perſwade me that you love me: for what inclination ſoever I have to love news, yet I do not love to be the news of others: and when I conſider, that if you take a fancy of doing ſuch things for me, as men who would be thought to be in Love, uſe; every one will begin to whiſper, that Beleſis loves Cleodora, and perhaps they will add, that Cleodora allows of it without reſiſtance; I ſhall be ſo extreamly angry, that I ſhall go near to hate you. Madam, replied Beleſis, the only way to prevent all whiſperings that I am in Love with you, is to permit me the liberty of telling it unto you in ſecret, and that you do not force me to deſpair; for, Madam, I conceive it an eaſie matter for an happy Lover to be ſecret: But if you will not believe that I love you, and let me ſpeak of it ſometimes unto you, then I ſhall be forced to perſwade you of the truth, by doing a thouſand things which would diſcover my paſſion unto all the World.

Therefore, Fair Cleodora, conſider well before you pronounce the ſentence of my death, whether I do deſerve it; if it be your pleaſure, none ſhall ever know that I love you, and you your ſelf ſhall only know what power you have over my ſoul. But if you will not allow me to ſpeak of my Love in private, I profeſs unto you, I will make every man a Confident of my Paſſion, not only to the end I may have ſome comfort in complaining againſt your Rigour, but to the end alſo that all the World may ſpeak of you; you ſhall ſee (hard hearted Woman) whether it is better a 100000 men ſhould ſay I love you, than that I my ſelf only ſhould tell it you, and that with a moſt unparallel'd Reſpect. I pray, Beleſis, ſaid Cleodora, hold your peace, unleſs you have a mind to provoke me into very rude language, for if you continue any longer, the anger of my heart will ſo riſe, that I ſhall rail againſt you. As Cleodora was ſaying ſo, I came in, and broke off their diſcourſe: I eaſily perceived they had been in ſome private talk; for I ſaw ſuch a lively colour in the cheeks of Cleodora, and ſo much anger in the eyes of Beleſis, that I almoſt gueſſed at the paſſage between them: after this, Cleodora put in practice what ſhe had formerly told Beleſis: For there was no kind of ſeverity, which ſhe did not ſhew unto him, though ſhe eſteemed him infinitely, and perhaps loved him alſo. She did not only avoid all occaſions of talking with him alone, but if in any company he came amongſt them, ſhe would talk to ſome other in his preſence, yet truly ſhe was always civil towards him: for I believe ſhe did not ſtrive to quench thoſe flames which ſhe had kindled in his Soul, but did in her wiſhes rather blow the bellows and increaſe it: yet all her civilities towards him did much grieve rather than comfort Beleſis: and one day finding her alone, he complained of his miſerable condition unto her. I reſpect you ſo much, Madam (ſaid he unto her) that I will not complain of all your cruelties and ſcorns, for indeed I think my ſelf worthy of them; for, Madam, what good will all your civilities do me, if you have reſolved upon my ruine? is it becauſe you love long torments, and becauſe a violent death will not fully ſatisfie your cruelty? Civility, replied Cleodora, is a debt due even to our very enemies. I know very well, Madam, (replied he) that it is to be uſed in War, and Combats; but I know alſo, that you ought not to uſe it to a man who importunes you for Love, and whoſe preſence angers you. Ah, Beleſis, (ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled) I muſt needs make a difference between Beleſis and Beleſis, (if I may ſo ſpeak) for truly I did infinitely eſteem that pleaſing ſtranger who did ſo much invite my curioſity, the firſt time I ſaw him, and whoſe company was very delightful to me in many entertainments, and pleaſant Walks. But I muſt confeſs that this Beleſis now, is not ſo ſuitable to my humour as the other was. Provided you will love either of them (replied he, and ſmiled as well as ſhe) I will promiſe the other ſhall not offend you, or complain againſt you: Seriouſly, Beleſis, (ſaid ſhe unto him) can there be any truth in your words? Seriouſly, cruel Lady, replied he, can you doubt it? For indeed Cleodora, if you did not know that I loved you, then your behaviour to me was unreaſonable; and if you did know it, it was unjuſt and inhumane: Conſider therefore with your ſelf, I conjure you, or to ſay better, conſider me, and force me not into deſpair. To ſhew you (ſaid ſhe unto him) that I would not abſolutely diſoblige you, I will make an ingenuous declaration unto you, but I pray you do not put another gloſs upon my words than my meaning will bear. Never fear, Divine Cleodora, (ſaid he unto her) that I will flatter my ſelf with any thing that you can ſay unto me; for I look upon my miſeries through ſuch a glaſs as makes them ſeem greater than they are, and my happineſs leſs. Since ſo, (replyed ſhe) I will not fear to tell you, that I do infinitely eſteem you; and if I were capable of ſo much weakneſs as to love any, it ſhould be you ſooner than any other: But for all that, I muſt tell you, both for your good and my own, it is requiſite I loved you but a little: For if I ſhould proceed ſo far as to tell you that your Paſſion pleaſeth me, I ſhould be ſo much aſhamed that it would make me extreamly melancholy: and ſince melancholy begets vexation, and vexation anger, we ſhould always be quarrelling; therefore to compoſe things, and that you may not complain of my injuſtice, I will make a propoſition unto you; which is, that you ſhall love me much leſs than you do, and I will love you a little more than I do; to the end our affections may meet in the medium, and become a more ſolid and true friendſhip. When you begin to love me a little more, (replyed he) I ſhall try if I can love you much leſs: Oh, Beleſis, ſaid ſhe, it is you that muſt begin firſt, and not I. Alas, Madam, (replyed he, and ſighed) if you cannot love me when I love you as much as I can, I doubt you will not love me at all, if I love you leſs. But, cruel Woman, my affection to you is not in my choice, as it ſeems yours to me is in yours; for whether you would have me love you, or not love you, I ſhall always love you, not only whether you will or no, but alſo whether I will or or no: Yes, inhumane heart that you are, dou do often make me wiſh I could not love, but I cannot drive out of my heart that Paſſion which tyrannizeth in it. Beleſis had many more expreſſions of his ſoul, but could not obtain any more from her; yet he thought himſelf very happy that he was treated no worſe. In the mean time, the rare merits of Beleſis had a moſt powerful influence upon the heart of Cleodora; yet was it long before ſhe would give him any voluntary teſtimonies of it: But yet without any deſign at all, ſhe would often do ſuch things as let Hermogenes and me know that ſhe did not hate him: For though ordinarily ſhe ſeemed very cold in the buſineſs, when he did earneſtly ſeek for opportunities of ſeeing her; yet when it chanced that he was not in any place where ſhe imagined he would follow her, ſhe would always twit him with ſome piece of rallary or other: ſo that one may ſay, (if it be lawful to ſay ſo of ſuch an amiable perſon as Cleodora was) that her fantaſticalneſs was the firſt favour which Beleſis received from her: But at laſt, after a long conteſt between her lenity and her ſeverity, ſhe yielded a little, and confeſſed unto Beleſis, that ſhe was well pleaſed he could not love her leſs. It is a hard task to tell how joyful this half deſpairing Lover was when he obtained leave to talk of his Paſſion unto Cleodora: the memory of all her rigour was pleaſing unto him; and though ſhe granted no further favour than ſuffering her ſelf to be loved, yet did he eſteem himſelf the moſt happy Man alive; yet was his happineſs not long tranquil, becauſe the more Cleodora began to love Beleſis, the more hard ſhe was to be pleaſed. If he expreſſed much love, ſhe would ſay he was imprudent to expreſs ſo many viſible marks of his Paſſion; if he offered to hide it, ſhe would chide him for changing, and ſay he loved her leſs; if he were pleaſant, ſhe would think ſhe had given him too many teſtimonies of her affection, and would ſay ſhe repented; if he were ſad, ſhe would accuſe him for not being ſufficiently ſenſible of her favours, by his expreſſions of joy: ſo that whatſoever Beleſis could either ſay or do, there was ſome exceptions or other ſtill againſt him, and continual jars between them. However, they knew that they loved, and were confident of it, though they would often uſe ſuch expreſſions as would make others believe they loved not at all. Yet for ll this Beleſis had many pleaſant hours; for Cleodora would ſuffer him to write when he could not ſee her; and ſhe gave him her Picture, ſo that the unequality of her humours would move one to ſay that Roſes have always thorns in them, and thorns bear roſes. Thus, Sir, did Beleſis live a long time, whilſt Hermogenes and I without any intended deſigns, did recreate our ſelves in the viſiting of Ladies with all indifferency that could be: Yet Hermogenes went leſs to viſit Cleodora than any other, to the end (as he ſaid) that his friend might have more opportunities of courting his Miſtreſs alone. Things being upon theſe terms, it chanced that a Siſter of Cleodora's Aunt died in the Country, where ſhe had lived a long time: and having left only one Daughter, called Leoniſa, about the age of fifteen years: This young Lady came unto Suſa, to dwell with her Mother's Siſter, and conſequently in the houſe with Cleodora. When ſhe came thither, Beleſis, Hermogenes and I were gone a journey of eight days before we returned; and then we went to Cleodora, who had already contracted a great friendſhip with her new-come Couſin: But, Sir, we were all wonder when we ſaw Leoniſa: for though we knew ſhe was to come to Suſa, and had heard ſay ſhe was very fair, yet we could not chuſe but be dazled at the luſtre of her eyes, and purity of her complexion: Nature never gave unto any one ſuch lovely hair, pure colours, ſprightly eyes, and handſom mouth: though her ſtature was not tall, yet it was not low; but ſo rightly proportioned in all parts, and ſo noble, that ſhe was a delightful Wonder; her affability was as admirable as her Beauty: the lovely Air of her Aſpect was ſuch, that her eyes never took any hearts without giving ſome hopes of moving hers, though yet as modeſt as poſſible could be. Thus, Sir, appeared Leoniſa, when Beleſis firſt ſaw her with Cleodora, who preſented us all unto her lovely Couſin, whoſe civility to us appeared as much as ſhe was ſprightly and fair. Since Cleodora and Leoniſa were of different Beauties, envy took no hold of their ſouls, and they had this advantage, that they did not injure each other; though it muſt be confeſſed that Leoniſa had more amiable ſparks of youth in her face than Cleodora had, though there was but three years difference in their Age. In the mean time, as it is civility to commend all Beauties, eſpecially at the firſt ſight, Hermogenes and I did extreamly commend the beauty of Leoniſa; Beleſis alſo commended her, but leſs than we, becauſe it was before his Miſtreſs; for my part, ſince I had no ſuch reaſon upon me, I did as much as I could extol Leoniſa: I asked her whether they had not already written of the death of many of her Lovers about that place from whence ſhe came, whom very grief for her abſence muſt needs kill? For, ſaid I unto her, if they were not dead they would have followed you, and we ſhould have ſeen them here. I aſſure you, ſaid ſhe, and laughed, if I had as much beauty as to make any Lover in the place from whence I came, and to make them follow me hither, I ſhould not have brought very good company with me, and therefore it is my happineſs that I have made no Conqueſts. But you will make ſome here, and that quickly, replyed Hermogenes; and queſtionleſs ſhe will not make many Inconſtants, added I: Fie, fie, ſaid Cleodora, I beſeech you, do not preſage ſo many misfortunes unto Leoniſa at one time. It ſeems, (ſaid Leoniſa very pleaſingly, and bluſhed) that I have not yet lived, but came from a ſavage place, where they know not what Love is: For I ſhould think it more glorious to take hearts from other Beauties who took them firſt, than to take ſuch as were never captivated by any. It is meerly malice, Leoniſa, replyed Cleodora, to ſay any ſuch thing, and much injuſtice and vanity alſo. Did I not tell you, replyed Leoniſa, that I knew not how to argue rightly upon ſuch a ſubject? Yet whatſoever you ſay, I muſt needs think that it would be very pleaſant. But would you be contented, replyed Cleodora, that they ſhould quit you for another? No, anſwered Leoniſa, and becauſe I do fancy how extreamly vexed I ſhould be, if ſuch a thing ſhould chance unto me, therefore I do perfectly fancy the pleaſure of cauſing it to others: If the miſeries of others do ſo delight you (ſaid Beleſis who had not yet ſpoken) I extreamly pity thoſe who are deſtined to love you; I believe they are ſo ſmall a number, replied ſhe, as I believe I ſhall not give you any great ſubject of compaſſion. For my part (ſaid Cleodora only for arguments ſake with her Couſin) I wiſh with all my ſoul that the firſt heart you captivate may be inconſtant, and caſt off your fetters to puniſh you for your unjuſt opinion: I cannot yet repent of it (ſaid Leoniſa) for when I conſider the pleaſures I ſhould take in rooting the image of another out of the heart of him whom I have captivated, and forced this Lover to let me ſee the Picture and Letters of his firſt Miſtreſs, and how I ſhould delight in looking upon the one, and reading the other, I aſſure you it is worth wiſhing I were ſo fair as to make ſome inconſtant Lover to be my Votary: In good earneſt, (ſaid Cleodora, and laughed) you will make me believe you know not what you ſay: I do confeſs, I do not, ſaid Leoniſa: but I know what will pleaſe me; and yet I do not ſay I will love this inconſtant Man, whom I would make; for my deſign is only to laugh and make ſport with him when I have made him ſo. Fy, fy, fair Leoniſa, ſaid Hermogenes, you are now worſe than your Couſin thinks you; for why ſhould you deſire to gain hearts, unleſs you were reſolved to part with your own? That reſolution (replyed Leoniſa) methinks is too much: and I muſt tell you, I have ſo good an opinion of my Sex, that I do not think there is one who is ſo liberal as to part ſo eaſily with their heart. Yet I muſt confeſs, (ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled) ſome Men will vaunt how they poſſeſs the hearts of many fair ones; but certainly they got them ſurreptitiouſly, by craft or violence. I aſſure you, (replyed Hermogenes) which way ſoever one enjoys yours, he will enjoy a moſt glorious and Heavenly happineſs. Though it were ſo, (anſwered ſhe) yet this Heavenly happineſs you ſpeak of ſhould coſt him ſome ſorrows before he enjoyed it; for I am reſolved not to give him the leaſt room in my heart, and therefore am farr from giving it all unto him; I pray you Leoniſa, ſaid Cleodora, do not ſpeak ſo reſolutely, ſince it is no prudence to triumph before the Victory; you never yet heard any Courtſhip, but only Country complements, and have all your life been brought up amongſt ruſtiques; and yet you are as confident of your ſelf, as if you had made all the Gallants of Suſa bow knees unto your beauty, and as if you ſcorned them all: Believe me, Leoniſa, it is no diſcretion to have ſo good an opinion of your own ſtrength, and I have known ſome as well conceited as your ſelf, who ſlighting their enemies, are ſometimes overcome, therefore do not brag that you are invincible: when you have been a year or two at Court, and when your beauty hath made an infinite number of ſlaves who have caſt off their firſt Miſtreſſes to enter into your fetters, and when you have defended your ſelf againſt them all, we will then freely allow you to ſpeak thus boldly, but till then, I muſt tell you I cannot endure it. 'Tis better for me to ſay nothing, replied Leoniſa, than to diſpute againſt you. Then, after a while of ſome other diſcourſe, Beleſis, Hermogenes, and I, took our leaves, being all very well pleaſed with the beauty and wit of Leoniſa, and concluding her to be the only ſtarr of the Court or Town. Beleſis yet did hardly conſent unto this ſo clearly as we did, and only ſaid that if Leoniſa had not a couſin in Suſa, ſhe had clearly tranſcended all that was amiable. In the mean time, ſince he could never ſee Cleodora, but he muſt ſee Leoniſa alſo, becauſe they dwelt both in one houſe, therefore he ſaw her every day: and as Leoniſa was one of thoſe beauties which the more one looks the more one likes, ſo Beleſis ſeeing her more than any other, did eſteem her more than any, though ſhe was generally eſteemed of all: Leoniſa alſo was more civil and complacential unto Beleſis than ſhe was to any other, not only becauſe his merits did excel others, but alſo becauſe ſhe obſerved that her Aunt and Cleodora eſteemed him very much; ſo that Beleſis finding her to be of a very ſweet and affable condition, uſed to ſeek for ſome comfort in her company, when Cleodora did at any time frown upon him, and ſo it chanced, that Leoniſa againſt her will cauſed a quarrel to riſe between them: For as her beauty was all the talk of the Town, ſhe attracted abundance of Gallants about her, and alſo ſome others that were not over well accompliſhed: ſo that Cleodora who was uſed only unto very choice company, grew weary of ſuch a miſcellany of many men, and her complacency to them was very cold: ſhe told Leoniſa divers times of it: but ſhe not being of her Couſins humour, and being ſomething younger than ſhe, ſhe could not find in her heart to baniſh any that came unto her, and ſeemed to eſteem her: ſo that ſhe told Cleodora, that ſhe could not be uncivil unto any, and more than that, ſhe ought not to take ſo much upon her in a houſe where ſhe is rather to obey than command: Cleodora durſt not ſpeak of it unto her Aunt, becauſe ſhe knew it would not pleaſe her, that ſhe ſhould be of any ſuch critical humour: and therefore not knowing what courſe to take, ſhe entreated Beleſis one day (ſince ſhe obſerved there was a great confidence between Leoniſa and him) that he would tell her, that her univerſal civility did much offend her: and, if ſhe anſwer you (ſaid ſhe unto him) that ſhe does not love to diſoblige any one, tell her that in all reaſon ſhe ought rather to oblige ſome one compleat Gallant to eſteem her, and not ſhew ſuch equal civility unto all that come to ſee her: As Cleodora ſaid ſo, and thinking none did hear her but Beleſis, Leoniſa was unknown in a Cloſet, and came unto them laughing, and addreſſed her ſelf extream ſweetly unto Cleodora: I beſeech you, ſaid ſhe, do not condemn me, before I may anſwer for my ſelf: Cleodora perceiving that Leoniſa had heard what ſhe ſaid, ſeemed as if ſhe knew that ſhe was in the Cloſet, and ſpoke purpoſely that ſhe might underſtand her: In the mean time I will ſeriouſly tell you Leoniſa before Beleſis (ſaid ſhe) who knows the world very well: that there are two ſorts of people, who without any choice uſe to affect a multitude which thus daily flock about you: I pray tell me, ſaid Leoniſa, in which Catalogue you rank me, and who are thoſe two ſorts of people, which ſo affect that which I muſt confeſs I do not hate? They are, replied Cleodora, either Country people newly come to town, or elſe they are light headed huſwifes which love tatling. Surely, ſaid Leoniſa, I am not of this laſt number; I confeſs it, ſaid Cleodora, for if you be, you would make me much to wonder; yet I muſt ſay thus much for you, that you ſmell not at all of the Country, unleſs in this humour: But Cleodora, ſaid Leoniſa, is it not an undeniable Maxime, that civility ought to be ſhewed unto all in general? and is it not by eſteem only, that one ought to put a difference between thoſe men we ſee? No, ſaid Cleodora, for which way can one expreſs eſteem but by civility, when one would diſtinguiſh one of excellent qualities from others? you know it is not handſom to give men tender and obliging language.

The word friendſhip is ſomething too hard to pronounce; and it is dangerous to uſe it in ſpeaking unto young and Courtly Gallants; and the truth is, a man muſt give a thouſand teſtimonies of his wiſdom, or elſe do ſome very conſiderable piece of ſervice, before it will be handſom to be tender and affectionate to him: after this, conſider Leoniſa, whether you be not too prodigal of your civility, unleſs it be ſhewed only unto ſuch men as really eſteem you: I ſhall be very reſerved in my favours and my eſteem, replied Leoniſa, and be prodigal only of a thouſand trivial paſſages and behaviours, which indeed are nothing elſe but common civility; your praiſes, and commendations, and eſteem, replied Cleodora, are certainly of an ineſtimable value; But Leoniſa, It is men only that muſt handſomly give commendations ſo frequently, when they ſpeak unto Ladies, and ſurely you never told Beleſis ſince you ſaw him, that you think him very handſom, that his wit doth infinitely pleaſe you, and that his company charms you: Alas, Madam, ſaid Beleſis, I beſeech you do not Jeer me in your diſputes, for it is not I who cauſeth the fair eyes of Leoniſa to attract ſo much company that troubles you; I pray you, ſaid Leoniſa to Beleſis, let me anſwer Cleodora my ſelf; I pray anſwer then directly, replied ſhe; ſo I will replied Leoniſa, and therefore I will confeſs I never ſpoke any ſuch thing unto Beleſis as you mention; yet I aſſure you, that maugre this univerſal civility wherewith you upbraid me, Beleſis hath obſerved that I put a great difference between him and many others: ſpeak Beleſis, ſaid Cleodora, does Leoniſa ſay truth? have you perceived that eſteem which ſhe had of you from that which ſhe had unto any elſe? Beleſis was now much put to it; for he was unwilling to diſoblige Leoniſa, and fearful alſo to anger Cleodora; ſo that carrying a level hand between them both, I have ſo little right unto fair Leoniſa's eſteem, replied he, that I cannot imagine how ſhe ſhould put any difference between me and the loweſt rank of qualified men: But as I am oft apt to flatter my ſelf, and to believe things which I deſire, I muſt confeſs I have obſerved ſome kind of civility uſed more obligingly unto me than unto ſome others to whom ſhe hath done more reverence; ſo admirably well doth ſhe know the art of obliging by little things. Believe not Beleſis (ſaid Cleodora unto Leoniſa) ſince I aſſure you, he is no lover of multitudes; and certainly he hath good reaſon for it; So have you Leoniſa; for what can you do with ſo many men? you cannot marry them all; You would not be thought a Tatler; you cannot eſteem them all, and therefore how can you endure them all? Nothing is more ſweet unto me, replied Leoniſa, than to think that none doth hate me, but that every one on the contrary ſhould eſteem and commend me. Alas Leoniſa (ſaid Cleodora) what extream folly is it to ſay ſo? for what good will the eſteem of a thouſand men do you, when you eſteem not them; and believe it, Dear Leoniſa, it is very well if one can live ſo as none ſhall hate them, without affecting that all the World ſhould love them; I do confeſs, that one ought to do all the good they can, and not to let a perſon drown for want of a hand lent to help him out. Yet for all this, one muſt love for themſelves and their friends, and not altogether for the publick; The fitteſt places for expreſſions of civility is in the Temples, in the walks, and in the ſtreets; but in my chamber, if my coldneſs to thoſe that trouble me would not drive them away, I ſhould be then uncivil, and perhaps go a little further ſometimes, to rid my ſelf of ſome ſuch men as I know; and certainly all this, not without good reaſon, for one dull fellow may hinder me from enjoying the converſation of the compleateſt man in the world. And truly I have ſo nice a ſpirit, that I cannot endure this kind of complacency, which will not purchaſe one real friend in a thouſand years: 'tis very true, ſaid Leoniſa, that perhaps I have fewer friends than you but perhaps I can brag of having fewer enemies: and do you not conſider it is a hard matter to find a man who will not think you of too myſterious and private a ſpirit? how many have you diſobliged by not ſpeaking to them, or by ſpeaking too much unto ſome whom you affect more than them. I know not what you ſay, replied Cleodora, but I pray take notice that the ſcorn or hatred of ſome men moves me not at all: nor do I value the blaſt of vulgar popularity more than an unconſtant puff of wind. I care not for the eſteem of the giddy multitude; when I began the world, and ſet laws unto my life, I reſolved never to do any thing which would draw odium upon my ſelf: But I never reſolved to trouble my ſelf ſo much as to get the love of all the world: but on the contrary I am very deſirous of the love of a very few, becauſe I think a very few are worthy of reciprocal Returns: moreover I conſider that one ſingle perſon cannot poſſibly love many men; And true happineſs is to live with one they love, and to ſhun the ſight of thoſe they love not. Theſe Leoniſa are my Maximes, which never will be yours, unleſs you change your humour. To teſtifie unto you, ſaid Leoniſa, how much I value your judgment, I do profeſs, that I would abſolutely live as you would have me; I beſeech you, Madam, after this (ſaid Beleſis unto Cleodora) do not chide Leoniſa any more;

For ought I ſee (ſaid Cleodora unto him) you are very much devoted unto her, and would not any think who hear you ſpeak, that I am in the greateſt wrong in the world, and that Leoniſa is in the right? you, I ſay, who have told me a thouſand times that a multitude was as odious to you, as the company of one qualified perſon was pleaſant: and that the converſation of above three or four at the moſt, was ever troubleſome to you; and yet you have not put in one word to ſtrengthen my ſide, but your ſilence hath ſo fortified Leoniſa's, that ſhe thinks in her heart your ſilence was only out of diſcretion, and becauſe you had no mind to condemn me. Madam, (ſaid he unto her) ſeeing Leoniſa ſubmits unto you, I think you intend to pick a new quarrel with me, for I did not think it juſt to meddle in a buſineſs wherein I had no intereſt; when one comes into a place (Replied ſhe with a ſcornful ſmile) where the perſon who talks is not ſuitable to their likeing, it is an eaſie matter to make excuſes and pretend buſineſs to decline the company. And Leoniſa, be not deluded, for moſt of the men who come unto thoſe houſes which are as publick as the Temples, and frequent them, more do come only for their own ends; if it be winter, they ſeek out warm chambers; if ſummer, coole roomes; they are choice in their very ſeats; ſome talk of riding horſes, others of ſome buſineſs: ſome not knowing whither to go, are there out of neceſſity; and perhaps of a hundred men that frequent theſe houſes, there is not one has any honourable deſign; For my part, I who do not deſire men ſhould ſeek me, I hate that kind of life, and therefore (ſaid ſhe in riſing up) leſt my company and diſcourſe ſhould ſeem too long unto you both; I will go unto my chamber, where none but ſuch as pleaſe me enters; by that reaſon, ſaid Leoniſa, I hope Beleſis and I may follow you. I am infinitely obliged unto you (ſaid Beleſis unto Leoniſa) for ſpeaking ſo advantageouſly for me: but I am afraid Cleodora will hardly conſent unto part of your motion; I ſhall conſent unto leſs than you imagine (ſaid ſhe) for I will not conſent unto any part of it, ſince in the angry humour I am in, neither ſhall I pleaſe you, nor you me; in ſaying ſo, ſhe went away, and pulled the chamber door after her, ſeeming by that action, ſhe would not have Leoniſa nor Beleſis follow her; yet had they followed her notwithſtanding, if at the very ſame time they opened the door to go after her, abundance of company had not come in, which hindered Leoniſa from executing her intended deſign; However Beleſis left her, and went to Cleodora's chamber, but in his way thither he met the Prince of Suſa coming to ſee Leoniſa, and would by all means have him back, telling him he had ſome buſineſs with him: the reſpect Beleſis owed unto this Prince, who was naturally of a very violent temper, moved him to obey; ſo that he went with him into Leoniſa's chamber again, yet he ſtayed not above half an hour there, for as ſoon as he ſaw a fit opportunity, he ſtole away, and went to Cleodora; but he could not meet with her; for ſince ſhe ſaw Beleſis did not follow, not knowing the true reaſon, ſhe went out at a back way to viſit ſome of her friends which dwelt not far off, purpoſely that when Beleſis came to her chamber he ſhould not find her there. He was ſo well acquainted with her, that he made no queſtion but ſhe went out of ſpite to him; in the mean time, I know not what temper his ſoul was in that day, but he had not the ſame reſentments he was wont to have when Cleodora was in her fantaſtical humours, for commonly he was always very ſad and was never at quiet in his mind till he had made his peace with her: but now, in lieu of ſorrows, he was all anger, and reſolved to expreſs as much unto her the next time he ſaw her; And ſince ſo, it is no wonder if theſe two incenſed parties had a ſharp and twitting conferrence the next morning when they met. Yet for all this, Beleſis did not give Cleodora any diſreſpective language, but he was nothing ſo obſequious as at other times to appeaſe her: All his diſcourſe tended to his own juſtification, but never uſed any Prayers nor Conjurations, nor ſighs: ſince Cleodora was not uſed unto ſuch complements from him, ſhe was ſo far from accepting of his juſtifications, that ſhe accuſed him of cold hollow heartedneſs; ſo that this little ſquabble, grew to be an earneſt falling out: and they parted upon ſuch tearms, that for many days Beleſis durſt not ſee Cleodora, and perhaps had no great mind to it. However, chance at laſt brought him to ſee her, and to ſpeak to her: ſo that it ſeems love was reſolved to torment Beleſis more than ever any man which knew his power, and cauſed the ſweetneſs of this Lady, whoſe heart was already much moved, to be now abſolutely charmed, and much increaſed towards Beleſis. Yet notwithſtanding, thus much may be ſaid in excuſe of Beleſis, that his vexation, to ſee he could never find the affection of Cleodora to be ſolid and certain, was one of the main cauſes of his love to Leoniſa. However it was, moſt certain he loved her, and ſo exceſſively, that his love to her encreaſed, and to Cleodora leſſened. At firſt, he did not think he was in love with Leoniſa, but thought that he was only angry with Cleodora: But he began by degrees to fear that Cleodora would not be appeaſed, and that he was diſobliged from ſeeing her as her ſervant: yet was he in a great ſtraight what to reſolve upon, for if he did not reconcile himſelf to Cleodora, he could not ſee Leoniſa: And he conſidered further, that admit he did reconcile himſelf, then would be a piece of difficulty to make Leoniſa believe he loved her: Alſo he was extreamly aſhamed of his inconſtancy, and that he ſhould ſo delude one whom he had ſo much loved, and whom yet he eſteemed, maugre his new paſſion: yet Cleodora continued ſo violent againſt him, that though he knew his crime, yet he could not repent of it. But what troubles and ſorrows ſoever his ſoul had, he never acquainted Hermogenes or me with his new love, but only complained againſt the fantaſticalneſs of Cleodora: in the mean time, this Lady whoſe heart was really affectionate unto Beleſis, repented much of what ſhe had done, and ſeeing he fell off from his accuſtomed Courtſhip, as fierce as ſhe was, ſhe reſolved upon the firſt opportunity to reduce him. And going one day with her Aunt unto the Queen without Leoniſa, by chance ſhe met him: as ſoon as ſhe ſaw him, ſhe had a great mind to ſpeak unto him, yet ſhe could not find in her heart to uſe her tongue, thinking it enough if ſhe looked upon him without anger, and to anſwer him mildly if he ſpoke unto her. On the other ſide, Beleſis was in ſuch a dump that he neither knew what to do or ſay: for the very ſight of Cleodora did make him ſo much aſhamed of his weakneſs, that one while he reſolved to carry himſelf as if he loved none but her: (this ſaid he to himſelf) is perhaps more than I can do, and perhaps more than I ought, ſince it is not Juſt to make her and my ſelf miſerable by telling Cleodora I love only her, when as I am ready to dye for the love of Leoniſa: but how can I break off her chains who has expreſſed a thouſand teſtimonies of her affection to me; and whoſe very fantaſtical humours are ſigns of it? how dare I ever let her know that I am inconſtant? how can I continually counterfeit? and what fruit can I hope for from my diſſimulation? yet however, whether I reſolve to devote my heart unto Cleodora, and chaſe Leoniſa out of it; or whether I will court Leoniſa and caſt off Cleodora, I muſt at this preſent apply my ſelf to the laſt of theſe; for if I would have her take her firſt poſſeſſion of my heart, I muſt approach her fair eyes, that they may kindle the flame which ſo long burned in my ſoul; and if on the contrary, I deſire to be inflamed by the glorious light of Leoniſa's eyes, yet ſtill I muſt keep fair with Cleodora, ſince I cannot ſee the one without the other. Thus Beleſis not knowing whether he ſhould be inconſtant or no; whether he ſhould appeaſe Cleodora or deceive her, he accoſted her with ſuch ſtrange confuſion as had a great operation upon the heart of that Lady, who was ignorant of the cauſe, but attributed the alterations in his face unto his repentance. He asked her in a trembling poſture, whether her anger was yet over? It is ſo long ſince you ſpoke unto me, ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled, that it were but juſt in me if I told you it continued ſtill: But Beleſis, the manner of your asking makes me believe, that I ought not to tell you ſo, and therefore I do declare unto you, that I do with all my heart pardon all that is paſt. Oh Madam (ſaid Beleſis unto her and bluſhed) you are all goodneſs if you do not puniſh me. If you had ſpoke thus, replied ſhe, at the beginning of our quarrel, it had not laſted ſo long: but the worſt of it was (continued ſhe, and laughed) that we were both of us very humorous at once: therefore, I pray you, let us hereafter be ſo one after another; or if you pleaſe, let us not be ſo at all: and the ſooner to oblige you unto it, I promiſe you to do my beſt in correcting my ſelf: I leave you to judge, Sir, in what a perplexed condition Beleſis was: Then did he begin to renew his love unto Cleodora, but it laſted not long, for as he waited upon her home, and there ſaw Leoniſa, all was quaſht again: for Leoniſa ſeeing him come with her Couſin, came unto her to rejoyce that ſhe had brought Beleſis with her, and gave him ſuch obliging language, as quite damped all his intentions of continuing conſtant to Cleodora.

After this Beleſis became ſo unquiet and reſerved, that he was not knowable. All this while, he ſpoke not a word of his love to Leoniſa, but addreſſed himſelf wholly to Cleodora, as if he yet loved her, yet with ſo much regret, that he was forced every day to colour the matter with ſome handſom invented lies: Sometimes he would ſay, he had received news of his father's being ſick: ſometimes again he would ſay, he was ill himſelf; and ſometimes not knowing what to ſay, he would put poor Cleodora in a miſerable dump: for ſince ſhe did really love Beleſis, and conſidered ſhe was ready to loſe him in a fantaſtical humour, ſhe gave him now no cauſe of complaint, but was as complacential as could be: and yet ſhe ſaw he was as much out of tune as when ſhe was the contrary. This being the ſtate of things, Hermogenes, with whom Beleſis lodged, obſerved that now he was nothing ſo careful of Cleodora's Letters as he was wont, for he found two or three of them upon the Table, lyng lying looſe and open; whereas before his inconſtancy, he would never part with them out of his hands when he ſhewed them unto him, but would always read them himſelf unto Hermogenes: Alſo, Hermogenes found the Picture of this Beauty, which he had loſt, but did not reſtore it until three or four days after, and all this while Beleſis never miſſed it, which was quite contrary to his cuſtome; for when he loved Cleodora, he uſed to look upon it every quarter of an hour: The greateſt wonder to Hermogenes was, that he ſaw Cleodora did never treat Beleſis ſo kindly as now, and yet Beleſis was more melancholy than when ſhe was moſt rigorous. Hermogenes having an extream deſire to know the cauſe of ſo great an alteration in his friend, he came unto him one morning to reſtore Cleodora's Picture. But, as he would not ſpeak of it ſeriouſly at the firſt, the better to diſcover his real thoughts; ſo he began thus; If the vertue of Cleodora (ſaid he unto him, and reſtoring the Picture) were leſs known unto me than it is, I ſhould think you had ſecretly married her, without either the conſent of her friends or yours: for as it is the cuſtom of many Lovers, to ſlight all the trifling favours which their Miſtreſs gave them, when once they enjoy themſelves: ſo I ſhould think, that ſince you loſt Cleodora's picture, and did not miſs it three days together, and ſince you are grown more careleſs of her Letters than uſual, that you enjoy ſo much happineſs in the ſubſtance, that you need no ſhadowes, or pictures, or letters, to comfort you: 'Tis true, I perceive you ſo melancholy, that it is evident you are not contented: And therefore ſince I cannot dive into the bottom of your heart, I conjure you to tell me, whether I muſt rejoice or grieve with you; and if you will not open your thoughts unto me, I will ask Cleodora of them, who, as I think, ſhould know them. Oh I beſeech you Hermogenes, ſaid Beleſis, do not tell Cleodora how I loſt her picture, and never miſſed it, nor how I left her Letters ſo careleſly that they might be ſeen: Then tell me, ſaid Hermogenes, from whence comes this alteration tation in your humour? Is it not enough you know the humour of Cleodora, replied he, without asking any further reaſons? The humour of Cleodora, replyed Hermogenes, is now ſo ſweet, and complacential towards you, that Leoniſa's cannot be more affable to all the world, than Cleodora's to you. Ah Hermogenes, (ſaid this inconſtant Lover, being tranſported by the exceſſe of his new paſſion) I would to the gods, Cleodora's humour had always been like Leoniſa's: Like Leoniſa's, I ſay, upon whoſe face I never yet ſince I knew her, ſaw the leaſt wrinkle of anger, and whoſe fair eyes are like unclouded ſtars, which ſhine always alike, without one cloud of anger. I ſhould have thought (replied Hermogenes, looking earneſtly upon Beleſis) that a Lover had never thought any eyes fair, but only his Miſtreſſes, but for ought I perceive Leoniſa's eyes pleaſe you as well as Cleodora's. Beleſis bluſh'd at the language of his friend, and let him apparently ſee there was a great alteration in his ſoul; ſo that Hermogenes went on; Confeſs the truth to a friend (ſaid he unto him) and tell me freely, whether Leoniſa is not more in your heart than Cleodora: and whether if ſhe have not already driven her out; ſhe will e're long, 'tis true, replyed, Beleſis; But, cruel friend, what delight can you take in making me to lay open my imperfections? However, (replyed Hermogenes) then you do love Leoniſa, and not Cleodora? I know not (anſwered he) whether I do not love Cleodora, but I am ſure I am deſperately in love with Leoniſa: Then doubtleſs you do not love Cleodora, (anſwered he) for one cannot love two at once. However, I muſt needs chide you, for truely Inconſtancy is an unexcuſable crime, unleſs it be cauſed through the infidelity, or exceſſive ſeverity of a Miſtreſs. But the caſe is farre otherwiſe with you, for you cannot tax Cleodora with any infidelity, nor is ſhe more ſevere than vertue and decency require. I know very well that I am culpable, though I could find ſome excuſe for my crime, if I would: for indeed Cleodora, hath quarrelled with me without any cauſe in the earth, and hath ſo tired out my patience, that my paſſion is much weakned whether I would or no: Yet the gods are my witneſs, that I have endeavoured with all my poſſible power to reject Leoniſa, and keep my heart wholly for Cleodora; but, alas! all was impoſſible, all too too weak; for all my deſires, all my thoughts and faculties have changed objects: I do not ſee Cleodora with the ſame eyes I did, and by a fatal inchantment, that which I once thought would be my chief felicity, will not now afford me one quarter of an hours joy: what then would you have me do? Can I alter my deſtiny? Can I dictate rules unto my fate? and make love an act of my will? I know that Cleodora has a million of moſt excellent qualities, and that ſhe is moſt admirably fair; But I find Leoniſa has pulled my heart out of her hands, and made me change Miſtreſſes: I am moſt horribly aſhamed of my inconſtancy I confeſs, but I cannot keep my ſelf from changing; therefore I beſeech you Hermogenes pity me in lieu of condemning me, ſecond me in my affection to Leoniſa; you, I ſay, who firſt brought me to Suſa, and is the cauſe of my miſeries: and could ever Lover be more miſerable than I? For it was my fate to love a Lady of a difficult and fantaſtical humour; I endured as much as patience her ſelf could do, to the end I might obtain her love; and when in all likelihood I was arrived even at the very Port of my happineſs, my angry fate would needs prompt me to ceaſe my deſires of enjoying Cleodora: All the time and pains which I employed in getting the affection of this Lady, whom I thought would have compleated my felicity, is quite, abſolutely, entirely loſt: ſince her affection makes me only more culpable, and more miſerable; and ſince I muſt fatally begin my ſighs and prayers for another, againſt all which I know no remedy: therefore, my dear Hermogenes, once more let me entreat your aſſiſtance. I beſeech you firſt, ſaid Hermogenes, upon what termes are you with Cleodora and Leoniſa? Cleodora, replied Beleſis, thinks I love her ſtill; and as for Leoniſa, I have not yet ſpoke a word unto her, only in the language of her eyes, and yet I imagine by her looks ſhe underſtands me: How, replied Hermogenes, does Leoniſa underſtand that language, and anſwer it? I do not think ſhe underſtands me, replied Beleſis, becauſe ſhe anſwers, but becauſe ſhe is very careful not to anſwer. But Beleſis, replied Hermogenes, dare you ever ſpeak of any love unto Leoniſa? do you not fear ſhe will upbraid you with inconſtancy? and can you have the confidence to tell Leoniſa you love her, in the ſight of Cleodora? for my part, Beleſis, I wonder how you can have ſuch a thought: If Cleodora lived at the other end of the Town, the matter would not be ſo difficult: but to love one Lady really, and to diſſemble love unto another in the ſame houſe, and another who really loves you, is a thing ſo ſtrange, that I ſee no poſſibility of doing any good in it: For, Beleſis, you cannot poſſibly delude Cleodora long: indeed I do not think it impoſſible but one may perſwade a Lady that he loves her, though he do not, provided he does not really love any other: but to love another really, and to perſwade a Lady whom he formerly really loved, that he loves her ſtill, cannot ſink into my belief. I ſee all theſe difficulties which you propound, replied Beleſis, and conceive them to be as great and greater than they are: But ſince my tyrannical paſſion triumphs over all oppoſition, I muſt delude Cleodora, notwithſtanding my ſecret repugnancy, ſince otherwiſe I cannot ſee Leoniſa: I intend therefore (if I can ſpeak it without bluſhing for ſhame) to continue my viſits unto Cleodora, and to live with her as if I loved her ſtill; unleſs at ſuch times as when I can look upon Leoniſa and Cleodora not ſee, and talk to her when ſhe cannot hear. I have already told you, replied Hermogenes; that you cannot do this: and I am the moſt miſtaken man in the world if Cleodora be not undeceived once in eight days, and if you do not loſe both Cleodora and Leoniſa at once. After this, Beleſis began to walk about the chamber with the greateſt agitation of ſpirit in the world: and afterwards addreſſing himſelf to Hermogenes; My dear friend, ſaid he unto him, if you would do me one favour which I am thinking upon, I ſhould owe my life and all my felicity unto you. Tell me what it is, replied Hermogenes, that I may conſider whether I can and ought to do it: for your reaſon I perceive is ſo blinded, that I dare not truſt you: I would have you, replied he, feign a love unto Cleodora, and become my Rival, which you may eaſily do; and it is not impoſſible but you may perſwade her to believe you, and therefore I conjure you, dear Hermogenes, to perſwade Cleodora that you are her lover. But what advantage can you draw from this diſſimulation? replied Hermogenes: my plot is, replied Beleſis, that you ſhall make Cleodora inconſtant, as Leeniſa hath made me: or at leaſt that you may give a colour unto my inconſtancy, and by living in that manner with her, I may have ſome ground to accuſe her of inconſtancy, and that I may upbraid her with her change, as well as ſhe may me with mine. Believe me Beleſis, (replied Hermogenes) I ſhall never make Cleodora inconſtant; all that I ſhould be able to do, is to give you ſome colour of falling out. But if ſhe prove more faithful than ever unto you, and all my endeavours cannot ſhake her conſtancy, you will then be more in fault. I do confeſs it, replied Beleſis, but I cannot ceaſe being leſs miſerable: It will ſuffice, if your company with her will give me a colourable quarrel againſt her, and that I may hereafter ſay, that the beginning of my love to Leoniſa, was from my belief that ſhe was perfidious: whilſt you are ſpeaking to Cleodora, I ſhall ſometimes have opportunity of ſpeaking with Leoniſa, and therefore I muſt ſay, that upon you and your aſſiſtance depends all my hopes. I muſt needs confeſs, ſaid Hermogenes, that I owe you all ſervice; But I muſt needs confeſs alſo, that I am extreamly unwilling to do you this office which you deſire. But Beleſis was ſo exceedingly urgent with him, that he undertook it: and for the handſomer carriage of the buſineſs, he did not at firſt ſpeak of his diſſembled paſſion, but only went to ſee her after their ordinary way, and to court her much more than he did Leoniſa: But the rareſt paſſage was to ſee with what zeal Beleſis wiſhed Cleodora might uſe Hermogenes kindly, that he might have the better ground of a quarrel: In the mean time, be pleaſed to know, that though there was a very good correſpondency between Cleodora and Leoniſa, yet there was no ſuch ſtrict league of confidence between them, as to impart all matters unto each other: ſo that Cleodora never acquainted Leoniſa with any paſſages betwixt her and Beleſis, nor did ever any tell Leoniſa that Cleodora did not hate him: ſhe ſaw that they were kind unto each other, but ſhe thought it was onely matter of friendſhip, and never ſuſpected any matter of love between them: Being then in this opinion, upon a day when the Siſter of Hermogenes was with her, between whom there was an intimate affection, and Leoniſa infinitely eſteeming Beleſis, ſhe began to ſpeak unto Praſſilla concerning him, as unto her that was ſiſter to his beſt friend: At firſt, ſhe enquired of his houſe, of his kindred, of his eſtate, of his travels, of the friendſhip between Hermogenes and him, and of a hundred other things, which expreſſed her curioſity of every thing which related unto Beleſis. After Praſſilla had made an exact return unto all her Queſtions, and ſaw that Leoniſa prepared to enquire further, I beſeech you tell me (ſaid Praſſilla and laughed) why you have ſuch a mind to ſpeak of Beleſis, and what's the reaſon you would ſo exactly know every circumſtance which concerns him? is it love, or only curioſity? I cannot reſolve you, (replied Leoniſa in Rallary) whether it be Curioſity or Love, but I am ſure it is not out of any hate to him that I enquire: nor is it credible it ſhould be love, (replied Praſſilla) though I ask'd the queſtion, for you have more reaſon than to love one who cannot love you again, and you are wiſer alſo than to make any conqueſt in prejudice of Cleodora, who would never pardon you: is Beleſis then in love with Cleodora (replied Leoniſa, and bluſhed) I think he hath loved her ſo long, replied Praſſilla, that it will not be doubted, and you are the onely one in all Suſa, who is ignorant of it: But, Leoniſa, how comes it to paſs that you change Colour, when I tell you Beleſis is in love with Cleodora? The reaſon is, (replied Leoniſa, and bluſhed more, not having time to think of an anſwer) becauſe I thought he was in love with another: And with whom? (asked Praſſilla:) You have ſo twitted me with my Curioſity (replied ſhe) that I will not ſatisfie yours. Yet truly I would gladly know with whom you thought Beleſis in love: I am ſo vexed to be thus deceived in my judgment (replied Leoniſa) that I will die rather than tell you. Then will I never tell you any thing you deſire to know (anſwered Praſſilla;) Yet, replied Leoniſa, I do exceedingly deſire to know more Paſſages Concerning Beleſis and Cleodora: I know a thouſand (replied Praſſilla) but I will not tell you one, unleſs you will tell me firſt, with whom you imagined Beleſis in Love: Since you will needs know (ſaid Leoniſa to her) I thought him to be in Love with you: Fie, fie, Leoniſa) cryed Praſſilla) you are not ſincere; do you think me ſuch a fool, as to think you ſay truly: No, no, I am not ſo eaſily deluded, but to puniſh you for it, I ſhall tell you what you would not confeſs unto me: Be ſure you gueſs truly, ſaid Leoniſa, and laughed, elſe I ſhall never Pardon you, eſpecially ſince I am deceived my ſelf, and would be revenged upon Beleſis. Thus, Sir, theſe two amiable Ladies, did underſtand each other without any direct telling: and thus did Leoniſa firſt underſtand of any paſſages between Beleſis, and Cleodora. Howover, the eyes of Beleſis had told her ſuch things, as ſhe knew not whether ſhe ſhould give more credit to the words of Praſſilla or the looks of Beleſis, yet ſhe reſolved to carry her ſelf more coldly to him, as if ſhe were deſirous to puniſh him, becauſe he was the ſubject of her diſcourſe with Praſſilla, which was not at all agreeable to her mind: you may well imagine, Sir, after this which I ſhall tell you, that theſe four illuſtrious Perſons were not without ſomething to do: For Cleodora was very buſie to diſcover from whence the melancholly of Beleſis ſhould proceed: And Beleſis had enough to dô, in deluding Cleodora, and endeavouring to find out ways to diſcover his Love unto Leoniſa. Hermogenes, having undertaken to diſſemble Love, was not without his cares: and Leoniſa being deſirous to diſcover exactly the thoughts of Beleſis, had ſuch a kind of unquiet Curioſity, as it cannot be otherwiſe named: When Hermogenes did begin to frequent Cleodora, after their ordinary manner, She made him a hundred welcoms, thinking thereby more to oblige Beleſis than Hermogenes, and imagining that his coming was only to do ſome good office for his friend: and never dreamt of the matter as it was. Some days paſſed thus on, and none of theſe Parties found any great augmentation of ſorrows: Beleſis yet had his choice, for when he was alone with Cleodora, he could ſpeak unto none but her, and when he was with Leoniſa and her, he was ſo amazedly confounded, that he was not able to help out with Converſation, unleſs in things indifferent. In the mean time, Hermogenes, to content his friend, did ſo accuſtom himſelf to ſpeak to Cleodora, that he left much time unto Beleſis to talk with Leoniſa, yet this did exceedingly perplex Cleodora: for believing that Hermogenes was of Beleſis his intelligence, ſhe could not comprehend, why he ſhould not give place to Beleſis to talk unto her, and why he ſhould always talk to her himſelf, yet at laſt ſhe imagined, that perhaps Hermogenes was in love with Leoniſa, and had deſired Beleſis to ſpeak to his advantage, but ſtill ſhe thought ſtrange Beleſis ſhould never talk with her: But what conveniency ſoever Beleſis had to talk with Leoniſa, by reaſon of Hermogenes his holding Cleodora in hand, yet he had not confidence enough to diſcover his paſſion to her, in the preſence of one whom he had formerly loved ſo well, and one who loved him, and therefore he ſought for an opportunity of ſeeing her, when Cleodora was not preſent. He never could find her without Hermogenes, who at the laſt, was no leſs deſirous to talk with Cleodora in private as Beleſis was to talk with Leoniſa: For, Sir, be pleaſed to know, that ſince Hermogenes was more converſant with Cleodora than he uſed to be, he diſcovered ſo many charms and rich beauties in her mind, that never any appeared more amiable in the eye of his Fancy, and he hath told me a hundred times, that whoſoever does not ſee her in this free humour of familiarity which ſhe uſeth to her real friends, cannot ſee half her beauty, nor can imagine the power of her charms. Hermogenes diſcovering a thouſand freſh Graces, and as many rare Qualities in the ſpirit and heart of Cleodora, which he was ignorant of before, was wounded afreſh with the darts of her fair eyes, and fell inſenſibly to Love her; at firſt he could not think it to be Love: for he did nothing elſe but blame Beleſis for quitting Cleodora, and addreſſing himſelf unto Leoniſa. But by degrees he left off telling his friend of his inconſtancy, and fell ſo deſperately in Love with this Lady, as Beleſis never loved her or Leoniſa more. Yet he did not acquaint his friend with his growing Paſſion, though he knew not why he ſhould make a ſecret of it, unleſs becauſe Love in its own nature is a myſtery, and love is a ſecrecy, he never ſtrived againſt this Powerful affection which took root in his heart: For although he knew the heart of Cleodora was a little engaged to Beleſis, yet he hoped that when ſhe knew his inconſtancy, ſhe would eaſily diſengage her ſelf, and then he might perhaps poſſeſs that place in her ſoul which Beleſis had made himſelf unworthy of. Hermogenes then having theſe thoughts, did viſit Cleodora with ſuch aſſiduitie, that Beleſis not knowing the thoughts of his heart, did always, when they were together, ask him pardon for the trouble which he conſtrained himſelf unto, for his ſake.

But at laſt, hoping for ſome fruit of the plot which he had invented, Beleſis ſeemed to grow ſomething jealous of Hermogenes, and did ſo negotiate with Cleodora, that he perſwaded her ſhe was deceived, if ſhe thought he talked unto Leoniſa in behalf of Hermogenes:

for by ſome paſſages which he told her, ſhe thought he talked with her, only to ſpite her. At the firſt, ſince ſhe imagined this odd and jealous proceeding of Beleſis, was an argumeut of his love to her, ſhe was not offended with him, and ſo much leſs, becauſe not ſuſpecting any thing of the love of Hermogenes, ſhe imagined it would be an eaſie matter to cure Beleſis of his jealouſie when ſhe would, by deſiring his friend not to apply himſelf ſo much unto diſcourſe with her, ſo that taking a kind of delight to torment Beleſis for a few days, ſhe never troubled her ſelf to remove that belief out of him which ſhe thought he had, ſo that this did facilitate unto Beleſis the deſign which he had to diſcover his paſſion unto Leoniſa.

One day then when they were all four together in Leoniſa's chamber, which ſhe kept, not being very well, Cleodora, to vex Beleſis, asked Hermogenes, if he would go with her upon a viſit which ſhe intended to make. Leoniſa, hearing her ſay ſo, began to complain for leaving her, and threatning to uſe her with the like indifferency, if ever ſhe were ſick: But Cleodora told her that ſhe left her ſuch good company as ſhe had no reaſon to grudge hers.

Beleſis raviſhed with this, though heretofore he would have deſired her preſence, told her, that ſhe might judge others by her ſelf, who in carrying away Hermogenes would not regret thoſe ſhe left with her.

After which Cleodora and Hermogenes going out, Beleſis remained alone with Leoniſa, who knew not what to think of this paſſage: for if ſhe remembred what Praſſilla told her, ſhe ſhould believe Beleſis loved Cleodora, and that this was only a trick to hide his paſſion: but when ſhe conſidered all his actions, ſhe believed he loved her and not Cleodora. Yet not knowing what to think, nor daring to wiſh any thing, ſhe turned towards Beleſis, and looking upon him with a crafty ſmile, I do extreamly pity you, Beleſis (ſaid ſhe unto him) that Cleodora's ſeverity ſhould engage you thus in a company, which cannot Countervail the loſs of hers: I beſeech ſeech you, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) if you will pity me, let it be becauſe I have ſought for an opportunity of ſpeaking to you in private, and could never meet with it till now: we have been ſo continually Converſant, replied Leoniſa, that I cannot think you have any thing to ſpeak of, more than you have already told me; for have I not ſeen you every day, ſince you came to Suſa? 'Tis true, replied Beleſis, I have ſeen you every day, and the reaſon was, becauſe I would ſpeak with you in private: for Divine Leoniſa, had I ſeen you ſeldom, perhaps I ſhould not have obſerved all the Riches of your mind, but ſhould doubtleſs have been leſs in love with you than I am. Fie, Beleſis, (cried Leoniſa) I thought you would have ſpoken ſeriouſly, but I ſee you deceive me: No, no, Madam, replied he, you cannot imagine I will jeſt upon ſuch a ſubject as this, and it is ſo certainly true, that I am in love with the fair Leoniſa, that it is not poſſible ſhe ſhould doubt it. Since there is a kind of Raillary, ſaid Leoniſa, whoſe ſubtilty conſiſts in ſeeming to ſpeak in earneſt, I ſhall think that yours is now of that nature. But, Beleſis, that which Puzzles me moſt, is, that I cannot imagine what good it will do you, unleſs you would thereby blind me from knowing you are in Love with Cleodora: but that you may not uſe your Language in vain by offering to perſwade me you Love her not, know Beleſis, that I do know you have Loved her ever ſince the firſt day you came to Suſa. I muſt confeſs with ſome ſhame, replied Beleſis, that I did Love Cleodora: but that you may know the end of my paſſion as well as the beginning of it, I beſeech you know, that as I began to love Cleodora the firſt day I came to Suſa, ſo I ceaſed to love her the firſt day you came hither, and when I had the honour firſt to ſee you: Ah Beleſis, cried ſhe, doubtleſs you remember how I told you that day, I ſhould take great delight in making men inconſtant, and to pull their hearts out of the hands of thoſe who had ſubjected them; and certainly you do this to jeer me for this folly which I expreſſed unawares: No, (replied he, with a moſt ſerious Countenance) it is becauſe you have really made me inconſtant unto Cleodora, and more conſtant than any man alive unto the fair Leoniſa. Inconſtancy, anſwered ſhe, is of ſuch a nature, as thoſe that are once capable of it, will be ſo for ever: No, (replied Beleſis) not when it has reaſon, not humour, for its foundation, and when the perſon one forſakes, is leſs fair, and leſs accompliſhed than the perſon whom one chuſeth. However, replied Leoniſa, before I give any farther ear unto you, you muſt give me leave to inform my ſelf very throughly, whether I am fairer and more accompliſhed, than any in all Suſa; For Beleſis, if I find it not ſo, but that there are an infinite number in Suſa more amiable than I, I were a fool if I accepted of your affection this day, to loſe it to morrow: Cruel woman, (ſaid he unto her) I beſeech you do not treat me ſo rigorouſly, but conſider, that ſince I love you more than I love Cleodora, I ſhall never love any but Leoniſa: ſince in pulling my heart out of her hands, you muſt needs have ſuch a power, which none can ever ſurmount. However it be, replied ſhe, I muſt needs tell you, that if what you ſay be true, you will be a moſt miſerable man, ſince I will do all I can to puniſh you for your inconſtancy, in forſaking Cleodora: However, ſaid he unto her, I beſeech you refuſe not to give credit unto my words: I will refuſe all that you can ask, replied ſhe: How, replied Beleſis, can I think you will not believe me? and can I imagine that though you did believe me, yet you would be always inexorable? Doubtleſs you may, anſwered ſhe, for I am moſt fully reſolved, never to give you the leaſt hopes, that I can take any delight in being loved. How Leoniſa, ſaid he, will you refuſe me every thing I ſhall deſire? will you not allow me the leaſt hope? as for hope, replied ſhe, perhaps I cannot take it from you: 'Tis true, anſwered Beleſis, but it is in your power to give it; Since you can find it in your ſelf, replied Leoniſa, you need not ſeek for it from another: I moſt humbly beſeech you, do not abſolutely deny me all things, but do only one thing for me; and to the end you may grant it willingly, I do profeſs unto you, that the thing which I ſhall ask, cannot be called a favour: Upon that condition, replied ſhe, I give you leave to ſpeak what you will. After this, replied Beleſis, I ſhall not fear to beſeech you, that you will believe as often as I ſpeak unto Cleodora, I have a zealous deſire to ſpeak unto Leoniſa: and that all the teſtimonies of affection which I render unto her, out of fear ſhe ſhould baniſh me from you, are ſo many teſtimonies of that violent paſſion, which I bear to the fair Leoniſa. Do you not call this a favour? (replied ſhe, and laughed.) No, ſaid he, but only a means how to obtain it: I pray, replied ſhe, what greater favour can one do than to hear you? To hear, replied Beleſis, is certainly only a Civility; but to love is the real favour: It being ſo, replied Leoniſa, you will do very well and wiſely never to hope for any favour from me: for Beleſis, I do tell you truly, it were a fond vanity in me, if I ſhould offer to take any Lover from Cleodora: and indeed (if I may ſpeak ſo of a man, who hath ſpoken ſo placentially unto me) I think of inconſtancy, and inconſtant men, as I do of Treaſon and Traitors: it is your part (added ſhe, and ſmiled, to take off ſome part of the wormwood in her words) to make interpretation of what I ſay. I perceive, Madam, replied he, that you would have me think you love inconſtancy, and hate the inconſtant man: In the mean time, it is not very juſt methinks to treat me more cruelly than a Lover, who never yet loved any beſides you, and who never quitted any other for you. But, Madam, if you conſider what I loſe for the love of you, I am confident you will confeſs, that your Beauty did never produce greater effects of its power, than in captivating my heart: as Leoniſa was ready to anſwer, much company came in, ſo that the Conference ended; Beleſis not knowing whether or no Leoniſa believed what he ſaid unto her. Yet his hope was, that hereafter ſhe would be more obſervant of his actions, and by conſequence would better perceive his Love to her. All this while, Hermogenes who was gone with Cleodora upon a viſit, having not found her whom they went unto, brought her back into her own chamber, having no will to go into Leoniſa's: ſo that finding a free opportunity of ſpeaking to her, his paſſion did ſo ſpur him to acquaint Cleodora with his ſufferings for her, that he reſolved upon it, yet he could not find fit words wherewith to expreſs himſelf as he deſired: And I think, if Cleodora, not thinking of it, had not furniſhed him with an occaſion to diſcover his love unto her, he would hardly have ventured upon it, out of his fears to incenſe her: But after a quarter of an hours ſilence, not one word paſſing between them: for Hermogenes was conſidering what to ſay, and Cleodora muſed upon the proceedings of Beleſis: But ſhe rouſing her ſelf ſuddenly out of her fixed poſture, and turning towards Hermogenes with a ſmile: If Beleſis, ſaid ſhe unto him, do not entertain Leoniſa better than you do me: and if Leoniſa be not better company to Beleſis, than I am to Hermogenes, we did them no very good office in leaving them alone, nor unto our ſelves neither, ſince if we were all four together, perhaps we ſhould muſe leſs than we do. I know not, Madam, what you do, replied Hermogenes: But I am ſure, as muſing as I am, and as reſerved as you are, I had rather be alone in your company, than with all the company in the world: and yet there is no great pleaſure (ſaid ſhe) in the company of one whoſe ſpirits are ſo diſtracted, and thoughts ſo far off when ſhe ſpeaks, as if there were Countrys, and Seas between them: and I confeſs when I revived out of my muſing humour, and found you in yours, and as far off me in your thoughts, as I was off you; I thought my ſelf very uncivil, and was ready to correct my ſelf for it: Why, Madam, ſaid Hermogenes, can you think that my thoughts might not be of you, though I did not ſpeak? doubtleſs they were not, replied ſhe, and to be ſincere with you, though you were near me, yet you were far off my thoughts. We are then very different, ſaid Hermogenes, for you are always in my thoughts, though I be far from you: I ſee

I ſee you will repair that incivility whereof I taxed you, with another exceſſive civility; but know, Hermogenes, that you need not uſe unto me any improbable truth, much leſs any poſſible lies, to get belief: I had thought that what I ſpoke, ſaid Hermogenes, had been eaſie to believe; for, Madam, it is very imaginable one may remember you, when he ſees you not, and for my part I profeſs, that I can think of nothing elſe but you, in what place ſoever I am: had you told me, replied Cleodora, that you remember me very often, I ſhould have thought my ſelf obliged unto you, becauſe then I ſhould have thought you ſpoke ſincerely; but to ſay you remember me always, this is too much to believe: and yet I tell you not all, anſwered Hermogenes, ſince if I ſhould tell you all I think of you, I ſhould tell you more than ever Beleſis did: ſince certainly I Love you more than ever he did. Ah, Hermogenes, cryed Cleodora, I cannot endure this affront, for would you have me lend an ear unto a declaration of Love from you, and another from Beleſis? whoſoever conſiders what you ſay, will find that you wrong Beleſis, as well as me: for if you think Beleſis loves me not, he hath reaſon to complain againſt you, for thinking him capable of ſubjecting himſelf to ſo mean a beauty as my ſelf: and if he do Love me, then you are a very bad friend to him, and an ill husband of your own honour, to publiſh your crime ſo boldly: However it be, Madam, (replied Hermogenes) I do Love you: and certainly Loves you without a crime, though there were no other reaſon to excuſe my ſelf, but by ſaying I muſt needs Love you and cannot chuſe: No, no, Hermogenes (ſaid Cleodora) you cannot deceive me: I ſee this is only a compacted plot between Beleſis and you; and therefore without any anger againſt you, I will only be revenged upon Beleſis: for indeed I do not take it well, he ſhould oblige you to ſpeak unto me as you do: and there are ſome things wherewith there is no jeſting. I do proteſt unto you, Madam, replied Hermogenes, that Beleſis is ignorant of any thoughts of Love which I have to you; though I knew all his: you are then a very perfidious friend, anſwered Cleodora: I know not, Madam, whether or no I am a perfidious friend, but I am moſt certain, that I am a moſt faithful, and paſſionate Lover; in the mean time, I beſeech you, Madam, let Beleſis complain againſt my infidelity, when he ſhall know it, and let me only beg this one favour only from you, that you will be pleaſed to obſerve both the paſſion of Beleſis and mine; and to promiſe me that if Beleſis conſent unto my happineſs, you will not oppoſe it: you tell me ſuch ſtrange things, replied Cleodora, that I know not what anſwer to return: yet I know this, that I take it very ill you ſhould ſpeak unto me as you do: yet, Madam, replied he, I ſhall ſay the ſame as long as I live: then ſpeak unto me no more, replied ſhe, at leaſt in private; yet once more, Hermogenes, I charge you to proceed no further unleſs by order from Beleſis, and unleſs I may know his reaſon, for to ſpeak ſincerely unto you, if you be his rival, you are leſs his friend: But I obſerve you live and agree together as you uſed to do: therefore if you will really oblige me, tell me what benefit he hopes for by this plot: Since I am not ſo bad a friend to Beleſis as you upbraid me with, ſaid he, I will relate nothing unto you that concerns him. But ſhall only tell you that he is ignorant of my love to you, and by conſequence cannot know that I have aſſumed the boldneſs to tell you that I love you; But, Madam, I beſeech you do not charge me with any infidelity to my friend, or raſhneſs to my Miſtreſs; let time and your own reaſon find out the truth of things: I need no time, replied ſhe, to find out that I ought not to ſuffer you to ſpeak as you do, therefore be ſilent, unleſs in lieu of my anger, you will incur my hatred: After this Hermogenes was ſo bold as to uſe many expreſſions more paſſionate than the firſt, and ſpoke with ſuch an Air, as let Cleodora know, he loved her in earneſt: And in that belief, after ſhe had well conſulted with her ſelf upon the buſineſs, and after Hermogenes had left her, ſhe reſolved not to acquaint Beleſis with any paſſages

ges between them, for fear ſome quarrel or diſorder might grow between them, for though ſhe intended to be very faithful unto Beleſis, yet ſhe wiſhed that no misfortune might happen unto Hermogenes for the love of her: and therefore ſhe could not reſolve to break off abſolutely with him: but intending to avoid as much as ſhe could his being alone with her: After Hermogenes was gone, ſhe went into Leoniſa's Chamber from whence Beleſis was not yet departed: But ſince both their ſpirits were very buſie in thinking upon what they had told them, and in endeavouring to know the truth, their converſation was ſomething Reſerved and Private. At firſt, when Cleodora entred, Leoniſa ſpoke firſt, Though you were ſo cruel as to leave me, ſaid ſhe unto her, yet I pray tell me what News you have heard in your viſits: Since I did not find any at home (replyed Cleodora) and ſince I never ſtirred from Hermogenes out of my Chamber, I know no more than I did when I left you, it is you rather than I that is likely to tell news; I aſſure you, replyed Leoniſa, if you know no more than I do, you have met with no very good intelligence, for I ſaw no body but Beleſis, who told me nothing at all: yet you have been a long time together, replyed Cleodora: I have had never the more news for that, replyed Leoniſa, as you might have with Hermogenes: But Beleſis, replyed Cleodora, is uſed to hear more news than he: yet he hath told me none (replyed ſhe:) yet I would gladly know, replyed Cleodora, what you have talked on all this while: ſometimes we talked of you (anſwered Leoniſa) and the reſt of the afternoon was ſpent in repetition of a hundred things which imprinted themſelves ſo ſlightly in my memory, that I have forgotten them: But ſince I know you have a better memory, I pray tell me what diſcourſe Hermogenes and you have had, ſince news was no part of your converſation? Truly ſaid Cleodora unto her, I ſhall be a little more ingenuous than you are, for I muſt confeſs that I remember very well all Hermogenes ſaid unto me: but I profeſs

I will not tell you, unleſs you will tell me what Beleſis ſaid unto you concerning me: cannot you Imagine replied Leoniſa what Beleſis and I might talk of? No, replied Cleodora, not in the humours he hath been in of late, and therefore I would gladly know, whether he complains of any thing which I have unawares ſpoken: it is not likely he ſhould complain of you to me (replied Leoniſa) What did he then ſpeak of? (ſaid Cleodora) Sincerely I cannot tell you, anſwered Leoniſa, I only know we ſpake of you, but know not upon what occaſion. I ſhould not ſo ſoon forget what's told me (replyed Cleodora, and bluſhed for anger ſhe ſhould be ſo inquiſitive to no purpoſe) after which every one of them began to muſe upon the matter, and paſſed away the reſt of the evening without any diſcourſe, unleſs ſome odd word by chance. Thus, Sir, was the ſtate of things, when one of high quality, and of greater wealth, fell in love with Leoniſa, as well as Beleſis: his name was Tiſias: But ſince he was a man of none of the rareſt parts, ſhe could not much brag of this conqueſt; Yet being then very young, and Rubies gliſtering in her eyes, ſhe was pleaſed that a man of his rank ſhould think upon her, though ſhe had no eſteem of him at all, but looked only upon him through his great birth, and through the magnificence of his troops, and becauſe he was in favour with the Prince of Suſa. Then did Beleſis think himſelf very miſerable, becauſe ſince Tiſias fell in love with Leoniſa, he was almoſt perpetually with her, and did not only hinder him from talking with Leoniſa, but forced him often to apply himſelf unto Cleodora, unto whom he could hardly ſpeak: Hermogenes had alſo ſome ſhare in this angry adventure, becauſe he ſpoke leſs unto Cleodora than before, and his paſſion was arrived to that height as he could enjoy no reſt: Yet all his expreſſions of affection were in vain: for this Lady was ſo conſtant in her affection to Beleſis that nothing could alter her: all the favour ſhe ſhewed him, was not to ſpeak unto Beleſis, becauſe ſhe thought if ſhe did, there might ariſe ſome quarrel between them; her greateſt motive to that was, becauſe ſhe thought Beleſis leſis was jealous of Hermogenes, and becauſe he diſſembled a coldneſs to his friend, the better to delude Cleodora; and therefore ſhe offered him to ſee Hermogenes no more, and denied that he was in love with her. But ſay what ſhe could, Beleſis told her that he would endeavour to love Leoniſa to be revenged of Cleodora, ſince ſhe loved Hermogenes to mock Beleſis and his paſſion: ſo that Cleodora, believing Beleſis to be really jealous of Hermogenes, began to ſhun him with all care, and to treat him extream roughly: Beleſis on the other ſide was far from his happineſs: not but that he knew Leoniſa eſteemed him, and was not ſorry that he loved her, but it was becauſe he had ſo few opportunities of talking with Leoniſa in private, eſpecially ſince Tiſias became his Rival, that it was impoſſible he ſhould make any far progreſs into her heart: Yet he watched his opportunity ſo well, that one day he ſpoke with her, when neither Cleodora nor Tiſias were preſent, and in a place where none could hear what they ſaid, Beleſis laying hold on this precious minute, began to aggravate the grandure of his paſſion: But as Leoniſa for all her ſweetneſs had a kind of imperious ſpirit, ſo ſhe began to ſpeak, and looking upon him with an angry aſpect: Truly Beleſis (ſaid ſhe unto him) I wonder you dare be ſo bold as to perſwade me you love me, when all the world knows you love Cleodora; If I could caſt off Cleodora, and not caſt off Leoniſa alſo, replyed Beleſis, the world ſhould quickly be undeceived, for I would behave my ſelf ſo towards her, as there ſhould be no queſtion, that I am not in love with her, though I would never fail in the payment of thoſe reſpects which are due unto a perſon of her merit and virtue; But ſince my croſs fate will have it ſo, as I cannot let you know that I love you, unleſs I ſeem to love her alſo, queſtionleſs it were injuſtice in the Fair Leoniſa, to tax me with a thing which I would not do but for the love of her. I can tax you with one fault, replied ſhe, unto which I think you cannot make any direct anſwer, and that's this: if you were nor in love with Cleodora, why are you continually looking upon her Picture? That you may know what I look upon (replyed Beleſis, in giving the caſe unto Leoniſa, and letting her open it her ſelf) I beſeech you ſee and judge whether my crime be ſo great in looking upon that Picture. Then Leoniſa taking the caſe, and opening it, ſhe was extreamly ſurpriſed, when in lieu of Cleodora's picture, ſhe had found her own. Ah Beleſis (ſaid ſhe, and bluſht) your crime is greater than I thought it: for I cannot think it good you ſhould have my picture: Beleſis then fearing ſhe would not reſtore it, did cunningly catch it out of her hands, before ſhe could hinder him I humbly ask your pardon, Madam, for my incivility (ſaid he unto her) but I am ſo miſerable, that I ought to fear the loſs of my only conſolation which your rigor hath left me: do not deceive your ſelf (ſaid Leoniſa) for it is not my intention to let you have it, nor to expoſe my ſelf unto the danger of the worlds belief that I gave you the picture. I am not ſo vain, Madam, replied Beleſis, to make my boaſt of receiving ſuch a favour from you: but you may well think, that man who would ſo cloſely conceal a real favour if he received it, will not falſely report that you gave him this Picture: you have not been yet ſo diſcreet, replyed Leoniſa, but I know that you had Cleodora's Picture: 'Tis true anſwered Beleſis, but you know it only by the ſiſter of Hermogenes, who her ſelf had never known it, if I had not been in love with you, for that was the true reaſon that I became ſo careleſs, and left it once behind me: Ah Beleſis (ſaid Leoniſa, and interrupted him) I will never ſuffer my Picture to remain in the hands of a man, who is uſed to loſe it: hitherto I have not loſt it (replyed he:) Have you Cleodora's yet (replyed Leoniſa?) 'Tis very true, I have, (ſaid he,) and under colour of that, I ſometimes pleaſe my ſelf in looking upon yours, even in her preſence: Leoniſa then importuned him to tell her how he got her Picture: And Beleſis told her, that underſtanding ſhe was to have her Picture taken to ſend unto ſome of her Couſins in the Province from whence ſhe came, he ſuborned the Painter and got it from him: afterwards he ſhewed her how the caſe was double, which ſhe did not perceive before, and there ſhe found Cleodora's picture and her own both: So that by this fallacie Beleſis did often look upon the picture of his new Miſtreſs, at the ſame time when the poor Cleodora thought it had been her own, becauſe ſhe knew the caſe, and becauſe Beleſis did ſomtimes ſhew her her own picture purpoſely, that ſhe might think he looked upon it: For though Beleſis was moſt deſperately in love with Leoniſa, yet he ſtill feared and reſpected Cleodora. Leoniſa, knowing this trick, uſed all her rhetorique to get her picture out of his hands: but do or ſay what ſhe could he would not part with it: But being deſirous to be as ſafe as ſhe could, and being alſo deſirous to ſatisfie her ſelf in one thing which ſhe had much longed to know, and at leaſt to make trial of Beleſis his vertue. Truly Beleſis (ſaid ſhe unto him, after much other talk) I cannot believe you love me, nor ſuffer my picture to be in your hands but upon one condition: which is, that you let me have in my keeping all Cleordora's Letters unto you, and alſo her picture; for unleſs you do this, I do proteſt I ſhall not believe you love me: but ſhall think that you love Cleodora ſtill, and that you carry my picture but the better to hide hers. All this is ſo unjuſt, replied Beleſis, that I cannot imagine you ſhould deſire I ſhould believe you: and truly Cleodora never did me ſo much honour as to write unto me: as for her picture, 'tis true, I got it by a ſlight as I did yours, and by conſequence I were too ſimple if I let it paſs for a favour; if ſo, ſaid Leoniſa and laughed, methinks you ſhould not think it ſtrange that I do no more for you than Cleodora did, for I do intend to be no leſs ſevere than ſhe. But for all that I know you had Cleodora's picture from her own hand, and I know alſo you received a hundred Letters from her: if I had, replied Beleſis, I beſeech you be as kind as Cleodora was: I ſhall be what I ought to be, replied ſhe, when you have performed the condition which I deſire: It is queſtionleſs my duty to do any thing which you deſire (replied Beleſis) except ſuch things as may make me loſe your eſteem: and unto ſuch things, Madam, the love I bear you will not permit me to conſent unto: and therefore I beſeech you, Madam, take it not ill if I deny your deſires; for how ſhould you ever truſt my diſcretion with the leaſt favour; if I ſhould laviſhly confeſs what Cleodora conferred upon me? it is ſufficient, Madam, that I forſake her for you, without baſely betraying her; alſo I do not think you have well conſidered what you demand; Really, ſaid he and ſmiled, if you ſhould deſire to ſee Cleodora's Letters, and to know how far ſhe favoured me, to the end you might go as far as ſhe, I think I ſhould invent a thouſand lies, and counterfeit as many Letters which might be advantageous to me; but ſince I know that though I received a thouſand real favours from the greateſt beauties in the world, yet you would not be the more favourable to me, therefore I beſeech you move me not to invent falſe ones; if you would have me relate any paſſages between Cleodora and me, I beſeech you, Madam, let it be her Rigours and Cruelties, to the end that aggravating the miſeries which ſhe hath cauſed me to ſuffer, you may reſolve to be more mild and ſweet, and make me leſs miſerable. Examples (replied Leoniſa craftly) are things which much moves me, and powerfully works upon my ſpirit; and therefore if you tell me only of Cleodora's Cruelties, perhaps I ſhall eaſily have the ſame thoughts ſhe had; I know, Madam, rereplyed Beleſis, that you are more reaſonable than to do as you ſpeak, or to ſpeak as you do, and ſpeak ſincerely; but though Cleodora had writ many obliging Letters unto me, and though I had them in my keeping, yet I ought not to give them you: A Lover doubtleſs ought blindly to obey the perſon whom he loves, but not, (as I ſaid before) when he expoſeth himſelf to the loſs of her eſteem; Yet there are ſome certain things (replyed Leoniſa) which if a Miſtreſs deſire, and the ſervant obey, he will merit her affection; and I know not whether what I now deſire of you be not in that number; for although I am forced to confeſs that it is handſomer to do as you do, than if you did otherwiſe, yet I muſt let you know it is not ſo obliging, ſince you cannot deny me but for two reaſons; the one becauſe you dare not truſt my diſcretion; the other, becauſe you would perhaps keep your ſelf upon terms to renew your love with Cleodora; and which of thoſe two ſoever it be, certainly it is not very advantageous for me. I muſt needs acknowledge, ſaid Beleſis, that whatſoever your diſcretion be, I do not think my ſelf obliged to truſt you with any thing which might be prejudicial unto the perſon whom I once loved, and who did not hate me: For truly if I did, I ſhould give you a very fine example of indiſcretion, ſuch a one as I ſhould think that you could not be more diſcreet than I am, unleſs you give me a juſt ſubject of complaint.

But, Madam, as to what you ſay, that perhaps I keep Cleodora's Letters in my hands, purpoſely to cloſe with her again; In anſwer to this, Madam, I will tell you, that if you pleaſe, I will never ſpeak unto her again, nor ever look upon her: I will go ſo far as incivility, if you deſire it: but I beſeech you, let me not go ſo far as treaſon: yet do not think, I beſeech you, that I ſpeak thus, becauſe my love to you is not violent enough, for though I do deny what now you do deſire of me, yet I offer at the ſame time to undertake the moſt difficult enterprizes in the world for your ſervice. At theſe words Leoniſa interrupting him, It is enough, (ſaid ſhe unto him) it is a ſufficient trial of your vertue, Beleſis: But to the end you ſhould not have a leſs good opinion of my vertue, than I have of yours, know, that if you had conſented unto what I did ſo urgently deſire, I ſhould never have truſted you with the leaſt favour in the world: But ſince you have reſiſted me with ſo much prudent obſtinacie, and denied me the Picture of Cleodora, I conſent you ſhall keep mine, though you ſtole it from me.

At the pronouncing theſe words Leoniſa was ſilent, and bluſht, and I know not whether Beleſis was haſtier to render thanks than ſhe was to diminiſh the obliging ſence of her language. But he was ſo ready to apprehend the obligation, that the words no ſooner touched his ear, but they reached his heart, and his heart his tongue, to thank her. Though you do nothing (ſaid he unto her) but conſent unto a thing which you could not hinder me from, yet am I infinitely obliged unto you, for creating it a gift, and not a theft: and I am moſt certain, I ſhall find your Picture more reſembling your fair ſelf, ſince theſe three or four words which you have ſpoken in my favour, do ſo pleaſingly ſweeten my imagination, that I ſhall think my ſelf much more happy every time I look upon it: I pray Beleſis, ſaid Leoniſa, do not give me ſo many thanks, leſt I ſhould think I have granted you too much, and repent: then I muſt ſhut up my acknowledgments in my heart, ſaid Beleſis, and content my ſelf with ſhewing you only my Love. After this Leoniſa deſired to ſee her Picture, which he preſented unto her; he had as great joy to receive it from the fair hand of his dear Leoniſa, as if he had received it from her own gift. But firſt he obſerved unto her, by the diſtinguiſhment of the Claſps, which was on that ſide where Cleodora's Picture was, to the end ſhe might know in opening of the Caſe, which ſide hers was on: for though it is not the cuſtom of thoſe that have the Pictures of the perſons whom they love, to look upon them in their preſence, yet it was not ſo with Beleſis, for whether it was Cleodora, or Leoniſa that he loved, he would look upon their Pictures with ſuch violent raptures of love, and ſuch private thoughts, as if they were the very ſubſtances. He was never better pleaſed, than when he ſaw Leoniſa in a great Cloſet at her Aunts, where there was, on four great Pillars, four great Mirrours of polliſhed ſteel: which way ſoever he turned he ſaw four Leoniſa's, and ſometimes many more Leoniſa's, at leaſt he ſaid ſo, when he would aggravate his paſſion: and there alſo he looked often upon the Picture, though it was in the ſame Chamber where ſhe was. Thus, Sir, you ſee upon what terms Beleſis was with Leoniſa. In the mean time, the poor Cleodora, thinking that the love of Hermogenes was the true cauſe of Beleſis his manner of behaviour, reſolutely determined to entreat him not to ſee her any more, ſeeing that all her roughneſs of behaviour would not repulſe him. Since ſhe knew he was very wiſe, and knew moſt of the paſſages between Beleſis and her: She thought it beſt to ſpeak unto him in all ingenuous ſincerity: ſo that finding him one day, in her Aunts chamber, as ſhe was buſie in talking with others: ſhe began to ſpeak unto him: In the mean time, ſince ſhe had a long while ſhunned him, Hermogenes was raviſhed at the alteration: but his joy was very ſhort; for ſhe no ſooner opened her mouth, but he knew that he ſhould have more cauſe to complain againſt Cleodora, than to thank her. I pray you, Hermogenes (ſaid ſhe unto him) do not murmur at the requeſt I ſhall make, and take that confidence which I have in you, for the greateſt teſtimony of my eſteem and affection, which you can ever receive from me: For Heavens ſake, Madam, (ſaid Hermogenes) do not ask me any thing that will force me unto a denial: If I thought I ſhould be denied (ſaid ſhe) I would not ask, but having great confidence in your wiſdom, I hope to obtain my requeſt. But, Madam, replied Hermogenes, what can you deſire more of me, than what I have already given? I would deſire you, for ſome urgent conſiderations which nearly concern me, to forbear either ſeeing me or ſpeaking unto me: Alas, Madam, replied he, you ask me that which is not in my power to grant? But I pray, Madam, is this the teſtimony of that eſteem, and affection you ſpoke of? Doubtleſs it is (replied ſhe) for if it were not, I ſhould have baniſhed you without ſpeaking to you, and therefore methinks you ought to conſent willingly to my deſire. If you will baniſh me, replied he, becauſe the Perſon that hath Power over you, thinks it not fit I ſhould have the honour to ſee you, or becauſe my paſſion makes too great a noiſe in the world: I could put a favourable ſence of your act, and obey you: But, fair Cleodora, I know very well, you only would pack me away, to admit of Beleſis: I crave your pardon, Madam, (ſaid he, ſeeing Cleodora bluſh at his anſwer) for taking the freedom to ſpeak with ſo much ſincerity, but yet the lamentable condition wherein I am, might ſerve, methinks, for an excuſe. However I muſt tell you, that though it be only to recall the happy Beleſis that you drive me away, yet you ought to let me love you, and that freely; for, Madam, if jealouſie do not bring him back, nothing will: Therefore, though you have no conſideration of me at all, and though you conſider only your ſelf, yet it is your beſt courſe to let me live with you as formerly. No, Hermogenes, replied ſhe, you muſt not deny me, and therefore content your ſelf that I am not angry at what you ſay: But I will ingenuouſly confeſs unto you (ſaid ſhe, holding her hand before her eyes, and turning away her head to hide her bluſhes) that the jealouſie of Beleſis begins to anger me, eſpecially ſince it diſcovers his folly unto ſome who elſe would never have known it. I beſeech you, Madam, (ſaid Hermogenes) do not diſguiſe the truth, but conſider, that Cleodora being my Miſtreſs, and Beleſis being always my intimate friend, it is not poſſible but I ſhould a little know how things are: Certainly, replied ſhe, ſince Beleſis is your rival, you cannot be his ſpie; Beleſis carrying himſelf now, replied Hermogenes, as the Lover of Leoniſa, and not of Cleodora, I do not reſent him as my Rival: However it be Hermogenes, replied ſhe, do not deny me in my requeſt, and do not force me to baniſh you with a noiſe. But, Madam, I beſeech you, (replied he) ſince Beleſis is in love with Leoniſa, is it not unjuſt in you to treat Hermogenes thus? Doubtleſs it is not (anſwered ſhe) for I have ſuch a horror to all men, that your ſelf muſt needs be included: Revenge is very ſweet replied he: I confeſs it, replied Cleodora, yet there is no ſweetneſs to be revenged upon ones ſelf, by deſiring it upon another: and ſince Hermogenes, you have too many excellent parts, to owe that affection which one hath to you, unto the hatred which one hath againſt your rival; therefore it were more expedient you looked about for ſome better fortune: No, no, Madam, replied he, I am none of thoſe delicate and ſcrupulous men, who are ſo preciſe as to obſerve which hand it is that gives a preſent: for ſo you will love me, I care not whether it be by revenge, or by inclination. However Hermogenes, ſaid Cleodora, I will be obeyed. This is ſome favour yet, replied he, that you will abſolutely command me, after you began with intreaties. 'Tis true, ſaid ſhe, but leaſt you repent, do as I bid you. Hermogenes, ſeeing with what reſolution Cleodora ſpake, thought it his beſt courſe not to reſiſt her: ſo that to gain a little more time, for the execution of a deſign which he had: he conjured her to allow him ſix days only to conſider; at the end of which time he would demand one hours audience. Since Cleodora did very much eſteem Hermogenes, ſhe conſented unto his deſire, and ſo they parted: Cleodora hoping ſhe had baniſhed Hermogenes, and that Beleſis would return unto her: and Hermogenes hoping, that as ſoon as he obtained one thing of Beleſis, which he intended to ask, he ſhould make Cleodora change her mind. And to that end, he went to look him the very ſame hour, and as hap was, found him in his chamber: As ſoon as he ſaw him, Beleſis came to meet him, and gave him many thanks for applying himſelf ſo cloſely unto Cleodora that day, for he had thereby given him good opportunity to talk with Leoniſa, to his exceeding delight. I am extreamly joyed, ſaid Hermogenes to him, that I was able to contribute any thing to your felicity: But my dear Beleſis (ſaid he unto him, and embraced him) you muſt do ſomething alſo, to keep me from being miſerable: You need not uſe any ſuch conjuration, replied Beleſis, for can you doubt, but that I will do any thing I can to ſerve you? In good earneſt, Hermogenes, your way of proceeding does offend me, ſince prayers are not to be made unto real friends: 'Tis doubtleſs enough to let them know we ſtand in need of them, and that will oblige them to our ſervice: Speak then, I conjure you, and tell me quickly what you would have me do for you.

You muſt, ſince you will not have me intreat you, (replyed Hermogenes) let Cleodora know that you love her not, and let her alſo know, that you love Leoniſa. Ah Hermogenes, (replied Beleſis) it is yet too ſoon to appear inconſtant in the eyes of Cleodora: and why would you have me ſo ſoon diſcover my crime? is it becauſe you are weary of talking ſo much with her? and does it vex you to be tied too long unto a buſineſs which concerns you not? if ſo, I had rather you would ceaſe ſeeing her, than to tell her what I would not have her know ſo ſoon, and which indeed ſhe will know but too ſoon. No, no, ſaid Hermogenes, you do not underſtand me: but to explain my words unto you, know cruel friend, that when you ſhaked off the fetters of the fair Cleodora, you enchained me with them: and the truth is, you never loved that fair Perſon, ſo well as I love her, nor would I quit her for a thouſand of your Leoniſa's. How (ſaid Beleſis in a great aſtoniſhment) do you love Cleodora? Yes, replyed he, I do love her, and thank the gods you love her not, but are in ſuch a condition as to pitie me, and give me leave to do as I deſire of you. Beleſis ſeeing Hermogenes was ſerious, did not queſtion the truth of his words, but the ſtrangeneſs of the matter was, he was ſo ſurpriſed at them, that he walked up and down the chamber, and could not ſpeak a word: ſo that Hermogenes wondering to ſee him ſo amazed, importuned him ſtill to let his inconſtancy be known unto Cleodora. For truly, ſaid he unto him, if you will for my ſake permit it, you will be a gainer by it as well as my ſelf; ſince if Cleodora do not pretend any thing unto your affection, ſhe will not then torment you, as ſhe doth. Though her affection, replyed he, will not torment me, yet her hatred will; therefore I intreat you heartily, not to tell her poſitively that I do not love her: and it will alſo reflect ſomething upon Leoniſa, and conſequently it will augment your miſeries, and not leſſen mine. For I cannot ſee what advantage you can draw unto your ſelf by letting Cleodora know, that I am in Love with Leoniſa.

Since I muſt tell you, replied he, know that it is becauſe Cleodora (who thinks you jealous of me, and who thinks you counterfeit love to Leoniſa, to ſpite her) loves you a thouſand times better than ſhe ſhould: ſo that my affection to her cannot have any influence upon her heart, unleſs I can expel you out of it: Move her to hate me if you can, becauſe ſhe loves you (replied Beleſis) but I beſeech you do not endeavour to make her love you, becauſe ſhe hates me: methinks (ſaid Hermogenes, and ſmiled) this is too much fantaſtical niceneſs, for you do either love Leoniſa, or you love her not: if you do not love her, then you ought to tell me poſitively, that you love Cleodora ſtill, and that you are my enemy, becauſe you are my Rival. But if on the contrary you do love Leoniſa, I do not ſee any reaſon why you ſhould not permit me to tell Cleodora, that which will advance me, and free you from her affection; for I am fully perſwaded, that though it be only to revenge her ſelf, ſhe will treat me much better. However, not to diſſemble with you, let me tell you truly, that if you do not conſent unto this requeſt, know, it is her will, I ſhould neither love her, ſpeak to her, nor ſee her any more: and then he told Beleſis all the paſſages betwixt Cleodora, and himſelf; Whilſt he was telling him the ſtory, he obſerved a ſtrange agitation in his mind, though he could not well conceive the reaſon, unleſs it was his ſhame to be known ſo inconſtant. But ſo it is (ſaid he after he had related all unto him) that Cleodora will certainly e're long know you love her not, and that you love Leoniſa; and ſince ſo, is it not much better ſhe knew it now, when ſome advantage may be gotten by it, than to ſtay till none can be reaped by the knowledge of it? The more you hide your crime, the more Criminal you will appear: and therefore, I conjure you let me endeavour to obtain that which you would willingly part with: Conſider, that you have no reaſon to deny me, becauſe you are the cauſe that I love her, ſince it was for your ſake I undertook ſuch familiarity with her: I ſaw her long before you, and never loved her, and certainly ſo I ſhould have done all my life: but ſince only in your behalf, and for no intereſt of my own, I was ſo complacential as to ſee her, and am deſperately in love with her, methinks it is but juſt, you ſhould contribute all you can to cure that wound which you have cauſed. I wiſh I could, (replyed Beleſis much amazed) But I muſt confeſs unto you, I cannot ſo far prevail with my ſelf, as to ſuffer you ſhould diſcover my Crime unto Cleodora, moreover I beſeech you conſider, that ſince I am not upon abſolute good tearms with Leoniſa, Cleodora when ſhe knows the truth, will in all probability do me a thouſand ill offices unto Leoniſa: and therefore, though I ſhould give way unto your deſires, it ſhould not be till I had abſolutely gained the heart of Leoniſa. But whilſt you are obtaining that Victory, replied Hermogenes, what would you have become of me? for Cleodora within this ſix days will neither let me ſpeak unto her, nor ſee her again: Conſider, I beſeech you, what you would do if the caſe were your own: I know not, replyed Beleſis, but I am ſure I cannot conſent you ſhould diſcover my Crime unto Cleodora. But why, I pray you, did you fall in love with her? did you not lay to heart what I told you of her humours? why were not you wiſe by my woes, and let her alone: Believe me, it were Prudence in you in lieu of endeavouring to win her heart, to diſengage your own from ſuch a ſad ſervice: for the more in favour you are with Cleodora, the more unquiet ſhall your Soul be: and therefore though it were only in Conſideration of your ſelf, I ought to deny you what you deſire in this buſineſs: No, no, Beleſis, ſaid he, we ought not to ſerve our friends according to our own Palats, but according unto theirs: and when I firſt diſſembled to be in love with Cleodora, I did not reaſon with you, ſo wiſely as you with me, though perhaps, I had more cauſe than you have. However, ſince at your deſire in feigning love to Cleodora, I became really in love with her, I cannot ſee why you ſhould ſo obſtinately deny my requeſt. But Hermogenes with all his Rhetorick could not perſwade Beleſis to conſent. And Beleſis having no good reaſons wherewith to Colour his denial, imployed his Prayers, and in all Zeal intreated him not to tell Cleodora that he did not love her, but loved Leoniſa.

After this Conteſt had laſted a long while, theſe two friends parted, both complaining one againſt the other; 'Tis true, yet there was no bitterneſs in their complaints, but they ſpoke to each other as if they hoped ſtill to perſwade; but after they were parted, they did more ſharply reſent the bitter Conſequences of the buſineſs. Hermogenes was ſo ſunk with ſorrow, that Beleſis had refuſed to aſſiſt him in his ſervice of Cleodora, that he came in a lamentable dejection unto me, to relate the Paſſage, aggravating the injuſtice of Beleſis his denial, in ſuch Language, as made the vehemency of his paſſion appear plainly unto me: but that I ſhould not be ignorant in any circumſtance which was related unto either of them, the next morning Beleſis, knowing I was an indifferent friend unto them both, came and acquainted me with the paſſage alſo, and deſired me that I would keep Hermogenes from telling Cleodora how he deluded her. So that I being the confident of them both, I made uſe of that knowledge I had of their real thoughts, to keep them from falling out, and did ſo temper their ſpirits, that they complained againſt each other, in a much more civil manner. Yet the buſineſs could not ſtand long upon theſe terms, as you ſhall preſently know. In the mean while Beleſis was not a little perplexed, when he went unto the Aunts of Cleodora, and Leoniſa: for when he talked not unto the laſt of theſe, he was not pleaſed: and when Hermogenes talked with Cleodora, he was not able to endure it, imagining always that, notwithſtanding all his prayers, he was diſcovering his inconſtancy unto her: ſo that to defer that inconveniency, he would oftentimes leave Leoniſa, and come to interrupt Hermogenes and Cleodora, intruding himſelf into their diſcourſe, and excuſing himſelf afterwards to Leoniſa, as well as he could. Cleodora for her part ſeeing Beleſis was ſo troubled and unquiet, and that yet he ſpake more unto her than he uſed, did interpret all his inquietudes unto her own advantage, and thought him to be ſtill in love with her. On the other ſide, Hermogenes told Cleodora in a low voice, that if ever ſhe would reduce Beleſis, ſhe muſt not baniſh Hermogenes; but as for Leoniſa, ſhe knew not what to think, but upon the perplexities of Beleſis, yet ſhe endeavoured to keep that which ſhe had cauſed Cleodora to loſe.

The truth is, Sir, I ſaw that at this time, which I aſſure you I never in my life ſaw before, and perhaps ſhall never ſee again: I mean a man to be jealous and not in love, ſince certainly Beleſis did for ſome days behave himſelf both to Cleodora and Hermogenes, as if he did not love the one, but as if he were the Rival ot the other: to wit, with many Perplexities, many alterations of Countenance, and with the very ſame impatiencies, that jealouſie is uſed to infuſe into thoſe whom it moſt torments. In the mean time, he always ſaid that he did not Love Cleodora, and that he was deſperately in love with Leoniſa. I have heard ſay (ſaid I unto him one evening when I was ſpeaking unto him concerning his intimate thoughts) that it is not eaſy to be long in love without a litle jealouſie: but I never thought it poſſible to be jealous, unleſs one were in love; And yet I ſee you behave your ſelf as if you were; For truly you canot endure Hermogenes ſhould talk in private with Cleodora: you interrupt their diſcourſe as much as you can: and when you cannot, you look upon them as if you would look through their hearts, and gueſs their thoughts: and then you are ſo tranſported, that you never look upon Leoniſa, though you are deeply in love with her: What would you have me do? (ſaid he to me) I would have you hearken unto reaſon (anſwered I) and ſince you are not in love with Cleodora, not to hinder Hermogenes, but permit him to do whatſoever will be advantageous to him: No, no Alcenor, ſaid he, I cannot prevail ſo far with my ſelf: and there is ſuch a fatal fantaſticalneſs upon me that I cannot endure neither that Hermogenes ſhould tell Cleodora I betrayed her, nor that he ſhould love her, or be loved: I value not methinks if a hundred others love her, but I cannot endure Hermogenes ſhould: yet you are more obliged to endure him than any other, replied I, for he is more your friend than any other: 'Tis very true, replyed Beleſis, and if you did but know how much I am aſhamed of my folly, you would Pitie me: in the mean time it is ſo predominate, that I can never return abſolutely unto Cleodora, nor allow Hermogenes to love her, nor can I ever forſake Leoniſa. As we were diſcourſing thus together; Hermogenes came in, who in my preſence ſpake as obligingly unto Beleſis as poſſibly could be: He told him that his ſix days would expire that night, and that he came once more to ſolicit him for a conſent unto what he formerly deſired. Moreover I have one thing to tell you ſaid he, before you give me my laſt denial, which is, that if you will repent of your fault, and quit Leoniſa, and return unto Cleodora, and become as faithful as you have been inconſtant: I promiſe you, to ceaſe my ſute, and never to diſcover your Crime, proteſting unto you that I will not only leave Cleodora, but Suſa alſo: but then I expect, that if it be ſo, you will love Leoniſa ſtill, and by conſequence not pretend any thing unto Cleodora: I expect, I ſay; you ſhould aſſiſt me, and no longer oppoſe my deſire. All that you ſay, is full of reaſon, replyed Beleſis, ſo that I am infinitely aſhamed to return ſuch an extravagant anſwer: But, Hermogenes, if you love me, you will pitie the imperfections of your friend, and excuſe me if I deny you, and confeſs that I cannot receive a more ſenſible diſpleaſure than to ſee you love Cleodora, though I Love Leoniſa. I know very well that it is extream folly to ſpeak thus: But it muſt be you, Hermogenes, who are wiſer than I am, that muſt connive at my weakneſs: it was you that brought me to Suſa, and cauſed all my miſeries, and therefore it muſt be you that muſt comfort me. Tis true, replied Hermogenes, I did bring you to Suſa: but it was you firſt who brought me in love with Cleodora, and by Conſequence it is our parts to comfort one another. After this, I took upon me to talk unto them both, but all to no purpoſe, and thus we all parted without any concluſion at all. And certainly it was very happy Beleſis did not lodge near Hermogenes, as he did when he came firſt to Suſa; for if they had, matters might have been worſe between them. In the mean time, the poor Hermogenes was in a ſad condition, becauſe Cleodora obſerving the inquietudes of Beleſis, and thinking he ſuffered them for the love of her, ſhe reſolved to baniſh Hermogenes; So that the ſix days which ſhe gave him, being expired, ſhe prepared her ſelf for that hour of audience which he asked, and ſhe promiſed, and taking hold of the opportunity in her Aunts chamber, they went both to a window, far enough from the reſt of the company, to talk, and not be underſtood; Therefore Cleodora began to conjure him not to ſpeak unto her any more, but by degrees to withdraw himſelf from coming to her. However, Madam, ſaid he unto her, you will confeſs that it is for Beleſis his ſake that you baniſh me; and that if he were not in love with you, you would not baniſh me; Cleodora thinking that Hermogenes would be better ſatisfied if ſhe ſpoke ſincerely unto him, than if ſhe ſhould diſſemble a truth which he was not ignorant of, told him in very obliging language, that it was very true, ſhe deſired to take from Beleſis all cauſes of jealouſie, and all complaints againſt her: aſſuring him, that if ſhe had not ſome compaſſion upon Beleſis, ſhe would never deprive her ſelf of his company, but ſhould deſire him to regulate that affection which he ſaid he bore her.

Hermogenes hearing Cleodora ſpeak with more mildneſs than one that had any mind to baniſh onother, or abſolutely diſoblige him, did believe, that if ſhe knew of Beleſis his inconſtancy, perhaps he might poſſeſs that place which this inconſtant man injoyed in the heart of this Lady: ſo that being prompted unto it by the exceſs of his love, and perceiving that he muſt either quit Cleodora, or undeceive her in her belief that ſhe had of Beleſis his loving her, began to think of changing the ſentence of his death: ſince he did extreamly love Beleſis, he was extreamly unwilling to tell her what he knew: but ſince it concerned the chief felicity of his life: and love ſurmounting all laws of friendſhip, his ſpirits began to be exaſperated againſt Beleſis.

Whilſt Hermogenes was thinking what to do, Cleodora looked upon him, imagining that the many alterations in his countenance, were cauſed only becauſe of his ſorrows, that he was not to ſpeak unto her as he was uſed: but at laſt Hermogenes prevailing with himſelf: the gods are my witneſſes, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) what an extream unwillingneſs is in me, to eaſe my Soul of thoſe miſeries which oppreſs it, by telling one thing which doubtleſs will much trouble you, and which is far from pleaſing me. For the melancholy which I ſhall ſee in your fair eyes, when you ſhall underſtand, that Beleſis is unworthy of thoſe honours you do him, will infinitely grieve me. But, Madam, though I ſhould not attempt to revoke that fatal ſentence, which you have pronounced againſt me; yet in conſideration of your own intereſt, I think my ſelf obliged to diſcover unto you what I know: for I am fully perſwaded, that when a Miſtreſs, and a friend are in the ſcales, the weights are much uneven. Nor is it in my choice to deliberate, ſince as the ſtate of my caſe ſtands, I muſt tell you that Beleſis is an unconſtant man: that his jealouſie is counterfeit, and that he is in love with Leoniſa. At the firſt Cleodora did not believe Hermogenes, but thought that all he told her, was his own invention: But ſince there is nothing more eaſie, than to infuſe miſtruſt into an amorous mind, ſhe no ſooner had told Hermogenes, that ſhe gave no credit unto his words, but ſhe began inſenſibly to be jealous, and ask him upon what conjectures he grounded his belief? So, that by little and little, and hardly knowing what ſhe ſaid, ſhe asked Hermogenes of more things than he knew of: and alſo he told her more than ſhe deſired to know: yet ſince there ſtill remained ſome kind of doubts in her; Hermogenes told her, that to clear them all, ſhe ſhould get her Picture out of Beleſis his hands, and there ſhe might ſee Leoniſa's alſo: Ah Hermogenes, ſaid Cleodora: Could I but ſee that, I ſhould extreamly hate Beleſis: And certainly you may ſee it, replied he, if you go handſomely about it: But alas, Madam, ſaid he, it will not be enough to hate Beleſis, unleſs you love Hermogenes: I aſſure you, ſaid ſhe unto him, if this you tell me be true, I ſhall not eaſily love any: and I ſhall ſo hate my ſelf, that I ſhall not be in any diſpoſition to love others; ſince, to ſpeak truly, none ever loves, but for love of themſelves: but however I aſſure you, that I ſhall think my ſelf eternally obliged unto you, for diſcovering the perfidiouſneſs of Beleſis to me. As ſhe ſpoke theſe laſt words, Beleſis entered, who ſeeing Hermogenes and Cleodora ſeparated from the company, went towards them, to interrupt their diſcourſe: though Leoniſa was in the ſame chamber. In going thither, his mind began to change, becauſe he feared Hermogenes had already diſcovered his crime: yet ſince he had already ſtept a pace forward, he went on, with a ſpirit ſo full of turbulency, as plainly told Cleodora, his mind was unquiet. On the other ſide, this Lady was not a little troubled, in diſſembling her thoughts: But ſince there was a neceſſity in it, to the end ſhe might clear all her doubts, ſhe forced her ſelf extreamly, to ſpeak unto Beleſis as ſhe uſed to do: yet ſhe received him with a conſtrained civility, ſo as Beleſis was much perplexed at it, not knowing whether it was an effect of her knowing his crime, or that it was only to ſpite him: Hermogenes alſo was ſo damped, that he durſt hardly look upon Beleſis, and therefore it was not ſtrange, that theſe three perſons could not endure to be together, but came unto the reſt of the company, as ſoon as they had done their firſt complements. In the mean while Leoniſa ſeeing Beleſis enter, turned her head continually, to obſerve whether he ſpake unto Cleodora: but ſince ſhe ſaw, he ſaid almoſt nothing, but that they all came towards her, the little ſpite ſhe had againſt him diminiſhed: yet for all that, ſhe thought to be revenged, and was ſo, immediately after: for, Sir, you muſt know, that Beleſis at his firſt coming into the chamber, did chuſe rather to addreſs himſelf unto Cleodora, than unto Leoniſa, becauſe ſhe was alone with Hermogenes, and he no ſooner ſaw that they were ſeparated, and joyned to the reſt of the company, but he addreſſed himſelf unto Leoniſa: who to be revenged as I ſaid before, did receive him with ſuch a cold look, as did little comfort him, in his ſecret ſorrows: for turning her ſelf preſently towards Tiſias, ſhe taught Beleſis by experience, what it was to prefer another before himſelf, and he could not get her to ſpeak one word unto him all that day: but whilſt Leoniſa was revenging her ſelf in this manner, Cleodora was full of impatient deſires, to be clearly reſolved of every thing which Hermogenes told her, and moved the company, to go and walk by the River which runs by Suſa: for ſhe had no mind to walk in the common walks, becauſe then ſhe could not ſo conveniently talk with Beleſis, as ſhe deſired: ſince Tiſias was with Leoniſa and being of the moſt conſiderable quality in all Suſa, none did diſpute with him for the place he would take, and therefore he led Leoniſa to the Coach, and afterwards by the rivers ſide, to which all the company being come, they walked on foot in a great meadow, where there were many willows growing by the River ſide: Beleſis ſeeing that he could not walk with Leoniſa, and being deſirous to hinder Hermogenes from preſenting his hand unto Cleodora, he addreſſed himſelf unto her, though not with the ſame amorous Aire, he was accuſtomed before he loved Leoniſa: Cleodora ſpoke to him with much civility and ſweetneſs, inſomuch as Beleſis aſſured himſelf, Hermogenes had not yet diſcovered his crime, and conſidering with himſelf, how Cleodora always loved him very dearly, his ſoul was ſtinged with extream remorſe, for betraying ſo fair, ſo ſweet a Lady: Not but that he did ſtill turn his head continually towards Leoniſa, to ſee how Tiſias courted her; and it was apparent, that his heart was pitifully torn in pieces. In the mean time Cleodora, who had a ſecret deſign in it, did ſo order her pace, whether Beleſis would or no, that they were ſeparated from the reſt of the company, taking a little path nearer the river ſide, to the end, as ſhe ſaid, ſhe might walk more under the ſhadow of the willows; after they had walked a while, Cleodora ſeeming to look upon the river that was very calm and ſmooth, and would needs look upon her ſelf in it: Ah Beleſis, ſaid ſhe, I ſhould think my glaſs to be a very bad one, or elſe I look very ill of late; yet I ſee it is not, for this river flatters no more than it: Beleſis not ſuſpecting her deſign, did contradict her, and ſaid ſhe never looked more fair; thinking that ſhe ſaid ſo only to move him not to conſent unto her. Beleſis therefore told her, he ſaw none more fair, ſince the firſt day he came to Suſa: yet I have been very ill, and much altered ſince then, replied ſhe, and I am confident that if you will look upon my picture, it will accuſe you of flattery, and make my alteration evidently appear. To ſhew you (ſaid he to the end ſhe might not ſee it, leſt ſhe ſhould ſee Leoniſa's alſo) that I think you fairer than your picture, I will not look upon it now in your preſence, becauſe I had much rather look upon you, than it: ſetting flattery aſide, ſaid Cleodora, I pray you let me ſee it: I would gladly let you ſee what wrong you do your ſelf (ſaid he unto her) in ſpeaking ſo ill of your beauty, but I am ſo unfortunate, as I left it this morning, in my cabinet, and forgot it: in ſaying ſo Beleſis bluſht, and ſo did Cleodora alſo, for ſhe knew well he ſpoke not truly: but to excuſe the diſorder that appeared in her face: I would not have given you my picture (replied Cleodora) to lock it up in your Cabinet, and forget me; Oh, Madam, (ſaid Beleſis unto her, extreamly non-pluſt) I beſeech you condemn me not, for ſo ill expreſſing my ſelf: for it was not my intention, to ſay that I forgot it, but that without any intention, I left it in my Cabinet: However it be, (ſaid ſhe) I would not have given you it for that, yet I pray you let me ſee it as ſoon as you can, and look well whether or no you left it there; for ſince you tell me, you left it there, and never thought of it, perhaps without thinking of it, you have it about you: Beleſis refuſed a long time to look for it, ſaying that he knew that he had it not about him: but at laſt, leſt Cleodora ſhould ſuſpect him; he ſeemed to look whether or no he was deceived, and to that end he looked amongſt many papers, and other things which he carried about him, having a great care not to pull out that which he would not have her ſee. But as ill luck for him was, the claſps of his table book, catched hold of the claſp of the caſe of the picture, and drew it out: ſo that Cleodora no ſooner ſaw it, but ſhe took it, before Beleſis could hinder her; Cleodora had no ſooner this Picture, but fearing that Beleſis would take it from her, ſhe put it in her pocket; afterwards, turning towards him, hereafter (ſaid ſhe, and ſeeming as if ſhe did not think he told a lie) truſt not too much to your memory. In the mean time, Beleſis was extreamly perplexed; for although he did not think that Cleodora knew Leoniſa's Picture was in that caſe, as well as her own: yet he knew, that if it remained long in her hands, ſhe would ſee it: And therefore it was made of ſuch a faſhion, that it was very hard for thoſe that knew it not, to perceive that it opened at both ſides, yet he thought, that Cleodora being ſuſpicious, and witty, would eaſily find it out, if ſhe had any long time to conſider it. And therefore he began to conjure her, to reſtore it preſently, but durſt not for his life have recourſe unto any force, againſt one to whom he owed ſo much reſpect: Madam, ſaid he unto her, you asked me your picture, to ſee whether you were fairer than it, and to do Juſtice in reſtoring it again the ſame hour? I will look upon it, ſaid ſhe, when I am with my glaſs: But, Madam, ſaid he, how do you think it poſſible, I ſhould be all the reſt of the day without it? Since you ſee the Perſon, whom it perſonates, (replied ſhe with a crafty ſmile) you need not regret the want of the Picture: Promiſe me then, I beſeech you, replied he, that you will reſtore it before we part; perhaps I ſhall reſtore it to morrow, ſaid ſhe; at leaſt I will intreat you to come unto my chamber, and ſee the difference betwixt my Picture, and my ſelf: After this Beleſis uſed a hundred conjurations, and began to be very angry in his language: alſo he was very nigh ſteeping his words in his tears: but at laſt he was forced to be ſilent, for Cleodora brought him into the company again, ſo that he could not talk any longer in private together: and to take all occaſion of it from him, ſhe went unto Leoniſa, and parted not from her all the reſt of the day: You may imagine, Sir, how Beleſis fretted, and how impatient Cleodora was to be in ſuch a place where ſhe might ſee whether all Hermogenes told her was truth: She did ſit ſo upon thorns, that ſhe complained it was grown late, to the end ſhe might the ſooner induce them homeward: On the contrary, Beleſis thinking to find ſome remedy for the diſcovery which he feared, or at leaſt finding ſome conſolation in deferring it, did all he could to ſpin out time, telling Cleodora ſhe was not very full of complacency, in deſiring ſo much good company ſhould be deprived of ſo much pleaſure for her ſake: but ſay what he could, they went home betimes: Yet his hope was, that when he came to her houſe, he might perhaps wait upon her to her Chamber, and there importune her to reſtore the Picture, but ſhe very cunningly ſtayed in her Aunts chamber until he was gone: and as ſoon as ever that was, ſhe went into her Cloſet, and ſhut her ſelf up, and very haſtily opened the caſe, where at firſt ſhe found only her own Picture: But ſince Hermogenes told her that the caſe was double, ſhe began to conſider it very attentively: and looked upon it a long while, turning it on every ſide, that at laſt ſhe found the way to open it, and preſently found the Picture of Leoniſa: As ſoon as ever ſhe ſaw it, ſhe let it fall from her hand. Then taking it up, ſhe looked upon it again: after which, throwing it upon the table with as much anger as ſorrow: Ah, Hermogenes cried ſhe out: all is but too true: but I wiſh it were not; well perfidious Beleſis, haſt thou betrayed me, and become inconſtant? well, well, Leoniſa, added ſhe, did you come unto Suſa, to make me the moſt miſerable woman in the world? And you Hermogenes, did you only love me to acquaint me with the cheat of your friend? But what good can Beleſis, Leoniſa and Hermogenes get, by the miſeries which I endure? ſince it is my ſelf whom I ought to accuſe for all my diſaſters. For indeed (added ſhe, and addreſſed her ſpeech as unto a third perſon) to what end is it, that ſhe is ſo curious in the choice of her friends, ſince ſhe is ſo ill a chuſer of her lover? ſhe could never endure above four or five in all the world, and out of that number ſhe hath preferred one before the reſt, and it is the very he that hath betrayed and forſaken her; ſhe, I ſay, who forſook all the world for Beleſis: ſhe changed her own humours for him, and was neither cholerick or imperious, yet he hath forſaken her, when ſhe was moſt favourable unto him: Doubtleſs, ſaid ſhe, I muſt now treat him, as they uſe to do ſlaves and ſpaniels that are better for beating and ill uſage; or to expreſs my ſelf a little better, I muſt neither be mild nor ſevere unto him, but for my own quiets ſake, I muſt not ſee him at all: But, alas! it is but too true, that I have ſeen him; I have eſteemed him, and I have loved him: Yet I am fully reſolved, never to ſee him again in private, but once, and that ſhall be, to chide him for his perfidy, and I am moſt certain I ſhall never eſteem him again. But for all my wiſe reſolutions, ſaid ſhe and ſighed, I cannot tell whether I can never love him again; methinks I am fuller of ſorrow and anger than I am of hatred: and methinks I cannot chuſe but wiſh he would repent; But I am reſolved though he ſhould repent, yet never to pardon him, but to be revenged both upon him for his crime, and upon my ſelf for my folly: After this, Cleodora told me, that ſhe ſpoke a hundred things more, which ſhe could not well remember: and that ſhe fixed upon a hundred ſeveral reſolutions contrary to one another, and that her mind was full of all that love, hatred, anger, and jealouſy could in the moſt violent manner inſpire into her: And was ſo long in diſcourſe with her ſelf, that her women were conſtrained to come and tell her it was very late, and that if ſhe would ſleep before it was day, ſhe muſt go to bed quickly. Cleodora deſiring to conceal her perplexities, took up the picture which ſhe threw upon the table with much violence, and went to bed: but aſſured me that ſhe never cloſed her eyes all that night; but after ſhe had well thought upon what courſe to take, ſhe reſolved to imploy all her wits to make Beleſis and Leoniſa fall out, and to make a way for Tiſias to marry her. Yet ſince ſhe could not bring this to paſs by her ſelf, but did ſtand in need of the help of Hermogenes, who could eaſily help on her deſign, ſhe reſolved to endure him, and make him the confident of her revenge. Since ſhe was one of an arrogant ſpirit, ſhe had an apprehenſion that none could obſerve by her eyes that ſhe had been crying, or that ſhe wanted ſleep: ſo that before the Sun appeared, ſhe wiped up all her tears, and ſhut up all her ſighs, and did ſtrive to ſet a gloſs of that tranquility upon her face which was far from her heart: ſhe would needs be dreſſed better than the day before, thinking her dreſs would add gayneſs unto her looks: After that ſhe had taken all poſſible care to hide her melancholy, ſhe went from her own chamber to Leoniſa's, which was not far off, but ſince this Lady did not riſe ſo ſoon as Cleodora, ſhe was not yet ready; and not knowing why or what her buſineſs was, ſhe did chide her for being ſo early, and earneſtly asked the reaſon; for truly ſaid ſhe unto her, I did not think to ſee you ſo early, and ſo fine to day, (adding and laughing) that ſurely ſhe intended to make ſome new conqueſt at the Temple, and told her it was prophane to have any ſuch thoughts, and that therefore, ſhe was too early up, though her complexion was as freſh, and eyes as ſparkling, as if ſhe had ſlept ten hours; Yet it is ſo early, ſaid ſhe unto her, that before we go unto the Temple, half the curls of your hair would be out, and hang down negligently. I aſſure you, replied Cleodora, with a blitheneſs which was not very natural, if I can but pleaſe you to day, I ſhall think the time imployed in my dreſs to be well beſtowed. As for any conqueſt, my dear Couſin, I proteſt they are far from my thoughts, ſince if I ſhould make any, I ſhould endeavour to loſe them again; After this, theſe two fair ones talked of a hundred ſuch things as theſe, whilſt Leoniſa was dreſſing her ſelf; and when ſhe was ready, Cleodora aſſuming a more ſerious countenance, and having a mind to be revenged upon Beleſis, I am very ſorry, ſaid ſhe unto her, that I am forced to give you any ſuch teſtimony of my love, as will not be agreeable to your liking; and to reveal a ſecret unto you, which perhaps you will not give me any thanks for; but ſince I am perſwaded it is fit to be done, I am reſolved upon it, entreating you firſt to believe, that I have no intention to find that which I would adviſe you to loſe. There is ſo much obſcurity in your words, replied Leoniſa, that I cannot make any anſwer; all that I can ſay is, that I am moſt willing to put a favourable conſtruction upon any thing you ſhall ſay, and thankfully acknowledge any confidence you ſhall put in me: If ſo, replied Cleodora, I ſhall confeſs unto you, (though I cannot without a bluſh) that long before you came to Suſa, Beleſis did court me, and if I durſt ſay it, did love me; but loved me in ſuch a manner as made too great a noiſe in the world; ſo that to hinder him from doing many things which might be prejudicial unto me, I was forced to be a little leſs ſevere towards him than otherwiſe I ſhould: Then did I ſuffer him to tell me ſometimes that he loved me, leſt he ſhould otherwiſe blab it unto others; ſo that having ſome eſteem of Beleſis, and ſlightly acknowledging the affection he had to me, I behaved my ſelf with much confidence towards him. This was the ſtate of things, my dear Leoniſa when you came firſt hither. But ſince love is a paſſion which is hard to be hid, I confeſs I was afraid leſt you ſhould perceive the love which Beleſis profeſſed unto me: for ſince I never ſaw you ſince you were five years old, I had not experience enough in you to make you my confident: ſo that I hope in reaſon it will not offend you that I did at that time miſtruſt you, and to tell you truly, ſince you had never been at Court, I thought you would interpret things of this nature as crimes, and that perhaps you knew not how to diſtinguiſh between an innocent paſſion and an unlawful affection: So that extreamly fearing you ſhould diſcover the correſpondency between Beleſis and my ſelf, I told him that I would not expoſe my ſelf unto that hazard, and willed him never to talk in private with me before you, nor ſo much as to look upon me when you were preſent: For though I knew you not, yet I obſerved in you a notable ſpirit, which made me fear you: I being thus full of unquiet thoughts, and not affecting Beleſis ſo much as he did me: I abſolutely told him, that I would not live in ſuch continual apprehenſions of fear; and he ſeeing I was almoſt reſolved to break off with him, rather than you ſhould come to know the intelligence between us; he propoſed (for the ſetling of my mind in quiet, and to hinder you from diſcovering the truth) that I would permit him to diſſemble a love unto you: And I, not loving you then, as now I do, conſented unto his propoſition: Conceiving it would be matter of great joy unto a young freſh-come Lady, to think ſhe had captivated the heart of ſuch a gallant man as Beleſis. I aſſure you (ſaid Leoniſa, and bluſhed, denying only ſhe was deceived) Beleſis hath very ill acquitted himſelf of his negotiation, for he never told me that he loved me, but I very well perceived that he loved you: Fie, fie, Leoniſa (ſaid Cleodora very ſubtilly) never deny it unto me, for I know it as well as your ſelf: only pardon me I beſeech you for conſenting unto Beleſis in that cheat which Beleſis put upon you. But to ſhew you I had no intention it ſhould go ſo far: You muſt lend me a patient hearing: and I ſhall tell you, that in conſenting to his propoſition, I declared unto him, that I would only have him addreſs him in complements of Courtſhip and Gallantry: and not ſeem to engage himſelf in good earneſt, for that would not be only a ſimple cheat, but a horrible Treachery which I would never conſent unto: he promiſed me as much as I deſired, and ſince that, my mind hath been in ſome ſerenity, knowing that you would imagine his affection was to you, and by conſequence never ſuſpect he loved me: At firſt I was uſed to ask him what he ſaid unto you, and what you anſwered, but afterwards I gave over and enquired no more. Having ſince that obſerved, that he addreſſed himſelf with a ſtrange aſſiduity unto you, I muſt needs confeſs, my dear Leoniſa, that your fair eyes ſtruck a terror into me, and I feared his fiction was turned earneſt: Then I reſolved to tell Beleſis of it, who ſwore a thouſand oaths unto me, that he never loved you one minute, and the more forcibly to perſwade me, he offered never to ſpeak unto you again. And that he would put into my hands all that ever he had of yours, even your Picture: in ſaying ſo Cleodora did ſhew her Picture unto Leoniſa: I cannot repreſent unto you, Sir, the aſtoniſhment of this Lady: For I have heard her ſelf ſay, that her ſpirits were never in her life ſo troubled as then. Ah Cleodora, (cried Leoniſa) I never gave Beleſis my Picture, I will believe you, replied ſhe, but he told me you did, and that which makes me ſooner believe you, is, becauſe I never gave him mine: and yet he told me, replied Leoniſa, that your own hand did give it him, and he did not only tell me, but I think he told Hermogenes as much, for I have heard his Siſter ſay ſo: However it be, ſaid Cleodora, I thought my ſelf obliged to remedy the wrong I did, and undeceive you. But to let you ſee (ſaid ſhe unto her) that in diſcovering this truth unto you, I do it not out of any jealouſie, let me tell you that my mind does ſo diſguſt the proceedings of Beleſis, that I am abſolutely reſolved to break off with him, and the ſooner, becauſe I have credible information, that he holds a ſecret correſpondency with a Lady of the beſt quality in all Suſa. Therefore if you will believe me, and the advice of her who firſt conſented to delude you, you ſhall abſolutely reject him as I do, and let both reſolve never to ſee him again: I know that if I ſhould look upon the matter as I might, I had ſome reaſon to complain againſt you, ſince your own words did ſignifie you believed that I loved Beleſis, and yet for all that you did as much as was in your power to engage him unto a love of you: but it was I who committed the firſt fault, and therefore will pardon you the ſecond: offering my aſſiſtance to revenge your ſelf upon Beleſis, better than you your ſelf can without me. Leoniſa hearing Cleodora, ſay ſo, knew not what to think, nor could ſhe doubt her words, becauſe ſhe found ſo much probability in them: So that her anger againſt Beleſis for deceiving her did ſo exaſperate her ſpirits, that ſhe was not at all angry with Cleodora, but did very eaſily pardon her: After which, being very forward to incenſe her againſt Beleſis, and told her all his paſſionate and obliging expreſſions unto her: But ſince this was a better ſtory to tell Cleodora wherewith to incenſe her: She told her another which was much ſweeter: For as ſhe told her how ſhe believed that Beleſis loved her, yet I know (ſaid ſhe unto her) that I was much to blame in ſuſpecting it, for when I importuned him one day to let me have your picture and all your letters, the wicked man make his denial of them paſs in my conceit for an effect of his diſcretion and virtue, and I had that Day ſo good an opinion of him for it, that I ſhewed him more favour than ever I did ſince I knew him: Thus, Sir, the poor Leoniſa, did ſecond the deſign of Cleodora to be revenged upon Beleſis: yet Cleodora was not ſorry that Beleſis had ſo much reſpect of her as not to give her Letters unto Leoniſa: but he was ſo culpable ſo many other ways that this did not make her change her deſign, and ſhe ſtill looked upon him as a man who was naturally very diſcreet, but yet very inconſtant: Then ſhe began to flatter Leoniſa, and to confirm her in the reſolution of baniſhing Beleſis, ſeeking out for handſome pretences to move their Aunt not to take it ill. In the mean time, ſince Leoniſa's ſoul was not ſtrong enough to diſſemble ſorrow that day, ſhe deſired Cleodora to ſay ſhe was not well, and that none could ſee her, and indeed ſhe went unto Bed, the better to hide thoſe tears, which perhaps ſhe could not hold: After which, Cleodora went unto the Temple, waiting for the afternoon with much impatience; for ſhe imagined, that Beleſis would not fail to viſit her in her chamber: yet he came not ſo ſoon as ſhe hoped, for he apprehended that ſhe could not find out Leoniſa's Picture, and therefore it was late before he came to ſee Cleodora: and at laſt he went, but it was with ſuch thoughts as himſelf did not well know what they were: For as he earneſtly deſired that Cleodora would not love Hermogenes, yet he was ſtill as deep in love with Leoniſa as ever he was, though he bore much reſpect unto Cleodora. But for all thoſe reſpects he was extreamly afraid, that ſhe ſhould know his crime, not out of any reſentments of love, but of honour.

Thus being very unquiet in his thoughts, and fearing alſo that Leoniſa ſhould know he had talked ſo long with Cleodora the day before, and that he ſhould go into Cleodora's chamber before hers, he appeared before Cleodora very reſerved and melancholy. As for her, ſince ſhe hoped, that Leoniſa did reſolve upon a revenge, her face was full of joy, which raiſed a great confidence in him, thinking that if Cleodora had ſeen the Picture of Leoniſa, ſhe would not have been ſo pleaſant: Well, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) have you not found your ſelf far fairer than your picture? hath not your glaſs convinced you of an errour? and are you not clearly of my opinion, that you are infinitely fairer than your Picture? I know not whether you were in the right, or the wrong, in telling me ſo (ſaid ſhe unto him) but I am ſure there is one in that Caſe which I took from you whom you think far fairer than mine, or my ſelf either. In ſaying ſo, Cleodora bluſht for anger, and Beleſis grew pale with fear and aſtoniſhment: he had not power to open his mouth: ſo that Cleodora, ſeeing he ſpoke not: You do very well, Beleſis, ſaid ſhe unto him, you do very well not to go about to excuſe your ſelf; for you would do it ſo ſcurvily, that you would but augment my anger. I know, Madam, (ſaid he then unto her) that you have reaſon to think me culpable, ſince you have ſeen the Picture of Leoniſa: and I know, ſaid ſhe, that you can never perſwade me to the contrary: For to ſpare you the labour of giving any ſcurvy reaſons, or inventing any lies, I know all the paſſages betwixt Leoniſa and your ſelf: you cannot tell me a word which I do not know, either from her ſelf, or her confident which hath betrayed her: and I remember all that you have done againſt me alſo; and after all this, I pray, judge what thoughts I ought to have of you, and whether I have not reaſon to ſlight you ſo far as to hate you extreamly: but yet notwithſtanding, I cannot hate you without an Epithete, and therefore let me repeat it, and tell you, that I do moſt horridly hate you: I cannot endure the very ſight of you: not only as you are an inconſtant man, which is an imperfection far below a generous ſpirit; but becauſe you are a cloſe ſinner, and would have concealed your inconſtancy, in feigning to be jealous, and ſo would have ſmeared me with your own crime. Pray, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) why did you treat me ſo long, ſo cruelly? and why did you make me ſo miſerable, that I was forced to make you jealous, and feign to be ſo of you, thereby to obtain your love? Fie, fie, Beleſis (ſaid ſhe unto him) do not ſtill diſſemble the matter, you did really love Leoniſa, and never thought I loved Hermogenes. I know not, ſaid he, whether I thought it; but I am ſure I feared it extreamly, and would have done any thing to hinder him from being in your favour. Your language is ſo extravagant (ſaid ſhe unto him in great anger) that I cannot endure you ſhould be a minute longer with me: But ſince it is the laſt time of all my life that ever I will ſpeak unto you, I ſhall be glad to know what were your motives, and reaſons of your change: for before ever Leoniſa came to Suſa, you ſaw there a thouſand fairer than my ſelf, or her either: yet you did not quit me for any of them; nor can it be my ſeverity which tired your patience, ſince when I was rigorous you loved me, and when I was otherwiſe, then you changed your thoughts: Nor could it be any of my favours which could glut your love, for thanks be to the gods, I did never load you with them: what then may be the cauſe of your inconſtancy? Am I more ſtupid than I was? or of a more unpleaſing humour? Speak then, Beleſis, but ſpeak to me as if I were not Cleodora, and tell me exactly, how came Leoniſa to chaſe me out of your heart: for I ſhould be glad to know whether I was violently thruſt out, or came out with your good-will: whether it was through your own weakneſs, or my fault? Beleſis being ſo extreamly importuned by Cleodora, knew not well what to anſwer: for he was ſo horridly aſhamed of his inconſtancy, he could not for his heart confeſs it: on the other ſide, he ſaw that he could not deny it: and that though he ſhould ſeem to repent, and Cleodora inclinable to pardon him, yet it would be upon condition to forſake Leoniſa, which he could not do: ſo that not knowing what anſwer to return, he ſpake ſo ambiguouſly, that Cleodora was almoſt as angry at it, as at his inconſtancie: Sincerity (ſaid ſhe) is a thing which every one may have: I will believe then, that you cannot love me, and that you cannot but love Leoniſa; all this is honeſt: But could you not confeſs the truth unto me, and not add a crime unto your imbecility? What would you have me ſay, Madam (replyed Beleſis) ſince at this preſent I know not what to think? I confeſs that I have loved you more than I do, but you your ſelf is the cauſe I do not love you as well as I did: ſince in the very heat of my paſſion, you put my patience to ſuch rigid trials, as any other beſides my ſelf would have hated you. Then it ſeems, (ſaid Cleodora ſharply) according to your ſence, that I am obliged unto you for paſſing from love only into indifferency? But know, (weak and unconſtant man) that indifferency amongſt perſons that once loved dearly, is much more offenſive than hatred, and therefore I ought to hate you more, becauſe you did not hate me: But, alas, Madam, replied Beleſis, would you have me ſincere, when as my ſincerity does only incenſe you more? Yet I ſhould be glad you were, replyed ſhe, for I would know any thing that would not be advantagious unto you. All that I can do at this preſent (ſaid he unto her) is to aſſure you that I never fail'd in my due reſpects of you, nor ſpoke one word againſt you to Leoniſa, but I denied her your picture, therefore I conjure you, as you are generous, not to uſe hers ill. I underſtand you very well (ſaid ſhe unto him) you would have me reſtore it unto you: but ſince it will be more acceptable to receive it from her hand than from mine, I will reſtore it unto her, that ſhe may give it you the ſecond time. Oh I beſeech you, Madam, ſaid he unto her, do not offer ſuch a ſenſible diſpleaſure unto a Lady who is not at all culpable: For ſuppoſe me to be an unconſtant man, one that hath forſaken you, and betrayed you; yet Leoniſa hath no other ſhare in my crimes but in ſuffering me to ſee her. However it be, ſaid Cleodora, it ſhall be as I ſay. I ſee then, Madam, replied he, that you only ſeek a pretence for doing me an ill office unto Leoniſa: But, Madam, though you think I do not love you, yet I muſt needs intereſt my ſelf in any thing which concerns you, when I ſee you are ſo raviſhed with joy that you can accuſe me of inconſtancy, leſt I ſhould tell you that Hermogenes hath made you an infidel. I would not adviſe you (ſaid ſhe unto him) to make uſe of any ſuch ill policie, for it will not avail you; In the mean time, ſince you will have me know your real thoughts, I muſt tell you mine:

Know then, that it is impoſſible any ſhould have more horrid hatred, than I have of your inconſtancy; nor leſs regret for loſing that which is ſo eaſily loſt. After this, pray go and ſeek for ſome crumbs of comfort from Leoniſa, after you have been a whole long night without her Picture: neither is ſhe well, and did bid me tell every one that they ſhould not viſit her this day: but ſince perhaps you have ſome peculiar priviledge, you may chance to ſee her: In the mean time, I pray prepare your ſelf to go any whither, ſo it be out of my ſight, for I have ſo much credit with my Aunt, as I can obtain from her, you ſhall not have the liberty to look into her houſe: without doubt the reaſon is (replied Beleſis, not well knowing what he ſaid) becauſe you would have a handſome opportunity of ſeeing Hermogenes: without doubt the reaſon is, replied ſhe, becauſe I would ſee Beleſis no more, neither inconſtant, nor ſo bold, as to tell me ſuch things as he never thought: moreover, I pray, do not meaſure my anger by the little bitterneſs which is in my words: for if I ſhould follow my own natural Genius, I ſhould tell you moſt ſtrange things. But ſince you may imagine, that the greatneſs of my anger is a mark of the greatneſs of my affection which I had towards you: I will let you ſee, that I have ſo much power over my ſelf, as to be an abſolute Miſtreſs of a paſſion which uſeth to be imperious, and hard to be kept within the limits of Reaſon. Beleſis would have ſaid ſomething concerning Leoniſa's Picture, and concerning Hermogenes, but the patience of Cleodora would not permit him, and therefore away he went. As ſoon as he was gone out of Cleodora's chamber, he went to ſeek ſome conſolation in Leoniſa's, having a mind to prepare her, leſt Cleodora ſhould do her an ill office: But when he came within two paces of the door, her woman told him, that none could ſee her Miſtreſs: but he ſo tampered with her, that he perſwaded her to leave the door open, to the end it might be ſaid he entered without ſpeaking unto any: and accordingly this woman went in, and left the door half ſhut, as Beleſis deſired her. Then preſently after he entred, and went to Leoniſa's bed-ſide undiſcern'd by any of the Women which were in the other ſide of the Chamber, ſhe who left open the Door ran unto him, ſeeming to be very angry that he entred, and asking pardon of her Miſtreſs, who indeed was very angry. She would have deſired him to go out again, but ſtill he preſſed forward, and Leoniſa at laſt admitted of his viſit: he was no ſooner ſet, but he asked her why ſhe ſhould ſo cruelly drive him out of her chamber, at a time when he was moſt in need of conſolation: The reaſon is, replied Leoniſa very ſharply, becauſe reſolving to drive you out of my heart, I began this day to drive you out of my chamber. Madam, ſaid he unto her, I perceive Cleodora hath prejudicated your opinion of me. Ah, Beleſis, replied ſhe, you ſee how ſhe whom you named, repenting of her conſent unto your cheat, hath diſcovered it unto me: Beleſis hearing Leoniſa ſpeak ſo, was ſo aſtoniſhed, that he knew not what to think of her words: for he knew but too well, that it was Cleodora whom he deceived, and that he never deceived Leoniſa: Then he deſired her, ſhe would be pleaſed to let him know whereof ſhe accuſed him. Leoniſa, as plauſible as ſhe was, was ſo incenſed with this demand, that ſhe gave him a hundred bitter expreſſions, letting him underſtand the crime which ſhe thought he had committed: Beleſis then offered to juſtifie himſelf, but ſhe would not ſuffer him to ſpeak. No, no, ſaid ſhe unto him, you are culpable, and more than is imaginable: for why would you put my Picture into Cleodora's hands, and refuſed to truſt me with hers? Was it not enough, that to ſatisfie her, you ſhould diſſemble love to me, and conceal the affection which you had, and yet have to her, but you muſt alſo triumph over my innocency, and my credulity, in giving her a Picture which I never gave you, and which I did only conſent that you ſhould keep, ſince I found you ſo diſcreet as not to part with Cleodora's? Alas, Madam, ſaid he, do you think that I did voluntarily give your picture unto Cleodora? I muſt needs think it, ſaid ſhe, for ſhe could not take it from you by violence: Beleſis then conjured her to admit of his juſtification. But ſhe anſwered him, that ſhe would ſooner believe his eyes than his words, and ſay what he could, he could not obtain leave to ſpeak; for Leoniſa had ſuch an extream ſpite againſt him, becauſe ſhe thought he diſſembled a love to her, that ſhe could not ſuffer him to juſtifie himſelf: yet had his importunity wearied her out, and he had obtained liberty to plead for himſelf, had not Leoniſa's Aunt come in, who hearing that ſhe kept her chamber, and would ſee none, came to ſee how ſhe did: But ſhe much wondered to ſee Beleſis with her: I thought, ſaid ſhe unto Leoniſa, to have found you ſick by your ſelf: and in lieu of that I find you well, in good, though not much company. I aſſure you, replied ſhe a little troubled, that I am not a whit better for my company, and you would do me the greateſt favour in the world, if you would move Beleſis, who came in without permiſſion, to go out without thanks, and leave me at reſt, and in ſolitude, which is the beſt remedy againſt what I am troubled with. This grave Lady hearing her ſay ſo, and ſeeing both her eyes ſwelled, and her colour high, did eaſily believe that ſhe was ill in her head: ſo that preſenting her hand unto Beleſis, ſhe moved him to follow her, telling him with a ſmile, that ſhe would acquaint him with a buſineſs which perhaps he knew not of; which was, that he ſhould never viſit Ladies at ſuch time when they had not a deſire to be ſeen: For truly, ſaid ſhe unto him, I am very much deceived, if Leoniſa pardon you this long time, for ſeeing her in her negligent dreſs: and I know by the colour which I obſerved in her face, that ſhe was very angry Beleſis then made a hundred excuſes unto this Lady, deſiring at leaſt to be in favour with her, who had power either to admit him into her houſe, or to drive him out. But his ſpirits being in a ſtrange diſorder, he did not continue long in returning handſome anſwers, but did ſo rove in his diſcourſe, that ſhe thinking he was weary of her, and that he could not endure the company of any but young perſons, ſhe grew very angry with him, and played upon him with a jearing kind of Rallary: ſo that poor Beleſis went out of the houſe very ill ſatisfied with all that dwelt in it, and with himſelf alſo ſo much, that he complained more againſt himſelf than any of the reſt. Sometimes he would upbraid himſelf with inconſtancy, and repent that ever he quitted Cleodora: but he was no ſooner in but out of that mind, and quarrelled with himſelf for being ſo reſpective of her: Sometimes he would lay the fault upon Leoniſa's credulity, and afterward accuſe Cleodora of her old fantaſticalneſs: Nor did he ſpare Hermogenes, yet had he no convincing proofs againſt him, but thought that Leoniſa's picture was it which diſcovered the truth unto Cleodora, who for her part was not without her ſhare of inquietudes; deſire of revenge did ſo tranſport her ſoul, that almoſt ſhe did not value the ruine of Beleſis, and hence it was that ſhe received Hermogenes with extraordinary civility, whilſt Beleſis was with Leoniſa. The firſt time ſhe ſaw him, thanks for diſcovering the deceit of his friend, was his firſt congratulation: She called him her deliverer, and gave him ſuch obliging Language, that if he had been leſs in love than he was, he had thought himſelf deeply obliged: but becauſe all Cleodora's candid favours were but ſo many ſymptomes of her affection to Beleſis, though ſhe did ſeem ſore incenſed againſt him, yet he could not reliſh them as favours to be rejoyced at, yet ſhe told him ſo often, that ſhe would never forget the ſervice he had done her, that at laſt his hopes told him he might happily draw ſome advantage to himſelf by diſcovering his friends inconſtancy: but ſince he ſaw much turbulency in her ſpirit, he durſt not ſolicit for that place in her heart which Beleſis deſerved to loſe, and lent an ear unto all her bitter exclamations againſt the Perfidie of Beleſis without any expreſſions of his own paſſion, further then with the language of his eyes only. After ſhe had told him that ſhe had the Picture of Leoniſa, and her ſelf; and had related all Beleſis told her: Hermogenes (ſaid ſhe) I do not think it enough that you have revealed his crime: but you muſt alſo help me to puniſh him: Provided that you will give me but a part of thoſe poſſeſſions wherewith you enriched him, replied he, I ſhall be ready to aſſiſt you in your revenge, and after that defend them againſt all the world. It appears that the poſſeſſions you ſpeak of were of no great value, ſince Beleſis did ſo willingly part from them: But Hermogenes, it is not now time to talk of ſuch things, ſince I need no additions unto my misfortunes, therefore I conjure you to tell me ſincerely whether you will aſſiſt me to be revenged upon Beleſis; for unleſs you will, I ſhall quite forget your ſervice in diſcovering his crime.

I beſeech you, Madam, replied he, firſt tell me what kind of revenge you intend before I promiſe you any thing? not that I think I can deny you any thing, nor that I do ſuſpect you are capable of obliging me unto any thing which becomes not a man of honour: But I muſt confeſs, I have already done Beleſis ſo great a miſchief, in taking from him your eſteem and affection, by acquainting you with his inconſtancy, that I have a great deſire to know what more you would have me to do: I would have you, ſaid ſhe unto him, imploy that credit which I know you have with the Prince of Suſa, and with the friends of Tiſias, that the laſt of theſe may marry Leoniſa, you know that he hath a great deſire unto it, and there are ſome reaſons why both families ſhould forward the motion, and likewiſe ſome, why they ſhould oppoſe it: and becauſe I know you are able to ſurmount all obſtacles, and bring it about, I conjure you to negotiate the buſineſs.

I can aſſure you, that in the humour ſhe now is, and wherein I will keep her as long as I can, ſhe will marry who one will. I wiſh, Madam, replied Hermogenes, that this deſire of revenge would infuſe into your ſoul, a favourable inclination to receive my ſervices. I ſhall moſt willingly receive this ſervice which I require, replied ſhe; But, Madam, anſwered he, I ſee you do admirably well contrive your own revenge, and you could not do it more fully than by taking Leoniſa from Beleſis : but I do not perceive you have any conſideration of the intereſt which I might have in this revenge : do not you conſider divine Cleodora, that by putting Leoniſa into ſuch a condition, as ſhe can never be married to Beleſis, you put Beleſis into a way of returning unto Cleodora ? though he ſhould, ſaid ſhe, he ſhould return in vain: moreover, Madam, purſued Hermogenes, I muſt tell you, that my love to you does ſo perfectly tell me what the ſorrows of a man would be, from whom all hopes of enjoying his Miſtreſs is taken away, that how great ſoever my deſires are to pleaſe you, yet I am extreamly unwilling to obey you, therefore I beſeech you think of ſome other way to puniſh Beleſis : As he is not my Rival, ſince now he does not love you, I muſt confeſs, I cannot leave loving him as my friend : not but that he hath denied me many things, which exceedingly incenſed me againſt him, but for all that, I cannot commit this treaſon againſt him : I know well that I have revealed his crime unto you, but it was becauſe in doing ſo, I did not take from him that perſon whom he deſired to enjoy. Therefore, Madam, I beſeech you once more move me not unto a thing for which you will hereafter upbraid me, when the heat of your anger is over and your reaſon free : revenge your ſelf upon Beleſis, in forgetting him : or if you cannot forget him, remember him only to hate him, and to deteſt his inconſtancy : and if you will puniſh him further yet, I beſeech you make me ſo happy, that my felicity may create a horrid envie in him : in letting him know that he hath quitted Diamonds for Glaſs in forſaking Cleodora for Leoniſa. No, no, Hermogenes, replied ſhe, I am not capable of this generoſity which you would perſwade me unto, and which perhaps proceeds not from your heart, but becauſe there is in you a little diſpoſition to oblige me. Alas, Madam, ſaid Hermogenes, you do not know me, it you think it want of affection which makes me ſpeak thus : you know me worſe than I know you, replied ſhe, if you think I can keep any meaſure in my revenge: and not ſee that you have no diſpoſition to do me ſervice: for the truth is, ſaid ſhe, if you will do me any, you muſt aſſiſt me with your tranſaction, that Tiſias may marry Leoniſa, or that Hermogenes never ſee Cleodora again. Oh, Madam, ſaid he unto her, for Heavens ſake have ſome care of my Honour: And force me not to a thing which will render me odious in the eyes of all the Court: I do not intend, replied ſhe, that you ſhould publikely ſpeak of a marriage between Tiſias and Leoniſa, but I would have you go cunningly to work, and negotiate it with all ſecrecy; truly, Madam, ſaid he unto her, ſince you force me to tell you my thoughts, I muſt manifeſt unto you that I will not refuſe you out of generoſity only, but out of love alſo: For, Madam, what hatred ſoever you reſent againſt Beleſis, or what love ſoever he bears unto Cleodora, I ſhall never be at reſt as long as I ſee any poſſibility of your uniting together: after this, Madam, you may imagine, that it is not for want of affection, that I refuſe what you deſire of me: what ever it be, replied ſhe, it ſeems you refuſe me, and refuſe to do the thing which I moſt deſire of any thing in the world; But for all that, ſince I have no right to force your will, I will diſpence with you from your obedience: and the rather becauſe I do Fancy another way to bring my deſign to paſs without your help, and I am not ſorry that I ſhall not ingage my ſelf unto you by it. Hermogenes, thinking Cleodora was incenſed againſt him, began to give very obliging Language; proteſting unto her, that whatever he ſaid, yet if it were her Poſitive pleaſure, he would obey her, though his honour and life and all would be at the ſtake: ſo that Cleodora took him immediately at his word. But, Madam, ſaid he unto her, that I may have ſome Colourable excuſe wherewith to anſwer thoſe that know my Crime, I beſeech you what recompence may I hope for, if I do as you deſire me: even any thing, anſwered ſhe, for I muſt confeſs unto you, that if I could prevent Beleſis from obtaining Leoniſa, I would be fuller of joy than I am able to expreſs, and by conſequence ſo obliged unto you, that I will put no limits unto your hopes, provided they be juſt. Then, Madam, replied Hermogenes, ſince I ſee ſo much ſweetneſs in your expreſſions, I ſhall conjure you, that if I hinder Beleſis from Leoniſa, you ſhall give Cleodora unto Hermogenes. No, no, Hermogenes, ſaid ſhe unto him, I will not capitulate with thoſe I would have do me any good office; and I wonder how you dare be ſo bold as to ask me any ſuch thing: otherwiſe, Madam, anſwered he, how can you conceive, (ſince I am ſo deeply in love with you) that I can hinder Beleſis from marrying Leoniſa, ſince I ought ſo earneſtly to wiſh the marriage? and how can I chuſe but ſuſpect and fear that you have ſome ſecret deſign in it, if you will not engage your ſelf unto any thing, and therefore, Madam, ſince if I break off that marriage, it is not impoſſible but he may repent, and you may pardon him: I beſeech you take it not ill, if I be very unwilling to hinder that match which may cauſe yours with Beleſis. Then I ſee Hermogenes, (ſaid ſhe unto him) that you will not do this good office which I would have you; and the leſs to diſoblige me, you pretend a reſentment of love, though indeed it be only a reſentment of generoſity: I will not much blame you for it, for I have not yet abſolutely loſt my reaſon: neither have I any great reaſon to commend you, ſince you have denied that which I did moſt deſire. In the mean time ſince you cannot ſatisfie my deſires, unleſs upon ſuch a condition, as I will not engage my ſelf into: yet I pray you let the ſame generoſity, which will not permit you to betray your friend, keep you from betraying her that truſts you with her ſecrets, and her revenge. Hermogenes ſeeing Cleodora would not promiſe what he deſired, did believe that ſhe would only have Tiſias marry Leoniſa, to the end that Beleſis might thereby be out of all hopes of enjoying her, and ſo return unto her again: and therefore reſolving not to do a thing which he thought prejudicial both to his honour and his love, did excuſe his denial with a hundred expreſſions of ſorrow, and in ſuch a ſenſible manner, that ſhe plainly ſaw he was as full of vertue as love, ſo that they did not part upon very ill terms. Hermogenes had one imagination which proved very advantagious for him; For ſince he perceived the mind of Cleodora was ſilled only with thoughts of revenge upon Beleſis, he did cunningly hint unto her, that though his jealouſie was but counterfeit, yet he could not be more ſenſibly vexed than to hear that Beleſis did viſit her, and that ſhe did not ſlight him; Tis true, he uſed much art in his expreſſions, fearing Cleodora ſhould attribute his thoughts unto jealouſie, and he applied his words ſo ingeniouſly, that Cleodora called Beleſis a hundred times fantaſtical, as well as inconſtant. So as in that humour ſhe was then in, ſhe would not neglect the leaſt thing that might diſpleaſe Beleſis, and therefore ſhe reſolved to ſpeak ofter unto Hermogenes than ſhe uſed, and alſo to treat him incomparably better. In the mean time, ſince ſhe had one friend that was much in favour with the Prince of Suſa, and had a prevalent power both with him and Tiſias, ſhe plotted how to make uſe of him, though at firſt it went againſt her mind to truſt her ſelf unto any one who knew nothing of her ſecrets. But as ſweet revenge will ſurmount all obſtacles, ſhe tranſacted with this friend, who was able to accompliſh her deſires, and managed the matter with ſo much ſubtilty, that the Prince of Suſa, and Tiſias did earneſtly deſire this marriage. The firſt of theſe, for ſome reaſons of ſtate which required this alliance, and the other, becauſe ſo many impediments being now removed which obſtructed his love, he was hotter than ever to marry Leoniſa. As for her, ſince ſhe had been foiled with the deceits of Beleſis, her heart began to lean after ambition, and hearkened unto a marriage with Tiſias: 'Tis true, the counſels of Cleodora did much prompt her unto it, and ſo much the ſooner, becauſe ſhe ſaw Cleodora reſolved never to ſee Beleſis again, and becauſe ſhe ſaw her treat Hermogenes much better. Thus thinking her ſelf diſintereſted, ſhe thought ſhe might do as ſhe pleaſed: ſo that when the poor Beleſis came to viſit Leoniſa, he was in a perplexed condition, for ſince, it did extreamly concern Cleodora that he ſhould have no private conference with Leoniſa, alſo Leoniſa thinking Beleſis to be in love with her Couſin, ſhe was not ſorry he did not ſpeak unto her; They promiſed not to leave each other untill the marriage with Tiſias which was plotted in ſecret was ſolemnized: ſo that when Beleſis waited for an opportunity to Juſtifie himſelf unto Leoniſa, and appeaſe Cleodora, he found them continually together, and could not ſpeak with them aſunder. But that which did moſt ſtick upon his ſtomack, was, that Tiſias commonly was continually talking with Leoniſa, and Hermogenes with Cleodora; and indeed, Sir, the poor Beleſis did fret with no leſs impatience to ſee Cleodora ſpeak ſo civily unto Hermogenes, than to ſee that Leoniſa would not ſpeak unto him at all, or if ſhe did, it was but ſome interrupted word and that in anger: ſo that though he had equally loved Cleodora, and Leoniſa, yet he could not have done more than he did, and to ſpeak ſincerely, I verily believe that the love of Hermogenes to Cleodora did inkindle in his heart ſome embers of his firſt love: he grew to that height, as almoſt to hate his friend: they never ſaw one another unleſs at Cleodora's Aunt, whither Beleſis could not chuſe but go, and whither he never went but he received a freſh diſcontent. For ſince Leoniſa thought her ſelf deluded, ſhe began to hate him: and ſince Cleodora ſaw that her favouring Hermogenes perplexed him: ſhe doubled her civilities to Hermogenes, the buſineſs was ſo carried, that Beleſis and Hermogenes were ready to quarrel two or three times: and if I had not been preſent one day by accident, certainly ſome hurt had enſued: but that which ruined Beleſis, raiſed the deſigns of Hermogenes: For Cleodora imagined how Beleſis would be incenſed if ſhe ſhould marry Hermogenes, ſhe permitted him ſecretly to ask the conſent of her Parents, to the end that Leoniſa's Marriage and hers might be publiſhed both together, conceiving it would overwhelm him with ſorrows, to hear of ſuch a ſhower of perplexities all at once. And indeed the buſineſs was carried ſo ſecretly, and went on ſo proſperouſly in a few days, that all their kindred conſented, and all ſeemed to be made up: Tiſias and Hermogenes were the only favourits, inſomuch as Hermogenes, having one day found the picture which Cleodora gave Beleſis, and which ſhe took from him again, he deſired it of her, and ſhe gave it unto him: as for the Picture of Leoniſa, ſhe had taken it out of the caſe, and reſtored it unto her. Thus was Hermogenes enriched, with the ruines of his friend: Not that Cleodora did love Hermogenes, but becauſe revenge reliſhed ſo ſweet in her mind, that ſhe reflected upon nothing but what might haſten it: Whilſt things were thus carried, Beleſis led the moſt miſerable life of any man in the world: for his ſoul was ſo ſunk with ſorrows, that he never thought either of Cleodora or Leoniſa, and he hated both Hermogenes and Tiſias: At firſt his thoughts and deſires were very different concerning theſe two Ladies: for he deſired to enjoy Leoniſa, and only deſired that Hermogenes might not enjoy Cleodora: but afterwards, according to the meaſure that Cleodora favoured Hermogenes, ſo did the thoughts of Beleſis grow more tender towards her; His ſhame of his inconſtancy augmented: and his love to Leoniſa did not leſſen: So that he was the moſt miſerable of men: This being the ſtate of things, two paſſages above all the reſt, did ſwell his ſorrows; the one was, he heard Hermogenes had the Picture which once was in his poſſeſſion, and the other was, that the Prince of Suſa ſolicited for the marriage of Tiſias with Leoniſa and that the match was as good as made up, and the marriage would be ſolemnized within two days. I ſhall not need, Sir, to relate all the raptures of his ſoul upon this news; for my ſtory is too long already: and becauſe you may eaſily gueſs them, I ſhall only tell you, Sir, that ſince the marriage of Tiſias moſt pinched him and his love of Leoniſa was the Predominate paſſion o his heart, he reſolved to quarrel with Tiſias upon ſome other pretence, before the buſineſs went any further: ſo that meeting him at the Temple the next morning, he went out with him as without deſign: they fell upon a diſcourſe of news and war, and Beleſis did obſtinately contradict all that Tiſias ſaid; for his deſign was to move Tiſias to begin the quarrel, becauſe knowing the haſty humour of the Suſianian Prince, he apprehended he ſhould be baniſhed, if it appeared that it was he who aſſaulted the man whom he loved. But ſince Tiſias was a man of more heart than ſpirit, it was a long time before he would be provoked, yet Beleſis urged him ſo far, that Tiſias drew his ſword firſt: but it was ſo little before Beleſis, that notwithſtanding it, he received the firſt blow. Their fight was furious, and if by-ſtanders had not parted them, they had died both upon the place: yet do what all could, both were wounded: and yet Beleſis ſo ſlightly, that he never kept his bed for it, ſince it was only upon his left arm. But Tiſias was much worſe, For he received two dangerous hurts, and had much the worſe of the combate: For beſides his two wounds, Beleſis ſeeing company come in to part them, he cloſed with him and diſarmed him by force: In the mean while, though this quarrel was conceived to be only caſual in heat of blood, the Prince of Suſa was much incenſed againſt Beleſis: for though he loved Beleſis well enough at this firſt coming to Suſa; yet Tiſias being his great favourite, all matters were made worſe againſt Beleſis: ſo that there was none, but ſuch as were altogether uninterreſted Perſons, or ſuch as were very generous, who came to viſit him: But all the croud was upon Tiſias, as the man that was the Princes favourite. But as for Hermogenes, ſince he was very Generous, he went to viſit him, and offer himſelf unto his friend. Chance was, that I was there when he came, and I was a witneſs of their meeting: 'tis true, I much wondered to ſee with what hollowneſs Beleſis, received Hermogenes: ſo that fearing a long diſcourſe might draw on ſome quarrel, I told Hermogenes, that I deſired to talk with him upon ſome buſineſs; and carried him away with me, extreamly wondering at the proceedings of Beleſis. In the mean time, this combate did highly incenſe Cleodora againſt him, and confirmed her in her deſign of revenge, by hindring him of Leoniſa, and marring Hermogenes, eſpecially when ſhe underſtood with what coldneſs he received his viſit. On the other ſide, the Prince of Suſa did expreſs ſo much diſpleaſure againſt Beleſis, that his friend told him there was no ſafety for him to ſtay in court, and they adviſed him at leaſt to keep his lodging for ſome days. Yet all could not perſwade him not to go out, becauſe needs would he go and be ſatisfied, whether Cleodora's Picture was in the hands of Hermogenes. And as he went one morning unto him, under pretence of giving him a viſit; he underſtood by the way, that his Marriage with Cleodora was reſolved upon, and that within few days, it would be ſolemnized: It is impoſſible to relate how the heart of Beleſis trembled, but when he had recollected, himſelf, in lieu of going to Hermogenes as he intended, he went to walk in a private place, behind the the houſe where he dwelt: after he had long muſed, and diſgeſted his anger, he reſolved to hinder the marriage, at what rate ſo ever: and his love formerly to Cleodora began to reſume ſuch force in his heart, that it amazed himſelf: Being then full of theſe fantaſtical and ſtrange thoughts, he went towards the houſe of Hermogenes, and in his way he met, Cleodora in her Coach: Her hood being up, he ſaw her ſo fair that time, that his eyes were never ſo full of wonder at her beauty: Since ſhe ſaw him, he prepared to ſalute her, but ſhe turned her head aſide in a ſcornful manner, and by that action did kindle the fire, which begun ſo violently to ſparkle. Beleſis then continued on his way to Hermogenes, where accidentally I met him; ſince he knew I was not ignorant of all paſſages between them, my preſence was no hinderance unto him from ſpeaking; He no ſooner entered, but addreſſing his ſpeech unto Hermogenes, Will you not reſtore me the treaſure which you have taken from me (ſaid he unto him) and which I would have truſted you withal; if it be of my friendſhip which you mean, replyed Hermogenes, I can aſſure you, that I never took it from you, and therefore you may eaſily find it where it was. No, Hermogenes, ſaid he unto him, I mean not that: for I doubt not but mauger all my misfortunes, you have preſerved that: But it is Cleodora which I demand: Cleodora, I ſay, unto whom I intreated you to diſſemble love, but never permitted you to love her really: therefore I conjure you to diſpute with me no longer about her: if love were a thing voluntary (replied Hermogenes) I ſhould think you had reaſon to ſpeak thus unto me: But Beleſis, you your ſelf know very well by your own experience, that one cannot leave to love when one will, and by the ſame reaſon one does not always love where one would: for if it were ſo, I am perſwaded you would never have quitted Cleodora for Leoniſa: but I underſtand very well, why you ſpeak thus unto me: ſince it is not likely but the man who fought with Tiſias, to prevent his marriage with Leoniſa, will at the ſame time think upon Cleodora, whom he hath incenſed by that combate: when I fought with Tiſias (replyed he) I knew not that Hermogenes was to marry Cleodora: then it ſeems (replyed Hermogenes) it is more out of hate to me, than love to her, that you oppoſe my good Fortune. No replyed Beleſis, but it is becauſe as to my misfortune I did in an inſtant leave my love of Cleodora, for the love of Leoniſa, ſo now I leave my love of Leoniſa, for the love of Cleodora. I know not whether loſing my hopes of enjoying Leoniſa, will contribute any thing to the extinguiſhing of that fire which flamed towards her, to enlighten another in my heart: but I am moſt certain that I no ſooner knew Cleodora was to be yours, but my old paſſion which was lurking in my heart, began to break forth into a flame again, and that with much violence; as I think I ſhall loſe my wits, unleſs you have pity of me. I muſt confeſs, Sir, that I was never in my life ſo amazed, as when I heard Beleſis ſpeak ſo. Hermogenes, as you may well imagine was in the ſame condition, and knew not well what to anſwer; for though he knew Cleodora had conſented to marry him, yet it was rather out of revenge upon Beleſis than out of any intention to make him happy: and therefore he had ſtrange apprehenſions, leſt Cleodora ſhould come to the knowledge of his repentance, and repent her life alſo.

Therefore, beginning to anſwer, I know very well, (ſaid he unto him) that what I ſhall ſay will much trouble you; but ſince it is neceſſary that you know it, both for your tranquillity and mine own; I muſt tell you, that though I ſhould conſent, yet it is a thing impoſſible for you, ever to be happy in the enjoyment of Cleodora, ſince ſhe is ſo incenſed againſt you, that it may truly be ſaid ſhe now hates you, as much as ſhe loved you before: it is becauſe ſhe hates me, replied Beleſis, that I hope ſhe will love me: for if her ſoul were only upon terms of indifference, or that ſhe ſcorned me, I ſhould for ever have deſpair of pardon: but ſince ſhe does not, I beſeech you let me have no other obſtacle but Cleodora her ſelf: moreover (ſaid he unto him) I know that ſhe gave you a picture, which indeed ſhe could not give, becauſe ſhe gave it unto me firſt, therefore I pray you reſtore it unto me. But is it poſſible (ſaid I unto him, and interrupted him) that this you ſay ſhould be really true? Can I believe that the man which within this eight hours ſaid he could love none but Leoniſa, ſhould now love none but Cleodora? I cannot well expreſs my thoughts (ſaid he unto us) for there is ſuch a multitude of things which at once do overpreſs my heart, that I cannot utter them; all I can ſay unto you is, that I know the gods are reſolved to puniſh me for my inconſtancy; and therefore I do moſt cordially repent of it: I am confident that within this eight hours, neither Cleodora, nor Leoniſa hated me; yet by a moſt fatal turne, I am like to loſe them both, and that in the moſt cruel manner. For Leoniſa is raviſhed from me by a man, whom of all living I moſt ſcorned; and Cleodora by him, whom I moſt dearly loved.

To ſpeak my mind really unto you (ſaid I and interrupted him) you can blame none but your ſelf, for your misfortune; I know very well, replied he, that I am culpable; I ſee my requeſt unto Hermogenes is not juſt; yet ſince the love of Cleodora, took firſt root in my heart, me thinks Hermogenes might pity me weakneſs I do very much pity you, replied Hermogenes, but me thinks I ought to pity my ſelf alſo: However my dear Hermogenns (ſaid he unto him) I beſeech you for Heavens ſake, oblige me, and tell me ſincerely whether you think Cleodora does really love you? or whether it be only ſpite againſt me that moves her to let you ſerve her. I know very well your merit is much above mine, and therefore, ſince I had the honour once not to be hated, it may not be impoſſible, but ſhe may now love you: However I beg this favour from you, to tell me what you think, proteſting unto you, that if you will ſwear as you are a man of honour, that you think ſhe loves you as well as ſhe loved me, I will never ſeek for any other remedy againſt my miſery but death: All that I can tell you, is (replyed Hermogenes who could not tell all his thoughts) that I am perſwaded Cleodora hates you, and I know ſhe conſents that I ſhall marry her, this is enough to let me know, replyed he, that you are not upon ſuch good terms with her, therefore I conjure you to permit me ſo much favour as to ſpeak once more in private with Cleodora: For if ſhe loves you ſo well as not to value my repentance you will be the more happy: And if I be ſo happy as to reduce her unto the ſame terms ſhe formerly was, you will be a gainer by that alſo, ſince it would have been but half a happineſs for you, to marry a woman whoſe affection was but weak towards you, therefore I beſeech you, deny me not this requeſt: I confeſs, that ſince I thought the requeſt of Beleſis to be ſomething reaſonable, I endeavoured to perſwade Hermogenes unto a conſent, but he would not by any means harken unto it. In the mean time, the more he denied, the more hopes Beleſis had that he was not quite rooted out of Cleodora's heart, ſo that having no hopes at all from Leoniſa, but conceiving ſome glimps from Cleodora, his paſſion did much increaſe: Seeing then that Hermogenes would not by any means conſent he ſhould ſpeak unto her, he began to ask the Picture which he had: But Hermogenes replyed, that he ought not to take any notice whether it was his or no, it ſufficed that he received it from Cleodora, and therefore he would not reſtore it to him: As I had blamed Hermogenes a little before, becauſe he ſo obſtinately refuſed to let Beleſis ſpeak unto Cleodora: ſo afterwards I blamed Beleſis for preſſing his friend, to reſtore a Picture, which he had not from him. In the interim, ſince I did extreamly fear that being alone with them, I could not hinder them from being too ſharp and high, I told them that being both poſſeſſed with one too violent a paſſion, to ſpeak of their intereſts with moderation, I deſired, that for the time to come, they might know each others pretentions only by me: Adding further, that when they were ſeparated I ſhould tell them ſomething which I could not tell them in their preſence. So that temporing their minds, as well as I could: I got them to part without a quarrel: After which, I went ſometimes to the one, and ſometimes to the other, not knowing which ſide to take: For when I was with Beleſis, he repented ſo bitterly of his inconſtancy, that he moved me to pitty him: and when I ſaw Hermogenes, he would perſwade me that right was on his ſide: for ſaid he unto me if Beleſis had never forſaken Cleodora, I ſhould then not only have never ver faln in love with her, but if I had, I ſhould have reſtrained my ſelf out of reſpect unto the laws of friendſhip: But ſince he forced me to ſee her often, and entreated me to diſſemble love unto her; and now to bar me from ſeeing her any more, but to raviſh out my heart a love which he himſelf cauſed, that is a thing which I neither can, nor ought, nor will do: on the other ſide, ſaid Beleſis to me is it juſt, that becauſe I entreated Hermogenes only to ſee a Lady whom I loved, that he ſhould therefore rob me of her? does he not know that ever ſince the firſt time he asked me leave to diſcover my inconſtancy unto her, I told him, that I would never ſuffer him; might he not well imagine that I neither would, nor ought, to do it but out of reſentment of love, though he gave it another phraſe? Can one be Jealous without affection unto the party of whom he is Jealous? might not Hermogenes rather think I loved two perſons at once, then to think me jealous of him with being in love with Cleodora? Afterwards (ſaid he unto me) my demand was but juſt, when I propounded to let Cleodora judge the difference between us, and that he would ſuffer me to ſee and ſpeak to her; for if after that ſhe would have choſen him, I would have left Suſa, and ſhould have gone unto ſome place far off from hence, where I might have hid my ſelf from the acquaintance of men; where neither he nor Cleodora ſhould have heard any more of me. After this Beleſis began to aggravate his misfortunes, until anger did ſo ſwell his ſpirits, that never remembring his love or friendſhip to Hermogenes, he ſaid that he was not able to ſuffer him to marry Cleodora. In the mean while, the prince of Suſa hearing that Beleſis ſtirred out of his lodging, was ſo incenſed againſt him, that I was advertized, he intended to give command that he ſhould retire himſelf. And I underſtood that Tiſias (thinking that whilſt he could not ſtir out, Beleſis might perhaps work upon the ſpirit of Leoniſa againſt him) had moved the Prince of Suſa, upon ſome Colourable pretence or other to place Leoniſa about the Queen, until he was perfectly recovered of his wounds: So that fearing ſome miſchief was plotted againſt my friend, I conjured him to quit Suſa for ſome certain days: but he told me that he would never quit it until he had ſpoken with Cleodora, and that in private. He told me how that he had been ſeveral times at her houſe; but he was always anſwered by them that ſhe was not within, or would not be ſeen: Adding that if Hermogenes would enjoy her in quietneſs, it were his beſt courſe to procure him a ſight of her: When I therefore perceived the obſtinacy of Beleſis, I went unto his friend, in hopes to do ſome good upon him: but found him as reſolute as a Rock which would not be moved: So that when I ſaw I could make no good end between them, I went privately unto Cleodora to let her know the ſtate of things, and that her prudence might prevent all miſchief, and order the buſineſs between them: for they being both my friends, I knew not how to be partial, and to prefer one before another: I had no ſooner acquainted Cleodora how things were between Beleſis and Hermogenes, but ſhe ſaid that the laſt of theſe did her wrong to tell his friend ſhe would not ſee him, ſhe ſeemed to be much ſurpriſed, and very unquiet: Yet afterwards ſhe uſed ſo many expreſſions of anger againſt Beleſis, as I thought he would find no great ſatisfaction in ſeeing her: But ſince he did ſo vehemently deſire it, and ſince I could not perſwade him to go out of Suſa until he heard his ſentence of death pronounced from her own mouth, I beſeeched her to let him have the opportunity to ſee her, but ſhe would not conſent unto it; Yet for all this, I had a conceit that if I did deceive her, and find out a way for Beleſis to ſee her, ſhe would pardon me; So therefore thinking to advance the happineſs of Hermogenes by advancing the departure of Beleſis, who would not ſtir from Suſa till he ſpoke with Cleodora, I ordered the buſineſs ſo, that the next morning, I imployed Hermogenes in ſome buſineſs another way, and one of my Coſens carried Cleodora to ſee a new built palace, which for its curioſity, every one went to ſee it, ſince it was yet uninhabited; Beleſis who had his inſtructions failed not to be there; and my couſin conducted Cleodora unto a Gallery, where leaving the reſt of her women, ſhe carried her into a chamber, and within that chamber a cloſet where Beleſis was waiting for Cleodora; ſhe no ſooner ſaw him, but ſhe ſtarted back, and would needs go out again; he falling upon his knees, and having hold of her gown; For God and Heavens ſake Madam, (ſaid he unto her) give me but one hours hearing, I conjure you. 'Twas to that end this charitable woman brought you hither; Give me leave therefore Madam to beg your pardon, and to beg it in a flood of tears. Provided you will give me leave to deny you all you ask (ſaid ſhe unto him) I ſhall conſent to give you audience. if I demand death, Madam, will you deny me that alſo? (ſaid he unto her) Doubtleſs I would deny you that, replyed ſhe, not only becauſe the puniſhment which you deſerve would not be long enough if you dyed ſo ſoon, but becauſe it ſufficeth that you have deſired ſomething, which I cannot conſent unto, however it be, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) if it be only to chide me, yet I beſeech you hear me, and hear me with patience; whilſt theſe two were thus in diſcourſe, ſhe who brought Cleodora in the Houſe, went to the reſt of the Women which were in the Gallery, and did amuſe them with ſhewing them Pictures, and other ſuch talk, ſo that Beleſis ſeeing he could talk and not be underſtood: Give me leave, Madam, (ſaid he unto her, before I ask you pardon, to aſſure you that this Beleſis whom you ſee at your feet, is the very ſame Beleſis whom heretofore you were pleaſed to prefer before any other. And ſo I do ſtill, ſaid ſhe, for I think you ſo much different from all other men, that I think you do incomparably excel them all. However it be, Madam, ſaid he, I am moſt certain of one thing, which is, that my heart was never ſo full of love unto you as now: Oh, I wiſh with all my ſoul, replyed ſhe, that you ſpoke truth; and I wiſh with all my ſoul, Madam, ſaid he, that you did really deſire it; No, no, Beleſis anſwered

Cleodora, I was not far from my real thoughts, when I ſaid that I ſhould be even raviſhed with joy, to be certain that you were deſperately in love with me; But you do extreamly miſtake my meaning, if you think I make this wiſh with any intentions to accept of your affection; Since I do not wiſh you ſhould love me for any other reaſon, but that I might thereby puniſh you for ceaſing to love me before. I confeſs, Madam, (replied he) that I am the moſt to blame of any man alive, for doing as I lately did; But, Madam, I beſeech you do not too ſeverely look upon the moſt extravagant act of all my life; or if you do look upon it, let it be as upon a ſubject whereupon to excerciſe your goodneſs; Forgiveneſs, Madam, does moſt reſemble divinity, and by conſequence your ſelf; To what purpoſe is clemency, but to forgive; and this is the operation, that when it is extended in the greateſt meaſure, it converts the greateſt Offenders to become the greateſt Lovers: Moreover, Madam, do not think, I beſeech you that I did abſolutely ceaſe to love you, at that very time when I ſeemed to be moſt in love with Leoniſa; She can tell you that I would never be moved to acquaint her with the leaſt paſſage which had been between us, nor could I ever endure that my beſt friend ſhould ever love you, and therefore it muſt by neceſſary conſequence be concluded that I ever loved you; Not that by this I intend to juſtifie my ſelf; but that I would if I could ſomething leſſen my crime, to the end you may the ſooner pardon it; Before I can ever have ſuch a thought, replied Cleodora, I muſt loſe my wits: For inconſtancy is a crime of ſuch a nature, as is abſolutely impardonable: But I beſeech you, Madam, replied he, did not you your ſelf ſo behave your ſelf towards Hermogenes, in ſuch a manner as might very well make me believe that you were guilty of the ſame crime wherewith you tax me? When I obſerved, replied Cleedora, that out of a moſt fantaſtical humour you were angry I ſhould begin to love Hermogenes, I muſt confeſs that ever ſince the firſt time I perceived you loved Leoniſa, I would not undeceive you: think on therefore, if it anger you, that I do love him, and more that that, ever will love him: For I aſſure you, that you cannot pleaſe me better than to torment your ſelf: But, Madam, I beſeech you (replied he) do you not fear to drive me into a horrid deſpair; and to make me ruſh upon any rude attempts, which a man deſperately in love may do, when he has loſt his reaſon and wits? No, Beleſis, replied ſhe, I apprehend no ſuch danger, for I heard ſay and believe it, that a man of a divided heart is not capable of over violent paſſions: But, Madam, replied he, my heart is none but yours, nor ever ſhall be any others. Can you be ſo impudent, replied ſhe, as to make any apoligy for your ſelf, after your weather-cock inconſtancy? for my part ſince I uſe to judge of the future by what is paſt, I am confident I ſhould love you to morrow again, and you would ſay the ſame unto Leoniſa which now you do unto me: And perhaps forgetting both her and me the third day, you will make a freſh addreſs to a third: Alas, Madam, ſaid Beleſis, can you not find a heart to pardon me: And will you not have any confidence in my affection? No doubtleſs, (replied ſhe) for how is it poſſible you ſhould give me any aſſurance of it: Since you caſt me off when I was as handſome as ever I was or ever ſhall be, and at a time when I was moſt affable and complacential to you? What can I truſt unto? To your words which you have ſo ill kept? Or to your oaths which you have ſo wickedly falſified? No, Madam, (ſaid Beleſis, and interrupted her) you may truſt unto my repentance. That is, divine Cleodora, which will preſerve me from inconſtancy for the future; for I am ſo horridly aſhamed of my crime, that it will moſt certainly prevent a relapſe: I cannot believe it (anſwered ſhe very ſharply) and I aſſure you, that I do intereſt my ſelf ſo little in any thing which relates unto you (except in ſuch things as may vex you) that I care not a ſtraw what befalls you. In the mean time, I muſt tell you, that I would not have you ſeek for any more opportunities of ſpeaking to me, unleſs you would have me put a thouſand incivilities upon you before all the world:

But, Madam, (replied he) though all my paſt ſervices are loſt, and though I am quite ruined in your opinion, yet I cannot chuſe but beſeech you to obliterate all paſt crimes, and to ſuffer me to begin upon a new ſcore of love, as if I had never loved you before: and then if you be not ſatisfied with my fidelity, treat me as the moſt vile, baſe, and infamous man that lives; and may you marry Hermogenes: and untill then, give me leave to tell you, Madam, that I cannot endure him. Yet I will marry him, replied ſhe, ſince my parents conſent unto it, therefore the beſt courſe you can take for your own tranquility, is to endure him, and ſay nothing, rather than nothing to the purpoſe; for all you can ſay ſhall be in vain. Moreover, never think of ſpeaking unto Hermogenes, unleſs you will augment my hatred, and my ſcorn of you: In the mean time, you may hope to your comfort, that perhaps, Tiſias will die of his wounds, and then you may return unto Leoniſa, and quit me the ſecond time: for ſince ſhe is of a much more ſweet and affable diſpoſition than I am, doubtleſs ſhe will receive you more kindly than I ſhall. And after that Beleſis, I have no more to ſay unto you, unleſs to aſſure you, that when you have quitted me for Leoniſa, I ſhall have ſuch thoughts of you, as ſhall deſerve that you become more faithful than you have been. Theſe Beleſis are all the advantageous thoughts I can have of you: After theſe words Cleodora roſe up, and ſay what Beleſis could ſhe left him complaining againſt her that deluded him: But, Sir, that which was moſt rare in this encounter was, that this conference produced different effects in the hearts of Cleodora and Beleſis. For this imperious Lady was extreamly joyed, to know by the eyes of Beleſis he was the ſame to her as formerly he had been, though it was without any intention to pardon him, but only to make him more miſerable: So that ſhe publiſhed to all the world her marriage with Hermogenes, as a thing which much pleaſed her: As for Beleſis, he parted from Cleodora, more in love with her than ever he was: ſo that extreamly wondering at his love of Leoniſa, he looked upon her as the cauſe of his loſing Cleodora, and began to hate her extreamly. Being thus in a moſt horrible deſpair, he came unto me to tell me, that he found Cleodora abſolutely inexorable; but that for all this, he could not endure Hermogenes ſhould marry her. I uſed my beſt rethorick to perſwade him to it, but all in vain: I hinted unto him what he had ſaid unto Hermogenes, that if Cleodora ſhould make choice of him after he had talked with her, than that he would let him alone in quietneſs. But he told me, that he was not obliged by any ſuch promiſes, as were impoſſible to be kept; ſo that not knowing how to prevent that inconveniency which I feared, I told him that the Prince of Suſa would baniſh him the Town, I hoping that time and abſence would ſettle his ſoul: But although Beleſis received this command that ſame day, yet was he not ſo quick in his obedience; but did ſomething to obey it, for he did conceal himſelf ſome days in the Town: In the interim, he writ divers times to Cleodora, without receiving any anſwer: alſo he ſaw Hermogenes once: But Hermogenes gave him ſuch ſatisfactory and prevalent reaſons, that they parted without a quarrel as Beleſis intended: for in the very heat of his love, he ſtill retained a great love of Hermogenes. Whilſt he was in Hermogenes his Cloſet, he ſpied the Picture of Cleodora, lying upon a Cabinet; and being tranſported with violence of paſſion, he took it, whilſt his friend was gone to ſpeak with one who asked for him: I do confeſs, I ſaw him commit this theft: but ſince I knew Hermogenes was ere long to marry Cleodora, and that Beleſis would depart the Town within two days, I did not oppoſe him: but fearing leſt during thoſe two days ſome ſad conſequence might follow, I ſtayed with Hermogenes, and told him how it was, deſiring and conjuring him not to deny ſo ſmall a conſolation to his friend; and indeed Hermogenes promiſed me to take no notice of it, though the loſs of this Picture, did exceedingly trouble him. In the mean time Tiſias thought himſelf all happineſs; his marriage and Hermogenes his alſo, was publiſhed to be both in one day: and all preparations were providing to render the ſolemnities joyful: But during this while, Beleſis, Hermogenes, and Cleodora were not without their unquietudes. The firſt of theſe, as you may well imagine, had cauſe enough: Hermogenes alſo, though ready to marry Cleodora, yet thought himſelf not ſatisfied, becauſe he ſaw ſhe was extreamly melancholy: And Cleodora was as ſad as any, for though her heart was full of ſweet revenge upon Beleſis, yet ſhe was to be revenged upon him, by being revenged upon her ſelf: But whilſt they were all in their diſcontents, Leoniſa, whoſe ambition recompenſed the loſs of Beleſis, knowing that he was concealed in Suſa: And fearing, that it was only to be an obſtacle to her greatneſs, deſired Tiſias to move the Prince of Suſa, that he might be ſearched for, and ſecured: ſo that Beleſis hearing of this, and fearing to fall into the hands of a violent and incenſed Prince, reſolved to leave Suſa: but before he went, he heard that the marriages between Tiſias and Leoniſa, and between Hermogenes, and Cleodora were to be ſolemnized the day after: For my part, I went with him ſome two hundred furlongs out of Suſa; but I never in all my life ſaw ſo ſad a ſoul, as Beleſis had at that time: At parting, he gave Letters unto one of his ſervants,the one for Cleodora, the other for Hermogenes, with order to deliver them into their own hands before he departed: That which did a little perplex me at parting was, that I ſaw he ſent all his Train and Equipage into his own Country, with a Letter to his Father; and that he would retain none with him but one ſlave, having no mind to tell me what his deſign was, nor whither he went: In the mean time the meſſenger with the Letters did not fail in his Commiſſion. Since it was very early, for Beleſis went out of Suſa by break of day, he went unto Hermogenes before he went unto Cleodora, and gave him a letter, which was thus indited.

Beleſis

Beleſis unto Hermogenes.

I Think you will not complain againſt me for taking Cleodora's Picture, ſince I leave you in poſſeſſion of Cleodora her ſelf: I cannot deny, but that if I had found any inclination in the heart of that fair One, to pardon me, I would have conteſted for her till death: and I confeſs my ſorrows to depart before I have given you ſome teſtimonies of my reſentments, for the troubles you have put me unto; yet ſince I have taken up a reſolution to puniſh none of all thoſe that were cauſes of my miſerable misfortune, I entreat you to acknowledge my moderation, and to let me make one requeſt unto you: which is, that when you are in poſſeſſion of Cleodora, you would not inſult over an unfortunate lover, whom you have made miſerable, and not put her in memory of that inconſtancy, whereof you your ſelf have been a confident. This is the only deſire which an unfortunate man will ever ask of you as long as he lives: who having found no compaſſion in the heart of his friend, nor ſweetneſs towards him in the mind of his Miſtreſs, will for ever renounce the ſociety of men and women.

Beleſis.

Hermogenes received this Letter with ſome reſentment of tenderneſs, but for all that, he was not ſorry for the departure of Beleſis: and his hopes of marrying Cleodora the next morning, made him ſo full of joy, that he could not very much condole the misfortune of his friend. But as the Letter of Beleſis to Hermogenes, had no great operation upon his ſoul; yet that to Cleodora produced conſiderable effects: for it was ſo full of moving expreſſions, that unleſs her heart had been made of marble, it wou'd have moved compaſſion: and certainly it made ſuch a deep impreſſion in her mind, that when Cleodora ſhewed it unto me, I asked her a copy of it; and though I never read it but once, yet I ſhall never forget it; The words were theſe.

Beleſis unto Cleodora.

Madam,

I Have ſo well deſerved all the torments which I endure, that I cannot accuſe you of any Injuſtice: and I am ſo really repentant, that I do not think it fit to murmur againſt your goodneſs, though it would not grant me a pardon: In the mean time I reſpect you ſo much irreconcileable as you are, that I will not complain either againſt you, nor againſt Hermogenes, nor any elſe but my ſelf: and to let you ſee that I ſhould have been faithful unto you, I promiſe you, to live in ſome place far from hence: I paſs my word that I will think of nothing elſe but you, all the reſt of my miſerable life: and ſince I became criminal by the ſight of One whom I ought not to have looked upon, but for the love of you, I will never look upon any whatſoever, but one ſervant which I will carry with me, to the end that when I am dead he may relate unto you the conſtancy of him whom you baniſhed for his inconſtancy. I am confident that if he be faithful, he will draw tears from your fair eyes, and will perhaps make you grieve for the death of him whoſe life you have made moſt miſerable.

Beleſis.

When Cleodora received this Letter, her mind was extreamly unquieted and though ſhe was ready to marry Hermogenes, yet her ſweet deſire of revenge upon Beleſis was converted into extream ſorrow for him: and though ſhe exceedingly eſteemed Hermogenes, yet her ſoul not being able to love any but Beleſis, ſhe diſcovered, that notwithſtanding all her reſentments, and her anger againſt him, her heart was never quite diſingaged from him: ſhe received his letter with a bluſh, and opened it with extream beating of heart: ſhe began to read it with a ſigh, and ended it with a ſhower of tears: In ſhort, Sir, Cleodora ſaw ſhe could not marry Hermogenes, and that ſhe ſtill loved Beleſis: In the mean time all things were prepared for her marriage, and ſhe ſaw an impoſſibility of recalling Beleſis, Not knowing then what to do, ſhe deferred her marriage, purpoſely to conſider what was to be reſolved upon: and to that end ſhe fained her ſelf to be ſick, and went to bed. Hermogenes hearing this, he was exceedingly troubled, not only becauſe ſhe whom he loved was not well, and becauſe his happineſs was deferred, but alſo becauſe he had ſome ſuſpition of the truth: he went then to ſee Cleodora in all haſte, but he was told by orders from her, that ſhe was aſleep, yet he came ſo often, that ſhe was forced to let him ſee her, but ſhe ſpoke very little to him, and that ſhe did ſpeak was only in complaining of her ſickneſs, and pain, which ſhe did really endure, though it was of another nature then ſhe complained of: Thus the marriage of Hermogenes was to be put off for that day: And Tiſias more happy then he married Leoniſa, whoſe eyes though dazeled with the magnificence of all the preparations, yet ſometimes they were very melancholy that day of great jollity: yet very few obſerved them, for I only perceived it; As for Hermogenes, he was not preſent that day, though the whole Court was. But whilſt the Kings Palace was filled with joy, where the Prince of Suſa would have this marriage ſolemnized, Cleodora was in her bed: Sometimes ſhe repented that ſhe did not pardon Beleſis; otherwhiles, ſhe would blame her ſelf for treating Hermogenes ſo kindly; and preſently after, ſhe would approve of what a little before ſhe condemned, and paſſing from one thought into another, ſhe found reſt in none, eſpecially when ſhe conſidered that perhaps ſhe ſhould never ſee Beleſis again, who was the only man of all the world with whom ſhe thought ſhe could live happily: as rarely accompliſhed as Hermogenes was, ſhe then diſcovered a hundred things in his humour, which concurred not with hers; in concluſion, Sir, not to abuſe your patience too much, Cleodora paſſed over three days in ſuch horrible agitations of ſpirit, that ſhe thought it would coſt her either her life, or her wits: but at laſt being reſolved, what courſe to take, ſhe gave orders ſecretly for the execution of her intended deſign; and indeed did execute it as I ſhall tell you. Be pleaſed to know, Sir, that one morning as I was ready to go out of my lodging, I received a Letter from Cleodora, which deſired me to bring Hermogenes that ſame hour, unto the Temple of Ceres, which is not above thirty furlongs from the Town, whither ſhe went, to give thanks unto the Goddeſs, for a favour, which, ſhe ſaid, ſhe had received, during her ſickneſs. Then, Sir, be pleaſed to know further, that this Temple is kept by an hundred Virgins, who obſerve the ſame ceremonies which they at Ecbatan do, though they be not conſecrated with the ſame Goddeſs. I confeſs that at firſt, I had not any ſuſpition of Cleodora's deſign, but went unto Hermogenes, unto whom I ſhewed the Letter which I received: but as for him, he was more clear-ſighted than I was, for as ſoon as he ſaw the Letter, he feared ſhe would take ſome deſperate reſolution: ſo that without any more delay, we took horſe, and went unto this Temple: as ſoon as we were alighted, they conducted us unto a chamber, which was ordained to receive ſtrangers; where we ſtayed a while: preſently we ſaw a door open out of the Cloiſter of the Virgins, out of which we ſaw Cleodora come accompanied with two women, but with ſuch a ſober melancholy in her aſpect, as would have tendered the moſt obdurate heart. Hermogenes alſo was ſo moved, ſo amazed, and ſo angry, that he had not power enough to expreſs his aſtoniſhment; after this ſhe came unto us, and after civil ſalutations ſhe did ſit down, and cauſed us to ſit by her: After this, ſhe began to ſpeak; I do not doubt (ſaid ſhe unto Hermogenes) but what I ſhall now ſay unto you, will trouble you: And I had a mind to let you know it in a place, where the reſpect due unto the Goddeſs of this place, will herhaps oblige you to receive it with more moderation. I beſeech you, Madam, (ſaid Hermogenes unto her) do not put me to the utmoſt trial of my vertue; and I conſider well what you will tell me, whether I can hear it and live, or without loſing my wits and reaſon, and reſpect unto to ſacred things. Since I know by my own experience, that none ever dies of ſorrrow; and ſince I have a better opinion of your vertue and wiſdom, than your ſelf has, I ſhall not fear to tell you, what reſolution I have taken. Know then, ſaid Cleodora, that I ſhould be unworthy of your affection, if I ſhould marry you; for the diſcovery of my heart ſince the departure of Beleſis, lets me ſee, that I am not in a condition to make you happy: Why, Madam (ſaid Hermogenes, interrupting her) will you delude thoſe hopes which your ſelf did create in me? I ſhould delude them more, replied ſhe, if I ſhould go about to ſatisfie them, ſince then I ſhould attempt a thing above my power. For to tell you truly, I have theſe three laſt days, continually conteſted for you againſt my ſelf, and could not overcome; ſo that ſeeing it was impoſſible to give you my affection, ſince I had given it to Beleſis, and by conſequence, ſhould make you miſerable, and augment my own ſorrows; I thought it moſt expedient for me, to diſingage my ſelf from all the world, and wholly devote the reſt of my days unto the Goddeſs which is adored in this place. This Hermogenes, is that which I had to tell you, and it is your part to teſtifie by your voluntary conſent unto it, that you have more vertue than love.

Ah, Madam, replyed he, I am not able to endure this, but I muſt murmur and oppoſe it, with all my power. I would not adviſe you to do ſo, replyed ſhe, ſince if you do, it will be in vain. But, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) if it be ſo, that you love Beleſis ſtill, why did you not pardon him? and if you do not love him, why will you not accompliſh my happineſs? Do not force me (replyed ſhe) to make a preciſe relation of what hath paſſed in my heart, for ſince I am reſolutely determined to forget all my follies, I will not revive them in my memory: The truth is, I will never return again to Suſa: Perhaps, Madam, (ſaid I unto her) that during the time that you are but a probationer, and before you engage your ſelf for ever, your mind will change: I do not think it, (replyed ſhe) for it is not my cuſtom to change my mind; and if I ever change, it ſhall be in favour of Hermogenes: For Heavens ſake, Madam, (ſaid he unto her being tranſported with ſorrow and deſpair) do not ſhut up your ſelf in this place; if it be (added he) becauſe you do not think me worthy of that honour which your parents would confer upon me; though you would deprive me of that happineſs, yet do not deprive the world of its chiefeſt ornament: Believe me Hermogenes, my fate hath called me to this place, and there is no remedy you can uſe to prevent it; as Hermogenes was going to anſwer, the ſame door through which Cleodora came unto us, opened the ſecond time: and the Governeſs of theſe ſacred Virgins appeared all in white, holding a ſheaf of gold in her hand, accompanied with a great number of Virgins in the ſame habit, holding every one of them, apples of gold in their hand: As ſoon as they were all come out and ranked behind the Governeſs, ſhe called Cleodora: who leaving us, and deſiring us to acquaint her Aunt that ſhe was in that place; and after ſhe had make a low conge to Hermogenes with tears in her eyes, ſhe went towards that door, whom ſhe who kept the door received in: all the Virgins beginning to ſing hymns unto the honour of Ceres, as ſoon as ſhe was entered and the door ſhut. But, Oh, Heavens, how doleful was that ſong unto Hermogenes, and in what a pittiful plight was he in? In the mean time there was no remedy but complaints; for there was no poſſibility of procuring any more conference, either with Cleodora, whom they carried into the temple, nor with any of the Virgins. But we were conſtrained to return unto Suſa, and report this ſtrange ſtory: and never ſince, Sir, was it poſſible for Hermogenes, to ſee Cleodora; yet we underſtood by one of the ſacrificers, that ſince ſhe came into that place, ſhe never enquired of any worldly buſineſs, except it were ſome times, ſhe would ask if any knew in what part of the world Beleſis lived; or in what part he died? But as none could inform her what was become of him, ſhe was nothing ſatisfied: yet we were told ſhe ſomething joyed to know, he was not returned into his own country, which made us think ſhe had rather be her ſelf miſerable, than to know that he was happy: Yet for all this, ſhe lived a moſt ſtrict and exact life, and as regular to the orders, as any of the moſt ancient Virgins of the temple, though ſhe had yet ſix months to be as a propationer, before ſhe made her laſt vows. This, Sir, was the adventure of Beleſis and Hermogenes: and I have no more to tell you, unleſs that Hermogenes ſince Cleodora took this reſolution, was a hundred and a hundred times at deaths door with ſorrow: but beginning inſenſibly to conſider, that he himſelf was in ſome ſort a cauſe of her recluſement, and of his friends loſs, reaſon began to revive in his heart; his paſſion by degrees grew leſs violent: and I have heard him wiſh divers times that he were able to call back Beleſis, whom we thought to be dead in ſome unknown country: and therefore I cannot chuſe but wonder that he ſhould quarrel with Beleſis when he firſt met with him: doubtleſs it muſt need be Cleodora's picture which Beleſis took from him; the ſight whereof did ſurpriſe his reaſon as well as his eyes, which was the cauſe of it, ſince I am very certain that he preſerved a good opinion, and much friendſhip for him, eſpecially ſince his love to Cleodora began to leſſen.

Alcenor having ended, Cyrus was well ſatisfied with his relation, and gave him thanks: Panthea, Araminta, Abradates, and Mazares did alſo thank him: afterwards upon examination of the matter, they could not conceive it any great piece of difficulty, to reconcile thoſe two enemies. For ſince Hermogenes could live without Cleodora, and that his love to her was leſſened, doubtleſs it was fit for him to yield unto Beleſis, whoſe love was rather augmented then leſſened: they conceived alſo that as for the Picture, it was juſt it ſhould remain in the hands of him unto whom Cleodora gave it, and that if Hermogenes could not conſent to renounce Cleodora, then to let that fair one know Beleſis was alive, and loved her ſtill, and that Hermogenes loved her alſo: and that afterwards whether ſhe would remain ſtill in that place, or chuſe one of them for her husband, they ſhould conform their wills thereunto accordingly, and become friends: but the beſt of the ſtory is, when Alcenor went to Beleſis, with intention to acquaint him that Cleodora had not married Hermogenes; he found them talking together, having both of them deſired their guards that they might meet: ſo that Beleſis underſtanding that Hermogenes had not married her, his animoſity againſt him ſo vaniſhed, that he was full of tender expreſſions in words to him: making a ſhort relation of the miſerable life he had led: and ſo that Hermogenes being exceedingly moved with it, and conſidering that he was the cauſe of all his miſeries, reſolved to overcome himſelf, and conſented to uſe his beſt endeavours to get Cleodora out of her Cloiſter: Since Alcenor was friend unto them both, he embraced them with much joy; and carried them into Panthea's Chamber, more to thank the company for their patience in hearing their Adventures; than to be reconciled by them, ſince they had compoſed all differences themſelves. Yet notwithſtanding Cyrus willed them to promiſe the Queen of Suſiana that they would live lovingly together: and ſo they did very willingly: Afterwards Cyrus and Mazares, accompanied with Beleſis, and all that followed him thither, returned to the Camp. In the way thither, Chriſantes brought a man unto Cyrus, whom he thought to be a ſpie, and upon whom they found a Letter directed unto the Princeſs Araminta. This did conſtantly affirm, that he was not ſent to know any thing concerning the Army, but only with a Letter to the Princeſs of Pontus: Cyrus taking this Letter, but not opening it, asked him from whom it came? but he anſwered he could not tell: All he knew was, that a man unknown to him, came into Heraclea where he dwelt, as it appeared by his language, and taking him aſide, offered him a great recompence if he would undertake to carry a Letter unto the Princeſs Araminta, and a greater if he brought him back an anſwer; and told him that he would expect his return about eight days hence, and would be every morning by ſun-riſe at the Temple, expecting the ſucceſs of his voyage: Cyrus knowing by the ingenuity of him who ſpoke, that he lyed not, did not ſet any guard upon him; but to teſtifie the reſpect he owed unto the Princeſs Araminta, did ſend this Letter unto that Princeſs, and never opened it: Commanding Chriſantes, who had orders to carry it, to obſerve her countenance whilſt ſhe read it: and in obedience to this command he went unto the Princeſs, and delivered the Letter: which as ſoon as ever ſhe ſaw the ſuperſcription, ſhe knew it to be the hand of Spitridates, ſo that opening it with extream deſire to know where Spitridates was, ſhe read theſe words.

The Unfortunate Spitridates, unto the Princeſs Araminta.

Madam,

WHat ſorrows ſoever I ſuffered, yet I do declare in the frontiſpiece of my Letter, that I do not intend to complain againſt you; but to obſerve all thoſe due reſpects which I ever rendred unto you; and if in the ſequel of my diſcourſe any unbecoming word drop from my pen, it is againſt my will: After this, Madam, I ſhall not doubt, to let you know the adventures of an unfortunate man who has no ſhare in your affection, and ſhall tell you, that the Priſon in which my Father keeps me for the love of you, they cannot torment me more than by telling me every day, that you have conquered the Conqueror of all Aſia; And if I durſt, without offence, ſpeak it, your heart is more illuſtrious in that victory, and more ſecure. I beſeech you, Madam, do but imagine how inſupportable is my impriſonment, in hearing how kind you are to him by a hundred particular circumſtances: Yet I would not reſolve upon death, till I had it under your hand that you have changed your thoughts, methinks I owe ſo much reſpect unto thoſe aſſurances of fidelity which you were pleaſed to honour me with, as not to condemn you before you anſwered for your ſelf: Not that I do think you perfidious maugre all reports: But, Madam, that which moſt of all perplexeth me is, that knowing I reſemble Cyrus, I know not how you can look upon him without a remembrance of unfortunate Spitridates: and I know not how you can remember him but you muſt alſo remember my loyal love, This reſemblance 'twixt Cyrus and my ſelf is not at all in our fortunes as in our faces: for he is happy, I am miſerable: he is with you, I am abſent: he a Conqueror, I a Captive: He can command moſt of all Aſia, but I cannot command my ſelf: But yet for all this, Madam, this Prince does all his actions more for his own than your glory: whereas on the contrary, I have renounced all mine to do you ſervice: I have forſaken Crowns, ſuffered baniſhment and impriſonment: and to ſpeak all in few words, I have done all I could and conſequently all I ought: Ah, I wiſh with all my ſoul, Madam, that you could ſay as much, and ſay truly: However, ſince I never had the leaſt deſire of life, but only to do you ſervice: And ſince I ought not to enjoy it unleſs you will look favourably upon me, I beſeech you be ſo generous as to pronounce my death under your hand, that I may have the glory of dying in obaying you.

Spitridates.

The Princeſs Araminta bluſhed all the while ſhe read this Letter, and Chriſantes did ſo ſeriouſly obſerve her, that he made no queſtion but it was a Letter of ſome importance, though he could not imagine the truth: But whilſt he was gueſſing at it, the Princeſs of Pontus call'd for her dear Heſeonida to ſhew her this Letter, her ſelf not being able to contain her wonder at the contents of it, nor well knowing whether or no, ſhe ſhould let Cyrus ſee it, becauſe her modeſty made a ſcruple of it. But Hiſeonida upon ſerious conſideration of the buſineſs, and how he had ſent this Letter unopened unto her, ſhe thought it but fit ſhe ſhould truſt him with the ſecret of it. Moreover this Princeſs knowing very well how groſly Spitridates was miſtaken, and that Cyrus was as conſtant unto the Princeſs Mandana as her ſelf was unto the Prince of Bythynia, ſhe reſolved to let him ſee it, leſt he ſhould imagin it to be of another nature than it was: ſo that without further delay, ſhe writ theſe lines.

Araminta unto Cyrus.

Sir,

It is fit my confidence in you ſhould equal your civility: and ſince you would not open that Letter which by the laws of war you very well might, I will ſhew you one which I ought to conceal, if I did not think you as diſcreet as you are generous. You may judge by it, Sir, after you have read it, how ingenuous fortune is to perſecute me, ſince unleſs you will be pleaſed to lend me your helping hand you will augment my miſeries: I beſeech you pardon the crime of unfortunate Spitridates, in thinking you to be guilty of one, and help me to lament his miſeries and to ſweeten mine: you may if you pleaſe, Sir, ſend back this Letter unto me by him who brought it, to the end I may know a little better, in what condition that unfortunate Prince is;

Araminta.

This Princeſs had no ſooner done writing, but ſhe incloſed the Letter of Spitridates in her own, and ſealing them up gave them both unto Chriſantes, who returned to his Maſter after he had received as much civility as the perplexities of that Princeſs would permit her: After which, ſhe began to repeat all his misfortunes, with reſenting aggravations. In the mean while Cyrus, who longed for an occaſion to oblige her, as ſoon as he had read the Letter of Spitridates and her own, did ſend it back unto her by him that brought it, and anſwered her in theſe terms.

Cyrus unto the Princeſs Araminta.

Madam,

Since the laws of war ought never to contradict thoſe reſpects which are due unto perſons of your Quality and virtue, doubtleſs I have done no more than what I was bliged unto: But for your part, Madam, you have gone ar beyond what might be required at your hands. All I can ſay unto you by way of gratitude for the confidence you have in my diſcretion, is to aſſure you, hat the Prince is only miſtaken in Name, when he ſpeaks unto you of that affection, which your merit hath planted in my heart, ſince certainly my ove of you is as perfectly pure, as his love s conſtant: I am confident, Madam, that what I ow ſay, will not offend you, but that you will e pleaſed, if I conjure you ſo to tranſact with Spiridates (whoſe virtue makes me admire him) that he will look upon me as his friend, as I am reſolved to be, nd already am, that ſo juſtifying me, you may thereby juſtifie your ſelf alſo: And in the interim I promiſe you, naugre the hatred which doubtleſs he conceives againſt ne, that I will be very careful of reſtoring him unto his iberty, as ſoon as ever the Gods have made me ſo happy as to releaſe the Princeſs Mandana.

Cyrus.

This Letter being given unto him who brought that f Spitridates, he was conducted unto the Princeſs, who made no queſtion of being by him fully informed of the fortune and condition of that Prince: But ſhe was aſtoniſhed when ſhe found he did not know o much as that he was a Priſoner: He could only tell her, that about ſome months ſince, there were ſome riſoners brought from Heraclea in the night time, nd that they were cloſely kept, but he could not ell who they were: Then ſhe asked him what was reported of Spitridates? to which he anſwered, that one knew what was become of him, and that all the eople both in Pontus and Bythinia did much lament him.

After this, ſhe enquired concerning Arbianes and Ariſtheus, who he ſaid were in health: So that ſince ſhe could not receive any further ſatisfaction from him, ſhe reſolved not only to ſend him back with a Letter, but alſo to ſend one of her ſervants with him, to ſpeak with the man who was to meet him in the Temple of Heraclea: Then without more delay, the Princeſs Araminta writ unto Spitridates, and chuſing out a ſervant to ſend back with him who brought the Letter, ſhe recompenſed him in an ample manner: for though ſhe was a priſoner, yet ſuch was the Generoſity of Cyrus, as he allowed her whatſoever ſhe pleaſed: In the mean time, the treaty concerning the exchange of this Princeſs for the Prince Artamas went ſlowly on: For Crœſſus did ſo delay the buſineſs, as that there was not one Article reſolved upon a day before the Treaty was to end: Cyrus no ſooner conſented unto any thing, but Crœſſus raiſed a new difficulty in the buſineſs: And his ſecret deſign to gain time, did ſo manifeſtly appear, that though it concerned the liberty of the Prince Artamas, yet the King of Phrygia was the firſt that told Cyrus, it was not fit to treat any longer with ſuch a Prince as was not ſincere in his buſineſs: and the rather, becauſe it was reported there was great joy in the Army of Crœſſus, for the arrival of ſome Egyptian forces, which were reported to be commanded by a Prince of a moſt gallant deportment. So that perceiving this Treaty was only a colour whereby to protract the war: It was reſolved to prolong it no longer, what propoſitions ſoever the enemies made, yet would not Cyrus break it until the laſt minute of it was expired: but as ſoon as ever that was, and the Commiſſioners for treaty on both ſides being come back, Cyrus renewed the war; And began to draw up his forces, to paſs over the river Halis, at that paſſage where the Brother of Andramites commanded: And ſince there was in that place, a great and ſtately Caſtle, as ſoon as the Army had paſſed over the river, and the Forlorn hope of Cyrus had beaten back the ſcouts of Crœſſus, to the very walls of Sardis, Cyrus cauſed the Queen of Suſiana, the Princeſs Araminta, and all the reſt of the Ladies to be brought into that Caſtle, to the end that Abradates might not be troubled to paſs over the river, when he went to ſee Panthea: In the mean time this great ſoul which was capable of many things at once, in the midſt of all his amorous ſufferings, was as vigilant as any young ambitious man, and as prudent as any old weather-beaten Captain, he did not only know how many troops he had, what ammunition, and what magazins, and artillery, but he knew alſo who commanded every particular ſquadron, and who was fitteſt to be truſted in any dangerous expedition: he knew the capacities of every Captain, even to the perſonal valour of every private Souldier; ſo that when he drew up his army into Battalia, every one was ranked in ſuch a place as was fitteſt for him: but whilſt his diligence was in the ordering of every thing, it was much murmured in the army, that Araſpes ſhould revolt unto the enemy, and intelligence was one day brought unto him, when the Kings of Phrygia, and Hircania, Tigranes, Mazares, and many others were preſent, that this Araſpes was the only adviſer of Crœſſus how to rank his men in the day of battel; and as ſome priſoners which were taken were brought unto Cyrus, and as he asked them, how they thought Crœſſus would order his army? they anſwered they heard ſay, that all would be diſpoſed according to the counſel of a certain Medean who was come unto their ſide, and who adviſed them to alter that order which they were accuſtomed to obſerve.

The Priſoners had no ſooner given this anſwer, but every one knew it was Araſpes they ſpake of: but they were all much amazed to ſee Cyrus in lieu of being angry againſt him, only ſmil'd and ſaid, that he wiſhed this Medean in his power. Yet he had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but without any further reflection upon it he called a councel of war, to conſult upon the buſineſs in general, yet there did not need any where Cyrus was: for he ſo ſtrengthened his advice with ſuch and ſo many prevalent reaſons, that none ever oppoſed him: ſo that the Kings of Aſſyria, Phrygia, Hircania, Suſiana, and Mazares, Tigranes, Perſodes, Phraartes, Gobrias, Gadates, Anaxaris, and every one referring all things to his conduct: he began to conſider of all things requiſite for the march of his Troops, and for the day of battle; in order to that he cauſed all the officers of his Army to come before him, and gave every one of them his particular order what to do: ſo that their buſineſs was only to obey his orders, and that was enough: it is your care, (ſaid he unto the Captains) to incloſe the worſt of your ſouldiers with the beſt, that their valour may on all ſides be exemplary, and keep them from running away: Afterwards, he commanded the Captains what confidence ſoever they had in their men, yet to exhort them unto their duty, and be ſure to puniſh cowards: telling them, that the only way to make their Souldiers invincible, was to make their Souldiers to ſtand in more fear of their Commanders, than of their Enemies; after that, he gave all neceſſary orders for the march of his Artillery and Baggage; as well as for the Chariots of War: he ordered how the Regiments ſhould march one after another, and was very circumſpect that none ſhould be diſpleaſed with his employment, he took order for the Archers which were to be carried in thoſe Chariots, aſſigning every one in all this great Army his particular duty, and his ſoul was of ſuch a large capacity, as made it apparent that he could govern the whole Univerſe with as much eaſe as others could a private family. This one thing he did eſpecially recommend unto all his Officers, that thoſe that were of the Rere-guard ſhould always keep themſelves in as ready a poſture to fight, as if they were in the front of the Battle. All things being thus ordered, and it being reſolved to march the next morning, Cyrus the night before went to take his leave of the Princeſs accompanied with moſt of any quality in the Army, and amongſt the reſt thoſe that had neareſt relation unto that place, as Phraartes, Andramites, and Ligdamis: who knowing that Crœſſus would ſurprize the Caſtle of Hermes, and that his Father who was Governour, would be forced to declare himſelf, he made no difficulty at all in fighting for Cyrus, ſince ſo many other Lydians would be in his Army. Cyrus, being full of generous civility, told all the Ladies in general, that he would do all he could to prevent their ſhedding of tears after the Victory which he hoped to obtain, aſſuring the Princeſs Araminta for her particular, that he would not fail in any thing he had promiſed: Cyrus had that night as much joy in his aſpect as might eaſily perſwade unto a belief of a happy ſucceſs in that battel which he was to fight; Panthea alſo added unto the hopes of it, imagining he knew well enough that his enemies were not ſo ſtrong as they gave out, but he told her, that on the contrary he underſtood there was an extraordinary gallant Egyptian Prince come unto his Enemies, and that the Prince of Myſia was alſo arrived at Sardis, and further, that a valiant Jonian Commander, called Arimaſpes, was come with Auxiliaries to the aid of Crœſſus: but ſince the valiant Abradates is on my ſide (ſaid he) and ſince Juſtice is alſo on our ſide, I ſhall not deſpair of Victory: but I ſhall have this conſolation at the leaſt, that I will either get the Victory or die: After this, he took his leave of them, and all the reſt of the Ladies, every one of them commending his civility, and praying for his proſperity. Yet Phraartes could not obtain one ſmile from the Princeſs Araminta, whoſe ſorrows for the priſonment of Spitridates, and fears of the battel were ſo great, that ſhe hardly took any notice of him: As for Ligdamis, he received all imaginable expreſſions of tenderneſs from his dear Leoniſa: but for Andramites, he ſaw Doraliſa only in terms of civility, yet he did not think himſelf altogether miſerable, ſince ſhe looked ſo well as in terms of civility upon him: In the mean time, Abradates took not his laſt leave till the next morning: But as he was ready to put on his Arms which he uſed to wear, Panthea ſent him a moſt magnificent ſute which ſhe had ſecretly cauſed to be made, and which ſhe trimmed up with all her jewels; His helmet glittered with abundance of rich Diamonds, and had a plume of purple colour; the reſt of the arms were ſutably rich, and of the ſame colour with his plume: So that Abradates wondering to ſee a ſtately ſute of arms, began his thanks unto his dear Panthea, by complaining againſt her for dreſſing his arms with her jewels, which were for her ſelf at a feaſt of rejoycing after the Victory. I have ſo great an opinion of your Valour (ſaid ſhe unto him) and we are ſo indebted unto the illuſtrious Cyrus, that I thought it requiſite you ſhould wear very remarkable arms, to the end your glorious acts may the more eaſily be diſcerned by him in the day of battel: But for all the courage of Panthea, ſhe could not pronounce theſe words without a ſhower of tears: ſhe endeavoured to hide them, leſt Abradates ſhould take them as a ſad Omen, nor would that Prince take notice of them, leſt it ſhould too much melt her heart and his own: but many expreſſions of an inviolable eternal affection paſſed between them: and he promiſed ſo to acquit himſelf in the ſight of Cyrus, as ſhould become him, ſo that inſenſibly ingaging themſelves in a diſcourſe of Cyrus, they did infinitely commend him for his civil uſage of them, Panthea making the time as long as ſhe could before they bad this cruel adieu, purpoſely the longer to enjoy the ſight of her dear Abradates, who was never ſo handſome, and gallant as in this glorious ſute of arms. But the time did come that he muſt leave her, and he embraced his dear Panthea, and then pronouncing the word adieu, he went out of her chamber, to mount into a moſt magnificent Chariot of war which waited for him at the Caſtle-gate, Panthea following him with all the reſt of the Ladies which were Priſoners. And he eſpying her with ſuch a ſadneſs in his countenance as was not ſuitable to his great and heroique ſoul, he went back unto her, and taking her by her fair hand, which he kiſſed with a ſad dovotion, and being deſirous ſhe would go in again, I pray unto the gods, (cryed he out) I may behave my ſelf as one that is worthy to be Panthea's husband, and Cyrus his friend, after which conjuring her once more to retire, he left her, and went haſtily into his Chariot: but ſhe was not retired till he was quite out of ſight, he ſtill looking upon her as long as he could. But as if the conſtancy of Panthea had been inſpired that ſhe ſhould never ſee him again, ſhe ſounded, and her women were forced to carry her to bed.

In the mean time, never was ſuch a glorious ſight as this Army, for not only Cyrus, the king of Aſſyria, Mazares, and all the reſt of the Princes were moſt magnificently armed; but there was not a common ſouldier, which ſhined not in his arms: ſo that the ſun ſhining that day without a cloud, made the march of this army the moſt glorious ſight that ever eye beheld. All the Cavalry had marrions of burniſh Braſs, with white feathers, their ſuits of arms carnation colour, and their lances all gilt or imbroidered. As for Cyrus his arms were the ſame of gold, which he wore that day he gained the victory over the King of Aſſyria: the horſe he rid on, had alſo the honour to ſerve him in many of his victories, and particularly in that: ſo that the King of Aſſyria knowing theſe armies, he ſighed, and could not chuſe to ſay unto Cyrus, I pray Heavens, (ſaid he unto him) that thoſe arms which now you wear, prove as fortunate againſt Crœſſus and the King of Pontus, as they did againſt me, and I beſeech the Gods I may make better uſe of mine this day then I did on that. You did ſuch glorious things that day, (replyed Cyrus modeſtly) that if fortune had not been your foe, Ciaxares had not been conquerour, and therefore I have greater hopes this day in your valour than in mine own. Then Mazares, Tigranes, Phraartes, Anaxares, Gobrias, Gadates, and all the volunteers coming unto him, he commanded that all the army ſhould march: he himſelf did lead up the vanguard with the King of Aſſyria, unto whom he gave the right hand, and offered him the command of it: Hidaſpes commanded the main body of the battel, wherein were all the Homotimes: the King of Phrygia the rare Guard: and Abradates all the Chariots of war, which made a diſtinct body of it ſelf: Cyrus then beginning to advance, having firſt ſent out ſcouts to diſcover the enemy, gave motion to this huge body, who with one wink diſperſed ſpirits into it. Crœſſus alſo and the King of Pontus prepared for a general combate, and neglected nothing that might get a victory. 'Tis true, there was a vaſt difference between theſe two armies: for hope was in that of Cyrus, and fear was in the Lydian Kings. Not that he was any thing inferiour in numbers, eſpecially ſince the arrival of the Egyptian Auxiliaries, and of thoſe forces which the Prince of Myſſia and Arimaſpes brought up: but the very name of Cyrus was grown ſo terrible every where, that it was no ſooner known in the camp of Crœſſus this Prince was come over the river Halis, but fear ſeiſed upon the hearts of all his ſouldiers, and the night following their frontier Guards gave many falſe alarmes to their own ſide, for they apprehended ſuch fears as made them believe they ſaw what they ſaw not, ſo that they ſtood all night in their arms. Crœſſus then fearing leſt this general terrour ſhould grow to be one of thoſe panick fears which hath ruined whole armies, without a blow, reſolved to expreſs ſome courage, and and by his example to infuſe it into others, that he might meet Cyrus: ſo that the morning after, he diſencamped, and advanced a little beyond Thybarra, at the ſame time Cyrus was drawing towards him: ſo that theſe two huge armies encamped that night within fifty furlongs of each other. Cyrus becauſe he would not be ſurpriſed, paſſed over all that night without any ſleep: and the King of Aſſyria and Mazares being as vigilant as he, they were witneſſes of the pains he took in every thing, and how he neglected nothing that might obtain a victory. In the mean time theſe three illuſtrious Rivals ſpent all the night together in one Tent, but with different thoughts, though Mandana was the only object of them all. As for Cyrus his certainty of Mandana's love, maugre all the menaces of the Gods, afforded him many hours of joy amidſt his ſufferings: whereas on the contrary, the King of Aſſyria, maugre the favourable Oracle which he received at Babylon, knowing he was not loved, and that Cyrus was many times poſſeſſed with ſuch fits of fury, as he had much ado to maſter them. Mazares, though his thoughts were leſs violent, yet was his ſorrow a heavy load upon his heart, for when he began to conſider, how he had impoſed upon himſelf a neceſſity of never pretending further than to the friendſhip of Mandana, he knew not whether he was able to keep within thoſe limits which he had preſcribed unto himſelf: On the other ſide, the King of Pontus thought himſelf as miſerable as any, eſpecially when he conſidered that it was not a Victory could make him happy, ſince when he had conquered Cyrus, he could not conquer Mandana, unto whom he had not ſpoke one word of the battel towards, leſt it ſhould trouble her too much: For it may well be ſaid, never was raviſher leſs violent, and more reſpective than himſelf: So that Mandana and the Princeſs Palmis not knowing they were ready to fight for their liberties, did both condole and comfort each other. Yet was Mandana verry ſorry ſhe did not credit Mazares, for ſhe underſtood by Cyleniſa how that Prince was really gone unto Cyrus. The Prince Artamas for his part, he did ſuffer unconceivable torments of mind, not only by reaſon of his own impriſonment, but for the Princeſs Palmis, and in thinking upon the Battel which was ready to be given: Yet as brave as he was, he was ſomething glad that he was not to be in it, becauſe the Princeſs Palmis could not hereafter upbraid him for fighting againſt the King her Father. But as reſtleſs as theſe three, nay all theſe Illuſtrious Perſons were, I think it may truly be ſaid, that Cyrus being moſt amorous, was moſt tormented, or at leaſt moſt diligent to obtain the Victory: For no ſooner did Aurora begin to gild the clouds from the Eaſt, than he awaked all his Camp, by ſound of Trumpets, Drums, Fifes, and Howboys: So that all this vaſt Army, was in a moment in their arms, and ranked under their Colours, and ready to obey their General; who being as full of Piety as valour, commanded a Sacrifice to be offered unto the Gods, and to beg Victory from them; and willed the Sacrificers to uſe no other Ceremonies than after the Perſian cuſtom: ſo that the Magi, who made preparations for this Ceremony, made choice of a Hill, which was in the midſt of the Camp, to ſacrifice unto the Sun, which they called, Ocoſmades, and unto Venus Urania, whom they called Mitra, and unto Jupiter; Cyrus making choice of theſe three divinities, to the end that Jupiter might give him power to vanquiſh; that the Sun might ſhine upon his Victory; and that Venus Urania might favour his deſign of Mandana's releaſment: Since the Perſians never uſe to ſacrifice, but under the Canopy of Heaven, nor to dreſs up any Magnificent Altars, nor light any Fire, nor uſe any Crowns of flowers: the Ceremony was not long, for the Sacrificers do nothing but put a wreath of Myrtle upon their heads, and carry the Victims up to the Hill they make choice of: and there they invoke the Gods unto whom they ſacrifice, and according to the Perſian Cuſtom, which is never to make any prayers but for all the Perſians in general, excepting for their King, they ask of thoſe Divinities all that may be glorious unto their Nation, and by conſequence Victory: Afterwards they pray for all their army, and for Ciaxares only in particular: Cyrus deſiring to make no diſtinction between Perſians and others: In the mean time, how early ſoever the Magi were, thoſe of Crœſſus were before them: 'Tis true, it was in a different manner: For ſince he and the King of Pontus, and the Prince of Myſſia, and all the other great Commanders, had obſerved that their Souldiers ſtood in fear of their enemies, and that the very name of Cyrus ſtruck a terror into them, they were themſelves afraid leſt this panick fear ſhould put their army into diſorder: Therefore ſince they were to fight a deciding battle, they thought beſt to infuſe mettle into their men by ſome rules of religion. And in order to that, they brought into uſe an ancient ſacrifice uſed in wars, in the time when Heraclides raigned in Lydia: and about two hours after midnight, they make ready their Altars in the midſt of the Camp, all the Souldiers being drawn about them as in Battle aray: After this, they make about theſe Altars twelve fires, which ſhews unto the Souldiers a great number of Victims, which the Sacrificers kill before them: About theſe Altars, fires, and bloody Victims, ſtand two hundred men with ſwords drawn in their hands: After which, theſe men do ſwear all the Officers, never to leave fighting untill they have met with death or victory; then they call all the Souldiers one by one, and make them promiſe and ſwear with moſt terrible Imprecations upon themſelves and their poſterity, to be obedient unto all that Creſſus, or their Officers ſhall command them: and never to flee from battle, but every one to kill his fellow that ſhall offer to give ground before victory be obtained, and if there were any which out of fear of ſuch a ſtrange ſacrifice, would not ſwear, theſe men with ſwords in their hands were to kill them; and by this cruel example to affright the reſt to promiſe what was deſired them, though perhaps they had no intention to keep it: yet notwithſtanding ſince ſuch things as theſe do extreamly move the hearts of the multitude, the Souldiers in the Army of Crœſſus in general, did believe they ſhall become more valiant after this Ceremony: ſo that hopes ſucceeding their fears; the Army of Crœſſus began to be confident of happy ſucceſs in Battle.

However, the King of Lydia did not truſt more to the multitude of his men, then he did of ſome advantages which might be taken, and therefore he advanced to Hyberra, ſo that Cyrus was much amazed, when after his ſacrifices ended, and day began to break he ſaw his enemies removed from the place he thought them to be, conceiving that they had poſſeſſed themſelves of a place of great advantage for themſelves: and the very truth is, if this Prince had not been full as wiſe as he was valiant, he had expoſed his Army to an inevitable ruine. Thyberra was a Town of an indifferent largeneſs, ſeated upon a pleaſant Hill, ſome thirty furlongs from Sardis: at the foot of this hill ran a little river, which running round the walls made the acceſs very difficult; So that it ſeemed, Crœſſus thought he ſtood in need of all advantages to deal with ſuch a Prince as Cyrus was. As this Hero was ever uſed to ſeek his enemies, and never to turn his back upon them, he drew up into battalia upon another hill, oppoſite to that which Crœſſus poſſeſſed, and ſeemed ſo exceedingly deſirous to be fighting, that he ſtood in need of all his prudence, to ſtop the heat of that courage, which deſired to hazard all than not fight. Yet upon better conſideration, finding that if he loſt this Battle his glory would receive a foil, and Mandana would not be releaſed: He examined the matter a little better. He ſaw that the right wing of Crœſſus was ſheltred with the Town of Thyberra, which on that ſide was naturally fortified by the fall of many Torrents which time had made ſo deep and impetuous, that the paſſages were not fordable: Cyrus alſo ſaw that the main body of his enemies was moſt judiciouſly placed, ſo that more advantage could not be deviſed: For indeed it was in a little wood, which nature had ſo intrenched, that all art could not mend it: As for his left wing, it alſo had poſſeſſion of another Hill, the acceſs unto which was through many ditches: ſo that it were fond imprudence to fight upon ſuch advantages, eſpecially ſince Crœſſus was more numerous than himſelf. The King of Lydia hoped that Cyrus would have done as he did at Artaxates, and in Aſſyria: ſo that Cyrus hazarding all, and he nothing, he might chance get the victory. But ſince prudence will alter thoughts according to occaſions, Cyrus who did hazard all in Armenia to deliver Mandana where he might well in reaſon do it, would not do ſo in Lydia, where he ſhould hazard the loſs of Mandana and the victory alſo: yet he uſed all poſſible ſtratagems to make Crœſſus quit the ground he was in poſſeſſion of, and to provoke him to fight upon reaſonable terms. It may truly he ſaid, all military Art was uſed upon this occaſion, to draw his enemy out of his holds, ſo that every day both Armies had continually skirmiſhes, though Cyrus could not engage his enemy in a main Battel: In the mean while, the place where he was encamped was very incommodious for him, for his enemies being Maſter of the little river which ran by Thyberra, he wanted drink both for horſe and man, and likewiſe all manner of forrage. Cyrus then reſolving to diſincamp, reſolved to quarter near Pactolus, where his Army might have plenty of all proviſions, which he wanted in the quarters he quitted, and where he might obſerve the motion of his enemies, which way ſoever they moved, and force them to fight if they ſtirred: the queſtion was, whether they ſhould remove in the night, or in the day time: for though prudence told Cyyus it ſhould be in the night, yet his great ſoul would not permit him: his chief reaſon why he deſired to follow the motions of his courage was, becauſe he was in hope Crœſus would follow him, and ſo he ſhould face about and fight him. But ſince there was ſome danger in that attempt, and that good ſucceſs was doubtful, he reſolved upon an honourable Retreat, in the face of an Army much ſtronger than himſelf, and commanded by Princes expert in command: ſo that at break of day his firſt Brigade began to march, the ſecond followed; afterwards the Artillery and Chariots marched in the head of the Infantry.

The Orders of Cyrus were ſo well executed, that the Retreat was without diſorder, except the firſt Brigade of the right wing, wherein Cyrus was, becauſe the left wing of Crœſus, which was oppoſite to it, and wherein the Lydians and Mariandins were, was beſt able to fall upon this Prince, becauſe there was fewer obſtacles on that ſide than any other: and they left them to charge that Prince, whom not a Lydian durſt look in the face upon even terms, nor now aſſault him, but becauſe he retreated: In the mean time Cyrus commanded that body of Horſe which Hydaſpes commanded, to keep their ground upon the plain, to the end his Brigade might retreat between the Horſe, as indeed they did: But thoſe Forces which Artabaſes commanded that day, who retreated with the reſt of the Army, as well as thoſe which Anaxaris commanded, were aſſaulted by the Mariandines, who received them with much courage, eſpecially Anaxaris, who indeed did miracles at that time. But do what they could, the Troops which they commanded were worſted, Anaxaris was wounded, and taken priſoner, and Artabaſes more happy than he, diſingaged himſelf from amongſt them, and got amongſt his own party. The enemy encouraged by this proſperous beginning had advanced their victory, if Hydaſpes had not ſtopped them, and given them ſuch a ſharp repulſe, as merited the acclamations and praiſe of both Armies: for he charged with ſuch furious valour, as made it appear he merited the favour of Cyrus: and fighting both for his own glory, and the glory of his Maſter, he beat the Mariandines, and Lydians, as far as half way up the Hill from whence they deſcended. But three ſquadrons coming freſh upon him, and all the Cavalry of Crœſſus being commanded to oppoſe the valour of Hydaſpes, He and his forces were forced to ſubmit unto ſuch a multitude, and retreated in confuſion, eſpecially becauſe they retreated down the Hill. Cyrus, whoſe prudence could not be deluded, did foreſee this, and commanded one part of his Troops to draw up into Battalia on the top of the next Hill, and ordered his Brigade to keep the plain, to aſſiſt the retreat of Hydaſpes;and to that end he went from ſquadron to ſquadron, to exhort them all, to ſhew themſelves worthy of that good opinion which he had of them and their courage, and indeed, he had a confidence that they would do as heretofore they were accuſtomed, and never forſake him: Yet as he charged thoſe who forced his men to retreat in diſorder, theſe ſame ſquadrons who promiſed never to forſake him, nor never yet had done ſo, were blaſted with that ſame fear with which heretofore they were wont to aſtoniſh others: ſo that whether the multitude of their enemies did amaze them, or whether the tumultuous retreat of their own ſide did ſhake their courage, they forſook Cyrus: ſo that there was no other courſe for him, but to think of ſaving himſelf, that he might ſave all his Army; yet he would not reſolve upon that courſe, until he was driven to the danger of being either killed or taken, more than once: ſo loath was he to retreat from his enemies, who never met him but were beaten. Thoſe of his men whom fear frighted out of judgment, ran away to the bottom of the Hill, where all the Infantry ſtood as a Reſerve: but thoſe who had ſo much courage as to look danger in the face, and retain their reaſon, ſtayed at a paſs in the plain, where there was a little blind, which did in ſome ſort hide them.

Cyrus who at this time had his ſpirits as free, and his ſoul as ſeeing as if he were in no danger, ſpying ſome of his men which made a halt in this place, began to rally as many of them as he could together, and couragiouſly facing about upon his enemies, did not only ſtop their purſuit, but did vigorouſly repulſe them, and beat them up the Hill which Cyrus his men had quitted: After this Heroick Act, Cyrus meeting with the King of Aſſyria, the King of Phrygia, the King of Hircania, and all the Princes of his Army, he fully determined to give Battel, and not to alter from the firſt Orders which he had given: and indeed there needed no other alteration, unleſs that the firſt Brigade of the right wing ſhould change places with the ſecond; Cyrus not conceiving them yet recovered out of thoſe fears into which they were driven, and therefore would not expoſe them to the firſt ſhock of the Battel: not but that there is ever ſome danger to change Orders in the face of an Enemy, yet the change of thoſe two Brigades was done in ſuch excellent order and regular motion, that the leaſt confuſion did not appear: for commanding a countermarch, they paſſed from one place to the others, between rank, and rank, and kept their diſtances and motions ſo even, that in a very little time, they were ready to fight, as if there had been no change at all: All the Calvalry which Cyrus had rallied were ſent unto ſuch Quarters as were fit to be poſſeſſed: and all things were ſo ſoon, and ſo well ordered, that it was not diſcernable any man were loſt in this retreat; the loſs whereof in reality was very ſmall. In the mean time, Cyrus who was alwayes circumſpect to chuſe the moſt advantagious ground, eſpecially in the day of Battel, took the right wing, and quartered them with the firſt Brigade, whoſe ſquadrons were compoſed of Perſians, Medes, and Cappadoceans, and placed a Body of Voluntiers, who deſired the honour to fight where he did, between two ſquadrons which Gadates commanded, in the head of which this Prince would fight: The moſt eminent of theſe Voluntiers were Perſodes, Andramites, Ligdamis, Timoreon, Soſules. Hermogenes, Beleſis, Orſanus, and Tegeus: Feraulus, and Ortalques alwayes keeping cloſe to their Maſters: Thoſe who this day ſerved under this Prince, were the King of Aſſyria, who commanded the firſt Brigade, aſſiſted by Aglatidas: Tigranes kept cloſe unto the perſon of Cyrus, and was adjutant unto him, as Aglatidas was unto the King of Aſſyria. Abradates commanded the Cavalry of this Brigade: In the mean while Mazares took upon him the command of the left wing, the firſt diviſion whereof was equal in the number of ſquadrons to the firſt diviſion of the right wing: Gobrias commanding this firſt diviſion, was aſſiſted by Aduſius: Phraartes commanded the Cavalry of this Brigade. The firſt diviſion of the Infantry marching between theſe two wings, conſiſted of five Battalions: The Artillery marched in the head of the Infantry: and ſo did the hundred armed Chariots under the command of Abradates, whoſe ſtately Chariot was drawn by eight of the fineſt horſes ever eye beheld: the ſecond diviſion of the right wing was commanded by Artabaſes, as the ſecond diviſion of the left was by Chriſantes: The ſecond Brigade of Infantry was divided alſo into five battalions; many ſquadrons of horſe were placed between the two Brigades of Infantry, and all the body of Perſian Cavalry, wherein were the Homotimes, and the Aſſyrian Infantry, commanded by Hydaſpes, made up the body of the battel: The body of Reſerves, compoſed of Phrygians and Hircanians, were commanded by the Kings of Phrygia and Hircania. All things being thus ordered, there was ſuch an interior joy appeared in the aſpect of Cyrus, as inſpired courage into the ſouls of all thoſe that looked upon him: But that the ſame ſpirit of valour which did animate him, might be infuſed into all the Army, he commanded a muſter of all his troops, and going from Diviſion to Diviſion, from Brigade to Brigade, from Squadron to Squadron, and from Rank to Rank, he diſſipated all fears out of cowards, and inſpired valour into them, and the moſt couragious alſo.

Remember my Companions (would he ſay unto the firſt Squadrons) that it concerns you to fight this day, not only to get Victory, but to keep that Glory which we have gotten at other times. Afterwards turning towards other Troops, Forget not (would he ſay unto them) that thoſe who fight ill, are in more danger than thoſe who fight well, and that in all places, and fights, there is more ſafety in keeping ground than flying Then going a little further, and ſpeaking unto others: Make it appear Souldiers (ſaid he) that you know how to vanquiſh by Art, and never Triumph by hazard: Remember (would he ſay to others,) that moſt of our enemies have been vanquiſhed by us before, and that they never vanquiſhed you: Let not the multitude of our enemies fright you, (would he ſay unto ſuch whoſe valour he ſuſpected) for if you have but more heart than they, you will eaſily overcome them, though they were as many more. I ſhould do you wrong (would he ſay unto ſuch whom he deſired to flatter) if I ſhould exhort you to fight; It is enough if you do but as you were wont. Moreover my Companions, (ſaid this Prince, and went a little further) Remember that our cauſe is juſt, and the Gods are Juſt. I know you are Brave and Gallant men, and that you were never overcome, and that you uſtly expect great Recompence. And I dare boldly promiſe both t and Victory unto you, if you will but do as I will do my ſelf.

After this, Cyrus recommended three things eſpecially unto them all. The one was, to obſerve each other in their march, that thereby the order of battel might not be broken, but that their diviſions might be even, and their diſtances equal: The ſecond was, neither to be too backward when they charged, nor too precipitately forward: And the laſt was, to let their enemies ſhoot all their arrows, and throw all their darts, before they began to ſhoot and throw theirs. Afterwards Cyrus going to Abradates, told him that he expected to be a debtor unto him for the Victory which he hoped for: But the King of Suſiana, ſeeing himſelf diſadvantageouſly placed, anſwered, that he ſtood moſt in need of his help to get the Victory, and that he deſired ſome Perſians would come and teach him to fight: After which Cyrus ſtill exhorting his ſouldiers, returned to the head of the right wing in which he was to fight: and he had no ſooner took his place, but Araſpes who had diſingaged himſelf from the Lydians, came into the Army of Cyrus, and preſented himſelf unto him. I am now come, Sir, (ſaid he unto him) to expiate the crime which I committed, by dying in your ſervice, as I writ to you that I intended when I went firſt unto your enemies, purpoſely to give you intelligence. We have ſo much need of valiant men, replied Cyrus, that as faulty as you are, I cannot chuſe but be glad to ſee you: and when you have given me a ſhort account of what you know concerning the Enemy, I will aſſign you your place to fight with Andramites. Then Araſpes whiſpered with Cyrus, and told him all which he thought of moſt concernment: As ſoon as Cyrus had well conſidered upon the advice which Araſpes gave him, he ſaw the Lydian Cavalry appear upon the hill which was oppoſite to Cyrus, and to divide themſelves into right and left wings, to make room for the main Battel of Crœſſus. Cyrus ſeeing by this, that now his Enemies would fight, was infinitely joyed to ſee that his ſeeming retreat had deceived them, and invited them to fight in hopes of a Victory, upon more eaſie terms now than ever, by reaſon of the diſorder which happened. In the mean time, the army of Cyrus was in a condition to fight: and that of Crœſſus was not: for the diligence of this famous Conquerour, ſurprized the ſpirits of thoſe who would have ſurprized him. And indeed without any delay, or giving his enemies ſo much time as to rank themſelves, Cyrus marched up to them, the Sun being then three hours and a half high: until now the army of Crœſſus was full of hopes to be victorious. But as ſoon as ever they ſaw Cyrus come to them with full reſolution to fight, their confidence failed, and Victory became doubtful. The word of Battel which Cyrus gave unto all his Troops, was, Jupiter our Protector. But all the army animated by the preſence of a Prince, whom all the Souldiers called a ſecond Mars, in lieu of crying Jupiter our Protector, made the air eccho with the name of the God of war: ſo that all crying out Mars, Mars. Mars, the noiſe of ſo many ſeveral voices, mingled with the Muſick of Trumpets, Fifes, Hoboys and Drums, ſeemed to be acclamations of victory, though it was only the beginning of combat. The Chariots and the Artillery of Cyrus did much more execution than thoſe of his enemies, for they rained moſt terrible clouds and ſhowers of arrows upon the Lydian troops: And the artillery made ſuch impetuous ſhots of ſtones upon the enemy, that they were exceedingly annoyed, inſomuch as they had much ado to keep in order: Yet Craſſus and the King of Pontus, ſeeing they were forced to fight, did ſhew much gallantry, and came up to fight with great reſolution: yet were they put to one notable diſadvantage, for they were forced to rank themſelves into Battalia as they marched: ſo that it was a hard matter for a great Body not ſettled in order, to ſuſtain the ſhock of another which is better ordered. But yet at laſt they ranked their troops: The Prince Myrſiles notwithſtanding his imperfection, commanded the two diviſions of the right wing, being aſſiſted by Pactias, who gave orders for him, this Prince having only the honour of the command, not being able to do any other ſervice, than by his perſonal Valour. The Prince of Myſſia, and a Lydian of quality called Artibies, commanded the two diviſions of the left wing: Arimaſpes the valiant Ionian Captain, commanded all the Infantry: and the King of Pontus all the other troops which were as Reſerves: Craſſus was placed in the head of a body of Lydian Cavalry in the midſt of the battel: theſe two great Armies were ſome thirty paces from each other, when Cyrus perceived the left wing of his enemy ſent three volleys of arrows upon the right wing of his, ſo that this Prince deſiring that his men ſhould not ſhoot theirs before the enemy had thrown all their Darts, did make a ſtop to hinder them, and commanded that none ſhould draw an arrow until their enemies had done theirs. This command was as exactly obeyed as Judiciouſly given: from whence did ariſe three conſiderable advantages: for it did redouble the fury of the troops in reſtraining them put order into all the diviſions and ranks: and by receiving upon themſelves all the arrows and darts of their enemies,they exhauſted them of all at the very firſt ſhock: This being the ſtate of things, the Prince of Myſſia to ſignal himſelf, advanced with his firſt diviſion againſt that of Cyrus, who at the ſame time advancd to receive him: theſe two diviſions, being come within reach of darts, did both make a ſtand a pretty while, both deſiring the other ſhould begin: at laſt the Lydians more impatient, began to obſcure the air with an incredible Cloud of Arrows and Darts: at the ſame time Cyrus commanding his men to do as he did, he threw the firſt dart, and drawing their Swords, ruſhed upon the ſquadron which oppoſed him, and did ſuch miraculous acts, that all he did before was nothing in compariſon of this: his firſt diviſion couragiouſly following him, charged the firſt diviſion of the Lydians with ſuch fury, that they intirely routed them. Cyrus, ſeeing he had taught them in that place how to get a victory, diſengaged himſelf from amongſt them, to ſee what other place ſtood in need of his help: But he was no ſooner from amongſt them, than the ſecond diviſion of the enemies ſeconding their firſt, did ſo repulſe that from which Cyrus departed, that all the King of Aſſyria's valour could not ſave himſelf from being taken. 'Tis true he made a gallant reſiſtance, and charged through both diviſions of his enemies: Tigranes alſo was unhappily wounded, and maugre his valour, taken priſoner, though he did moſt gallant things in the ſight of Cyrus; nor did he render himſelf until his horſe was killed, and was overcumbered by a multitude. This being the ſtate of things; the ſecond diviſion, to repair the misfortune which it had in his retreat, had command to relieve the firſt, which it couragiouſly did under the conduct of Artabaſes. In the mean while Cyrus,having rallied his firſt diviſion,fell upon them on one ſide,whilſt Artabaſes was on the other:and both this Prince and Aglatidas did ſuch wonders that the whole power of their enemies was not able to ſtop their valour: yet the combat was a while very doubtful:and victory knew not which ſide to take,for ſometimes the troops of Cyrus would ſo preſs upon the Lydian troops with ſuch fury, as one would have thought them quite routed and torn in pieces: And ſometimes they would ſo rally, and charge afreſh, as would make thoſe who routed them before to ſtagger: That which, to the glory of Cyrus, was moſt remarkable, was, that there was not one of his ſquadrons ſquandred by any of the Lydian troops, which Cyrus did not rally, and bring up again to fight, with as much courage and judgment, and quickneſs, as if he had been more than in one place at once, ſo ready was he to do all that his great ſoul did prompt unto him: and it is not imaginable how oft he charged, and how many ſingle combats he had: He no ſooner had vanquiſhed in one place, but he ſought out a new ſubject for his valour: and being not contented with overcoming all he met with, he ſought out for the King of Pontus with extream deſire: But all in vain, for fortune would not let them meet. In the mean while he met with freſh reſiſtance, and the reſoluteneſs of his enemies gave him an ample ſubject for his prudence and valour; So that not enduring that the victory ſhould continue any longer upon doubtful terms, he cauſed his body of reſerve to march up; The King of Lydia did the like, but with different ſucceſs; For the Kings of Phrygia and Hircania did ſo ſharply charge their enemies, and were ſo exceedingly animated by the example of Cyrus, whom they ſaw did ſuch incredible acts of valour, as they had the honour to ſecond him in his courage, and routed the left wing and body of his enemies Reſerve, who were forced to fly and yield unto the valour of a Prince whom none could ſurmount; In the mean while, ſince the whole army of Cyrus was inſpired with the ſame ſpirit, Mazares, where he was, did as much as any brave Prince could do, who deſired death and victory; for he charged the Prince Myrſiles and Pactias with extraordinary valour. He did not only go unto them with a reſolution of fury, but ſeeing they would not come unto him, becauſe they were on very advantageous ground, he went up the Hill unto them with incredible courage, though without any diſorder or indiſcretion, and charged them ſo hotly, that he routed them; yet one of his ſquadrons, paſſing up a place of difficulty, was repulſed by one of the enemies ſquadrons, but Gobrias relieved them, and forced the Lydian ſquadrons to do like their fellows, which was to fly away in diſorder; Yet The ſecond diviſion of the enemy attempted to relieve their firſt, but Chriſantes, coming up to Mazares, the right wing of the Lydians was entirely ſquandered; So that Mazares now made no doubt of victory, though himſelf was two or three times in danger to be taken by the enemy. The body of the battel, in the head of which were the Chariots, had no mean ſhare in the Victory: and Abradates did more than he promiſed his dear Panthea, and indeed more than he ſhould have done; for he did ſo expoſe himſelf unto dangers, as if he had either known himſelf invulnerable, or elſe deſired death: he drove the eight horſes which drew his Chariot with ſuch fury, as he tumbled down his enemies, and forced their Chariots to fly; The reſt of the Chariots which followed him, doing the ſame, ſtruck terrour into all that oppoſed them; Some of the enemies Chariots fled; others were tumbled over and broken: all were rendered uſeleſs to the Lydians. Abradates having done this, and ſeeing the Egyptian Battalia keep their ground, went with his Chariots to rumble amongſt them, and overthrew all he met, either by the impetuoſity of his Chariots, or by his Sword, or with the Sythes wherewith the Chariots were armed: Never was fight more terrible to behold than this: The horſes trampled upon the bodies of dead and dying men: the Sythes cut off others: and the wheels ran over thoſe which the horſes and Sythes tumbled down: But, alas, the Victory of Abradates proved fatal unto him: for the field was ſo ſtrewed with horſes and dead men, with broken armes, and overturned Chariots, that he could not paſs, but over Mountains of theſe mingled together: ſo that the wheels ſometimes went high, and ſometimes low, and his Chariot unfortunately overturned, maugre the skill of him which drove it: Yet Abradates diſingaged himſelf from under it, and began to fight on foot, but was forced to yield unto a multitude, who ſeeing him down, fell upon him: ſo that this valiant Prince and all thoſe with him periſhed at this time; Yet his death was revenged to the full; For Hidaſpes and Gadates coming in, they charged all thoſe that fell upon Abradates, with ſuch fury, that they forced them to retire in confuſion into the body of their battel; Afterwards Hidaſpes with thoſe troops under his command charged Arimaſpes and his troops, and all the Battalions of the firſt diviſion charged thoſe enemies which oppoſed them with ſuch vigour, that Arimaſpes as Great a Commander as he was, was forced to yield unto the valour of Hidaſpes, not being able to reſiſt him long. The King of Pontus, who fought with as much courage, and ill fortune, perceiving the diſorder in Crœſſus his Army, did what he could to Rally, and was twenty times in danger to be taken: But in that deplorable condition in which he ſaw himſelf, he could do no good. Crœſſus alſo, as well as he, gave many rare teſtimonies of his courage, but could not find any remedy againſt his misfortunes. He ſaw the two wings of his Army broken in pieces, and the main body of the Battel ſquandred: He ſaw the field was covered with his dead and dying men: That terrour was in all his Troops: they fled whereſoever Cyrus aſſaulted them, and in ſome places where they were not aſſaulted. So that Crœſſus ſeeing no way but to ſecure his perſon, and defend Sardis: And the King of Pontus thinking upon the preſervation of the Princeſs Mandana, both theſe two Princes reſolved to retire; and ſo they did, notwithſtanding Cyrus ſought all over for them, and could not hear any thing of them, for they were gotten into a great body of horſe, which haſtily flying, raiſed ſuch a cloud of duſt as obſcured their flight, and hindred him from the purſute: In the mean time Cyrus and Mazares, being both of them in the heads of thoſe wings which they had ſo glorioufly conducted, fell upon the Rear of the enemies battel, which conſiſted only of the remainder of Infantry, the Horſe being all fled away. So that Cyrus ſeeing none was able to reſiſt him, but one Egyptian Battalion which ſtood ſtill upon their ground: He ſent Feraulus to take their Guards, the Captain whereof was killed, and to give this Battalion Battel. But as Feraulus did execute the commands of his Maſter, he found that theſe Egyptians did naught elſe but cover themſelves with their Bucklers, and ſtood as men that were reſolved to dye upon the place: Cyrus wondring to ſee this Battalion neither advance nor retreat; and ſeeing all his Army victorious, and alſo the Army of Crœſſus quite defeated; He commanded the fight to ceaſe, and to ask the Egyptians, why they would not throw away their arms, if they intended to render themſelves, and why they did not fight, if they would not? unto this they anſwered, that the Prince who commanded being dead, and his body in the middle of their Battalion, they were reſolved never to forſake it; and therefore if Cyrus would have them ſubmit themſelves unto him, he muſt give them leave to render all the honours which was due unto his body, and go to bury him: this being granted them, they would take the part of Cyrus, and leave Crœſſus who had forſaken them: otherwiſe they would be all killed upon the body of their dead Prince: Cyrus no ſooner heard their deſires, but he admired their fidelity and affection to their Prince, and conſented to their demands, appointing Feraulus to let the body of the dead Prince be carried in a Chariot of war whither they would have it, deſiring alſo to ſpeak with the chief Commanders of theſe Egyptians, who without more delay lifted up the Corps of their General. But as if Heaven would recompence them for their fidelity, as the Chariot paſſed by Cyrus, [he caſting his eyes upon him whom the Egyptians thought to be dead, he perceived that as he leaned his head upon a Buckler, he opened his eyes: ſo that Cyrus ſeeing a Prince ſo handſom as he was, in a condition to be recovered, commanded Feraulus to carry him into one of his tents: So after this, purſuing his Victory, he went before Thybirra, and ſummoned it, which the ſame hour ſubmitted unto his diſcretion. So that having in one day won a battel, took a town, and releaſed the King of Aſſyria, Tigranes, and Anaxaris, he was moſt triumphant: it is worth obſervation, that this priſoner King was he who did capitulate about the ſurrender of this town, unto which they who took him carried him: for the inhabitants ſeeing themſelves without any hopes of relief, or any power to defend themſelves, threw themſelves at his feet, beſeeching him to intercede for them unto Cyrus to uſe them well, which he promiſed and performed: for Cyrus, at the requeſt of his Rival, did moſt generouſly expreſs all the ſigns of clemency and ſweetneſs unto them upon all occaſions. This Victory left the conquered no manner of conſolation: for the Lydians were totally defeated: they loſt all their Artillery, all their Enſignes, and all their Baggage. Abundance were killed, and abundance were taken priſoners: Arimaſpes that valiant Ionian, was taken, and died the next day of his wounds: and all this with a very inconſiderable loſs unto Cyrus, unleſs in the death of Abradates, which did ſo ſenſibly grieve him, that he expreſſed much ſorrow upon the field, and where he encamped that night, notwithſtanding his ſatisfaction not only to ſee that all his friends and ſouldiers had exceedingly well behaved themſelves, but alſo that his very Rivals ſhould add unto his glory. Seeing he had now nothing to do for the releaſement of Mandana, but to enforce the walls of Sardis, his joyes at it did comfort him for the loſs of Abradates; whoſe Corps he ſent to ſeek, that he might render it all the honours it deſerved. And ſince the gods were pleaſed to ſhowre happineſſes upon him, after ſo many bitter ſtorms of misfortunes, as he went into his tent to reſt himſelf after all his glorious pains, there came a Poſt unto him from Thraſibulus, to let him know that his Armies were no leſs proſperous under his command, than under his own; for he had vanquiſhed all that ever oppoſed him, and that the greateſt part of all lower Aſia was reduced under his Empire: At the ſame time alſo arrived an Envoy from Ciaxares, to tell him that he could ſpare him many freſh troops, becauſe Thomiris was not in a capacity to make any war upon him, ſince ſhe was deſperately ſick of a languiſhing diſeaſe which was like to coſt her her life, or her reaſon. And to compleat his happineſs, a Cavalier, whom he knew to be one of thoſe he heretofore had pardoned, for being in the conſpiracy of cowardly Artanus; brought him a Letter from Mandana, which before he read it, did induce him to believe that he had very ill expounded the Oracles of the gods, and that for the future he ſhould be as happy under the name of Cyrus, as he had been miſerable under the name of Artamenes.

OR,

Cyrus the Great.

PART VI. BOOK I.

THough Cyrus was infinitely impatient to ſee what the incomparable Mandana had writ unto him, yet it was a long time before he could read the Letter; not only becauſe exceſs of Joy had diſordered his heart ſo much, that he knew not whether he ſhould believe what he ſaw, but alſo becauſe he would have the man who brought it tell him, whether he received it from the hand of Mandana? how he ſaw her, and when? but he had no ſooner asked him all ſuch queſtions as he deſired to be ſatisfied in, than that without ſtaying for his anſwer, he opened the Letter, which had no ſuperſcription; but when he had opened it, he knew her Character, and found in the beginning of it theſe words.

The Unfortunate Mandana unto the Unfaithful Cyrus.

This Prince had no ſooner caſt his eyes upon her cruel words, but he ſtopt, and read them over the ſecond time, yet with ſo much wonder and deſpair, that he could not chuſe but break out into ſad expreſſions of his ſorrows, inſomuch that feeling his heart full of violent agitations, he return'd in private, but ſtill as he return'd he read Mandana's Letter, which contained theſe words.

I would I could lock up in my heart my reſentments of your Inconſtancy: But I do confeſs my wonder is ſo great, to hear that you have changed your opinion of me, that I cannot chuſe but vent both my admiration and indignation; though I know it argues weakneſs to make any complaints unto ſuch as offends me, and that it ſpeaks more greatneſs of Soul not to accuſe ſuch Delinquents as we are reſolv'd never to pardon. But ſince I cannot endure your change without complaint, I will complain like one that will never be appeas'd: Therefore I do declare unto you, that I will not any longer be the Pretence of the ambition, nor be the innocent cauſe of all Aſia*'s deſolation. Render back unto my Father thoſe Forces which you have of his, to the end my fetters may be never unlooſed by your hand, for I confeſs I had rather remain a Captive ſtill under a reſpective Raviſher, than to be ſet at Liberty by a perfidious Prince, who hath heretofore given a hundred illuſtrious Teſtimonies of his fidelity unto* Mandana.

Cyrus read this Letter with ſo much ſadneſs, with ſuch aſtoniſhment and perplexity of ſpirit, that he was forced to read it over again: But the more he read, the more he was amazed: and the heavier was his heart: and though his innocency might have been a cordial unto him, yet his too delicate a ſoul could not without extream ſorrow, ſuffer ſuch an unjuſt accuſation: and his purity of love could not chuſe but be apprehenſive, that Mandana ſhould think him capable of any change in his affection to her; moreover, ſince it appeared not by her Letter who it was ſhe thought he loved, he could not gueſs whether it was Panthea or Araminta, for he rendred equal civilities unto them both: ſo that being in a moſt ſad deſpair, he ſent for him who brought the Letter, to ſee if he could draw ſuch conceits from him, as might give him any ſatisfaction. This man then told him, that being in the cittadel of Sardis, when they brought the Princeſs Mandana and the Princeſs Palmis thither, he reſolved to ſtay there until he found an opportunity of paying a debt which was upon him, by doing ſome ſervice unto the Princeſs Mandana; hoping alwaies to find an occaſion to make it known unto ſome of the Women which belonged unto that Princeſs, how he was ready to attempt any thing which ſhe would command. He further ſaid, that ſince ſhe was ſtrictly guarded, he could not deviſe any way how to execute his deſign, until of late he met with an opportunity of talking with Marteſia, who at firſt gave no credit unto his words, but afterwards believing what he ſaid unto her, ſhe brought him this Letter, aſſuring him it would be a very acceptable piece of ſervice unto the Princeſs Mandana, if he delivered this Letter unto him. Cyrus ſeeing this was all he could get out of the man, commanded Ortalques to have a care of him, and conjuring him to let none whatſoever know that he brought a Letter from Mandana, for he would not make his Rivals ſo glad as to know he was in her diſfavour: and love is of ſuch a nature, as all thoſe in whom it is predominate, do forſee any thing that may either advantage or diſadvantage their Rivals, as well as themſelves: and therefore Cyrus would not add unto his ſorrows, thoſe Joys which he ſhould find in the King of Aſſyria's eyes, if he ſhould come to underſtand his diſgrace. His reſpects alſo of Mandana, would not permit him to let it be known unto others, that ſhe was capable of ſo much injuſtice and weakneſs, and as all jealouſie does argue love, ſo his deſcretion would hide it in the Princeſs. After Ortalques was returned with him, who, thinking he had brought ſuch joyful news unto Cyrus, had filled him full of ſorrow: Cyrus called for Feraulas, who was not a little ſurpriſed to find ſo much ſadneſs in his eyes. Sir, (ſaid he unto him, after the ſame accuſtomed freedom which he ever uſed unto his illuſtrious Maſter) I did not think it poſſible a victorious Conqueror could be ſo melancholy upon the very field of Battel. Ah Feraulas, (ſaid Cyrus, and ſhewed him Mandana's Letter) Fortune is more ingenious to torment me than you imagine; ſee (ſaid he) Read the cruel words which my Princeſs hath written, which muſt needs poiſon all thoſe ſweets which uſe to follow Victory. This is it which makes me inſenſible of the glory in Vanquiſhing, which bitters all my joys, and ruins all my hopes. I muſt confeſs (ſaid Feraulas, after he had read the Letter) that I wonder how the Princeſs, who is ſo prudent, can think you unfaithful; But for all that, I know not why you ſhould ſo exceſſively grieve, for there is no queſtion in the World but it is an eaſie matter to deceive her. No, no, Feraulas (ſaid Cyrus) my miſery is not ſo inconſiderable as you think it: for ſince my Princeſs can ſo eaſily believe I love her not, and that I fight only out of ambitious ends; ſhe may as well do me more injury: perhaps ſhe may abſolutely take her heart from me, and give it to the King of Pontus, whom certainly ſhe would never have ſo conſtantly refuſed, but for love of me. You know her, you know how firm her reſolutions are: you ſee how ſhe would not let Mazares releaſe her, and you ſee alſo how ſhe treats me as ſhe did him, ſince ſhe would have me ſurrender up unto her father, thoſe Forces which are his; and tells me plainly ſhe had rather be in the power of a reſpective Raviſher, than be releaſed by a perfidious Prince: Fie, fie, Mandana (cryed he out) can any ſo unjuſt a thought harbour in your mind? can you believe it? is it poſſible you ſhonld ſet your hand unto it? Alas, alas, but ſince I ſee you have, I muſt needs think you will not ſee my innocency, but that you are become the moſt unjuſt, the moſt perfidious, and the moſt ungrateful Princeſs in the World. But, Sir, (ſaid Feraulas, and interrupted him) why may you not as well believe that as ſoon as you have taken Sardis, the prejudicated opinion of the Princeſs will ceaſe? For truly when ſhe ſhall ſee you proſtitute at her feet all thoſe Lawrels which Fortune and Victory hath Crowned you withall; and that you do no longer look upon Panthea or Araminta, ſhe muſt needs repent of her errour, and render you her affection, which doubtleſs ſhe never yet took from you, though ſhe have writ it; for if ſhe had, ſhe would never have writ unto you: However it be, ſaid Cyrus, my Princeſs thinks I love not her, but that I love ſome other; ſhe thinks that all I have done for her, the giving of ſo many battels, the many hazards of my life only for her liberty, were only conſequents of Ambition, not Love: though heavens know, all my affection of glory, all the ambition of my ſoul, had never ſet fire on all Aſia, had never overturned ſo many Provinces, nor Conquered ſo many Kingdoms, if my love of her had not been my only ſpur; yet ſhe thinks and ſhe writes that all was but a Cloak to cover my Ambitition, and never telling me whom it is ſhe accuſeth me to love, ſhe treats me as one whom ſhe loveth not; truth muſt be confeſſed, Feraulas, there is ſome odd fantaſtical fury in my Fate: may it not be ſaid, that Fortune which makes all in the world happy and miſerable, hath forſaken the care of the Univerſe to think upon me only? for by an unexpected cruelty ſhe moves my ſoul to paſs eternally from one extream to another, and that there is not a minute between an extream joy and an extream misfortune: ſhe ever makes the ſweet to precede the bitter, ſo that it plainly appears, ſhe gives me the firſt only to make me more ſenſible of the other: do you not ſee in what a time, on what a day, at what an hour, and in what a place ſhe will have me receive this cruel Letter from Mandana? had ſhe ſent it before the battel, perhaps Victory would now have ſweetned that bitter Wormwood which is in my heart. But on the contrary, I muſt receive it after I have overcome my Enemies, and my Rival: After I know all lower Aſia is reduced under my power: receive it when I was ready to take Sardis; in the field of battel, where I ſaw nothing about me but ſigns of my Victory: yet in the midſt of all theſe cauſes of joy, ſorrow muſt needs clog my ſoul and overcome it, inſomuch as I am moſt confident that the King of Pontus, who hath loſt the Victory, is not ſo ſad as I am: But he hath more cauſe than you, replied Feraulas: For truly, Sir, all your Arguments cannot perſwade me that the Princeſs can continue long in this belief. However, replied Cyrus, I muſt make haſte and go to Sardis, that I may either periſh under the Walls, or elſe come to throw my ſelf at Mandana's feet, and ask her with whom ſhe thinks me in love, and that I may proteſt unto her I love none but her ſelf. After this, and much other diſcourſe with Feraulas, he reſolved to ſend him who brought Mandana's Letter to him, with an anſwer unto that Princeſs: For the man ſeeming to be reſolute and bold, Cyrus thought it an eaſie matter for him to get into Sardis, as indeed he did: ſo Cyrus tranſported by the violence of his paſſion writ a Letter unto Mandana, but in ſuch haſte, as one may ſwear it was the dictate of his heart, and his hand following his thoughts, he writ theſe words.

Unhappy Cyrus unto unjuſt Mandana.

Madam,

IT muſt needs be that I love you better than ever any did, ſince notwithſtanding your injuſtice in calling me perfidious, I love you no leſs than I did before. On the contrary, my paſſion is ſo violent, and your unjuſt accuſation makes me ſo ſenſible of it, that if you did but know the reſentments of my ſoul, you would confeſs your ſelf to be the moſt cruel and unjuſt Woman in the World. If fortune in War continue her ſmiles upon me, and that I find no greater difficulty in taking Sardis, than in winning that Battel which Crœſſus and the King of Pontus loſt; you ſhall ere long (Madam) ſee me at your feet; and as you were my firſt paſſion, ſo you ſhall be my laſt. In the interim, I beſeech you remember that you permitted me to affect glory; and that's the reaſon, I did not think it handſome to be rigorous after conqueſt; but that it was permitted me to be civil towards two great but unfortunate Princeſſes, and to to compaſſionate their miſeries. This is all I have done (to too unjuſt Mandana) unto the two only Ladies I have ſeen ſince the War began; and to the only perſons I think you can ſuſpect me to be in love with. But how was it poſſible (Madam) you ſhould do ſo? How comes it to paſs you know your ſelf, and me no better? However I beſeech you, diſpence with me from ſurrendring my power unto the King your Father, until I have ſet you at liberty, and when that is done (Madam) and when I have conquered all my Rivals, I ſhall ſurrender the Army which I command unto the King of Medes, and leave you all the Crowns I have conquered, that you may wear them upon your head, and then (as I have already ſaid) I will come and proſtrate my ſelf at your feet, and either die with ſorrow and love, or elſe perſwade you that I was never unfaithful, and that never any ſince the world began did love one more, than you are by

Cyrus.

This Letter being written, Cyrus read it over more than once, imagining that his repetitions of it, would perſwade Mandana of his innocency, and after he had ſealed it, Feraulas was to give it unto the man who was to deliver it: yet upon ſecond thoughts, Cyrus would needs deliver it with his own hand; and it may truly be ſaid, that never bringer of ill news was better recompenced. After this he was forced againſt his will to take ſome hours of reſt: and the wearineſs of the day precedent, and his ſorrows, were ſomething charmed by ſleep; 'tis true his ſleep was but an interrupted ſlumber, and far from ſoft ſecurity: for ſince his Imagination was ſwell'd with nothing but tumultuous things, his ſleep and dreams could not be pleaſant. But to ſee the force of his love and tenderneſs of his affections; in lieu of dreaming upon combats and noiſe, he dreams only of Mandana and Abradates: he was full of various dreams, though all were ſad ones: ſometimes he ſaw Mandana without Abradates, but he never ſaw Abradates without Mandana: this Princeſs was moſt deeply imprinted in his Fancy, as well as in his heart, though that part of the ſoul is accuſtomed to be light and extravagant, and will ordinarily repreſent ſeveral kinds of objects, eſpecially in ſleep. 'Tis true, the ſleep of Cyrus was not deep, nor laſted long: aſſoon as he was awake, a council of war was held in his Tent, where the King of Aſſyria, Muſſanes, and all thoſe that uſed to be there, were preſent; where it was reſolved, that without giving any time unto the enemy, to recollect himſelf, or to the King of Pontus to carry Mandana out of Sardis, they ſhould the ſame hour go and beleaguer the Town: ſo that without more delay, they conſidered the ſcituation of it, and what quarters were moſt convenient to be poſſeſſed: Cyrus then aſſigned the quarters unto all his Army, which was to march that very hour: but he himſelf ſtayed until the next day, becauſe he intended a viſit unto Panthea, to condole the death of Abradates with her, and to comfort her: but news was brought that his Corps could not be found upon the place where he fought, by reaſon of the abundance of men ſlain, which lay dead upon the ground; Cyrus commanded ſearch ſhould be made the ſecond time, and ſent for all the Captains that fought under Abradates and were alive, to aſſure them that he would recompence the admirable ſervice both of their Maſter and them: Then after he had taken all requiſite order for the Siege of Sardis, and for the interment of the dead, he took horſe to viſit Panthea: all orders for the beleaguering of the Town were eaſily executed; for as Cyrus foreſaw it would come to that paſs, he brought all manner of Engines with him, which were requiſite for the taking of that Town: But before he went to the Place where Panthea was, he ſtept into the Tent into which the Egyptian Prince was carryed, who was ſo loved by his ſouldiers; The chief of thoſe Egyptians who never did nor would forſake him, told Cyrus, that the Chyrurgeons, after ſearch of his wounds, did not deſpair of Life, but yet would not undertake for him; and though the Phyſitians did forbid any to ſpeak with him, yet they would permit their Illuſtrious Conqueror to enter, but he refuſed, knowing it might prejudice their wounded Maſter: ſo commanding that all poſſible care ſhould be had of him, and aſſuring thoſe Egyptians that they might expect any thing from his aſſiſtance, he departed. But as Cyrus was as ſad after Victory as if he had been conquered: ſo Crœſſus and the King of Pontus were in a moſt deplorable condition; the firſt of theſe in flying away after the loſs of the Battel, did foreſee the loſs of his Kingdom: and though the Delphique Oracle aſſured him, that if he undertook War with Cyrus, he ſhould ruine a great Empire, he was afraid he meant his own, and that he underſtood the Oracle ſince he ſaw himſelf ſo near ruin: on the other part, the King of Pontus conſidering he was the cauſe of his ruin who had protected him, imagined that he ſhould now loſe Mandana as he had loſt his Kingdoms; ſo that theſe two Princes retired in ſilence, and mourned in ſecret for their lamentable condition, not being able to complain either againſt Fortune, or one another, or of themſelves, ſince they knew themſelves to be the cauſes of their miſeries: Terror had ſtruck ſo deep into the hearts of all their remainder of troops, that thoſe which followed them did continually imagine themſelves to be followed and aſſaulted, ſo that by degrees they disbanded themſelves, and in little troops took ſeveral ways: And Crœſſus and the King of Pontus ſaw themſelves ſo ſlenderly accompanied, that they could eaſily count all that followed them: ſo that conſidering how in the morning they were in the head of 200000 Men, and that before night they ſaw themſelves without one ſervant, ſorrow and deſpair did ſo ſeiſe upon their ſad ſouls, that not knowing what they did, and coming unto a place where there were ſeveral ways, they parted from each other without any intention ſo to do, and there was ſo very few men with them, that it may well be ſaid they were alone. Which way ſoever Crœſſus turned his eyes at the beginning of his flight, he ſaw nothing but dead and dying men, and men that fled: Preſently after he ſaw none but a few afrighted perſons, who ſaved themſelves in the Town with their Baggage: At laſt leaving the high way, and croſſing the Country to get unto Sardis unſeen in ſuch a deſpicable condition, he came unto a little ſolitary vally: So that coming out of a terrible tumultuous world, into a place where all was ſilent, but only a little murmuring Rivolet, volet, where birds were ſinging, he ſighed, and, as if a place of ſilence were a place of ſafety, he marched ſoftly: But as he turned his head to ſee who followed, he found himſelf alone, for of thoſe four or five which did follow him when the King of Pontus ſtrayed from him, one of them had his horſe wounded, and could not follow; another himſelf wounded, and ſtayed behind; and all, having ſome impediment or other upon them, left their unfortunate Prince, who ſeeing himſelf alone in this ſolitary Valley, then knew, that all his beloved treaſures were but uſeleſs vanities,and that wiſe Solon had good reaſon to deſpiſe them. Whilſt he was there in his ſad contemplations ſtill going forward, he heard the ſound of a pleaſing Pipe, and turning himſelf that way, he ſaw that he who played upon that Ruſtick Inſtrument, was a young ſilly Shepherd about fourteen or fifteen years of age; who without any fear of publique miſery, or knowledge of any Battel that had been fought, play'd upon his Pipe, and kept a little flock as innocent as himſelf: Crœſſus, then ſtanding ſtill and conſidering this young Shepherd, who was very fair, ſighed with more Bitterneſs than his country muſique was ſweet, and caſting up his eyes unto Heaven, he envied the happineſs of this ſilly Boy; and though he was a King, yet wiſhed with all his heart he could change his Scepter into this Shepherds hook. But ſince he could not be dictator to his deſtiny, nor alter the immutable decree of that ſoveraign power which rules the world, he continued his March, and came at laſt to Sardis, where he was received by all the people with tears of tenderneſs and ſorrow. The King of Pontus, who wandred another way, came not till an hour after him: ſo did likewiſe the Prince Myrſiles and the Prince of Myſſia, who had taken another way. All the Princes did what they could to keep up the hearts of the People: but every minute wounded men came in, who told the people of the death of ſome friend or other, ſo that it was a hard matter, to gull thoſe men who ſaw their King return ſingle after he went out in the head of the greateſt Army in the world. Moreover theſe Princes underſtood that the Thracians, in lieu of coming to Sardis, after they were rallied, faced about into their own countrey: and that the Ionian Troops did the like; the Myſſians alſo followed their example, and retired: ſo that in all appearance they could never recruit into a body again, and that their only courſe was to keep the Town, till they could make new levies for their relief. Thus the people being too well informed of the lamentable ſtate of things, did murmur highly, and ſaid very boldly, that the Prince Artamas muſt be releaſed, that there was no other way to prevent the danger which hung over their heads, and that it was a ſhame for the Lydians to let ſo innocent a Prince be in priſon, who had formerly eſtabliſhed their Empire by ſo many brought-home Victories, and who only was able to check the Power of Cyrus. This murmur of the people ſeemed ſo full of juſtice and reaſon, that it became the general opinion of all in a ſhort time, and nothing could be heard of in all places, but that Artamas was innocent, Artamas was a gallant man, Artamas knew what belonged to war, he was a great captain, and a fortunate conqueror; ſo that pure reſpect only which they bore unto their Soveraign, kept them from releaſing this Prince. But Crœſſus thought theſe reſpects (conſidering the urgent neceſſity of things) too weak an obſtacle to prevent it; ſo that he told them, he would releaſe him, and in order to that, he propounded unto Prince Artamas to ſet him at liberty, upon condition he would defend the walls of Sardis againſt Cyrus. But ſince this Prince could not accept of this condition, unleſs he ſhould fight againſt the King of Phrygia his Father, therefore as well as he loved the Princeſs Palmis, and as great a deſire as he had to prevent the ruine of Crœſſus, he refuſed it; yet with ſo many ſigns of ſorrow and evident teſtimonies of reſpect, as made it apparent he grieved that Crœſſus ſhould have ſuch enemies, againſt whom neither honour nor nature would permit him to fight. However this unfortunate King was much incenſed at the denial of Prince Artamas, and doubling his guards, he divulged amongſt the people all that he could poſſibly deviſe, to allay their zeal of releaſing him. But the giddy incenſed people who are light and capable of any impreſſions, ſtill continued their devices of this Princes liberty, making eternal Elogies of his Valour and Magnanimity, and railing againſt Crœſſus, threatning every hour to releaſe this renowned Priſoner, before they would ſleep: yet they did not attempt it. In the mean time the King of Pontus took ſuch order in the Citadel, that the Princeſs Mandana and the Princeſs Palmis knew not that the Battel was loſt, until Sardis was beſieged: as for the Princeſs Mandana her ſoul was ſo full of ſorrow that Cyrus ſhould prove perfideous, that thoſe thoughts took up all her mind, and ſhe enquired of nothing; therefore it was eaſie to hide it from her. But whilſt ſhe thought upon nothing but the ſuſpected inconſtancy of the moſt conſtant Prince in the World: And whilſt the Princeſs Palmis thought upon nothing but the deplorable condition of the King her Father, and the Prince Artamas, and whilſt all the cares of Crœſſus was to ſecure the walls of Sardis, and whilſt the King of Pontus looked for nothing but death in defending the Citadel, and whilſt the Prince Myrſileſſe, the Prince of Myſſia, Pactias, and all other Commanders, were buſie in fortifying the Town, and whilſt the tumultuous diſcontented people diſapproved of all that the Princes did, not knowing whether it was right or wrong, Cyrus, though a Conqueror, yet went in extream ſorrow to viſit Panthea: But in his going thither, he had ſome repugnancy againſt it; for ſince he knew it was either ſhe or Araminta with whom Mandana thought him in love, he feared leſt this viſit ſhould hurt him, and leſt Fame (which carries the leaſt actions of Princes over all the World) ſhould let Mandana know it. But for all that, Abradates dying in his ſervice, nothing could hinder him; ſince his ſoul was full of ſorrows, he would go not only with a ſmall company, but alſo a dark way, by the River Halis, until he came at the Caſtle where the Queen of Suſiana lodged; yet he needed not to go ſo far to ſeek her, for aſſoon as news was brought unto that Princeſs how the Battel was fought, not telling her Abradates was kill'd, ſhe took Coach immediately, without acquainting the Princeſs Araminta or Doraliſa, ſo that taking none with her but Pherenice, two other women, and a few ſervants, ſhe went unto the place of fight by the ſame way which Cyrus took to come unto her; and though Pherenice did all ſhe could to diſſwade her from this voyage, yet needs would ſhe go, telling her, that if Abradates were living, ſhe could not go to ſoon to rejoyce with him; if he were wounded, ſhe could not go too ſoon neither to help him; and that if he were dead, ſhe could not make too much haſte to follow him unto his Grave: ſo that her Coach going as faſt as her Horſes could draw it, and going alſo all the Night, ſhe came unto the place where Cyrus, who was coming to her, diſcovered her Coach, yet not knowing it to be hers: but that which took up his eyes moſt, was to ſee her ſtop, and ſtay by another, near the River, where many men were doing ſomething which he could not diſcern; his curioſity was much higher, when he ſaw women come out of the Coach which ſtopped in much haſte, one of which ſat down upon the earth, but he could not diſcern what ſhe did. Cyrus ſeeing all this, without any extraordinary apprehenſion, went on ſtill towards them. But he was extreamly ſurpriſed, when coming nearer, one of thoſe men whom he ſent to ſeek the Corps of Abradates told him, that his companions and himſelf had found it, and brought it to the River ſide, with intentions to carry it in the next Boat that paſſed by unto the place where Panthea was: but no Boat paſſing by, and an empty Coach coming that way, they altered their intentions, ſo that as they were ready to put the Body of Abradates into it, Panthea came unto them, who no ſooner knew the Body of her Husband, but that ſhe came haſtily out of her Coach, and ſat down by it upon the ground, making ſuch lamentable cries, and ſhowering out ſuch floods of Tears, as never was more ſad an object. Cyrus making haſte unto her, and lighting from his Horſe a little diſtance from this deplorable Princeſs, he ſaw her ſit by the Corps of Abradates, from whom they had not taken his Rich ſuit of Arms which Panthea gave him; for the enemy being vanquiſhed, they had no time to think of Plunder, or ſtripping the dead, and Cyrus purſued ſo far, that his men were buſied another way. 'Tis true theſe ſtately Arms had loſt much of their luſtre, by reaſon of the abundance of blood which dimm'd the Diamonds, and turned them to fatal Rubies; but as for him, he was ſo little changed, that he only looked a little pale: Panthea, who held his head in her lap, upon whom ſhe fixed her eyes, and bedewed with abundance of Tears, which ſhe continually wiped off, that ſhe might look upon her dear Abradates; her Tears were accompanyed with ſighs ſo ſad and loud, which came from the depths of her heart, and from the ſaddeſt heart that ever was, ſo that they could not chuſe but fill all ſpectators full of ſorrow and compaſſion. This Princeſs was ſo ſadly taken up with this ſo fatal object, that ſhe ſaw not Cyrus when he came unto her: and certainly ſhe had not known he was there, if the Prince extreamly moved at the ſight of dead Abradates, and to ſee Panthea in ſuch a pitiful condition, had not kneeled down upon the ground to comfort her, and by his loud language moved her to turn towards him. I would it were the will of the Gods, Madam (ſaid Cyrus unto her, with ſuch a ſadneſs upon his face as ſufficiently teſtified the ſorrows of his ſoul) that I could revive the Illuſtrious Abradates with the loſs of my life; and that the loſs of my blood could ſtop your tears. You ſee, Madam, how much the loſs of Abradates troubles me, and how your ſorrows grieve me. At firſt Panthea could anſwer Cyrus no way but by profound ſighs and ſobs, which would not give her leave to ſpeak. But as this Princeſs had a ſoul as great as ſenſible, ſhe recollected her ſelf. Sir (ſaid ſhe unto him, with a doleful lifting up of her eyes, and with her right hand pointing at her dear Abradates) ſince I have received this fatal loſs, you never need to think of ſtopping up my tears, ſince it is the office of death to do it, and which ere long moſt certainly ſhall. May you quietly enjoy that Victory which you have got, and remember ſometimes, that my dear unfortunate Abradates was perhaps the Victim which rendred the Gods propitious unto you. But, Sir, whilſt my ſorrows are ſobbing over Abradates, I forget my obedience unto his laſt commands. In ſaying ſo, ſhe pulled out a paper ſealed, and gave it unto Cyrus. Sir (ſaid ſhe unto him) the day before the departure of my deareſt Abradates from me, he gave me this, which I preſent unto you, with orders ſo to do if he dyed in your ſervice. You ſee he's dead, Sir, (ſaid ſhe, and ſhowred tears afreſh) and therefore you may ſee there what he deſir'd you ſhould know. Cyrus did what he could to get Panthea into her Coach, and to let them lay the Corps of Illuſtrious Abradates in the other, deſiring to defer the reading of the Letter which ſhe gave him, until ſo ſad an object as dead Abradates was removed; but ſhe would not by any means; ſo that this Prince not daring to contend too much with her in the firſt apprehenſions of her ſorrow, did as ſhe would have him, and began to ſee what Abradates had writ with his own hands. As ſoon as he opened it, he ſaw theſe enſuing words written in a greater Character than the reſt of the lines.

The Laſt Will of Abradates.

I Leave my heart and entire affections unto my deareſt Panthea, and my Kingdom unto the Illuſtrious Cyrus; upon no other condition, but that he ſhall protect this Princeſs who wore the Crown, and comfort her after my death: Conceiving that all my Subjects will be as obedient unto this Prince as unto my ſelf; and knowing that I cannot do an act more glorious for my ſelf, than to make choice of ſuch a Succeſſor, nor more profitable for them, than by giving them ſuch a Soveraign; nor more advantagious for the Queen my deareſt Wife, than in procuring her ſo generous a Protector.

ABRADATES.

After Cyrus had read what the King of Suſiana had writ, he was aſtoniſhed at the generoſity of this Prince, ſo much, that his ſorrow began afreſh; and ſince his great ſoul could never yield unto any in point of Generoſity, I muſt needs declare unto you, Madam, (ſaid he unto Panthea) that I except only of this laſt Qualification which the ever renowned Abradates hath conferred upon me, conceiving that he would never have conſtituted me King of Suſiana, but becauſe the Laws of his Country would not permit him to make you Queen. But I accept of the title of your Protector, with hopes of meriting it by my ſervices, and protecting you againſt all the world. I do declare, and promiſe you, never to make uſe of this Authority which Abradates hath given me in his Dominions unto any other end, but only to ſettle the Crown upon your head. Your expreſſions (replyed Panthea) are worthy of your ſelf, and worthy of Abradates his friend. But, Sir, I need no more than a Tomb large enough to hold Abradates and my ſelf: Therefore I beſeech and conjure you to leave me by my ſelf a while with this dear illuſtrious Corps, which I am fully reſolved never to forſake. I know, Madam (ſaid Cyrus unto her) that your ſorrows are but juſt, and that they may be extream without ever accuſing you of any weakneſs. But, Madam, it is requiſite that you ſhould preſerve the memory of Abradates; and in order to that, it is requiſite you ſhould live. Therefore I moſt humbly, and earneſtly beſeech you, let us go and prepare a Tomb worthy of his Valour and Quality; and give me leave to ſeparate you from him, whom death too cruelly before me hath ſeparated you. I conjure you unto it (ſaid Cyrus, and taking one of the hands of this Illuſtrious Corps) by the moſt valiant Prince that ever lived, and by the only man of all the world whom you loved. But, alas, Cyrus was extreamly ſurpriſed to ſee this hand which was quite cut off from the arm of Abradates with a ſword, remaining in his own, and ſeparated from the body of his Illuſtrious friend; his ſpeech failed him, tears dropt from his eyes; and Panthea redoubling hers, took his valiant hand out of the hand of Cyrus; and after ſhe had kiſſed it with abundance of tenderneſs, and reſpect, ſhe laid it in its place, as if ſhe deſired to faſten it unto his arm again, waſhing it with as many tears as quite took away all the blood wherewith it was ſprinkled in ſeveral places: It is my ſelf, ſaid ſhe, it is I who am the cauſe of Abradates, my dear Abradates his death; for I had not confidence enough in his own accuſtomed valour, to pay that debt which I owed unto you, Sir: I ſpoke a hundred things which moved him to ſurpaſs himſelf; and I am moſt confident, that his love of me cauſed him to precipitate himſelf into the midſt of dangers: Is it poſſible I ſhould look upon him and live? Can I ſuffer any ſhould ſpeak unto me of any ſuch thing as conſolation? Madam (ſaid Cyrus unto her) ſince your miſeries cannot be remedied, you ought to endure them patiently. Abradates dyed full of glory; his memory will paſs to Poſterity with honour; but to make it more Illuſtrious, it is your part, Madam, to make the conſtancy of your ſoul equal his courage; and it is my part alſo to make the friendſhip betwixt me and him, and the reſpects I have of you, conduce unto his glory, and your tranquility. I beſeech you, Madam, tell me whither it is your pleaſure I ſhould conduct you; and leave it unto my care, to provide for the Funerals of this Illuſtrious Corps. Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him, with a little more ſerenity in her looks) I beſeech you let me have the ſight of this dear Corps only one quarter of an hour, and let me have the liberty to lament in ſilence and privacy when none ſhall be with me. Cyrus, unwilling to contradict her too much, roſe up, and taking Pherenice apart as well as Beleſis, and Hermogenes who followed him, he began to deſire her ſhe would help him to perſwade Panthea, that they might take away this doleful Object from before her eyes: But Pherenice and Hermogenes were ſo ſadded with ſorrows, that they could not ſpeak: and as for Beleſis, he durſt not think that his eloquence could prevail where all the Rhetorique of Cyrus could not. None of the other men which waited upon this Prince were ſo near as to ſpeak unto this miſerable Queen; ſo then ſeeing he was the only man who muſt deal with her, ſince Pherenice could not by reaſon of her extream grief, and abundance of tears, he began to chide Panthea: But Pherenice, who by long experience knew ſhe could not endure to be croſt in her firſt apprehenſions of ſorrow, reſtrained him, and deſired him to give her a minutes patience. Stay, Sir, ſaid ſhe, I beſeech you, ſtay: I will if I can ſtop the current of my tears, and caſt my ſelf at the Queens feet, and endeavour to get her from Abradates. But whilſt Cyrus, Pherenice, Hermogenes, and Beleſis were deviſing how they might ſeparate Panthea from dead Abradates, this deplorable Princeſs was deviſing in her mind what courſe ſhe ſhould take never to be parted from him. And ſince Fate favoured her diſmal deſign to dye, ſhe eſpied a Dagger which her dear Abradates had about him, which he uſed not in Battel; ſo that conceiving her ſelf to be the cauſe of her husbands death, not only in what ſhe had ſaid unto him at parting, but alſo becauſe ſhe did firſt engage him on Cyrus his Quarrel, ſhe thought the Gods did ſuffer Abradates to have this Dagger, that ſhe might by it both puniſh her ſelf, and free her ſelf from all her miſeries. Since ſhe had loſt all ſhe loved, nothing could pleaſe her; ſhe could not conceive ſhe ought ever to comfort her ſelf;and ſhe thought it a ſhame to live ſince Abradates was dead. So that her exceſſive ſorrow made her think death to be the greateſt good that ever could befal her. She no ſooner eſpyed this Dagger, but taking it unſeen by any of the company, becauſe every one diverted their eyes from that lamentable object, ſhe ſtruck it into her body, and drawing it out again to give her ſelf a ſecond blow, ſhe had not ſtrength enough; ſhe leaned upon the body of her deareſt Abradates, the blood which poured out of her wound, guſhed upon the arm of this Illuſtrious dead Corps. Though thoſe who were near Panthea never perceived this act; yet one that was a ſervant unto this Princeſs, and who was farther off, did ſee her take this Dagger, and crying out aloud, and running towards her, his voice made Cyrus, and all the reſt turn their heads towards him, and not towards Panthea; ſo that this was partly a cauſe that none but this Servant ſaw the act, and by conſequence why they could not prevent it. But ſince the loud cries of this Servant doubled, who ſtill cryed out, and never told why, Cyrus began to ſuſpect ſomething; he went towards him, and coming near Panthea, he found her at the laſt gaſp; yet ſhe opened her fair eyes, turning them towards Abradates, and afterwards up to Heaven, where they fixed without any further ſign of life. Cyrus was ſo amazed at this ſad accident; ſo grieved for the death of two ſuch Illuſtrious perſons, and ſo aſtoniſhed at the great heart of Panthea, that he was not able to expreſs either his wonder or his ſorrows. On the other ſide, Pherenice, and the reſt of the women were ſo full of pityful lamentations, as would have melted hearts of Marble. And the amaze was ſo generally amongſt them all that were preſent ſpectators of this bleeding ſpectacle, that none of them were able to comfort another: And to compleat this Tragical adventure, three of the Queens ſervants killed themſelves within ten paces from the Queen: And Araſpes, ignorant of this accident, came by, by chance, and ſaw the dead Queen, whoſe Beauty ſurmounted his Virtue, and overcame the inſenſibility of his heart; Araſpes being of a violent haſty compoſition, and ſtill in love, though he was full of reſpects unto Cyrus, yet his Paſſion was above his Reaſon, and the greatneſs of his Love did appear in the greatneſs of his Deſpair, that he deſerved ſome excuſe for no better concealing it. His eyes were full of fury, he knew not whom he ſpoke unto, and asked all one after another, what brought Panthea unto this condition? he could not believe ſhe was dead by her own hand, and reſolved to revenge her death as ſoon as ever he ſhould know the cauſe. But when at laſt he believed what was told him, he turned his fury againſt himſelf, and had he not been prevented, would have faln upon his ſword: Afterwards he would have thrown himſelf into the River, if Cyrus had not commanded two of his friends to have an eye over him, and not to forſake him; otherwiſe he had infallibly followed Panthea to the grave. In the mean time, ſeeing no remedy for this ſad accident, he cauſed the bodies of Abradates and Panthea to be put in one Coach, and the women of the Princeſs in the other; himſelf following on horſeback with his men, towards the Caſtle where the Princeſs Araminta was. Cyrus alſo cauſed the bodies of thoſe ſervants which killed themſelves, to be brought, to the end they might be buried cloſe by the Tombs of their Princes. He ſent Feraulas to order all things neceſſary for the Funerals of theſe two Illuſtrious perſons, which he deſired ſhould be as magnificent as poſſible. In the mean while the Princeſs Araminta, who with extream impatience expected the Queen of Suſiana's return, was in the window of her chamber with Cleonice, Doraliſa, and the reſt of the Ladies, which were Priſoners, when theſe two Coaches arrived, and were followed by Cyrus: So that ſhe was infinitely ſurprized to ſee one of the faireſt Princeſſes in the world, and one of the moſt valiant Heroes upon earth in ſuch a lamentable condition. Cyrus commanded their bodies to be laid in a great Hall under a Canopy of State, covering them with a Counterpane of black Velvet: He alſo commanded abundance of Cryſtial Lamps to be placed in the Hall, and there theſe two Illuſtrious Corps to remain until the Ceremonies of Funeral were ready. In the mean while Cyrus went to the Princeſs Araminta to condole with her, rather than to comfort her; but what conſolation ſoever he found in her company, he made no long viſit there. Yet he aſſured her that the King her Brother was neither dead, nor wounded, as he underſtood by ſome Priſoners which were taken. After which he left her, ſaying, he would wait upon her the next day; for he was reſolved to honour the Funerals of Abradates and Panthea with his preſence. After this, Cyrus viſited Cleonice and Doraliſa in their Chambers, whither they were retired; bringing Cleonice unto them, and comforting them with extraordinary civility. He aſſured them he would have as great a care of them as ever Panthea had; nor would he forget the very meaneſt of her Vaſſals. But to teſtifie how much he honoured the dead, he commanded Chriſantes to provide Architectors for the erecting of a ſtately Tomb of Marble and Porphyrie in the ſame place where Panthea dyed. The next day following, an Egyptian Sacrificer embalmed their bodies after the Cuſtom of the Country, which was to keep them incorruptible: After which they were laid in a Temple cloſe by, until their Tombs were built, whereon Cyrus cauſed their Epitaph to be written in many Languages; ſetting forth to all that read them, the Valour of Abradates, the beauty and virtue of Panthea, their dear affections to one another, their lives and deaths, and the fidelity of their Servants. After Cyrus had rendred the honours due unto Abradates and Panthea, he reſolved to ſee the Princeſs Araminta once more before he went whither his honour, or to ſay better, his Love called him. But in ſeeing her, he conceived, that ſince ſhe had ſo much confidence in his diſcretion, as to acquaint him how Spitridates was jealous of her and him, ſo he conceived it expedient to acquaint her, how Mandana was jealous of him and her; but his principal motive of all was, becauſe he had a deſign to take all manner of colour from Mandana, to be jealous of him; and in order to that, he beſeeched this Princeſs not to think it ſtrange if he viſited her no more until he had delivered the Princeſs of Medea from her impriſonment, and had juſtified himſelf: But the beſt of the ſtory was, that at the very ſame time he ntended to acquaint Araminta, ſhe intended to inreat him that he would ſee her ſeldomer, leſt thoſe who perſwaded Spitridates of what was ſo far from ruth, ſhould thereby have ſome ground whereupon to uild their ſuppoſitions, ſo that Cyrus needed not to fear is requeſt would be offenſive to her. Afterwards ſhe onjured him, that as long as the Siege laſted, he would ot ſuffer the Prince Phraartes to viſit her. But wonder was, that theſe two prudent perſons, who had ſuch great eaſon not to be long together, yet this time held a vey long conference; for after they had diſcourſed of heir misfortunes, and after ſhe had put him in memoy of all his promiſes concerning the King her Brother, hey began to talk of Abradates and Panthea. Cyus intreated her ſhe would be pleaſed to take care of herenice and Doraliſa until they had reſolved upon ſome ourſe, and that ſhe would be pleaſed to let Cleoniſa and her friends ſtay with her till the Siege was ended; after which he left her, and went in all haſte to lay cloſe Siege unto Sardis. But in his way, he called at the Tent of the Egyptian Prince, whom he found in a condition to be ſeen, and to be carried unto the ſame Caſtle where th Princeſs Araminta was, whither Cyrus cauſed him t be conducted, and where he lay in the Chamber o the unfortunate Panthea: the enterview of theſe tw Princes began ſuch a friendſhip, as ended not but wit their lives:for from this very firſt day they found in eac other all the qualities that could be wiſhed for in friend When Cyrus firſt entred into the Tent of this Illuſtrious wounded Prince, who was called Seſoſtris, th Grandure which appeared in his Aſpect ſurpriſe him, for though he then ſeemed to be of a very handſome compoſure the firſt time he ſaw him, yet ſince h ſaw him not but when he lay in a ſwoon, he found very advantageous alteration in him. But as Cyrus wa very pleaſingly ſurpriſed at the ſight of Seſoſtris, ſo Seſoſtris was infinitely ſurpriſed at the ſight of Cyrus, who produced his cuſtomary effect in the hearts o all that look upon him, which is, to move reſpect and admiration. Since Seſoſtris did owe his life unto Cyrus, and was infinitely obliged unto him, for his ſo generous uſage of his men, he returned him a complement of gratitude. Sir (ſaid he in the Grecian Language, knowing that Cyrus ſpoke it admirably well, but was not ſo well verſed in the Egyptian Tongue) I am very glad that fortune, which in divers other occaſions hath been ſuch an Enemy unto me, hath been favourable to me in this, and hath brought me to take that ſide, which is both more juſt and more fortunate, than that wherein ~~I was~~. But, Sir, the principal reaſon why I think my ſelf ſo obliged unto Fortune, is, becauſe by her I enjoy the honour of ſeeing you, as I moſt earneſtly deſired. I think my ſelf extreamly honoured (replied Cyrus modeſtly) that a Prince ſo highly honoured for his vertue by his Souldiers as you are, ſhould have any inclination to love me; for it is to be believed, that ſo many Valiant men would not reverence you ſo much as they do, unleſs you were more valiant than they are. But, Sir, I do admire, I ſhould never till now hear tell that there was a Prince in Egypt, which carried the name of Seſoſtris;and knowing all the Acts of the great Seſoſtris, who heretofore was ſo highly Victorious in Aſia, and Arabia, I ſhould be ignorant who this Seſoſtris is whom now I ſee ſo Illuſtrious. Sir, (replied this wounded Prince) when I ſhall have rendered my ſelf worthy your eſteem by ſome conſiderable action, I ſhall then tell you who I am, and until then, I cannot think my ſelf in a condition able to let you know the diſaſters of my ſelf and Family. Cyrus, perceiving that much ſpeaking might prejudice the health of this Prince, would not preſs him any further, but parted from him infinitely well pleaſed and ſatisfied. One of the principal Egyptian Commanders who was with Seſoſtris, waiting upon Cyrus to his Horſe, told him that Seſoſtris was one of a moſt prodigious ſpirit and Valour, and aſſured him, that when he ſhall be acquainted with his quality truly, he will find his merits ſurpaſs the moſt Illuſtrious that are in the world. After which Cyrus leaving him, went in all haſte unto the Camp: as ſoon as he came there, the Kings of Aſſyria, Phrygia, Hircania, Mazares, Anaxaris, and all the reſt, rendred him an account how all things ſtood, yet he did not altogether truſt unto them, but went himſelf to view all the Quarters, and to ſpie out the ſtrong and the weak places. But upon exact view and conſideration, he was very ſorry to find them much more ſtrong than they were reported unto him; yet what difficulty ſoever there was in taking it by force, he was reſolved not to make a long war of it, nor to make a regular Siege of it, by raiſing Forts, and caſting Lines about it, and he choſe rather to loſe ſome men, than to be a long time thought unconſtant unto Mandana; yet he thought it expedient not to preſs too hard upon Sardis, until he made ſure one ſide of the Town, at which he feared the King of Pontus might carry away the Princeſs. In the mean time, as he would never neglect any thing which was becoming him, ſo he ſent unto the Prince of Claſomena, whom he acquainted by Letter with the deaths of Abradates and Panthea, he ſent alſo unto Ciaxaris, to let him know of his Victory, and to tell him that he had no need of thoſe Forces which he offered him, he ſent alſo unto Perſepolis to the King his Father, and the Queen his Mother; he deſired alſo that Alcenor would go into Suſa, accompanyed with Artabaſes and Aduſius, and that they ſhould carry with them the laſt Will of Abradates, the better to move the people to put it in execution; his device was alſo to ſend Hermogenes: but this generous friend knowing that Cyrus would ſend Beleſis alſo, he deſired a diſpenſation, not daring to truſt himſelf, but feared he was never able to ſee Cleodora come out of the Temple of Ceres, without ſome reſentments of ſorrow, if ſo it chanced that Beleſis ſhould perſwade her to come out, ſo that there was only Abradates, Aduſius, Beleſis, Alcenor, and ſome other Suſanians who were in commiſſion to go into Suſa: They did not take their leaves of Cyrus without expreſſions of much ſorrow to leave him at ſuch a time, when they might be ſerviceable unto him. Cyrus to teſtifie his acknowledgment of Beleſis his zeal towards him, wrote unto Cleodora, to aſſure her of her adorer's fidelity. Mazares alſo did the ſame, and that Beleſis might not be neceſſitated to tell Cleodora himſelf what a miſerable diſcontented life he lived, this Prince ſent Orſanus with him. The parting between Mazares and Beleſis was exceedingly ſad; as well as that between Beleſis and Hermogenes, who had ſo much power over himſelf, as to let his friend ſee he was well ſatisfied and contented. Cyrus appointed Alcenor and Beleſis to go and bid adieu unto Doraliſa and Pherenice, who might perhaps employ them in ſome buſineſs. When Cyrus had given ſatisfaction unto all others, he thought upon nothing but how to ſatisfie himſelf in releaſing Mandana. The King of Aſſyria and Mazares were much in Admiration, to obſerve he was more diſquieted after the Victory, than he was before; yet they could not dive into the reaſon, but did in vain ſeek for it: however, the melancholy of Cyrus beginning to leſſen, by reaſon of his hopes ere long to juſtifie himſelf; their curioſity did leſſen accordingly, and both they and he thought upon nothing but the taking of Sardis; yet had they very different thoughts, for Cyrus hoped that by the taking of this Town he ſhould juſtifie himſelf in the opinion of Mandana; and aſſoon as he had vanquiſhed the King of Aſſyria, to enjoy her. But as for this King, the taking of Sardis, and the vanquiſhing of Cyrus would not ſuffice to make him happy; for when all this was done, he had the obduracy of Mandana, to vanquiſh, which in all probability he could never hope for, unleſs in the promiſe of the Oracle; as for Mazares he was in a more miſerable condition than they both; for which way ſoever ſquares went, he could never find any favourable hopes; he did his beſt to baniſh that hope out of his heart, by baniſhing that love which firſt planted it there, ſo that at the ſame time when he fought againſt the Lydians, he fought againſt himſelf: and there paſſed not a day away, wherein love and virtue did not contend which ſhould have the dominion of his ſoul. In the mean while Cyrus was extreamly vigilant, he went perpetually from quarter to quarter, and longed with exceeding impatiency to ſee things in ſuch a ſtate, as they might make an aſſault upon the Town, though all the Walls were manned with ſuch a multitude of ſouldiers, that the very thought of placing Ladders, was enough to ſtagger the ſtouteſt reſolution. 'Tis true, that thoſe which were in the Town upon their ramparts, ſeeing this great victorious Army environ it, were not terryfied with the ſpectacle, as not doubting their ruine, thought upon nothing but how to ſell their lives at as dear a rate as they could; yet the ſight of this apparent danger did not produce the ſame effect in the hearts of all the inhabitants, for the Town was ſo divided among theſelves, that Crœſſus ſtood in as great fear of his own ſubjects, as of his enemies. As love is ſuch an heroique paſſion as is infinitely above the capacity of the vulgar, ſo the people of Sardis could not believe that Mandana was the real cauſe of the War; but on the contrary they imagined it to be ambition only which exaſperated Cyrus againſt them; ſo that knowing how this Prince had rendred back the Kingdom unto the King of Armenia after he had conquered it, and that he contented himſelf only with the honour of it, and making him to pay a tribute which was due unto Ciaxares. Therefore the rout of the people took up a Fancy, to ſay that Crœſſus had no better way than to propoſe unto Cyrus to become his

Vaſſal, imagining that this Prince would accept of it: ſo that this fancy paſſing from mind to mind, and from mouth to mouth, it raiſed ſo great a tumult in the Town, that Crœſſus, to calm it, was forced to tell the people, that he would make ſome propoſitions of peace unto Cyrus, but yet muſt ſtay a few daies firſt. Whilſt Crœſſus and the King of Pontus were in this condition, Cyrus, whoſe great ſoul thought nothing difficult, prepared himſelf for a general aſſault. 'Tis true, one ſide of the Town towards the Mountain Tmolus, was ſo inacceſſible, that there was no poſſibility of aſſaulting it on that ſide, and every where elſe,the Walls were ſo full of men, that there was apparent danger in the aſſault: However, Cyrus reſolved to attempt it, he viſited all his Engins, and Ladders, to ſee if they were long enough: he muſtered up all his Forces, he ſpoke his ſouldiers fair, and after he had given order to aſſault it in three places at once, the one of which was to be commanded by the King of Aſſyria, the other by Mazares, and the third by himſelf; This Prince was the firſt that put a Ladder againſt the Walls of this Famous Town, after the ditch was filled full of Faggots, maugre the reſiſtance of his enemies; conſidering the diſorder in the Town, there was great hope of good ſucceſs unto Cyrus in the attempt. Yet the report was no ſooner ſpread about amongſt the Inhabitants of Sardis, that their Town was ready to be ſtormed, but deſpair did ſo rouze up their ſpirits, and made them ſo Valiant, that there was hardly a woman that went not to defend it, and had not to throw upon the heads of them that climbed the Ladders: indeed the reſiſtance of the Lydians, animated by the King of Pontus, was ſuch,that all the Valour of Cyrus, and them that fought under him, could not force them that day; Cyrus was repulſed above twenty times from the top of the walls; and if Fortune had not happily preſerved him, he had moſt certainly periſhed at this bout, for the enemies did ſo ſtoutly defend themſelves, that there was no poſſibility to get upon their Ramparts: nothing but overturned and broken Ladders could be ſeen;there flew from the walls of Sardis ſuch a prodigious number number of Arrows, Darts, and Javelines, that the Air was obſcured by them, thoſe who eſcaped them, miſſed not a ſhower of ſtones, which were continually thrown at them; they alſo had a kind of Sythes which kept the Walls from the aſſaultants, ſo that all three diviſions were forced to come off: but Cyrus in his coming off quartered under the counterſcarp of the Mote, ſince he would not be upbraided with getting no advantage. Anaxaris, who fought that day next him, and did ſuch wonders, that Cyrus confeſſed he never ſaw a more valiant man, did exceedingly help this Prince to take this Quarter, and to keep it: the night alſo coming on, did much facilitate the work, and made it in a condition to be kept; yet Cyrus was very ſorry his firſt aſſault ſucceeded no better; but knowing all days were not alike in War, he ſhrunk not, no more than the King of Aſſyria or Mazares, who were very gallant that day, and he commended his ſouldiers, as indeed he had no reaſon to complain, for they did as much as any couragious men could do. He was ſo happy as to loſe not one man of any quality in this ſtorm; 'tis true, a great number of ſouldiers were killed, ſo that as ſoon as day appeared, a truce was made to carry off the dead, during which time Cyrus was very circumſpect to obſerve whether there was any other quarter of the Wall which might be attempted with leſs difficulty. But whilſt he was conſidering what was advantageous or diſadvantageous, the Lydians, who in reaſon ſhould have been more couragious, after they had repulſed their enemies, became more cowed in their ſpirits, for many of them being wounded and killed, they were more afrighted than before, the women ſeeing their husbands and children wounded and killed, were ſo full of cries and tears, that they melted the hearts and courages of the reſt, ſo that ſuppoſing their King might now make a more advantageous treaty after he had repulſed Cyrus than before, they began to ſpeak of nothing elſe, and that in ſo high a manner, as this unfortunate Prince would willingly have parted with Mandana to ſave his Crown. But the King of Pontus had ſo cunningly carried the matter, as Crœſus was not

Maſter of the Cittadel, for this Prince had ſo complyed with Faction and all the Souldiers, that Crœſſus could not diſpoſe of it: inſomuch as this unfortunate King was not Maſter ſo much as of his own Daughter, nor of the only Town which was left him. In the mean time, Cyrus being advertiſed by ſome ſpies which Andramites imployed, and which went in and out of the Town, that the tumult began to grow high, reſolved to let them alone, and try what it would produce before he would give a ſecond aſſault: alſo intending to aſſault in all places of the Town which were acceſſible, he found he had not Ladders enough for it, ſo that he contented himſelf with keeping that quarter which he had made, and to repulſe thoſe enemies which two or three times did endeavour to diſlodge them that guarded it; but as oft as they ſallied, Cyrus beat them back ſo ſharply, that at laſt they thought no more upon it. As all things ſtood upon theſe terms, Leontidas accompanied with an Envoy from Philoxipes, came from Thraſibulus and Harpagus, to acquaint Cyrus with the particulars of the happy ſucceſs, which before he hinted unto him preſently after the Battel was won: Cyrus no ſooner ſaw them, but he was as much Joyed as poſſible, for ſince he loved Thraſibulus very well, and exceedingly eſteemed Leontidas, he hoped for much conſolation from them. Yet he could never look upon this jealous Lover without a remembrance of all his jealous paſſages which he related at Sinope, or without calling into his memory at the ſame time the unjuſt jealouſie of Mandana; ſo that notwithſtanding his joy to ſee Leontidas, he embraced him with a ſigh, yet he gave a ſudden check unto all his ſad reſentments, purpoſely to expreſs how great ſatisfaction the Victory of Thraſibulus did give him. I aſſure you (ſaid he unto him after the firſt complements, and after he had asked the Envoy from Philoxipes, how that Prince did) I have made no fewer prayers for the felicity of Thraſibulus, than for my own, and his happineſs keeps me from murmuring at the continuation of my own miſeries. You have reaſon, Sir (anſwered Leontidas) to intereſt your ſelf in the good fortune of the Prince Thraſibulus; for as his good fortune keeps you from murmuring againſt the Gods for your miſeries, ſo your miſeries keep him from thanking them for his own happineſs. But I pray you relate unto me not only all his Victories (ſaid Cyrus unto Leontidas) but alſo all his and your adventures, and tell me alſo, how fares all your Friends? Is Philocles yet cured of his paſſion, does he love ſtill without being loved again? is Thimocrates ſtill amorous and abſent? and are you yet jealous? All that you ask (replied Leontidas) do queſtionleſs deſerve anſwers, except the laſt, which concerns my ſelf: for, Sir, it is to no purpoſe to ask a man who is naturally jealous, whether he be jealous ſtill, ſince certainly he can never be otherwiſe. This anſwer of Leontidas did much grieve Cyrus, conceiving, that according to it, the jealouſie of Mandana would laſt eternally; for the exceſs of his paſſion would not permit him to diſtinguiſh between a jealouſie naturally rooted in the heart, without cauſe or reaſon, and a jealouſie which hath ſome colour and cauſe, and which by conſequence continues no longer than the cauſe; yet he concealed the diſorder of his thoughts, and moved Leontidas to ſatisfie his curioſity in letting him know all the paſſages concerning Thraſibulus, Harpagus, Philocles, Thimocrates, and himſelf, conceiving it would be a great joy unto him to hear that theſe Lovers, who were ſo unhappy the laſt time he ſaw them, are now in a better condition: alſo ſince Leontidas came upon the day of Truce, when Cyrus had no great buſineſs in hand, knowing that Sardis was not in any condition of relief, he imployed this leaſure in hearing of the particulars of both the Victories and amorous adventures of Thraſibulus. But ſince Leontidas knew that the Envoy from Philoxipes, whoſe name was Megaſides, had ſomething to ſay unto Cyrus from his Maſter, which would be more pleaſing unto him, than all he could ſay, he reſolved to ſatisfie his curioſity in few words. Sir, ſaid he unto him, the Prince Philoxipes hath ſent you ſuch joyful news by Megaſides, that leſt your ſoul ſhould be too much ſurpriſed at it, I think it is expedient for me to prepare you for the reception of it, by relating things of leſs conſequence; yet I muſt not keep you too long, therefore I will tell you all you deſire to know in as few words as poſſible. Cyrus hearing Leontidas ſay ſo, did believe that what Megaſides had to ſay, related only unto Philoxipes, and not himſelf at all; ſo that though he much eſteemed him, yet ſince he loved Thraſibulus better, he did not interrupt Leontidas who at firſt put him in mind of the ſtate wherein things ſtood concerning the Prince of Milete, when they parted from each other: But Cyrus interrupting him, Ah Leontidas, ſaid he, you wrong me much, if you think I forget the intereſts of my friends, no, no, I have not forgot any thing which concerns Thraſibulus or your ſelf; I very well remember how the People of Milete drave out the wicked Melaſia, the ambitious Philodice, the unfortunate Leonice, and the Tyrant Alexideſmas, and that all theſe abominable wretches retired to the Prince of Phoceus, brother of Philodice, who endeavoured to contract a league with all his neighbour ſtates, and that in the mean time Anthemeus in lieu of calling back his Prince, as the wiſe Thales adviſed him, he employed all his endeavours to make the people cry up Liberty, and not to acknowledge their Maſter. I remember alſo that the fair Alcionida ſtayed at Mytelenes whilſt the Prince Tyſander came to Sardis, and from thence went into Armenia, where you know he dyed, declaring by his laſt words, and by a Letter unto Alcionida, that it was his will Thraſibulus ſhould marry her: And to ſhew you, ſaid Cyrus, that I remember all that concerns my friends, I remember alſo that the laſt abſence of Thimocrates was cauſed by a combat which he fought with one of his Rivals, whom he killed, for which he was baniſhed from Delphos for three years. Nor have I forgotten how the unfortunate Philocles, who never was beloved, was abſolutely out of all hopes to be ſo, becauſe the fair Philiſta was married, and returned into Ialiſſa. And for your part (ſaid Cyrus with a ſmile, which he ſeconded with a ſigh) I remember very well you were jealous of all both above and below your quality; and that when you left Samos, after you had fondly conſulted with the Philoſopher Xanthus, you left three of your Rivals with the fair Alcidamia. And after this, I pray judge whether it be neceſſary to call into memory what I have ſo well, and ſo often thought upon. I muſt confeſs, Sir, replied Leontidas, I could not think your own misfortunes would have permitted you to remember ſo exactly the misfortunes of others; but ſince I ſee that I am deceived, I will haſten, and tell you that the Prince Thraſibulus, not being able to carry Tiſander's Letter unto Alcionida himſelf, nor to acquaint her with the death of her Husband, and having no mind to urge her unto the accompliſhment of that unfortunate Prince's Laſt Will, as ſoon as he came into Milete, of which he was not yet Maſter, he ſent Leoſthenes to give the Letter of dying Tiſander unto Alcionida, giving him alſo another from himſelf to that fair one, which, Sir, I am very ſorry I cannot ſhew you as Thraſibulus did unto me: For, Sir, I never in my life met with ſo well a penned Piece, ſo moving, ſo full of Art, Wit, Eloquence, and Judgment: But to hint it a little unto your apprehenſion, I need ſay no more, than that when Thraſibulus was not in love with Alcionida, but only the friend of Tiſander, it was impoſſible ſhe could be more tender than ſhe was towards that Illuſtrious deceaſed Prince: and that when he was not the friend of Tiſander, but only a Lover of Alcionida, ſhe could not be more paſſionate than ſhe was: He uſed not one word which was unbecoming: The word Love was not ſo much as once uſed throughout the Letter: He did not entreat her to fulfil the Laſt Will of her Husband, who deſired her to marry him. But in asking nothing, he asked all; and never was piece ſo full of wit and paſſion, as this admirable Letter. But after Thraſibulus had fully inſtructed Leoſthenes, and diſpatched him away to Alcionida, and unto the ſage Pittacus, Father of Tiſander, unto whom he writ alſo; he conſulted with Harpagus, upon the beſt expedients to compaſs his deſigns, and they conceived it beſt; Firſt how to become Maſters of Milete, before he thought of any revenge of his enemies: Yet the matter was not in their own choice, for the Prince of Phoceus, as I told you before, made a league with the Lanthians, the Carians, and the Caunians, ſo that getting up a conſiderable Army, he muſt think of fighting and not of going unto Milete, whither Thraſibulus then ſent one of his men ſecretly unto Thales. In ſhort, Sir, this Prince did fight him, and defeated him. After this Victory, the Prince of Phoceus and Alexideſmus were forced to retreat into their Town: which Thraſibulus the ſame hour beleaguered with Trenches, and by that means they had only that ſide towards the Sea open, from whence they had no hopes of any ſudden relief, ſo that ſince their Crimes put them in mind of puniſhment, if ever they fell into the hands of Thraſibulus, their plot alſo was to get their perſons out of the reach of his Revenge. They inſpired into the ſpirits of the Phocean People, ſo great a horrour of ſtrange dominion, that the innocent People were out of all heart: Then they deſired a Parley, and at firſt propoſed ſuch advantageous terms, that Harpagus moved Thraſibulus to forget ſome of his Reſentments and hearken unto them: So that all acts of Hoſtility ceaſed on both ſides, and they were in treating two days: In the mean time, the Phoceans took hold of this Interim, to tackle up all their Ships, which were not a few; for they were the firſt of all the Grecians which made any long Sea Voyages, and who alſo found out the way of Tyrrhenea and Tarteſſa.

In concluſion, Sir, in one night all the Phoceans embarqued with their Wives and Children, and carried with them all that was of any value, even to the Statues of their Temples. So that the next morning, in lieu of Commiſſioners to Treat, we ſaw none, neither upon the Walls, or any where elſe: Inſomuch as Thraſibulus triumphed in an empty Town, none remaining in it but a few miſerable Slaves. This, Sir, much perplexed Thraſibulus, for it was prejudicial unto him: Who putting a Garriſon in Phoceus, he ſtayed no longer there, but ſent to aſſure Euphranor, who was chief of all the Gnidian Councel, that he had no other deſign but to protect them, and conjured him not to give any Retreat unto the Prince of Phoceus, nor Alexideſmus. But notwithſtanding all the fair words of Thraſibulus, he knowing that the Army which he commanded belonged unto a Prince which pretended to ſubject all Aſia, he would not truſt him, but endeavoured to cut that Iſthmus of land which was between the two Seas, and which only joyned the Gnidean Country unto the Continent. But as they digged to make their Country an Iſle, whether it was ſo, or whether they imagined it, they thought the ſtones rebounded againſt them; ſo that thinking the Gods were not pleaſed with their work, they gave it over. Euphranor, to oblige them by the ſame reaſon which hindred them, ſent to conſult with the Oracle at Delphos: But the Oracle, which formerly returned obſcure Anſwers unto all their Queſtions, did now anſwer the Gnideans, That they ſhould not any longer vainly labour to cut this Iſthmus, becauſe if Jupiter had intended to make their Country an Iſland, he could have done it without them; ſo that this anſwer being known at Gnide, Euphranor ſubmitted to the will of the Gods, and yielded unto more than Thraſibulus demanded; for he ſent ſome deputies of the Country to aſſure him of the fidelity which he would render unto him. I ſhall not need to tell you, Sir, how Thraſibulus uſed them kindly, for when you know they came from Euphranor, you will imagine it: In the mean while Thraſibulus (after he had ſent them away with as much confidence of well uſage as they deſired) underſtood that his enemies were retired unto Xanthus, after they had been refuſed in many other places, and that the multitude of Phoceans were gone to Chio, he turned his Forces towards them, yet firſt there was a neceſſity of fighting the Carians, who quickly ſubmitted: Mean while, Anthemius and Thales negotiated in Milete according to their ſeveral deſigns.

But the ends of Thales being more juſt than the ends of Anthemius, the Gods did favour them, and maugre this Arch-enemy of Thraſibulus, he diſpoſed the People to ſubmit to, and receive their legitimate Prince. 'Tis very true, the power of your Armies, Sir, did not a little help him in his eſtabliſhment; and he commanded me to tell you, Sir, that he is a debtor to you for that ſecurity which he hopes to enjoy as long as he lives, and that all his Victories are but effects and conſequences of yours. But, Sir, to compleat his good fortune, he received news the next morning, that he had defeated the Xantheans and Licians, who were joyned together, and had forced Alexideſmus and the Prince of Phoceus to retire, not only into the Town, but into the Caſtle; for they thought themſelves not ſecure in the Town: but that which is moſt ſtrange, was, that theſe miſerable enemies (the image of whoſe crimes diſturb'd their reaſon, and deprived them of all humanity) ſet fire on that place which was their Sanctuary. It is no wonder if the horrour of their wickedneſs did make them imagine more mercy in the flames, than from the hands of Thraſibulus; for Melaſia had exiled him, had cauſed him to loſe his Dominions, and poyſoned his Father; Philodica was a partner in her deſigns and crimes. The Prince Phoceus, to revenge the misfortune of his Son, did not ſcruple to violate all Laws, no more than Alexideſmus, whoſe Wife doubtleſs was little culpable, and yet ſhe had a hand in the ſame deſign: For, Sir, theſe deſperate Wretches did not only burn the Town of Xanthus, in retiring to the Caſtle, but ſeeing Thraſibulus preparing to force it, they burnt it and themſelves alſo, and by this means were the executioners of divine revenge, and with their own hands puniſhed thoſe crimes which they had committed. You may well imagine, Sir, how much this horrid adventure did ſurpriſe Thraſibulus, and all the Army; for ſuch a horrid object was enough to ſtrike terrour as well into the Hearers as Spectators of it. After this, Sir, nothing could reſiſt the power of your Armies, all did acknowledge your Authority, ſo that Thraſibulus, full of glory, went unto Milete, where he was received with the greateſt acclamations in the World. But ſince he thought it not enough to be eſtabliſhed in his Dominions, unleſs he were ſo in the heart of Alcionida, he thought upon nothing thing but that; his greateſt grief was, that he did not know directly what opinion this fair one had of him; for ſince ſhe had heard of Tyſander's death before Leoſthenes came to Mytilenes, he found her ready to embark and return to Gnides unto her Father when Thraſibulus ſent him unto her, ſo that ſhe received this Letter, but returned no anſwer but by way of civil complement, and would not write, becauſe ſhe thought ſhe ſhould expreſs either too much or too little; Leoſthenes only told him at his return, that one could not behold more ſadneſs than appeared in her eyes, though ſtill moſt fair. Thraſibulus no ſooner knew that ſhe was at Gnides, (where ſhe arrived preſently after the Deputies which had been with her were returned) but he ſent Leoſthenes unto Euphranor to ask her in Marriage; he ſent alſo at the ſame time unto the Prince of Mytilene, to entreat him he would move Alcionida to fulfil the laſt will of dying Tyſander, and he writ the ſecond time unto Alcionida in ſuch paſſionate expreſſions, as was eaſie to diſcern that his thoughts and his words were all one. Since Thraſibulus did me the honour to have a great confidence in me during this War, he ſent me with Leoſthenes, to aſſiſt him in the negotiation of his deſigns; ſo that though Leoſthenes was ſent unto Euphranor, I may ſay that I was ſent unto Alcionida; I cannot make an exact relation, Sir, of all our tranſactions, which met with no great difficulties in approbation of the Father, but with many in the mind of the Daughter; for if I ſhould, the length of it would defer that ſatisfaction which you may otherwiſe receive. But in as conciſe a manner as I can, let me tell you, that the rare merits of Tiſander did not leſſen the tender affection which ſhe bore unto Thraſibulus, though ſhe lived moſt lovingly with her Husband: Yet for all that, though her Husband upon his death willed her to marry Thraſibulus, yet ſhe had a conceit that it would be more glorious for her not to obey him, than to accompliſh his Laſt Will; and this conceit did ſo command her mind, that ſhe thought her ſelf worthy of blame if ſhe ſhould marry Thraſibulus, though ſhe loved him very dearly. But the Prince of Mytilene having writ unto her, with deſires ſhe would fulfil the will of the Prince his Son;and Euphranor abſolutely commanding her, ſhe obeyed them without any reſiſtance: And was glad that two who had ſuch power over her, did aſſure her it was not againſt her honour. Thus, Sir, ſince Leoſthenes and my ſelf had abſolutely power to do it; the marriage of Thraſibulus and Alcionida was concluded: Leoſthenes returned to Milete, and I ſtayed at Gnides until all things were ready for Alcionida's departure: I ſhall not ſpeak, Sir, of Thraſibulus his joy, nor of her magnificent Reception: But I ſhall aſſure you, that the fair Alcionida is worthy of his affection; and ſo much the more, Sir, becauſe ſhe ſhares with him in that affection which he hath unto your ſervice; ſince certainly ſhe is ſo charmed with your Virtue, though ſhe know you only by Fame, and Thraſibulus, that ſhe was full of prayers for your proſperity, as he is. Thus, Sir, you ſee in what a happy condition is Thraſibulus: And, as if his good fortune did extend unto his friends, when I returned from Milete with Alcionida, I found Thimocrates ready to depart unto Delphos, becauſe he received News that his friends had procured a revocation of his baniſhment; and that the Father of Teleſile having changed his mind, would give his daughter unto him, before all the reſt of her Lovers; ſince Menecrates, who was the moſt conſiderable of them all, being repulſed by the rigours of Teleſile, had changed his mind: So that this Lover, who reſented abſence the worſt of all miſeries, was gone unto his dear Teleſile, never to leave her. Philocles alſo departed from Milete at the ſame time to Ialiſſa, hearing that the Husband of fair Philiſta was dead, and would try whether he could find a Widow more mollible than a Maid. For my part, Sir, whom jealouſie hath ſo tormented, I found at my return a Letter from one of my friends at Samos, which might in all probabilities cure me of my Paſſion, and conſequently of my Jealouſie; for he writes unto me, that now Alcidamia is not all Fair; he deſcribes her lean and pale, and ſo altered, that I know not how my Love and Jealouſie can ſubſiſt any longer, and yet they do. I do not wonder, ſaid Cyrus and ſmiled) that your Love ſhould laſt longer than the Beauty of Alcidamia; for one ought not to meaſure the length of Love by a Rule which is ſhort, fragile, and mutable, as Beauty is. But my wonder is, you ſhould be ſtill jealous; for according to your deſcription of Alcidamia, ſhe is not like to make any more Conqueſts. 'Tis true, Sir, replied Leontidas, but in telling me this of Alcidamia, they tell me further, that Theanor was never ſo much in her favour as now: So that ſince I have heard ſay, commonly the faireſt perſons ceaſe to be rigorous when they ceaſe to be fair, I am afraid ſhe will keep that by her favours which ſhe could not by her Beauty: So that I am now more jealous than I was when Alcidamia was the faireſt in the World. And ſince, Sir, Alcidamia hath only loſt her beauty by loſing her health, and that perhaps the next Spring will give her more than ſhe hath loſt, but will never reſtore me her affection which ſhe hath beſtowed upon another. But, Sir, ſince I ought not to be leſs jealous of your glory than of my Miſtreſs, though in a different manner, give me leave to tell you, that within theſe few days there will come unto you Deputies from all the Countries which Thraſibulus and Harpagus have conquered. And ſince the Army which they command hath nothing to do in thoſe places where you are the Maſter, be pleaſed to ſend them ſuch orders as you would have them follow. In the mean time, Sir, I beſeech you, let Megaſides do the commands of the Prince Philoxipes, and acquaint you with a buſineſs which will rejoyce you in your miſeries, becauſe it will let you ſee the end of them. What confidence ſoever I have in you (replied Cyrus ſadly) I can hardly believe what you ſay: Nor can I tell whether I ſhould credit the Prince Philoxipes himſelf, if he were here, and ſhould perſwade me I ought to hope for an end of my miſeries. I would not have you believe, Sir, (ſaid Leontidas) either the Prince Philoxipes, or Megaſides, or my ſelf, but the Gods only, who have given you ſuch a clear aſſurance of it, that you dare not doubt it when you know it. I underſtand ſo little what you mean (replyed Cyrus) that I know not what to anſwer; therefore I conjure you (ſaid he, and applyed his ſpeech to Megaſides) to tell me what you would have me know, and what it is will ſo much rejoyce me. Sir, (replyed Megaſides, before I ſatisfie your curioſity, be pleaſed to remember, that in Cyprus there is the Oracle of Venus Vrania, which for matters of Love did never fail in her Anſwers. After this, Sir, give me leave to tell you, that the Princeſs of Salamis, ſiſter unto the Prince Philoxipes, in whoſe fortune hath been many changes, ſince you were in our Iſle; having a mind to conſult with the Oracle upon a buſineſs on which the well-being of her life depended, and having ſent unto Delphos, as unto the moſt famous Oracle of the World, ſhe received an anſwer, which ſo ſurpriſed her, that ſhe thought it impoſſible to come to paſs, ſo that ſeeking for further ſatisfaction of the anſwer, ſhe conſulted with this of Venus Vrania, which told her in expreſs terms, It was not more true that Cyrus was the greateſt Prince in the World; and that he ſhould be hereafter as happy, as heretofore he had been unfortunate, than what this Oracle of Delphos had told her ſhould come to paſs. Ah Megaſides, ſaid Cyrus, how ſhould I believe this? for the Gods never uſe to contradict themſelves: however, they did not give me any ſuch anſwer when I conſulted with thoſe by whom they ſometimes reveal their ſecrets unto the ſons of men. Megaſides, ſeeing he was not believed, preſented unto him a Letter of credence, which the Prince Philoxipes writ unto him, which he did not preſent ſooner, becauſe Cyrus and Leontidas were ſo cloſe, he could not without interruption. But after he had given him this Letter, he gave him the Oracle alſo which the Princeſs of Salamis received, ſo that Cyrus not knowing whether he ſhould ſooner believe Venus Vrania, than the Sibyll with whom he had conſulted, or Jupiter-Belus who rendred the favourable anſwer unto the King of Aſſyria, his mind was in an anxious perplexity. That which induced him to think he had ill expounded what the Sibyll ſaid unto him, and what was anſwered the King of Aſſyria at Babylon, was, to ſee the Oracle at Delphos aſſure Crœſſus, That if he went to war, he ſhould ruine a great Empire. Yet he ſaw that he was in a condition of ruine. But all the hopes of Cyrus could hardly expel fears from his heart, therefore he ſaid unto Megaſides, I perceive the Oracle which the Princeſs of Salamis received, tells her, That it is not more true I ſhall be happy, than that which the Oracle anſwers her ſhall come to paſs. But Megaſides, the knot of the matter is to know, whether that which the Oracle of Delphos anſwered her will come to paſs; for it is upon that which I muſt find a foundation for any of thoſe hopes which the Prince Philoxipes would have me entertain. Sir, replied Megaſides, as the Prince who ſent me did imagine, that it would be the good fortune of the Princeſs of Salamis, which would create belief and hopes in you, he hath obtained permiſſion from her, to let you know all her adventures, which doubtleſs is ſo rare, as the relation of it will add much unto your hopes and delight, if you can ſpare ſo much leaſure to hear it. Though I ought not to intereſt my ſelf ſo much in the Fortune of one of the faireſt Princeſſes in the world (anſwered Cyrus) yet ſince my own hath a dependency upon hers, I am forced to intreat you to acquaint me with it: and therefore ſince the Prince Philoxipes, and the Princeſs Salamis have given you permiſſion, I beſeech you to do me the favour. But that I may have the better leaſure to hear you, and not hinder my cares of the Siege, which is of ſo great importance, it is requiſite I take the time which I uſe to allow my ſelf for ſleep: therefore let it be in the night if you pleaſe: and ſo it was. In the mean time Cyrus appointed Feraulas to have a care of Leontidas and Megaſides, and to bring them unto him aſſoon as he was retired into his Tent, after he had bid good night unto all the company. But do what he could, his mind ſtill ran upon what Megaſides told him; and he had ſuch impatient deſires to know how the Oracle was fullfilled, that he diſpatched all Orders concerning the Army with as much celerity as poſſible, to the end he might retire the ſooner. Cyrus then was no ſooner at liberty, but Feraulas, in obedience to his commands, brought Leontidas and Megaſides unto him, and Megaſides began his Relation after this manner.

The Hiſtory of Timantes and Parthenia.

I Beſeech you, Sir, do not expect I ſhould relate any thing of thoſe wonderful events wherein Mars has a greater influence than Love, or wherein fortune works the greateſt alterations, in acquainting you with the Adventures of the Princeſs of Salamis, whoſe name is Parthenia: but on the contrary, be pleaſed to know, that all the accidents in Cyprus cannot be of that nature. Indeed, it may well be ſaid, that Love, who in all other places does often cauſe tragical events, is contented, when he is angry, to produce only fantaſtical and capricious effects in our Iſle. However, thoſe who find theſe effects in themſelves, do think themſelves moſt unfortunate, and complain as much as thoſe whom Fortune, Love, and Ambition all at once do torment: After this, Sir, I know not whether it be neceſſary to put you in mind, that Love in our Court is not a ſimple bare paſſion, as in other places; but a paſſion of neceſſity and decency: All men muſt Love; and all Ladies muſt be loved: no hard-hearted inſenſible man ever gets any eſteem amongſt us, except the Prince Philoxipes, who yet continued not ſo long: This obduracy of heart is branded as a crime, and liberty of this kind is ſuch a ſhame, that thoſe who are not in Love, will at leaſt ſeem to be ſo. As for Ladies, cuſtom does not neceſſarily oblige them to Love, but only to ſuffer themſelves to be loved, and all their glory conſiſts in making Illuſtrious conqueſts; and not to loſe their Loves which they have captivated, though they be rigid unto them: For the principal honour of our Beauties is, to return in their obedience thoſe Captives which they have made only by the power of their Charms, and not by their Favours: ſo that by this cuſtom, there is almoſt an abſolute neceſſity of being a Lover, and unfortunate: yet it is not forbidden Ladies to acknowledge the perſeverance of their loves by a pure affection; Venus Vrania allows it; but ſometimes it is ſo long before they can win the heart of the perſon loved, that the pains of the Conqueror does almoſt equal the pleaſure of the Conqueſt: yet it is allowable for beauties to make uſe of many innocent Arts wherewith to take hearts: Complacency is not a crime, care to ſeem fair is no affectation, obſequiouſneſs is extreamly commendable, ſo it be without baſeneſs, Plauſibility is a virtue: and to conclude all in ſhort,all that may make themſelves amiable, and all that may make themſelves to love, is permitted, provided it be not againſt the laws of modeſty and chaſtity: which manage the Gallantry of our Iſle, is the predominate virtue of all Ladies. Thus allowing Fate,Innocency and love, they live moſt pleaſant and merry lives: This, Sir, I thought requiſite to hint unto your memory, that you may better comprehend what I am to relate. I ſhall not need to tell you, Sir, that Parthenia was born with a taking beauty: ſuch a one as charms at the firſt ſight, and which ſeems to augment, every moment one looks on her; for it is impoſſible you ſhould have been in Cyprus, and not know it, though ſhe was at Paphos when you were there: But give me leave to tell you, Sir, that her wit ſparkles as well as her eyes; and her diſcourſe charms as well as her beauty: Moreover, her mind was none of thoſe narrow ones, who knew one thing, and was ignorant of a thouſand: but on the contrary, it was ſo miraculouſly large, that though it cannot be ſaid Parthenia knew every thing equally well, yet it is moſt certain ſhe could give an excellent account of all things: there was alſo ſuch a delicate ſharpneſs in her wit,that thoſe whom ſhe honoured with her converſation ſtood in fear of her,and though all her expreſſions were ſimple and natural, yet were they full of ſtrong ſolidity: moreover ſhe could turn her wit as ſhe pleaſed: ſhe would be ſerious and wiſe with thoſe that were ſo: ſhe would be gallant and pleaſant upon neceſſity: ſhe had a high heart, and ſometimes an humour of flattery; None knew the news of the World better than ſhe: ſhe was of a natural timeroſity in ſome things,and bold in others: ſhe was full of Heroique Generoſity, and Liberality: And to conclude her deſcription, her ſoul was naturally tender and paſſionate: and it may juſtly be ſaid, that never any did ſo perfectly know the differences of love, as the Princeſs Palmis: And I never in my life heard a more pleaſing diſcourſe than hers, to make a diſtinction betwixt a pure refined love, and a groſs terreſtrial paſſion: between a love by inclination, and a love by acquaintance: between a ſincere Love and a Counterfeit; between a Love that hath ends in it, and a Love Heroique: For indeed, ſhe would penetrate into the very heart: ſhe would deſcribe jealouſie more terribly by her words, than thoſe who Paint it with Serpents gnawing the heart: ſhe knew all the innocent ſweets of Love, and all the Torments; and every thing that had any dependency upon this paſſion, was ſo perfectly known unto her, that Venus Urania her ſelf did not know them better than the Princeſs of Salamis. This, Sir, is her deſcription, of whom I muſt ſpeak, who was no leſs loved, than ſhe was lovely. And indeed, whoſoever would Catalogue the Prodigious number of her Lovers in his memory, would queſtionleſs be aſtoniſhed, ſince it is moſt certain, the fair Parthenia hath Captivated many, above a thouſand hearts ſince ſhe began to appear a Glorious Star in the World: The greateſt wonder in Paphos was, that ſhe was never taken away, becauſe the Father of Philoxipes being Governour of Amathuſa, cauſed all his Children to be taken away until they were in a fit condition to appear in Court: So that the Luſtre of Parthenia's beauty was not like that of the Sun which we ſee every day, and unto whoſe Rays we are accuſtomed alſo: For ſhe appeared upon a ſuddain at Paphos, all Luſtre and Glory, and dazled all beholders: It may moſt truly be ſaid, that ſhe dimmed all other Beauties, and ſcorched more hearts in one day, than other beauties could only warm in all their lives. But that which is moſt obſervable in the Conqueſts of Parthenia, when ſhe came firſt to Paphos, was, that ſhe never made uſe of her admirable wit, becauſe her beauty was ſo Prodigiouſly charming, that thoſe ſhe Captivated, were fettered by her looks, before ever ſhe ſpoke; ſo piercing were her eyes, and ſo inevitable were her Charms. But, Sir, as I told you already, that none durſt be inſenſible at Paphos, or at leaſt ſeem ſo; you may well conceive Parthenia found not many men at Liberty; and that ſhe could not gain ſo many hearts, without robbing others; and ſince ſo, ſhe muſt needs be loved by inconſtant ſervants, who quitted their firſt Chains to aſſume hers: For in the changing of a Miſtreſs, it is no good reaſon to alledge, he found one more fair, and therefore changed: ſince I am confident that whoever quits one whom once he loved for another more fair than ſhe, doth moſt certainly quit her for ſome end or other. Look then upon Parthenia as one that hath many Lovers, and many haters: for it is to be ſuppoſed that they, who loſt thoſe hearts ſhe found, did not love her: And not one of them but did ſet their wits on work to cavil at her beauty, and find ſome defect in it; And ſince they found that not any eaſie matter, they would at leaſt quarrel with her dreſs, though it was never ſo handſome, and deviſed all manner of Plots to diſparage her. In the mean time Parthenia, perceiving their envious aims, took much pleaſure in revenge, by Captivating each day their Lovers; not caring for new Enemies, ſo ſhe could make new Captives, for ſhe was taken of a fit age for it, and wherein it is a difficulty to keep within limits of Conqueſts, and unjuſt ſuits and ſacrifices unto her beauty: She was infinitely pleaſed to ſee ſuch a Crowd of Adorers about her, whom ſhe carried in Triumph which way ſoever ſhe went: But ſince ſhe did Captivate them only by the luſtre of her eyes, and not her wit or tongue, all her Amorites were not equally worthy of her Chains: Some of them dull and groſs: others light and fantaſtical: and ſome again envious and troubleſome: So that finding her ſelf troubled with that which at firſt ſhe delighted in, ſhe did what ſhe could to reſtore them unto thoſe from whom ſhe drew them, at leaſt to be rid of them; yet ſhe found this to be no eaſie matter: and now it may well be ſaid, her beauty put her to abundance of trouble and vexation: for many Quarrels did ariſe amongſt themſelves; but at laſt, her ſeverity to ſome, and even incivility to others, did rid her of this doteing and troubleſome multitude: For though the Cuſtom of Cyprus, was for Ladies to ſuffer themſelves to be loved; yet it was not with all ſorts indifferently. Thus Parthenia, being delivered from that perſecution, which this abundance of Lovers, and her own beauty cauſed, ſhe retained only three, who being more agreeable to her fancy than the reſt, ſhe baniſhed not: Theſe three were not only different in quality, but alſo in humours: The firſt was a kinſman unto Timoilea, whom you ſaw in Cyprus, called Polydamas, whoſe inclinations were all generous: He was fair, handſom and well compacted; he had a high and noble Air; his wit was pleaſant, but ordinary: and he pleaſed more by an unexpreſſible charm which was in all his actions and his Perſon, than by what he ſpoke, which took more by the manner than the matter expreſſed. The ſecond was the Prince of Salamis: infinitely Rich, of great quality, and of a handſom preſence, having wit enough, but a little fantaſtical. And the third was of a mean and baſe birth, called Callicrates, whoſe wit was incomparably above the beſt in all Paphos, and highly eſteemed both amongſt Men and Women. He writ both in Proſe and Verſe moſt admirably, in ſuch a pleaſing and unuſual way, as may be ſaid, he invented it; at leaſt I am ſure, I never ſaw any for him to imitate, and I think it may be truly ſaid, none will ever imitate him, but imperfectly; For of a very trifle he would compoſe a pleaſant Letter: And as the Phrygians ſaid of Midas, all he touched was Gold, ſo all that came from Callicrates paſt for current: He would make Glaſs paſs for Diamonds, and out of the pooreſt ſubject extract excellent matter: His company at ſome times was wonderous pleaſant, but not always alike; for ſometimes he would be as irkſom, as moſt of the World were always unto him: And he had ſuch an exceſſive delicacy of wit, that ſometimes it might better be phraſed Phantaſtical than delicate. His Perſon was not very well compoſed; Yet he made an open profeſſion of Courtſhip and Gallantry: but it was of an univerſal Gallantry, ſince he loved all ſorts, of all qualities: Yet had he one moſt dangerous quality for a Lover, which was, that he did as much affect to be thought he was loved, as really to be ſo. Theſe, Sir, were the three aſſiduous Servants about Parthenia, who yet would not let her heart be engaged unto any one of them; For Polidamas had not wit enough, though will; the Prince of Salamis was fantaſtical; and Callicrates was of ſo inferiour a quality, that ſhe could not look upon him, only as an admirer of his parts, not as her Lover: So that to make up ſuch a one as ſhe could fancy, was to find one who had the heart and perſon of Polydamas, the quality of the Prince of Salamis, and the wit of Callicrates: but ſince this was a thing impoſſible, ſhe contented her ſelf, to eſteem every one of them according to their merits, but to love none of the three. Yet Polidamas, and Callicrates were more in her favour than the Prince of Salamis: For the perſon of the one did extreamly pleaſe her, and the wit of the other made her merry. In the mean time, all theſe three Lovers had different deſigns upon Parthenia: For Polydamas his chief care was to be loved, and unleſs that, doubtleſs he would not marry her. On the contrary, the Prince of Salamis, rather than not enjoy her would have married her, though ſhe hated him; and therefore he was as diligent to gain thoſe who had any prevalence with her, as to pleaſe her: and Callicrates whoſe ſoul was all vanity, his principal care was to carry it ſo, that the people ſhould ſuſpect Parthenia was in love with him; and I am confident, he would have been better ſatisfied that all the Court ſhould have believed it, than he would, if ſhe had really loved him and none have known it. Therefore all his actions had ſome ſecret deſign in them, which Parthenia did not perceive till a long while after. But the ſtrangeſt humour of Callicrates was, he never ſo much loved out of his own judgement, as by that of others; and if Parthenia had been fairer than ſhe was, had it not been for the great reputation of her beauty, he had never loved her: For the lightneſs of his fancy commonly never fixed upon any thing, but ſuch as made greateſt noiſe in the world: Stately houſes, Greatneſs, Pompous Trains, high Quality, and ſuch like, ſometimes made him quit the faireſt Lady in Cyprus: and therefore it is no wonder, if meeting with Quality, Beauty, Wit, Reputation, Honour, Riches, and all in one perſon, he ſhould apply himſelf more to her than any other; and his chief felicity was in perſwading all the Court he was in no mean favour with her: Not that the meanneſs of his birth durſt preſume to act as Polidamis and the Prince of Salamis did; but he took upon him another kind of familiar air, and he did inſenſibly allure Parthenia to let him commend her; to ſpeak unto her often in whiſpers, and ſometimes to ſay aloud in Rallary, that ſhe was a moſt dangerous perſon. Since he did not ſo much care to be loved, as to have it thought he was: He never ſpoke any thing to her in private which might diſpleaſe her, leſt ſhe ſhould baniſh him. But he was exceedingly careful to carry it ſo, that people might perceive he was in love with her: Therefore when at any time he went out from Parthenia with any one whom he thought had wit enough to obſerve him, he affected to ſeem melancholy. Sometimes he would not ſpeak; otherwhiles he would ſpeak of nothing but her, and follow her almoſt into all places, affecting to look attentively upon her, when ſhe looked not upon him; yet very carefully watching for an opportunity to make ſome ſecret ſign unto her, upon ſome trifle or otherwiſe which he had truſted her withall, purpoſely to that end: For his humour was, to peruſe one favourable look which might be perceived above any real favour in ſecret. The ſtrangeſt humour of Callicrates was, that though he had ſuch fineneſs of wit, as he could ſeldom find any that were worthy of any Elogies, yet he had certain extravagant and fantaſtical conceits, which ſometimes made him love others, which were not at all amiable, unleſs it was becauſe he would be loved; and accordingly to his own ſenſe, he had the vanity to believe he was: He had ſuch an imperious wit, as he affected alwaies to have ſome whom he might ſcorn; and ſince none ſuch could be found either amongſt perſons of quality, or perſons reaſonable, he looked a little lower for ſome whom he might torment, and be rather their Tyrant than their Lover; ſo that it may rightly be ſaid, never had any ſo many thoughts in their heart ſo oppoſite to one another as his. Moreover, all the world knew, that he was a greater Votary unto Venus Anadiomena the Laſcivious, than unto Venus Urania the Chaſt, and he had much ado to believe there was any ſuch thing in the world as pure affection; yet he was not only allowed of amongſt the Ladies, but alſo by many of them Loved, ſo that it was not to be wondered that the wiſdom of Parthenia ſhould permit him her eſteem; and the more, becauſe he was more reſpective to her than all others, and becauſe he never ſpoke of any ſuch-thing unto her as Love, unleſs in Rallarie, and after ſuch a manner as could neither offend her, or make her believe him. In the mean time Polydamas and the Prince of Salamis being of ſuch qualities as they might publiſh their loves of Parthenia, they courted her by ways very different: For the Prince of Salamis was only very aſſiduous about her; and Polydamas, who had not wit enough to hold out any ſerious and long diſcourſe, did expreſs his paſſion by a thouſand diverſions, as Balls, Muſiques, Collations, and Walks; and ſince he was very amiable, and danced well, all his actions pleaſed her, and his preſence and pleaſant humours was enough to infuſe joys into the moſt melancholy ſouls, ſo that Parthenia did not hate him, nor had any indiſpoſition to marry him if her Parents would conſent. But ſince there was then ſome factions in Court, which divided the great Families: Some reaſons of Intereſt moved thoſe who had the diſpoſe of Parthenia, not to marry her unto Polydamas. On the other ſide, Callicrates ſeeing Polydamas in much favour with Parthenia, he moved her to obſerve the ſhallowneſs of his wit, and did it with ſo much art, as for all her inclination to Polydamas, ſhe began to think ſhe ſhould be blamed if ſhe loved him, or made choice of him, ſo that checking her own thoughts, Callicrates had the joy to ſee ſhe began to be a little more cold towards Polydamas, than accuſtomed. Yet ſince ſhe had a very ſtrong inclination to him, ſhe could not upon a ſudden vanquiſh her ſelf; and Callicrates ſtood in need of new wit to hinder her. As he was one day with her, he brought it about ſo handſomly that ſhe began ſo inſenſibly to ſpeak of Polydamas, and to ſpeak very advantageouſly of his great Courage, of his Liberality and Magnificence. I confeſs, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) that Polydamas merits all the commendations you give him; and if he did but know as well what you deſerve, as you do what he deſerves, he would be the happieſt man upon earth, he would honour you more, and be more in love with you than he is. Polydamas (replyed Parthenia) is not in love with me; but though he were, I am confident more or leſs wit does not get more or leſs love; and there are ſome dull blockheads more in love, than all your ſpritely wits are. Ah, Madam, (ſaid Callicrates) if I durſt but tell you what I think, I ſhould induce you to change your mind. I give you leave (ſaid ſhe unto him.) Then, Madam, (ſaid he) let me tell you, that poor Polydamas does but love the one half of the fair Parthenia. Dare you ſwear, Madam, that he underſtands all you ſay? Do you not obſerve that he looks more upon you than he hears you, and that there is no coherence between what you ſay, and what he anſwers? For my part (ſaid Parthenia, who was not very glad at what Callicrates told her) I think Polidamas anſwers as others do; but it is the noble qualities of his ſoul which is moſt commendable: Since you will not conſent with me (replyed he) that Polidamas hath a very ſhallow wit; I will apparently prove unto you that you have ten thouſand times more than he hath. You would do me the greateſt pleaſure in the world, replied ſhe. Truly, Madam, ſaid he unto her, I do not believe you. Do you think then, replyed ſhe, that I love Polydamas better than I do my ſelf? ſince I prefer his glory before my own. I do not ſay ſo, (ſaid he, and laughed) but I muſt tell you, I fear it, and think it. But I pray, Madam, (ſaid Callicrates, with the ſame freedom he uſed to all the world, whilſt Polydamas loves one half of the fair Parthenia, let a certain man whom I know love the other. Yet, Madam, when I ſay Polydamas loves the one half of Parthenia, I ſay not truly; for certainly he loves not half her beauty, though he ſee it every day. I think indeed he knows that it is great, that ſhe is of a good ſtature, that ſhe hath fair eyes, that her neck is whiter than ſnow, that her complexion is admirable, her hair fair, her mouth lovely, and all excellent; but as for that charming air, which is an ornament to all theſe, he knows it not at all. I am confident that though you pleaſe him infinitely, he knows not why you pleaſe him. There are ſuch pretty, I know not whats, in your face as infinitely tranſcends his ſphere of knowledge: He underſtands not the language of your eyes; your ſighs which are ſo ſubtle and eloquent, and which ſometimes makes known the ſweetneſs or bitterneſs of your heart, do not produce the ſame effects in his heart which they do in others; and to expreſs my very thoughts in one word: I am confident, that he who can be ſo happy, as to obtain ſo much favour from Parthenia as to love all in her, that Polydamas knows not; will have a better half than he. Callicrates ſpoke all this with ſo much audacity, that Parthenia had a mind to be angry, but ſhe had no time; For the Prince of Salamis coming in, Callicrates retired with as much ſerioufneſs in his looks, as if he had been all day talking upon nothing but Politiques, or Moral Philoſophie. In the mean time, ſince Parthenia did very much eſteem him, ſhe was very ſorry ſhe had ſuch an inclination to love a man whom ſhe eſteemed not: For ſince ſhe did not ſuſpect that Callicrates was in love with her, his words had a great influence upon her heart: Yet ſhe was not abſolutely reſolved to baniſh Polydamas at that time, as afterwards through the malice of Callicrates ſhe was, and thus it came about. Parthenia being one day ill, ſhe kept her Chamber, and by conſequence was viſited by very many; amongſt the reſt, Polidamas; and Callicrates, who being that day in one of his dumpiſh moods, which every one did chide him for, did ſit in a corner of Parthenia's Chamber, ſeeming not to underſtand what any ſaid. In the mean time, Polydamas not thinking that Callicrates was ſo ſilent, to the end he might hear the better, began to talk, as he uſed, to wit, with little coherence, leſs eloquence, and leaſt wit; yet with acceptation, becauſe his Perſon was very amiable: And as an amorous man is apt to ſpeak more unto her he loves than any other; So Polydamas to Parthenia: On the other ſide, Callicrates, having a cloſe deſign, and an admirable memory, not regarding what any of the reſt ſaid, harkned very attentively unto all Parthenia and Polydamas ſaid to each other: as he liſtned well, ſo he remembred better, ſince certainly he remembred word for word all that paſſed between them: So that the converſation ending, without a word unto any, in all haſte he went home; when as ſoon as he was come, he writ dialoguewiſe all that he heard Polydamas and Parthenia ſay, putting their names to each Paragraph, without any alteration. So that Parthenia ſpeaking always as well as any in the World, and Polydamas the worſt; the words of Polydamas wanting the grace of accent wherein they were pronounced: and the words of Parthenia gracing themſelves, this Dialogue was very delightful to read: For beſide the difference in their anſwers, the diſcourſe made moſt pitiful gibberiſh, as if it were a continued diſcourſe: But though Polydamas was not to be blamed or upbraided with this; yet Callicrates made uſe of it to ſerve his malice: Who, to loſe no time, went next morning betimes to Parthenia, whom he found alone; As ſoon as he was entered, the Princeſs remembring his ſilent dumps the day before, began to chide him, and to ask him whether he was yet in the humour of ſpeaking: No Madam, (ſaid he to her) but on the contrary, I am come hither this day to tell you what I thought yeſterday: You ſeemed ſo melancholy yeſterday, anſwered ſhe, that I do not think it will be any delighting matter, unleſs you were in the humour of compoſing Verſes: For I have heard ſay, thoſe who compoſe them, are as much ſeparated from themſelves, as you were yeſterday from the company whilſt you were in it. I aſſure you, Madam, ſaid he, I had no conference with the Muſes, yet I was in the merry vain of writing ſomething as pleaſant; But 'tis in Proſe, not Verſe: Since I know you are as good at the one as the other, replyed ſhe, I much deſire to ſee it, and therefore ſince you came hither this day to tell me what you thought yeſterday, I pray ſhew them: I ſwear, Madam, ſaid he unto her, though I came with that intent, yet I know not whether I ſhould ſhew you what I writ: No, no, Callicrates, (ſaid Parthenia, and ſuſpected nothing) never pump for any excuſes or denials, for I will ſee them: Then promiſe me, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) to do me ſo much honour, as to tell me ſincerely what you find ill in them; and obſerve unto me all the faults. I profeſs, Callicrates, (anſwered ſhe) this is a moſt admirable good one, that you ſhould think I can correct any thing you write: But to take all colour of excuſes from you, I promiſe you to tell what I think of them, that is as much as to ſay, I will promiſe you to commend them and you both. I aſſure you, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) you will be very indulgent, if you commend all I have writ; but to be ſincere, let me tell you that there are ſome things in what I ſhall let you ſee, which are not unworthy of your ſelf: And let me alſo aſſure you, there are other things, which are not ſo much as worthy of my ſelf, and which cannot pleaſe you, unleſs you be ſtrangely prejudicated: You do not uſe ſuch inequalities in what you write (replyed Parthenia) and I am confident you would not ſatisfie my deſire in ſeeing if they were ſo: You ſhall your ſelf be judge (ſaid he unto her, and gave her the Paper writ word for word, all the diſcourſe of Polydamas and Parthenia.) But how comes it to paſs (ſaid ſhe in taking it) that you put me to read what you have writ? The reaſon is,(replyed he) becauſe I ſhall be more delighted to hear you read them than my ſelf, and I am confident you underſtand them better. Callicrates being accuſtomed to vent a hundred witty tricks, Parthenia upon a ſudden ſuſpected one: But however ſhe had rather expoſe her ſelf to be deluded, than not ſatisfie her Curioſitie, and therefore ſhe opened the Paper, and firſt found this Title.

The anſwers of Polydamas and Parthenia, and of Parthenia and Polydamas.

She had no ſooner read this, but ſhe began to laugh: yet not with a bluſh, (and looking upon him) as being more deſirous to read in his face than in the Paper what he meant by this piece of knavery: Yet did ſhe not imagine the truth; for ſhe thought he would have informed Polydamas and her ſelf of ſomething: But in reading on, ſhe found her own very words, as well as thoſe of Polydamas; and indeed all their diſcourſe verbatim. Then had ſhe various apprehenſions, for at firſt ſhe thought it a pleaſant Piece of work, but immediately after, ſhe could not chuſe but be angry at Callicrates, at Polydamas, and her ſelf: at Callicrates for his knavery, at Polydamas for his little wit, and at her ſelf for her weakneſs. Yet out of honour ſhe concealed her thoughts as well as ſhe could, thinking it much better to hear his Rallarie, than ſhew her reſentment; and to that end, ſhe read the Paper from one end to the other, and was ſo extreamly aſhamed, that her heart ſhould ever have any diſpoſition to love him who ſpoke ſo, that ſhe abſolutely reſolved to Caſhier Polydamas out of her ſoul. All this while Callicrates looked attentively upon her: So that as ſoon as Parthenia had done reading, well Madam (ſaid he unto her) do you not confeſs there are many things in that you ſee, which deſerve your Cenſure? I confeſs, replied Parthenia, that you have as much knavery as wit: and I had need be as good unto you as I am, not to hate you extreamly for this trick which you have put upon me: Madam (ſaid he unto her) you are not ſo good as your word, for you promiſed to correct all my faults in what you read. You are ſo far from wiſe (ſaid ſhe unto him, and ſmiled) that I ſhould be as fooliſh as you are, if I ſhould take the pains to anſwer you ſeriouſly: However, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) certainly you will confeſs, that yeſterday you did not think that Polydamas ſpoke ſo ill as you do to day: I aſſure you (ſaid ſhe) I did not heed the anſwers of Polidamas, but my own, and I am beholding to you for nothing but for undeceiving me of the over good opinion I had of my ſelf; for I thought I had ſpoke better than I did. Ah, Madam, (ſaid he, and would have taken the paper from her) certainly you did not read them ſo well as you ſpoke them: I beſeech you give me leave to read your words; yet Callicrates could not get the paper out of Parthenia's hands, who kept them whether he would or no; perhaps if you deſire to ſee what was writ in this paper, that you might ſee the difference between the wit of Polidamas, and Parthenia: But, Sir, that Siſter which I have, who waits upon this Princeſs did tell them unto me, yet I cannot remember them; yet certainly nothing could be more different from another than the anſwers of Parthenia and Polydamas. In the mean time this conference of Callicrates and Parthenia, which began in rallarie, did end in a more ſerious diſcourſe: for paſſing inſenſibly from one thing to another, Callicrates moved Parthenia to confeſs ſhe could not but wonder Polydamas ſhould be ſo Amiable and have ſo little Wit. For Heavens ſake, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) do me the favour the firſt time you ſee him, and are in diſcontent with him, turn away your head and wink, that you may hear him, and not ſee him: and if after that you do not confeſs you have no cauſe to love him, I will for ever forſake thoſe hopes I have that you will never hate me: for really, Madam, there cannot be a greater difference between any two, than between the Princeſs Parthenia and Polydamas. Therefore, Madam, take my advice, prophane not thoſe excellencies which the Gods have given you, by giving your ſelf to one who cannot half underſtand them; but find one out that is able to know and adore you. This, Sir, was the conference between Parthenia and Callicrates, who left her with much ſatisfaction, that he had ſo well proſpered in his deſign: and indeed, ever ſince that day, Parthenia was Miſtreſs of her ſelf, and diſengaged her heart, and was able to look upon Polydamas as a Lover, whom ſhe would condemn unto deſpair, which was no ſmall joy unto Callicrates, who as oft as he met Polydamas, did treat him moſt cruelly, and abuſe him in the preſence of Parthenia; yet in ſuch a manner, as Polydamas did not perceive it, becauſe it was by applauding him for things which were not at all commendable, and in admiring all he ſaid, and making an Elogie upon every word he ſpake: and he had been more groſs in his abuſes, if the Princeſs had not impoſed ſilence, and forbidden him to uſe him ſo. In the mean time, the Prince of Salamis continued to ſee and ſerve her, though he made no great progreſs into her affection; and obſerving that Callicrates was much in her favour, but had not the leaſt thought of his being in love, though it was already noiſed in the world, he endeavoured to oblige him, and made him the confident of his deſigne; but Callicrates having no mind to turn ſollicitor for another in matter of love, told him, that he could do nothing for him, and that Parthenia was one who would take advice from none but her ſelf: But ſince he perceived that Polydamas was not yet enough out of Parthenia's

Books, he hinted ſuch things unto the Prince of Salamis, as moved him to apprehend, that as long as Polydamas was a viſitor of Parthenia, none ought to be pretender unto her: yet he told this as a mighty ſecret, for his deſign being to make the world believe Parthenia loved him, he would not Publiſh that ſhe had any inclination to Polydamas. But he told him all that he could deviſe which might move the Prince of Salamis to hate his Rival, and to make him quarrel with him, hoping thereby to be quit of two Rivals at once, either by killing each other, or by baniſhing them for fighting: and indeed his plot did hit, and that which did advance it, was the Prince of Salamis being one day in Parthenia's cloſet, ſhe went out for ſomething, and left this Prince with others in it, and the company coming out preſently after, left him in the Cloſet expecting Parthenia's return, ſo that looking upon divers things which lay upon the Table, he found a paper which the Princeſs had left and forgotten, and it proved to be that which Callicrates writ, with the anſwers of Polydamas and Parthenia; for the Princeſs would not burn it, becauſe ſhe kept it to cure her ſpirits in reading of them: ſo that the Prince of Salamis ſeeing the name of Polydamas and Parthenia, took up the Paper, and would ſee the contents of it; yet ſeeing there was much to read, and fearing the Princeſs would return before he had finiſhed, and being tranſported with a curioſity as great as his love, he took it and went away before the Princeſs returned into her cloſet: but he was ſtrangely amazed when he ſaw it, for it paſſed all mens underſtanding, nor he could not think that Parthenia, who had ſo much wit, could think well of all that Polydamas had ſaid, nor could he imagine it writ by Callicrates with her conſent, though he knew it to be his hand; nor could he believe, conſidering his ſuſpicions, that Parthenia loved Polydamas, that ſhe ſhould take any delight to ſee Callicrates full of ſuch raillery againſt him, ſo that not knowing what to think, he reſolved to make him who writ this fantaſtical Dialogue, tell the truth: he ſent then to ſeek Callicrates, and rather than fail of finding him, went himſelf to look him: but ſince this man, maugre his vanity he had in being thought to be Parthenia's Idol, and her Lover, had many other paſſions leſs honourable than that, the Prince of Salamis could not eaſily find him, though he went unto twenty ſeveral houſes to enquire: but at laſt, accidentally ſeeing him come out of a houſe which he never thought of, he ſent for him, and conjured him to tell him what was his deſign in writing thoſe anſwers of Polydamas, and giving them unto Parthenia. Sir, (ſaid he, with an anſwer as quick as his wit) I wonder much you ſhould not underſtand my deſign, and that you ſhould not ſee I have no other but to do you ſervice, in letting fair Parthenia ſee the odds that is between her wit and your Rival's. Ah Callicrates, ſaid the Prince of Salamis, why would you keep ſecret my obligations unto you? and why did you not let me know Parthenia ſuffered you to abuſe Polydamas? As ſhe hath much wit, replyed Callicrates, what reſentment ſoever ſhe hath, ſhe makes no expreſſions of them: However it be, ſaid the Prince of Salamis, all will do no good, ſince after this I ſee Polydamas in as great favour as ever. Callicrates perceiving that this Prince was not jealous of him, he kindled it againſt Polydamas by a hundred cunning expreſſions, ſo that when he left him, he left him more jealous than ever, but with more hope of revenge alſo againſt his Rival, imagining that ſince Parthenia out of her prudence had winked at Callicrates his jeering raillerie, ſhe would be alſo ſo diſcreet as to hide her reſentments at his quarrelling with him. The Prince of Salamis having this Fancy, it was not long before he put his deſign in exceution; for as there never wants a colour of a quarrel between two Rivals: The firſt occaſion that he met with, he began to contradict all that Polydamas ſaid, very obſtinately, and paſſing from contradictions unto angry diſputes, they fell from words to blows, and fought a Bloody duel. For the Prince of Salamis, having a ſecret deſign upon him, ſtayed for Polydamas in a great plain which is before Parthenia's Palace, ſo that this Princeſs was a ſpectator of the Combat out at her Window, which was ended before they could come in to part them. Which of theſe two had the advantage could not be judged, for they were both of them equally wounded, and their ſwords both broke when they cloſed, and fell; doing both of them what they could to vanquiſh each other; this combat made a great noiſe in the Court, but as for Callicrates, he laughed in his ſleeve: yet he went preſently to the Princeſs to grieve with her, or rather to ſee how ſhe took it: but ſhe thought him to be her friend, ſhe did not diſſemble how this combat had a great influence upon her heart; which news was nothing pleaſing unto Callicrates: for ſhe let him know, that ſhe hated the Prince of Salamis, and that ſhe loved Polydamas better than before, taking it very ill at the hands of the firſt, that he ſhould be ſo bold as to quarrel with the other in any conſideration of hers; not being ignorant, that it was he who firſt aſſaulted, and knowing that there could be no other fallings out between them, but for her intereſts. Truth is, Madam, (ſaid Callicrates to her) you have reaſon to be angry with the Prince of Salamis, and it is but juſt to hate him for his ſo little reſpect of you: But I cannot find you have any cauſe to love Pilydamas better, ſince he hath done nothing, but that he would not let himſelf be killed: for I cannot believe, Madam, you ſhould think he had any other end in defending his life, but to keep it for the love of you; and were I to judge upon the actions of theſe two Rivals, I ſhould think you are more of the two obliged unto the Prince of Salamis, than unto Polidamas, who for all this, hath no more wit than he had; for I proteſt, Madam, I am confident, that if he were himſelf to relate his Combat with ſuch Eloquence as he hath, you would wiſh the Prince of Salamis Victory. I aſſure you Callicrates (ſaid ſhe unto him) I have much ado not to be offended at you, for ſcoffing at a thing which both grieves and angers me: And the truth is, Sir, though Parthenia had not contracted any affection with Polidamas, yet ſhe could not chuſe but be very ſenſible of his misfortune, and the more, becauſe falling in a Fever he dyed of his wounds, the ſixth day after the combat; ſo that Callicrates, needing not now oppoſe that affection which he feared was in her heart towards him, he began to pity him in her preſence, ſaying, that the high qualities of his ſoul, and the handſomneſs of his perſon, did ſerve to excuſe the imperfections of his wit, deſiring if it were poſſible, that her ſorrows for his death, might keep her from any affection to the Prince of Salamis, and moved him to go out of Paphos until all things were appeaſed: but when Callicrates was out of Parthenia's preſence, he ſcoffed as much at Polydamas dead as living; and ſaid that all the Court was beholding unto the Prince of Salamis for ridding it of a man who ſpoke ſo much nonſenſe. In the mean time, to ſatisfie his vanity, whilſt there was no profeſſed Lovers of Parthenia, he was an eternal viſitant, and ſaw her every minute ſhe was viſible; and when ſhe was not, he affected to ſpeak of her, and oftentimes to name her in lieu of another: So that he called every one Parthenia, ſeeming alwayes to reprehend himſelf, and be angry that his tongue ſhould ſo betray the thoughts of his heart. In ſhort, he carried it ſo, that all the Court ſuſpected him to be in love with Parthenia, none yet daring to ſpeak of it unto the Princeſs: For certainly (ſaid every one) ſhe muſt needs perceive that which all the world ſees; and if ſhe does ſee it, why does it not diſpleaſe her, and move her to baniſh Callicrates from her? So they thought Callicrates in Love with Parthenia, but never told their thoughts unto her, who never ſuſpected any ſuch thing, ſince he never talked unto her but of things indifferent, and of ſmall conſequence. As for him, ſince he affected more the ſatisfaction of his vanity than his love, fear of baniſhment would never let him tell her ſeriouſly that he loved her, to the end there might be more ſuſpition that he was loved. In the mean time the Prince of Salamis having ſetled his buſineſs, and the Phyſitians reporting that Polidamas died rather of the ill diſpoſition of his humours than of his wounds, he returned unto the Court as ſoon as he was recovered; and he knew ſo well how to tamper with all the Parents of Parthenia, that his Marriage was concluded upon before ever he ſpake unto her. I ſhall not relate unto you, Sir, what unwillingneſs was in Parthenia to obey the commands of her Parents, in looking upon the Prince of Salamis as the man whom ſhe was to marry; nor how Callicrates did augment her averſion to it: But give me leave to tell you, Sir, there was no remedy, Parthenia muſt marry the Prince of Salamis, and Callicrates muſt be contented: His comfort was, Parthenia loved him not, and in his hopes ſhe would make him her ſecret confident. Alſo his hopes were, that all the world knowing Parthenia loved not her Husband, it would be more eaſie for him to make them believe ſhe loved him. Yet what vanity ſoever he had, and what ill opinion ſoever he held of women in general, I am confident he could never think Parthenia, whoſe vertue he knew very well, could have any vitious thoughts in all her life, though ſhe had a ſenſible and paſſionate ſoul. In concluſion, Sir, the Prince of Salamis married Parthenia much againſt her Will, and he expreſſed ſo much love unto her at their Marriage, that ſhe ſweetened her bitterneſs, and diminiſhed her averſion to him. He gave her in caſe he dyed before, the Principality of Salamis, being more ſubmiſs unto her than ever any was. But, Sir, as I have before deſcribed the beauty of this Princeſs unto you, ſo, is it poſſible you ſhould believe that the eyes of this Prince being accuſtomed unto the beauty of Parthenia, ſhould take leſs delight in looking upon her, than in a freſh beauty, which was a thouſand degrees inferiour unto hers? Yet it is true, that this Prince loving her only becauſe ſhe was fair, and his eyes being glutted with the cuſtom of ſeeing her, his paſſion leſſened, and his ſoul inſenſibly fell off from lukewarm to indifferency, and from indifferency to ſcorn: For ſince he was of a fantaſtical ſpirit, the humours of Parthenia and his kept no correſpondency. I leave you, Sir, to imagine, how ſad this Princeſs was, when ſhe found her ſelf ſlighted: Indeed it troubled her ſo much, that ſhe fell ſick, but in a languiſhing diſeaſe, as though it did not much hazard her life, yet it robb'd her of her beauty. And you may imagine, Sir, that he who ſcorned her when ſhe was the faireſt in all Cyprus, did not love in the Autumn of her beauty, but began to be harſher than before unto her: He had twenty ſeveral Paramours, who for all their glittering beauties were yet inferiour unto Parthenia, notwithſtanding her decayed alteration. The mutable mind of this Prince did ſo amaze the World, that none could imagine the ſecret cauſe of the ill correſpondence between Parthenia and him; and every one had his cenſure for him: Inſomuch as he having a hint of it, grew angry, and began to ſpeak aloud, that he could not conceive why they ſhould think it ſtrange he could not love his Wife, ſince according to his ſenſe, it was neither handſome nor reaſonable: For (ſaid he unto me, when I asked him what anſwer I ſhould return unto thoſe who wondered why he loved not Parthenia, who was yet the faireſt in Cyprus?) I think there is no ſuch extravagancy in the world, as for a Husband to be always in love with his Wife; and if Parthenia would have kept me ſtill in love with her, ſhe ſhould never have married me. I confeſs, Sir, (ſaid I unto him) there ought to be a difference between a Husband and a Lover; and I agree with you, that there are a hundred gallantries which are ornaments in a Lover, that would be ridiculous in a Husband. But, Sir, by your favour, this difference ought not to reach ſo far as the heart; certainly one ought to love and honour her he marries, as much after, as before marriage: Civility and Reſpect muſt not be baniſhed, but preſerved as preſervers of Love; leſt incivil familiarity ſhould entirely rout it out. Alas, Megaſides, ſaid he, it ſeems you were never married, nor very well know the nature of Love. Truly, Sir, ſaid I unto him, I think you do not know it your ſelf; for if you did, why do you not love Parthenia, ſince ſhe is as fair now, as when you were in love with her? The reaſon is, ſaid he, becauſe, that beauty which one enjoys is like perfumes, which continual cuſtom brings one not to ſmell at all. And for my part, I am perſwaded, that as one doth accuſtom himſelf unto a beauty, one may likewiſe accuſtom himſelf unto uglineſs; ſo conſequently whoſoever will marry, ought not to be ſo curious in chuſing one that is fair. Then, Sir, ſaid I unto him, why did you marry Parthenia? I married her, ſaid he, becauſe love led me out of my wits; and I choſe rather to run the hazard of being her Lover, than not to enjoy her. The truth is, there is ſomething in Marriage, which is ſo inconſiſtent with Love, that I cannot endure people ſhould blame me for not loving Parthenia. I cannot conceive, replied

plied I, you can love other women, who are a thouſand times leſs fair than ſhe. Were you married, anſwered he, you would know how, as well as I: The truth is, whoſoever takes away the ſweetneſs of Novelty from love, takes away love it ſelf; and whoſoever doth baniſh freſh deſires, and freſh hopes from it, leaves no zeal or delight in it. Conſider what the paſſion of a man will be, who alwaies ſees the ſame woman, who has no new hopes, no freſh deſires, and who ſees nothing in the time to come, but that his Wife will grow old and ugly. But, Sir, ſaid I unto him, though you are not capable of a conſtant love, yet let me adviſe you at leaſt to eſteem Parthenia; let your love become friendſhip. Had I never been in love with her, replied he, or had I married her for no other intereſts, I could have done as you adviſe me. But, Megaſides, to fall from love to friendſhip, is a thing I cannot think poſſible, nor am I capable of it. Indeed I am ſometimes aſhamed to ſee how weary I grow when I have been with her one poor quarter of an hour. Yet ſince I cannot love her, ſhe muſt ſute her mind to her fortune, and let me alone to live as I liſt. Theſe, Sir, were the thoughts of this Prince when he began to leave loving Parthenia; but he was not the only man who changed his thoughts of her; for Callicrates alſo finding that ſhe was not now the glorious Star of the Court, he fell off from his frequent viſits; all the Beauties whom ſhe had robbed of their Lovers at her firſt arrival in Paphos, were raviſhed at her misfortune; and all her Lovers whom ſhe had rigorouſly treated, rejoyced: Inſomuch as Parthenia, ſeeing ſhe had loſt all that her beauty had gotten, had ſuch an indignation againſt her ſelf, that ſhe left the Court, and went unto Salamis, where ſhe lived moſt obſcure and ſolitarily; but where ſhe found a hundred things to charm her ſorrows, and ſolitude afforded her much ſweetneſs, ſince the cauſe of her grief was out of ſight; and as ſhe ſaw nothing which pleaſed her, ſo ſhe ſaw nothing which vexed her; and the abſence of her husband, and all thoſe that forſook her with her beauty, made her mind very ſerene; ſo that uſing her ſelf by degrees unto a kind of melancholy, which ſeiſeth upon a ſoul and never troubles it, ſhe grew wondrous well contented, and recovered her beauty. This being the ſtate of things, ſo it chanced, that the Prince of Salamis died ſuddenly at Paphos, in his return from hunting: And the King made choice of Callicrates, as him that was the ancient friend of Parthenia, to carry the news of his death unto her. I am confident, Sir, you will imagine that it was impoſſible this Princeſs ſhould grieve violently for the death of her husband who had ſo ſcorned her; yet was ſhe much more moved at it, than in all probability ſhe would: For when Callicrates acquainted her with his death, ſhe ſhed tears, but not in ſo great abundance. But Callicrates could diſcern her eyes had recovered their firſt luſtre; and he found her ſo admirably fair, that in lieu of telling her what he had premeditated, he ſtood and gazed upon her, only telling her that her husband was dead: Yet he could not ſee her long that day; for ſhe retired, and ſat upon her bed, purpoſely to receive the viſits which ſhe foreſaw would be made: And indeed about two hours after the news was known, all of any quality in Salamis came unto her. In the mean time, ſhe ſent back Callicrates the next morning, though he had no deſire to go ſo ſoon; but when he was returned, his report of Parthenia's beauty was ſo high, that all the Court talked on nothing elſe but this wonderful alteration. I ſhall not ſpend any time, Sir, in telling you how the Corps of the Prince of Salamis was carried to the place of his name; but give me leave to tell you, Sir, that as ſoon as all ceremonious mournings were over, Parthenia made a voyage to the Court upon a buſineſs which concerned the Principality of Salamis; alſo that perhaps ſhe was not ſorry that ſhe was as fair as ever; for Parthenia was not above eighteen years of Age: However ſhe returned unto Paphos, where ſhe dimmed all that could pretend to any beauty, and captivated no fewer hearts than ſhe did at firſt; but hers was more difficult to be caught then ever, and ſhe was ſo reſolutely determined not to receive the affections of any, that ſhe did not think her ſelf ſo much as obliged unto any that proffered theirs unto her. And as Callicrates one day chid her for this cold indifferency; and telling her that ſolitude had made her ſalvage and unſociable, ſhe ſtiffly maintained, that ſhe had no reaſon to think her ſelf beholding unto thoſe who loved her, becauſe her beauty pleaſed them: For the truth is, ſaid ſhe, I am reſolved not to expoſe my ſelf unto the ſame misfortune I have had: and as long as I believe, that they do not love me, but becauſe I pleaſe their eyes; and for a fading thing which a little ſickneſs may take from me, I cannot much build upon ſuch kind of affections. But, Madam, replied Callicrates, if you take beauty away from love, you may as well take away his arrows and bow, and quite diſarm him. I would not take beauty away, replied ſhe, but on the contrary, I would have ſuch uſe made of it, as of a Candle: do you not ſee, that when fire is put unto a faggot, it burns, though the Candle which lighted it be taken away? or extinguiſhed? So would I have beauty do, which ſets hearts on fire: but I would not have them extinguiſh, when it which ſet them on fire is extinguiſhed: Your ſimile, Madam, replied Callicrates, is full of wit: Yet certainly the fire which laſts long, muſt have ſomething to maintain it: 'Tis true, ſaid ſhe, but it muſt not be beauty, for that is only to kindle the fire, not to preſerve it: It would be a rare World, if love ſhould always change as oft as the face of thoſe they love doth: If ſo, a Rheume would kill a thouſand Lovers: and a gentle fever would break a thouſand Chains, and ſet as many Slaves at Liberty: No, no, things muſt not be ſo; and whoſoever loves only the beauty of Parthenia, ſhall never get her love: I would have them love all Parthenia, and not by halfs, as you told me when Polydamas lived; I would have them love her for ſomething beſides her beauty, that they may not fall off when it fades: did not you do ſo Callicrates before I went to Salamis? 'Tis true, Madam, I did; anſwered he, but it was becauſe I could not endure to ſee you miſerable: Fie, fie, replied ſhe, you cannot make me believe that: but I am perſwaded you left me, either becauſe I had fewer Company, or becauſe my friendſhip was leſs conſiderable: But know, ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled, that I never loved Callicrates, but for the wit of Callicrates, I liked his facetious Letters, and his ſmooth Verſes, and his pleaſant conceits: otherwiſe what did I care whether he were happy or miſerable? Alſo I thought the days in which you ſhewed me none of my Letters (ſaid ſhe in ſuch a manner as might let him ſee ſhe was not ignorant of his proceedings) or Verſes, or on which you were not pleaſant, to be ill ſpent in your company, and but for them, I ſhould very near have hated you, for I cannot endure inconſtancy, either in friends or Lovers; but it is moſt of all odious in friends: Since ſo, Madam, ſaid he, I beſeech you do me the honour, to rank me amongſt your Lovers, that I may be leſs criminal. Since I cannot revoke what's paſt (ſaid ſhe and ſmiled) I cannot though I would make you more or leſs innocent than you are, but in juſtifying you on the one ſide, I ſhall condemn you on the other; therefore it is much better I look upon you as an unfaithful friend, than as an unconſtant Lover, ſince which way ſoever you ſhall become the laſt of theſe, you will be always criminal, and always ill treated. However I ſhould be glad, Madam, ſaid he unto her, that you would do me the honour I ask, for I muſt confeſs, I cannot endure to be diſhonoured, and called an unfaithful friend, ſince in being one, I ſhould have renounced all virtue and generoſity: but it is otherwiſe in being only an inconſtant Lover, for ſuch a one is only accuſed of lightneſs and weakneſs: Yet I think folly may be added unto them (replied ſhe.) Since that is a thing which is not diſhonourable, replied he, it ſhall be no great obſtacle unto me; and I had rather you ſhould think me fooliſh and out of reaſon, than think me culpable. Though Callicrates was formerly wont to ſpeak many times as boldly as thus, without any ſuſpicion of ſpeaking ſeriouſly; yet now Parthenia took it ill he ſhould ſpeak thus, for he ſpoke it with ſuch an Air, ſo bold as diſpleaſed her: So that both ſhe and Callicrates ſtood a long while ſilent, and Parthenia had no mind to begin diſcourſe, for ſhe obſerved that Callicrates was not ſorry for her anger: but this ſilence laſted not long, for company came in; and Callicrates went out, very glad Parthenia underſtood him: Yet he reſolved to appeaſe her at what rate ſoever, though it coſt him a hundred Oaths that he did not love her, and that he ſpoke as he did, only to put her into a quarter of an hours impatience. However, Sir, there was ſuch a Fatality in the beauty of Parthenia, as brought upon her a hundred miſeries, either by thoſe who loved her, or by thoſe who envyed her, or by Callicrates. There was alſo a man of very high account who loved her, but not long; and ſhe was ſo aſſaulted by all the Court, and all the World, that ſhe was not able to endure it; and ſo much the leſs, becauſe the Prince Philoxipes returning from War, Courted her in marriage for a friend of his; ſo that to deliver her ſelf from ſo many importunities at once, ſhe returned to her ſolitude. She had no fancy to Salamis, but to the Country; and ſince I had a Siſter whoſe name was Amaxita, whom ſhe loved very tenderly, ſhe entreated her to go with her unto her accuſtomed deſart, which ſhe willingly conſented unto. In the mean time, ſince Parthenia had ever a paſſionate Soul, ſhe was ſomething perplexed to ſee that ſhe could meet with none whom ſhe could love: Alſo the Cuſtom of Cyprus requiring that all Ladies ſhould be loved, ſhe was ſomething vexed, that all thoſe Ladies, who were her Enemies, becauſe ſhe was fair, ſhould Triumph in her abſence. But that which moſt vexed her, was a piece of knavery which Callicrates played her. I think, Sir, I told you not that ſince their laſt conference which ended in ſilence, he never ſpoke in private with Parthenia, who alwaies took occaſions to prevent him, and who treated him ſo coldly, that if he had not found out a way to make this coldneſs ſerve his Vanity; he would have dyed with ſorrow: But ſince this happened a little before the departure of Parthenia, he made every one believe, but did not ſay it directly, that this coldneſs of hers to him was but diſſembled; and the more to confirm this belief after the Princeſs of Salamis was gone, he writ unto her very often; yet writing nothing that could poſſibly diſpleaſe: Moreover he ſent her a hundred pretty knacks, and ſent them ſo handſomly, that it had been hard for her to refuſe ſuch diverſions as were but neceſſary in that ſolitude wherein ſhe lived: So that to make it laſt the longer, ſhe reſolved to anſwer. But though her Letters were only Jollities, and of things very indifferent, and written with deſign that he ſhould ſhew them; yet he did not ſhew one of them. So that every one knowing Parthenia writ unto him, and ſeeing that he made a myſterious ſecret of her Letters; the Enemies of this Princeſs endeavoured to make it thought that the Correſpondency which ſhe held with Callicrates was more than matters of wit only. But the further to ſatisfie his vanity, he diſſembled an intended journey, and gave out ſuch unlikely pretences of it, as made every one full of Curioſity: And to make it more general, he bad adieu to all the Court: After which, he departed without any with him, and in the Evening, ſaying that it was hot, and therefore beſt travelling in the night; Moreover, ſince he made no queſtion but ſome would have very obſervant eyes upon all his actions, as ſoon as he was out of the Town, he took the way which leads where the Princeſs of Salamis was, and went within fifty furlongs of the houſe; then turning upon the left hand, he went to hide himſelf with a friend he had thereabouts, not telling the true cauſe; and there he ſtayed fifteen whole daies: After which, he returned to Paphos, where thoſe who watched him, had publiſhed that he was gone to the Princeſs of Salamis: So that when he returned to the Court, every one asked him why he would conceal the place where he had been: But the more to make it believed, he ſeemed to be in a mighty chafe againſt them that ſaid ſo: The buſineſs made ſo great a noiſe all over, that I writ unto my Siſter, purpoſely that ſhe might let Parthenia know it, who made no queſtion, but that this was ſome knavery of Callicrates; So that this did more and more confirm her in her averſion which ſhe had to the World. In the mean time, Parthenia did ſo clearly make it known at Paphos that he was not with her, as none did doubt it; but yet they could not accuſe Callicrates of this impoſture, becauſe he always ſaid he was not with the Princeſs of Salamis. However Parthenia broke off all manner of commerce with him: But as if the Gods would have death Triumph over all thoſe whom the eyes of Parthenia had vanquiſhed, Callicrates, a little while after this impoſture, dyed, extreamly lamented by all thoſe that knew him, and even by thoſe alſo whom he had moſt cruelly deluded:

for his excellency of wit, and other rare qualities, excuſed the malignant vanity of his Soul. The fair Parthenia amongſt the reſt lamented him: notwithſtanding all Cauſes of complaint which he had given her: Now was the time, Sir, when the Prince Philoxipes fell in love with Policrite: So that being buſie with his own Paſſion, he let the Princeſs of Salamis live as ſhe pleaſed: Yet would he ſometimes invite her to quit her Solitude; but this was not often: Yet ſince he was married, he began to importune Parthenia to return unto her friends, and not to paſs away the reſt of her days as ſhe did. But all his preſſures were in vain: For ſhe told him, that her reſolution was to ſubmit the conduct of her life unto the Gods: and in order to that, ſhe had ſent unto Delphos to conſult with the Oracle, and to enquire what ſhe ſhould do to be happy, expecting the anſwer with much impatience; yet when it came, ſhe was not much ſatisfied with it: For the Oracle anſwered her in theſe words; That if ſhe would be happy, ſhe muſt marry a man who loved her without the helps of her beauty; and that on the contrary, if ſhe married any one of thoſe whom her eyes had Captivated, ſhe ſhould be the moſt unfortunate woman of her time. I leave you to imagine, Sir, how much this anſwer perplexed Parthenia, for to imagine that any one could love her, and not ſee her, ſhe could not comprehend it poſſible: To think alſo one ſhould ſee her, and not think her fair, and in ſeeing her, ſeparate her ſpirit from her body, and adore the one, without loving the other, this was as far fetched a conceit as the other: So that ſhe concluded it to be the will of the Gods not to love any, but that ſhe ſhould ſtill live in ſolitude: For, ſaid ſhe, ſince the Gods do tell me, that if I marry any one of thoſe whom my eyes have captivated, I ſhall be the moſt unfortunate woman of my time: they do tacitely tell me, I muſt never marry. But though you ſhould take this reſolution (ſaid the Prince Philoxipes, who loved her exceedingly) is it therefore neceſſary that you ſhould baniſh your ſelf from all civil Society? Certainly I ſhould (ſaid ſhe unto him) for why ſhould I expoſe my ſelf unto the aſſaults of any that will profeſs ſervice, and perhaps perſwade me to ſlight the counſel of the Gods? For my part, replied Philoxipes, I do not think we underſtand this Oracle as it ought to be, for the Oracle of Delphos would never counſel you unto a thing ſo oppoſite unto the Laws of the Goddeſs whom we adore, who would have us love and be loved: for my part, if I thought it, I ſhould adviſe you to ſupplicate this Goddeſs, for a reſolution of this doubt which I think is well raiſed. The opinion of Philoxipes ſeemed ſo reaſonable unto Parthenia, that ſhe went her ſelf into the Temple, which is upon the fartheſt part of the Iſle towards the Eaſt, to conſult with the Oracle of Venus Vrania: The Princeſs Policrite carried her thither, and I had the honour to go with her, and to be preſent, when ſhe asked whether ſhe ought to underſtand the Oracle of Delphos as ſhe did? But, Sir, ſhe was extreamly ſurpriſed, and ſo was all the company, when the Oracle anſwered her, That it was not more true that you were the greateſt Prince in the world, and that you ſhould be hereafter as happy as heretofore unfortunate, than it was true that this which the Oracle of Delphos ſaid ſhould come to paſs. The Prince Philoxipes, Sir, was beyond expreſſions joyed, to ſee that you were ſo highly in favour with the Gods, as that their Oracles ſhould Trumpet your praiſes over all the earth: and it may be truly ſaid, that never ſince the time of Licurgus, who heretofore received the like honour from Delphos, did the like happen till now. The Prince Philoxipes then was much comforted by it, for the ſlender ſatisfaction which the Princeſs of Salamis received from this Oracle: for indeed ſhe could make no other conſtruction of that from Delphos, and this Oracle, but that the Gods would have her paſs away her life unſeen of any, and unloved, which is a kind of ſhame and malediction in our Iſle. But, Sir, that which the Prince Philoxipes moſt rejoyced at, was to ſee the Gods not only truly to commend you, but alſo to promiſe a period to your misfortunes, ſo that he no ſooner carried the Princeſs of Salamis into her ſolitude, but he embarked one of his Servants to bring you this pleaſing news: yet by misfortune the Veſſel in which that man imbarked ſuffered Shipwrack, and the man periſhed;the Prince Philoxipes not hearing any thing of it until a long time after, ſo that he could no ſooner let you know the glorious teſtimony that the Gods did render unto your virtue, and I am confidently perſwaded that it was the pleaſure of the Gods, you ſhould not know this Oracle until that which concerned the Princeſs of Salamis was found to prove true; ſo that there might be more ground for your hopes and belief of what they ſaid concerning you. Give me leave to tell you, Sir, that ſince this Princeſs received the laſt anſwer from Venus Vrania, ſhe looked upon her Cell, as the place where ſhe was to live and dye, and took as much pains to hide her Beauty, as others did to ſhew theirs; The reading, the walking, and converſation of my Siſter, who would never forſake her, were all her recreations: the Prince Philoxipes, Policrite, and Dorida, did ſometimes give her a viſit, but it was very rarely. Parthenia imployed her ſelf ſometimes to make her Priſon more pleaſant, in cauſing the Chambers to be painted, and making Gardens: In the mean time, though ſhe ſtrove to Eclipſe her beauty, yet it did every day increaſe, her Cheeks had freſh Roſes grew in them, and the luſtre of her eyes ſhined more glorious than ever: But the preticeſt wonder was, that though Parthenia ſaw no body, yet ſhe was nothing negligent in her dreſs, but ſtill had as great a care of her beauty as if ſhe had a deſign to conquer a thouſand hearts,as if ſhe had thought,that though it was forbidden her to love any, yet ſhe would employ her inclination to love, and be beloved of her ſelf: and certainly a more beautiful object could not be ſeen, ſince Parthenia was never ſo fair at Court, as I ſaw her in her ſolitude, where ſhe ſuffered me ſomtimes to come and viſit my Siſter: yet for all that, on ſome certain days ſhe would be ſomthing out of tune, and ſo give over her ſelf to Melancholy, that ſhe would fall out with her own Beauty: 'Tis true,her humours angred none but her ſelf, for ſhe would even then vent a hundred excellent things to thoſe that could underſtand them.I remember one day when I was there,and found her in one of thoſe humours when ſhe was off the hooks in her conceit, and when I heard her wiſh ſhe were not of ſo high a quality, to the end ſhe might be more Miſtreſs of her ſelf, and leſs obſerved by others: and when I heard her wiſh her ſelf of another ſex; however, Madam, ſaid I unto her, you cannot deſire to be more fair than you are. Ah, Megaſides, ſaid ſhe unto me, how infinitely are you miſtaken? For I proteſt in the humour now that I am in, I had rather be ſuch a one as Æſop is deſcribed, who they ſay, was the moſt ill favoured man in the world, than to be the faireſt woman eye ever ſaw. I confeſs Madam, ſaid Amaxita, that I cannot believe you, or be of your mind. Perhaps ſo (ſaid Parthenia, and ſmiled) but however, I cannot think beauty to be ſo great a jewel as it is imagined; at leaſt it is none of thoſe ſweets which have no mixture of bitterneſs with them. For my part, Madam, ſaid I unto her, I am not of your opinion: For I am perſwaded that beauty is one of the moſt excellent gifts of the Gods: Do you not ſee what a ſoveraign influence it hath upon all hearts above any thing elſe? It charmeth Marble, and makes it mollible; it tames Tygers, and makes them affable, and ſubjects the moſt cruel, rebellious, and ambitious ſpirits. 'Tis true, ſaid Parthenia, but it cannot keep thoſe who are inconſtant; and I have known ſome, but of common beauty, which have been more conſtantly loved than any others. Since the number of Inconſtants is leſs than thoſe I named (anſwered I) and ſince Inconſtancy hath its birth from the hearts of Lovers, and not from the eyes of their Miſtreſſes: It is not to be wondered that it ſhould be ſo. Yet, Madam, without all diſpute, of all the excellent gifts of Nature, Beauty is incomparably the greateſt. But not moſt durable (replied ſhe) and therefore I cannot think a thing ſo fading, can deſerve the Epithete of good, ſince its ſweets are mingled with ſo many bitter Ingredients. I pray examine what pleaſure thoſe find who are owners of beauty: In their Infancy they are not ſo much as ſenſible of it; in more ripe years they injure other beauties; or which is worſe, are injured: if they be of fair complexion, then they cannot endure the brown; or if they be brown, they cannot endure the fair; all that's as fair as themſelves, diſpleaſeth and frets their hearts: Moreover if a Lady look a little pale, or her eyes a little hollow, there needs no more to make all the Town ſay, Alas, how ſhe's changed! She was fair, ſays one; There goes a withered beauty, ſays another; and every one hath his cenſorious vote. But ſay they ſhould not ſay ſo, what's the reſult of the fineſt Beauty? It gets one many Lovers, whoſe love laſts no longer than it doth: It attracts at randome, both the wiſe and the fooliſh, the handſome and ugly; and vaniſheth often before youth, and infallibly when age comes. So that thoſe who love their Wives becauſe they are fair, will moſt certainly come to hate, and at laſt ſlight them. I pray then judge whether Beauty be a thing ſo deſirable. Though all ſhould be true (replied Amaxita) yet I had rather be fair, and run the hazard of being ſlighted when I am old, than not to be fair, and be ſure to be ſlighted when I am young: For truly if one be not fair, there is requiſite abundance of wit to ſupply that want: And ſince more men are able to judge of the beauty in a face, than they can of wit, or ſoul, the world will follow the fair, and let fine ſouls ſhift for themſelves. However it be, ſaid Parthenia, ſince I am perſwaded that the higheſt misfortune is to be once loved, and then not to be ſo; and ſince Beauties are more expoſed unto that danger than any others, I do not recant of any thing I ſaid. Theſe, Sir, were the opinions of Parthenia, whil'ſt ſhe was in her melancholy moods; and this was the life ſhe lived, when a Gallant of high eſteem, called Timantes, came to Paphos, with an equipage proportionable to his Quality and high birth, and ſutable to the magnificence of his mind and riches, which were both as high as his Quality. This Timantes, Sir, was deſcended from King Minos, who raigned long in Crete: And though the Crown was not inveſted in his houſe, but the form of Government changed, yet the people did highly reſpect thoſe who were deſcended from their ancient Kings, inſomuch as they had the higheſt honours, and greateſt authority amongſt them. So that it may be ſaid, that though the Father of Timantes had not the name of a King, yet he had very near the authority, eſpecially in matters of [illegible] true, that ſince he did ſtrictly obſerve the [illegible]ous King which before I named, and who was a pattern for all the Legiſlators of Greece, he did not deceive that truſt which the people repoſed in him, but did infinitely purchaſe their love; and no wonder; for I am confident, that whoſoever is an obſerver of the Laws, will eaſily get love and obedience alſo. This, Sir, was the deſcent of Timantes, whoſe perſon was extreamly handſom, and whoſe wit was above ordinary capacities. The reaſon of his voyage had no matter of privacy in it, and being born in an Iſle which had a controverſie with ours in point of Reputation, he had a longing curioſity to ſee whether Cyprus was to be preferred before Crete, or Crete Cyprus: So that his travel being a voyage of pleaſure and curioſity only, he arrived at Paphos, as I ſaid, with a moſt magnificent Train and Equipage. His Quality was no ſooner known, but the King did him all imaginable honours; and his merits were no ſooner diſcovered, but he was eſteemed beyond all expreſſions: So that in a few days Timantes was no ſtranger in our Court: The Queen Aretephile much honour'd him; the Prince Philoxipes had contracted a cloſe friendſhip with him; Policrite eſteemed him, and not a Lady in all the Court, but had a good word for him. As it is the cuſtom of all Courts to double their diverſions in favour of ſtrangers, the like was there for Timantes: But whether in company, or Balls, or Sports, or Walks, or publick Feaſts, Timantes was the only man of ſpirit, wit, behaviour, and magnificence. So that no one was talked on in Paphos but him, his reputation rung as loud, and reached as far as where the Princeſs of Salamis kept her ſolitudes; and I think I was the firſt who deſcribed him unto her. Yet ſhe did all ſhe could to hinder me, ſaying, ſhe would not willingly know any more what paſſed in the world, ſince ſhe had quitted it: But notwithſtanding, preſently after, ſhe asked me, which of all the Ladies in the Court was it that moſt moved the heart of Timantes? Believe me, Madam, ſaid I unto her, hitherto his Civility hath been ſo equal unto all, that it ſeems he's not in love with any: For at a grand Feaſt, where there was uſed a kind of delightful Combat, where thoſe which fought had their devices upon their Bucklers: Timantes repreſented ſented upon his, a Phœnix with this Motto;

I ſtay until the Sun do burn me.

Certainly, ſaid Parthenia, this Stranger puts none of the Ladies out of hope to conquer his heart, to the end none ſhould hate him as long as he ſtays at Paphos. In the mean time, Megaſides, you would oblige me very much in acquainting me with thoſe diverſions which I am ignorant of: And therefore when you viſit your Siſter hereafter, I pray you acquaint me with what the Court hath more than it had when I was there; what new diverſions, what freſh gallants, and what the old ones, who are paſt diverſions, ſay. This, Sir, Parthenia heard me ſpeak of Timantes the firſt time; but I was not the only one who told her of him: For the Prince Philoxipes went to ſee her, and did the ſame; Policrite alſo, and Dorida writ unto her; ſo that ſhe had a moſt exact Idea of Timantes; Yet would ſhe never conſent that the Prince Philoxipes ſhould bring him thither, as he affected; this Prince telling her, that a Stranger would not interrupt her ſolitude: But ſhe did ſo earneſtly forbid him, that he durſt not bring him; or, to ſay better, the Gods would not permit him, ſince they would have Timantes and Parthenia acquainted in another manner. But, Sir, before I tell you how it was, be pleaſed to know, that there was a fair houſe of Timoclea's Fathers, about a days journey from Paphos, about half way unto the town or place where Parthenia lived; in this place there was a Labyrinth of Myrtle trees, whoſe hedges were ſo thick, and ſo high, that one ſhall be as much puzled to get out of it, as out of the famous Labyrinth of Egypt, or that in Crete, but this was made with ſuch art, that thoſe who were in them of Egypt or Crete, yet could not find out the iſſues of this: For as that of Crete was made by ingenious Dedalus, when Minos kept there the Minotaure, whoſe model Dedalus borrowed from that of Egypt: So likewiſe that which is at Paphos was made by a man, who, having ſeen both the other, took ſomething out of the one, and ſomething out of the other, and contrived one of the moſt pleaſant diverſions in the world: The Architecture ſeemed in Myrtle as if it had been in Marble, conveying from room to room, from Cloſet to Cloſet, and from gallery to gallery: In divers places there were erected Statues of Alabaſter, and Braſs, which yet were no notions of the ways in, or out, becauſe the very ſame were placed in many places alike; there were alſo ſeveral ſeats of graſs-cuſhions, whereupon to reſt the weary limbs of wanderers, or for thoſe that knew the paſſes to ſit and contemplate. The center of this Labyrinth, where all theſe ways did meet, was a moſt pleaſant round, in the midſt of which was a moſt admirable ſource of water, which was conveyed over the hedges as high as they were. This, Sir, was the Labyrinth which Timantes had ſo much curioſity to ſee, and with more longing deſire, becauſe he had ſeen that in Crete, which was viſited from all parts of the World: He ſpoke often of going to it: and the Prince Philoxipes intended to make one, but falling ſick, his journey was ſtopped: So that Timantes turned his intentions into a hunting deſign, with ſome others of quality in Paphos: But as chance would have it, Timantes loſt his way, and wandred from the reſt of the company, with a friend who travelled with him, whoſe name was Antimaques; So that not knowing were they were, they eſpied at their coming out of a Wood, a very ſtately houſe, ſtanding in the midſt of a great pleaſant Plain; They no ſooner ſaw it, but went thither, both out of curioſity, and to ask where they were, and which was their way to Paphos: Timantes going firſt, went ſtraight to the door, and found it open: Then came into a great Baſe Court, where he ſaw no body: Yet he and Antimaques lighted from their horſes, and leaving them with a ſervant which followed them, they entered into a Garden of a prodigious bigneſs, whoſe door alſo they found open: But as ſoon as Timantes had taken two turns in the Garden, he ſaw a great Cops of Mirtle Hedges, ſo that he made no queſtion but chance had brought him thither, where he had ſuch a deſire to go, and that this was the Labyrinth he deſired to ſee; So that walking haſtily towards it, with a longing deſire to ſatisfie his Curioſity, and never thought of any guide: For ſince he was acquainted with the turnings and windings of that in Crete, he imagined, he ſhould hit of this alſo: He entered therefore with Antimaques into this Labyrinth, and as ſoon as he had paſſed through five or ſix of the Rooms or Cloſets, he found, that he was ignorant of the turnings, and that it differed from the other at Crete: But it was no longer conſidering, for he was already ſo far wandred, that the more he ſought to find the way out, the further he was carried in. Yet was he much delighted with this pleaſant Wilderneſs: for ſince Antimaques and he were both in hunting habits, Antimaques had a horn about him: So that they feared not loſing themſelves, imagining they could make themſelves be heard when they would: As they were thus talking together, and Antimaques jeaſting with Timantes at their wandering,and telling him they ſtood in need of Ariadne's thread to get out of this Labyrinth; and hinting unto him, that being of that Queens Race, it was more a ſhame for him than any other, to be thus entangled, upon a ſudden he heard a woman ſinging, and that moſt admirably: ſo that ſilently walking towards the place from whence the voice came,they found there was but one thick hedge between them and her that ſung: But it was ſo extraordinarily thick and high, that they could by no means poſſible ſee her they heard, nor get to her; For when they tryed,they found themſelves farther from her: So that not being able to with-hold commendations from one that ſung ſo well; And Timantes hoping thereby he might perhaps get out of his wandering, he began to cry out, in a loud tone of admiration, as ſoon as ſhe had done ſinging; Ah Antimaques how happy is this wandering unto us, provided we meet not with the ſame deſtiny by Land, that Vlyſſes did by Sea, and that harmonious voice we hear be not only a bait to draw us unto a farther loſs of our ſelves. But, Sir, to make the reaſon of the fantaſtical encounter the more pleaſant unto you, be pleaſed to know, that ſhe who ſung, was the Princeſs of Salamis: who having planted ſuch a Labyrinth as this at her own houſe, only the hedges not yet grown above two feet in height, ſhe knew all the turnings very well: So that coming thither that day to conſult with my Siſter, whether ſhe ſhould place the Statues in hers as in this; She came into this Garden at a little back door, where her Coach waited for her. Moreover, ſince ſhe affected to be ſolitary, ſhe kept this voyage very ſecret, and therefore ſhe came in a poor Coach, without one man with her, and her chief reaſon why ſhe made ſuch a myſterious ſecret of it, was, becauſe this Garden belonged unto a man whoſe Son was deep in love with her; and therefore ſhe would not have it known who ſhe was, leſt they ſhould imagine ſhe deſired to recal him whom ſhe had baniſhed: And it was the eaſier to conceal, becauſe the Porter and the Houſekeeper, who let her in, had been her Domeſtique Servants whilſt her Husband lived; ſo that they were more for her than for their Maſter, and therefore they took an eſpecial care none ſhould know it? And in order to that, they went to the place where her Coach ſtood, leſt any ſhould enquire whoſe Coach it was: They left another Gardiner at the other door, with orders to let none enter, though it ſeemed they were ill obſerved; for Timantes it ſeemed found the door open, and entered, as I told you before: But, Sir, he had no ſooner expreſſed himſelf unto Antimaques (as I ſaid before) but Parthenia was much ſurpriſed to hear one ſo near her, and would remove from that place: But Antimaques anſwering Timantes, that he was ſo far from fearing this ſweet voice would make them loſe themſelves, as he hoped ſhe would happily help them out of the Labyrinths: ſhe underſtood by this, that they had really loſt themſelves, and had no Guide, becauſe ſhe perceived by the accent of their voices, that they were ſtrangers: So that recollecting her ſelf, and imagining that they could never get unto the place where ſhe was, and knowing they knew her not, ſhe reſolved for diverſions ſake, to anſwer them that ſpake unto her: So that ſhe ſaid, the voice they heard would not charm them, ſince they cared not for the hearing it, but only that they might by it get out of that Labyrinth in which they were entangled: Oh, Madam, ſaid Timantes, I beſeech you miſtake me not; For I am ſo glad of my entanglement, that I wiſh not to come out: and am ſo far from ſeeking for the iſſues of this Labyrinth, that that I ſeek only how to get unto the place where you are, that I may know whether there be as much ſweetneſs in your eyes as in your voice: It ſeems by your expreſſions, replied Parthenia, that you have as much wit as Civility: but I know not whether I may chide you or no, for offering to engage your ſelf without a guide in a place where you cannot get out without one. Whilſt Parthenia was talking to Timantes, Amaxita, and Antimaques, did both of them, what they could, on their ſides of the hedge, to open the boughs of Mirtle: but they were ſo extraordinary thick and entertwined, that Amaxita laboured long in vain: Yet at laſt ſhe found a place by the beams of the Sun, which pierced through the thick of the hedge, ſo that though the place was very narrow, yet ſhe ſpied Timantes talking to Parthenia, but ſaw not Antimaques, who was as buſie as ſhe ſome four paces off, but could ſee none of them: Amaxita no ſooner ſaw Timantes, but ſhe made a ſign unto Parthenia, who imagining that ſince they might ſee on that ſide of the hedge, as well as ſhe on this, pulled down her hood, and cauſed all her women to do the like. Yet ſhe removed a little to look upon the man whom Amaxita ſpied, and whom ſhe eaſily perceived to be a man of ſome great quality, not only by the richneſs of his Clothes, but alſo by the Garb, and Air of Timantes; Parthenia ſtayed not long there; for ſhe no ſooner ſaw him, but ſhe made no queſtion but that he was the ſtranger of whom they reported ſuch wonders: Inſomuch as without any reaſon, ſhe perceived in her ſelf a ſtrange agitation of that, for which ſhe could find no cauſe, but only the oddneſs of the adventure: But at laſt Antimaques found out a place where he might ſee Parthenia. 'Tis true, ſee her he did, but with her hood pulled down, no more than could Timantes, who ſaw her ſo alſo: So that all this while, every one was in a huſht ſilence: For Timantes not knowing that the Lady whom he looked upon, deſired not to be ſeen, hoped ſtill ſhe would lift up her hood, as he earneſtly deſired: His curioſity was the more zealous, becauſe he ſaw a Lady of a very handſome ſtature and ſymmetry, and had the whiteſt hands in the World, for Parthenia pulled Amaxita by the Gown to whiſper unto her, that ſhe thought this to be the man ſo much extolled by every one: So that by this means, Timantes might judge of her beauty by her voice, by her ſtature, by her arms, and by her hands. As for her dreſs, nothing could be concluded from it: For that day, ſhe wore ſuch a dreſs as Ladies of higheſt quality ſometimes uſe, and which thoſe of a more inferiour Rank uſe alſo, ſo that nothing could be drawn from it: Nor had he time to obſerve how her women kept their reſpective diſtances, for the hole through which he looked was ſo little, that he could ſee but one at once, and Parthenia removing from that place ſome two paces, he could ſee her no more, do all he could; I beſeech you, Madam, ſaid he unto her, though you will not give me leave to ſee you, yet for Heavens ſake let me hear you; and be not ſo inhumane as to let an unfortunate ſtranger wander, and wander for the love of you: For truly, Madam, had not your ſweet alluring voice becharmed my ear, I am confident I had found the way out of this myſterious Labyrinth: And though I am deceived in this, yet to let you know that I have ſeen others which I could have better underſtood: Let me tell you, that I am a Cretan, and I beſeech you, let me not find the Cyprian Ladies leſs pitiful than they there: For doubtleſs you know how Ariadne helped Theſeus out of the Labyrinth there: And be not ſo cruel, I beſeech you, as to leave him wandering here, who has the honour to participate of that Illuſtrious and charitable Ladies blood: but help Timantes out of this place as Ariadne did Theſeus out of that: For I muſt needs have the ſame paſſion to you, that ſhe had unto him, if you do the like for me. Since you are ſuch an abſolute Maſter of your paſſions (replied Parthenia, very glad to ſee ſhe was not deceived) that you can love when and whom you pleaſe: It is to be likewiſe feared, that you can alſo hate when and whom you pleaſe: and that if I ſhould do for you as Ariadne did for Theſeus, you would not do for me as Theſeus did for Ariadne: Therefore, Sir, I have no diſpoſition to free you from your Labyrinth upon that condition which you propoſe, for on the contrary, you could tell me nothing which would ſooner withhold me:

Alſo ſince now I know your quality, I cannot find in my heart to ſee you, becauſe I am much aſhamed that I have rendered you no more reſpect. But, Madam (replied he, and ſmiled) would it not be uncivil, if you ſhould not permit me the ſight of you, but to leave me wandering in a place, out of which I cannot get without your help? and do you not fear I ſhould complain againſt you? Could you know, Sir, who I am, replied ſhe, doubtleſs I ſhould fear it, and ſhould not do ſo: However, Madam, I beſeech you tell me why you uſe me thus? The reaſon is (replied ſhe, and laughed) becauſe having never captivated any by my own charms, I ſhould be glad to take hold of this opportunity, and at leaſt to make one Priſoner. If there want nothing but that, to give you ſatisfaction (anſwered Timantes) I promiſe you to be your Captive, and Priſoner both: I conſent not to follow you out, but to remain in this Labyrinth; therefore I beſeech you, deny me not the happineſs of ſeeing you, but inſtruct me which way I ſhould come unto the place where you are; ſince I ſhall be nothing but a piece of incivility towards you, replied ſhe, I cannot allow my ſelf to let you ſee me: but muſt be guilty of this cruelty wherewith you charge me: The cruelty of fair ones, will abſolutely be forgotten, (replied he) if they will but once ſhew themſelves. How can I give credit unto your words (replied ſhe, and laughed ſtill) ſince you rank me in the number of fair ones, before you ſee me. I know already (replied he) that you have a moſt Angel-like voice, not only in ſinging, but in ſpeaking: Moreover I know that you are of a moſt admirable ſtature and garb, and that you have the whiteſt hands upon earth: ſo that if your eyes be anſwerable, and as far as I imagine them, you muſt needs be the faireſt upon earth: Since you imagine them ſo fair, replied Parthenia, I will keep you ſtill in that imagination, and not ſhew them unto you: yet that you ſhall not ſay I am altogether inhuman, I promiſe to ſend you one that ſhall help you out of that Labyrinth, aſſoon as I am gone. Timantes perceiving Parthenia prepared to be gone, I beſeech you, Madam, ſaid he unto her, let me at the leaſt know your name as I have told you mine: I had rather let you have a ſight of me (anſwered ſhe) than tell you my name, but I pray you give me leave to conceal both. After this Parthenia went away, and Timantes heard no other noiſe but what ſhe and her women made as they departed, who never feared being followed; yet they went very faſt, and took Coach in all haſte, commanding the Porter to go and help thoſe ſtrangers out, who were wandring in the Labyrinth, but not until a full hour after ſhe was gone, commanding him alſo not to tell who ſhe was, but to ſay they were ſome Ladies of Paphos unknown to him. After this, Parthenia went away, and the Porter, in obedience to his former Miſtreſs, ſtayed an hour, before he went to releaſe the ſtrangers ſhe ſpoke of. In the mean time Timantes and Antimaques were as buſie as could be to follow her, but they were ſo far from getting out as they came into the middle of it, that is to ſay, in the round place, where they reſolved to ſtay and expect the performance of her promiſe. But as every minute ſeemed an age unto any that are in expectation of any thing, Timantes began to expreſs his ſorrows unto Antimaques that he could not ſee the face of her who ſung, and his extream deſire to know her name; yet his impatiency was not ſo earneſt to be out of the Labyrinth, as that he might endeavour to learn who this unknown one was, whoſe voice, ſtature, hands, and wit, did ſo pleaſingly ſurpriſe him, and ſweetly charm him: ſo that Antimaques, thinking the ſound of his Horn, would the ſonner cauſe ſome come unto their releaſe, began to wind it as loud as he could, but all in vain, for the Porter who walked in the Garden till the hour after Parthenia's departure, hindred the Gardner from going to them alſo: but when the hour was over, he went and releaſed them: aſſoon as he ſaw them, according to Parthenia's order, he told Timantes, that a Lady unknown unto him ſent him to releaſe them, and asked pardon for coming no ſooner, becauſe he met with a man with whom he had ſome buſineſs of importance. Ah my friend (anſwered Timantes) you tell me not truly, for it is impoſſible you ſhould not know one who is ſo well acquainted with every turn of this myſterious Labyrinth. Sir, (ſaid the Porter, with a ſeeming ingenuity) ſince I have not been long a Porter unto this houſe, it is no wonder I ſhould not know this Lady; for I aſſure you my Maſter hath a Daughter I know not yet: Timantes did not yet believe him, but preſſed him to tell him who ſhe was; but all in vain: then did he promiſe him a very conſiderable reward, if he would but ſatisfie his longing curioſity, but ſince promiſes are not ſo prevalent with ſuch men, as preſent gifts, and ſince Timantes had nothing about him to give, he kept himſelf faithful unto Parthenia. When Timantes ſaw he could not win him to reveal, and indeed believed he was ignorant who ſhe was; however tell me, ſaid he unto him, which way ſhe went: Sir (ſaid the man moſt ſubtilly) I ſhall eaſily do that; and then he ſhewed him the high way to P*aphos*, aſſuring him confidently that her Coach went that way, though it were quite contrary, and he told it with more confidence, becauſe the way was much beaten, and Coach-wheels might be ſeen lately gone that way, ſo that Timantes giving credit unto his words, took Horſe with Antimaques, and without any thoughts of Hunting, went in haſt and hopes to overtake the Coach: yet he asked the Servant whom he left with the Horſes, whether he ſaw any thing, but though he anſwered, yet did not this undeceive him, ſo that he went as far as P*aphos* in hopes to overtake it: and ſo it chanced, that asking ſome men upon the way whether they met a Coach, they anſwered that they met two: ſo that Timantes not queſtioning but ſhe in whom he was in queſt of was one, he went on: but when he came at P*aphos*, and told every one he ſpoke with, that the Lady he met with at the Labyrinth came thither, none ever looked towards the Princeſs of Salamis, nor could they believe ſhe would ever leave her deſart, and come unto that place, for the reaſon aforeſaid, and therefore none ever thought upon her: but to conſider who there was in P*aphos* who did ſo well ſing, but ſince the number of them was great, this afforded no light; the Prince P*hiloxipes* never thought upon the Princeſs his Siſter, but on the contrary imagined her whom Timantes heard, to be a woman of inferiour rank, who had a good voice, but was very ugly, and for that reaſon would not ſhow her ſelf, and indeed every one was of that opinion, and chid Timantes for his curioſity: But he for his further ſatisfaction would ſee this ugly woman, and hear her ſing; but when he ſaw and heard this woman, he was confident ſhe was not the ſame: but his imagination was filled with ſo much curioſity, that Timantes began to ſuſpect it was Parthenia which he heard. In the mean time, he would not declare his thoughts unto any but one woman, who was his friend,and this woman being one of thoſe whom Parthenia had heretofore robbed of her adorer, ſhe hated her; he had no ſooner asked her whether this woman whom he met with might not be the Princeſs of Salamis, whoſe Beauty, Wit, and Voice, he had heard ſo much extolled; But ſhe cryed out, and anſwered with as much envious haſt as any Rival could, that if ſhe whom he met was of a good ſtature, white hands, and ſweet Voice, as he deſcribed, it could not be Parthenia. For ſaid ſhe, however ſhe be cryed up by the world, yet ſhe is tall but not handſome, her hands are white, but not well made, and her Voice is ſhrill, but not pleaſant. You may imagine, Sir, after this, that all the ſuſpicions of Timantes dyed; for he knew that he whom he ſaw was of an admirable proportion and height, her hands the whiteſt and beſt made in the World, and her Voice the moſt ſweet and pleaſing: ſo that this pleaſing Idea ſwelling his imagination more and more,and augmenting his curioſity,he continued his queſt after this amiable unknown one,he went unto the Temples,to the Walks,and all Viſits, with an intended deſign to ſeek her out in all places:but all his labour was loſt,and he ſtill continned in the ſame unquiet curioſity. In the mean while Parthenia being returned from the Labyrinth to her ſolitude, began to talk with Amaxita of their encounter, extreamly commending the handſom garb of Timantes, and the gallantry of his wit. Madam, (ſaid Amaxita unto her) if Timantes prove the man whom the Gods have reſerved for you, our journey was very happy, and I am confident your Voice and wit did charm him more than you imagine, for he ſpoke in ſuch an obliging Emphaſis, as certainly expreſſed more than common civility. Alas Amaxita (anſwered Parthenia, and laughed) do you think I could wound Timantes through ſo thick a hedge? I know they ſay Love has wings, but I cannot think he can fly ſo high as over it: therefore never imagine that Timantes has any thoughts of me: his curioſity haply laſted a quarter of an hour, or ſo, and after that, dyed, and there's an end: and I pray let us do the like, and never trouble our ſelves, with chimerical Fancies in the Air, which have neither beginning nor ending: For truly Timantes will never love me unſeen, and if he ſhould ſee me, and chance to be captivated by that poor pittance of Beauty which I have, I durſt never truſt him; not only becauſe of that cruel experience I have had, that love founded upon Beauty will never laſt, but alſo becauſe the Gods have foretold me, that I ſhall never be happy, if I marry one whom my eyes have captivated. Theſe, Sir, were the thoughts which Parthenia had of Timantes, whoſe perſon and wit did much pleaſe her: yet had he eaſily ſlipt out of her memory, unleſs the Prince Philoxipes had viſited her, who revived him in her fancy; and thus it came to paſs. After that Prince had been a long while in converſation with her, ſhe asked him whether he would give her leave to ſhew him the alterations ſhe had made in her Garden: And Philoxipes deſiring the ſame, Parthenia carried him into all the places which ſhe had tricked up ſince he ſaw her; for he had an admirable fancy and judgement in ſuch things, his ſtately houſe of Clara having learned him knowledge in ſuch things. After a long diſcourſe of Fountains, Walks, Statues, and Flowers, Philoxipes caſting his eye upon the Labyrinth which I told you before ſhe had made, and whoſe hedges were not yet grown up; Your Labyrinth, ſaid he, unto her, will be a long time in growing up, before they will be fit for ſuch an adventure as the Stranger had of whom I ſpake the laſt time I ſaw you; for theſe hedges are yet very low. Parthenia, hearing Philoxipes ſay ſo, changed colour: 'Tis true he did not take notice of it, becauſe his head was turned towards the Labyrinth: So that Parthenia recollecting her ſelf, asked Philoxipes what that adventure w.s, which ſhe knew of better than he did? And he rela.ed from the beginning to the ending all the ſtory, aggravating the applauſes and commendations which Timantes gave the unknown Lady, purpoſely to make his relation ſeem more pleaſant: For after he had told Parthenia, how Timantes had extolled her he knew not, and he thought him in love with her, he added his further conceit, that he thought ſhe whom he ſo exceſſively commended, was a woman of low Quality, and ugly; then he named that woman unto Parthenia whereof he ſpoke before, and with whom he had ſo upbraided Timantes. Methinks he may be ſoon ſatisfied, whether or no it be ſhe (ſaid the Princeſs, and laughed) for he need only ſee and hear this woman. He hath done ſo already (replied he) but he is certain that it was not ſhe, and is angry when any names her unto him, moſt confidently affirming, that ſhe whom he ſaw is the handſomeſt woman in the world, and ſeeks out for her in all places. You may imagine, Sir, how much delight the Princeſs of Salamis took in hearing a relation of an adventure which concerned her ſelf, unknown to the Prince Philoxipes; yet this was not her greateſt delight; for her certainty that ſhe made ſome impreſſion upon the mind of Timantes, or at leaſt his memory gave her ſo high a ſatisfaction, that how joyed ſoever ſhe was in the company of Philoxipes, whom ſhe tenderly loved, yet ſhe was impatient till he was gone, that ſhe might the ſooner tell Amaxita all he had related. She offered a hundred times to diſcover unto the Prince the truth of the adventure, but ſome ſecret ſuggeſtion of her thoughts did hinder her: However ſhe asked Philoxipes a hundred queſtions concerning Timantes, which induced him to tell her, he would bring him to her; but ſhe forbade him more violently than ever; telling him, the more compleat Timantes was, the leſs deſire ſhe had to ſee him: For truly, ſaid ſhe, when one is reſolved upon a courſe of ſolitude, to bring any pleaſant company which is not to ſtay there, doth but redouble ſorrows, and leaves one in a more deep and ſerious melancholy and miſery: And truly, whenſoever you do me the honour to ſee me, 'tis two days at leaſt after, before I can take any delight either in Fountains or Gardens. You could not in a more civil manner tell me (replied Philoxipes) that I ſhould not come ſo oft to ſee you; and indeed I am partly acquainted with your humour, which is not to affect ſuch pleaſures as are ſeconded by ſorrows, and that's your chief reaſon why you would not be loved, leſt you ſhould run the hazard of not being ſo after. 'Tis very true, replied ſhe, I place that unhappineſs in the higheſt rank of misfortunes; and as I think there cannot be a greater: But you ſee (ſaid Philoxipes unto her) that all thoſe who love do not prove Inconſtants, as the Prince of Salamis was, and as many others who loved you did. And to ſhew you one example, I do proteſt unto you, that the enjoyment of my dear Policrite, does not at all leſſen my love: I am as much charmed as I was before I married her; and if handſomneſs would permit it, I would caſt my ſelf as ſubmiſſively at her feet now as ever: For my heart is not at all altered, and I am more troubled to hinder my ſelf from expreſſions of my paſſion, than to continue my zealous affections to her. Policrite is ſtill admirably fair, replied Parthenia, that your Conſtancy hath not yet been put to any difficult teſt: For I confeſs there are a ſort of men, not like thoſe, who fall off from loving, before the beauty doth which firſt moved them, aud whoſe paſſion does laſt as it doth. Fie, Siſter, ſaid Philoxipes, wrong me not ſo much as to think, that though Policrite were not fair, I ſhould not love her as much as ever; but believe me that her beauty is not the only cauſe of my conſtancy; her ſoul, and her mind has a million of real beauties beyond it, which time and age can never ruin, and which I ſhall doat upon eternally. I need no confirmations of my opinion, ſaid Parthenia, that it is not beauty which cauſeth conſtant and faithful love. Philoxipes would then have ſaid more, but it was late; and therefore he concluded with Parthenia, that as the abſence of the Sun cauſeth darkneſs: ſo the loſs of beauty cauſeth lukewarmneſs and inconſtancy in thoſe who love only for it. After this he returned to the Court, and left Parthenia at liberty to talk with Amaxita, unto whom ſhe related all that the Prince had ſaid concerning Timantes, taking great delight in talking with her; wiſhing ſometimes that Timantes knew it was ſhe, and ſometimes again checking her ſelf for wiſhing. Since Amaxita would have been glad to have Parthenia leſs ſolitary, ſhe uſed all her arguments to perſwade her, that Philoxipes might bring Timantes to her; but ſhe could not be moved unto it, ſtill proteſting, that her beauty ſhould never be the cauſe of her misfortune, and that both reaſon, experience, and the authority of the Gods obliged her not to change her opinion. After this, Sir, Parthenia would ſometimes unawares talk of Timantes, and then ceaſe for many days together; ſo that perhaps ſhe would have quite forgot him, but for another adventure which I ſhall acquaint you withall. It was now at that time of the year when the Adonian Feaſt was celebrated in the Town of Amathonte, which is ſo famous for the magnificent Temple there, and the ceremony there celebrated. I know, Sir, you will be a little ſurpriſed to hear talk of this Feaſt, in a place where Venus Urania had not more Altars, than hath Venus Anadiomena. But be pleaſed to know, that when the famous Queen of whom ye have heard reports, did re-eſtabliſh the Temples of that great goddeſs, ſhe was forced to tolerate ſome cuſtoms which were not quite repugnant unto good manners: For as the herd of people do oftentimes love the Ceremonies of Religion, better than the Religion it ſelf, ſhe thought it not expedient to incenſe thoſe who were apt to murmur at an univerſal change: So that ſhe was in ſome ſort forced to tolerate the Feaſt of the Adonians for the ſatisfaction of the people in Amathonte: So that ſince that time this Feaſt is ſtill kept, and become ſo famous, that they reſort from all parts of the Iſle unto it. Parthenia knowing the day when it was to be obſerved, reſolved to go thither, and more for the ſatisfaction of Amaxita's deſires, than to content her own curioſity; And ſo ſhe deſigned for Amathonte, but to go unknown, leſt it ſhould be laid in her diſh, ſhe ſhould quit her ſolitude, to ſee ſuch a Feaſt as that. Since ſhe was acquainted with one in Amathonte whom ſhe could abſolutely command, becauſe ſhe was brought up with the Princeſs her mother, ſhe lodged at her houſe: And ſince ſhe was well in years, and had neither husband nor children, nor any great Family, ſhe did ſo well conceal her ſelf there, that none ever ſuſpected ſhe was at Amathonte; For coming in the night, and in no magnificent Coach, and having none with her but my Siſter, and two women to wait upon her, it was no difficulty to be unperceived in that Town, eſpecially at a time when ſo many ſtrangers were there: But, Sir, give me leave to tell you, that this Feaſt of the Adonians is a Feaſt of Tears at the beginning, and of Joy at the end, as you ſhall e're long know. In the firſt place, it was the very eſſential part of the Ceremony in mourning for the death of Adonis, to forbid all Ladies that day to enter into the Temple with their masks off, or hoods up, it being not permitted thoſe that come to lament over the Tomb of Adonis, to have their faces uncovered as long as the Ceremony laſted: For ſince all the Ladies could not cry, they ſaid it was better they ſhould come vailed, than that Joy ſhould be ſeen in their eyes at a Feaſt of Tears. The firſt thing that is to be ſeen in the Temple that day, which is full of Lamps, and no other Light, is a great Coffin of Gold covered with Roſes, Mirtle, and Cypreſs, lifted upon four ſteps covered with black Tapeſtry, full of enflamed hearts, and drops of tears in ſilver: Theſe four ſteps ſtand upon four great Pillars of black and white Marble, twenty paces in diameter; about which ſtand all thoſe that are ſpectators of the Ceremony: Theſe Pillars being half covered with the richeſt Sydonian Tapeſtry; Cloſe about the Coffin kneel fifty of the faireſt Virgins in the Town, dreſſed like Nymphs; but Nymphs in mourning, and all in deſpair, that is, with looſe Robes of black Tiffany, with a mixture of ſilver, their hair diſhevelled upon their ſhouldiers, yet not in a negligent manner, teſtifying by diſſembled tears, or at leaſt deep-fetched ſighs, their extream ſorrow of ſoul. About this Square, on which the Coffin lies, is hang'd all the Equipage of a Hunter, but a Hunter moſt magnificent, that is, with a Bow of Ebony garniſhed with Gold, with a Quiver of the ſame; a Horn of Ivory, adorned with Jewels; a Hunters ſtaff headed with Rubies and Emeralds. Then two of thoſe mourning Beauties, which were about the Coffin, began to recite in verſe the Praiſes of Adonis in form of a Dialogue; and when their Panegeric was ended, twelve others began to ſing other Verſes, condoling his death; and to ſay truly, the Song was ſad, and ſo full of grieving expreſſions, enough to melt any heart. But before I end the relation of this Ceremony, I muſt needs tell you, Sir, how the gods, having determined that Timantes ſhould love Parthenia, prompted him to come unto this Feaſt, and ſo he did; and was not only there, but had placed himſelf between Parthenia and Amaxita, who according to the cuſtom of this place had their hoods pulled down, and therefore the beauty of Parthenia could not attract his looks more than any other of the Ladies who were all hooded, except thoſe who were about the Coffin: But ſince Parthenia and Amaxita ſpied him, they made a ſign unto each other as ſoon as he came in, ſignifying thereby their meanings. Parthenia confeſſed afterwards unto me, that ſhe no ſooner ſaw Timantes, but her heart did beat, and ſhe thought of changing places; but thinking afterwards that perhaps it might more attract obſervance, ſhe ſtayed where ſhe was. As for Timantes, ſince he ſaw no Ladies unvailed but thoſe about the Coffin, and knew not that ſhe he ſo ſought after was ſo near him, he regarded the Ceremony with cloſe attentention, until after the twelve had ſung their Song of ſorrow. One amongſt them turning towards all the Ladies of the Aſſembly, and conjured them in the name of Venus to conjoyn their complaints with theirs, and ſing with her ſix verſes which ſhe would immediately recite unto them, to the end that which they made for the death of Adonis might be a publik mourning; and ſhe no ſooner began to ſing theſe ſix verſes (which all the Cyprian Ladies knew) but all within the Temple began to ſing after her; ſo that Parthenia ſinging as the reſt, not thinking that in ſuch a croud of voices Timantes could diſtinguiſh hers: But however, Sir, ſhe no ſooner began to ſing, but amongſt this great abundance of ſeveral voices which made the Temple eccho, he diſtinguiſht hers from them all, and knew it; and the voice no ſooner ſtruck his ears, but his heart, and let him know he had found her he long had lookt for. So that without any further regard unto the ceremony, he turned towards her, to ſee whether he could find the ſame conformity in her ſtature as in her voice; and as ſhe feared, leſt her hood ſhould not be enough down, ſhe cunningly, puld it down with her fair hand: So that Timantes ſeeing the ſame ſtature, the ſame hand, and hearing the ſame voice which he heard before, did not queſtion but ſhe was the ſame he met with before. Yet he would not ſpeak unto her until ſhe had done ſinging; Mean while he endeavoured to diſcover through her Vail, whether her face was as fair as all he knew, but his endeavours were in vain: For the Temple having no light but that of Lamps, he was uncertain whether Parthenia's Vail was thicker than others; for ſince her intention was to conceal her ſelf, ſhe wore one of thoſe which our Ladies uſe to wear when they travel, to keep them from the Sun. Timantes could therefore ſee no more, than what he ſaid before: Yet it did not much trouble him, for his hope was, that after the Ceremony was ended, he ſhould ſatisfie his curioſity. So that Parthenia had no ſooner done ſinging with the reſt, but Timantes bowing and ſpeaking unto her in a low voice; I need not ask, Madam, ſaid he unto her, what is become of my curioſity to ſee this ceremony, for certain it is your ſelf, who drew me hither, without my knowledge. Sir, anſwered Parthenia, If I did draw you hither without your knowledge, pray add this, that it was without my knowledge: For ſince I have neither the honour to be known unto you, nor to know you, certainly we met without deſign: But ſince, Sir, the end of the ceremony will quickly ſeparate us, and ſince you came to ſee it, not talk with me, I beſeech you obſerve the end with as much attention as you did the beginning: Ah, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) I cannot do as you bid me: And to ſhew you, that I ought not, be pleaſed to know, that I am the ſame Timantes, who had the honour to meet you in the Labyrinth, and who ſince that have ſought you in all places. You need not tell me who you are (replied ſhe ſubtilly, and purpoſely to amuſe him) for I have ſeen you in other places than here or there: Timantes was ſo ſurpriſed at this anſwer of Parthenia's, that he knew not what to ſay, for he knew not that ſhe ſaw him through the hedge, but imagining that ſhe had ſeen him at Paphos. However, he knew none that did ſing like her, nor who ſpoke as ſhe did; ſo that hearing her ſay ſo, he knew not what to think or ſay: Alſo ſhe impoſed ſilence, during all the reſt of the ceremony, not that, ſaid ſhe, I have any ſuch great devotion unto this Feaſt, as I ſhould if it were unto Venus Vrania, but becauſe it is not juſt, ſince you came from Paphos hither, and ſince I am here not to obſerve it, and be able to tell you what we have ſeen. For your part, Madam, ſaid he unto her, you may do what you pleaſe; but for my part, I am reſolved to look upon nothing but your ſelf: For I am ſo afraid to loſe you again, that I am reſolved not to be put to the cruel neceſſity of being ſeparated from you the ſecond time, before I ſee you. P*arthenia* hearing Timantes ſay ſo, and having no mind to expreſs her ſelf, that he ſhould not ſee her, or know who ſhe was, leſt ſhe ſhould augment his curioſity, gave him no anſwer, but impoſed ſilence, and obſerved the reſt of the ceremony. Her example was nothing to Timantes, who could ſee nothing they did, ſince he had P*arthenia* to look upon. In the mean while, the ceremony continued ſtill: a conſort of hunting inſtruments was heard: another of Shepherds Muſick, and another of Lutes: after which, they put moſt rare Odors in the perfuming pans, which made a little cloud, and by an engine, which inviſibly moved, the Coffin of Gold vaniſhed in the cloud, as well as the Tapeſtry of ſable full of enflamed hearts, and tears of Silver: and in lieu of ſo ſad an object, was ſeen a little Garden ſet with Roſe-trees, and Myrtles, in a huge magnificent baſin ſtanding upon the ſquare, where the Coffin did lye in the midſt, in which did grow above all the reſt of the flowers, that ſweet flower, into which, 'tis ſaid, the God, at the requeſt of Venus, did metamorphoſe Adonis. So that thoſe ſweet Odors diſſipating by degrees, the ceremony began to look with another face, and the ſame women which before ſung ſongs of ſorrow, throwing away all their Mantles of mourning, appeared in rich and magnificent dreſſes, and ſung ſome verſes which declared the immortality of Adonis unto all the Aſſembly: So that the ceremony ended in joy, and a ſacrifice of thanks: But, Sir, ſince the cuſtom is, that as ſoon as this little Garden appears, all the Ladies muſt unmask themſelves, P*arthenia*, who was not ignorant of it,though ſhe had ne're ſeen the Feaſt,made a ſign unto Amaxita to retire; and indeed,when the perfuming Pans ſent forth ſuch clouds of ſweet ſmoky Odors as did both darken the Temple, and almoſt ſtifle the Ladies; Parthenia, ſeeming not able to endure it, changed places with Amaxita and her two women, and retired with variety of thoughts, for ſhe feared Timantes would know and follow her: yet ſhe was very glad that he did not perceive her when ſhe changed places; yet quickly he found her, and changed place as well as ſhe, and followed her under one of the Arches of the Temple, where ſhe was ſet with Amaxita, intending to go out amongſt the croud when the ceremony was ended, not daring to go out ſooner, leſt Timantes ſhould follow unto the place where ſhe lodged. In the mean time as ſhe was ſitting, and cauſing my Siſter to ſit with her without any ceremony, (the better to diſguiſe the matter) Timantes came and kneeled down before her, asking pardon for that liberty which he took, and beſeeching her not to be as rigorous unto him, as ſhe was in the Labyrinth, for, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) though I do infinitely honour your ſex in general, and you above all in particular, I am reſolved this day to fail in that duty which I owe you, by importuning you to do me the honour to lift up that envious vail which covers your fair face, and hinders the beams of your beauty from ſhining upon me, or elſe to tell me in what place and time my eyes may have a ſight of her whom my heart already honours Since Nature hath not beſtowed upon me, replied Parthenia, any ſuch beauty as your imagination gives me,I will not my ſelf put you out of that pleaſing Idea, which you have formed of me in your Fancy, but which does not at all reſemble me: for truly when you ſee me,and ſee me ſo infinitely below what you think I am,I ſhall then perhaps in lieu of chaſing curioſity out of your mind, put averſion in your heart. Ah, Madam, ſaid he, though your eyes ſhould not be ſuitable to your ſtature and proportion, nor to your voice, nor to your hands, nor your wit, yet I ſhould infinitely honour you. Yet beauty does not conſiſt in any thing you know of me, replyed ſhe, for the moſt exact act and handſom ſtature in the world, the faireſt hands, the ſweeteſt voice, and the fineſt wit, may notwithſtanding all theſe be the ugliest woman in a land: if her complexion be thick and muddy, the ſymmetry of her face diſproportionable, and her phyſiognomy ſavage or dull. Ah, Madam, anſwered Timantes, all theſe you name makes me believe you are ſuch an one as my imagination Fancies: for truly if you were not ſo fair as I think you are, you could never make ſuch a handſom deſcription of uglineſs, and I am confident that to make up your own picture, there needs no more but the juſt contraries to what you have ſaid: Therefore, Madam, I beſeech you in the name of that Goddeſs which is here adored, let me at leaſt know who you are, for I am reſolutely determined to follow you until I know. Parthenia perceiving Timantes to ſpeak as a man fully reſolved to ſee her, and to know who ſhe was, was exceedingly perplexed, ſhe knew well enough, that if ſhe ſhould lift up her hood, he could not know her; but ſhe thought alſo, that the ſight would more augment his curioſity than diminiſh it, and that he would then follow her as earneſtly as before, ſhe durſt not truſt unto his diſcretion, and ſhew her face or tell her name, becauſe ſhe was not ſo well acquainted with him, as to think he would be faithful, nor would ſhe in the mind ſhe then was in, ſuffer her beauty to make a conqueſt of him; and though ſhe did already very much eſteem him, both by all reports, and by her own knowledge, yet ſhe would not let him ſee her face, nor put her ſelf upon ſuch terms as ſhould oblige her to ſhun him: But ſhe knew not very well what advantage ſhe could draw unto her ſelf by not letting him ſee her and know who ſhe was; yet for all that, ſince the Gods had let her know ſhe ſhould never be happy by procuring love unto her ſelf, by any allurements of her Beauty, ſhe could not reſolve upon it, but concluded it to be her duty to ſubmit unto the opinion of the Oracles, both of Delphos and of Venus Urania. Thus was ſhe fully reſolved not to ſhew her ſelf, or name her ſelf unto Timantes, therefore beginning to ſpeak, Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, I perceive that you have ſome ſlight curioſity to know who I am, and therefore to be juſt, I muſt not think it ſtrange you ſhould deſire ſatisfaction from me, eſpecially ſince certainly you are perſwaded, that in importuning me to lift up my hood, you think to do me a civility by it: But, Sir, to teſtifie that I will deal with you as with one whoſe virtues I honour, I will impart ſomthing unto you, and tell you, that it does ſo much concern me, that you ſhould not at preſent know who I am, as perhaps the wel-being of my life depends upon it: therefore I conjure you, by all that is dear unto you, not to ask me who I am, nor to follow me. It ſeems, Madam, replied he, that you dare not truſt that virtue which you ſay you know in me, ſince you dare impart nothing unto me: But, Madam, one is not obliged to do impoſſibilities, and ſince I muſt not for ever loſe you, therefore I do profeſs that I will never leave you, until I know who you are; but withal I do aſſure you I will never reveal who you are, ſince you would not have it known. Parthenia then perceiving the obſtinacy of Timantes, bethought her ſelf of another expedient to prevent his knowing who ſhe was, and preſently propounded it unto him, becauſe ſhe ſaw the ceremony was ready to end. Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him) I confeſs I cannot hinder you from following of me, and therefore you may know where I lodge, and perhaps know who I am; but I do here profeſs and declare unto you, that if you do ſo, you ſhall never ſee or ſpeak unto me again, but on the contrary, if you will be ſo obſervant of my deſires as not to follow me, nor to enquire who I am, nor ever tell any without exception, that you met with her the ſecond time, whom you firſt met with in the Labyrinth, I promiſe you my company in a place which will afford better conveniency of talk than here; Therefore make your choice, Sir, but firſt conſider well, that if I tell you this day who I am, I will ſhun you all the days of my life after, ſo that you ſhall never ſee me more; and if you do not follow me, but exactly do this I deſire, I will keep my promiſe with you: but do not think of promiſing (added ſhe) and not performing, for I am confident there is not one in all Paphos unto whom you can impart theſe adventures, which will not communicate it unto me again the ſame hour: therefore take heed what you ſay, for I do the ſecond time reiterate my reſolution never to ſee you again as long as I live, if you ſee me this day, and do not punctually obſerve all my deſires. Madam, ſaid he unto her, what would you have a man anſwer who is ready to dye with deſire of knowing you, and whom you would have run the hazard of never knowing you: No, no, (ſaid ſhe haſtily unto him, ſeeing the people began to go out of the Temple) provided you do not follow me, but do as I deſire, you ſhall infallibly ſee me, and ſpeak with me, within theſe eight days. Swear then unto me, anſwered Timantes, in the preſence of the Goddeſs who is here to be adored: I do, ſaid ſhe unto him; but after that, do not follow me one pace further, and to keep you to your diſtance, think that the only means of ſeeing me hereafter, is not to follow me now. But, Madam, anſwered he, you do not tell me where I ſhall find you: I will let you know it at Paphos, ſaid ſhe, and went away. Once more (ſaid Timantes in following her) may I truſt unto your words? Yes, anſwered ſhe, ſo you do not follow me. Parthenia ſpoke theſe words unto Timantes in ſuch a reſolved manner, as he ſaw ſhe would be obeyed, and therefore he thought it his duty ſo to do; yet this thought had not faſt root in his heart, fearing that unknown Beauty ſhould break promiſe with him, he ſtill looked after Parthenia, who turned her head two or three times to ſee whether he obeyed, and ſtill looked after her as long as he could, with intention to follow her, maugre all her promiſes: But as ſoon as ſhe was mingled amongſt that great croud of vailed Ladies which went out of the Temple, do what he could, he loſt the ſight of her; yet he thought he ſaw her in the ſtreet joyning to the gate of the Temple, but he was deceived, for as ſoon as he was out, ſhe turned upon the right hand, ſtill obſerving whether or no Timantes did punctually obey her, and perceived that he had much ado; and though ſhe did not deſire he ſhould ſee or know her at this time, yet I know not whether or no ſhe deſired he ſhould obey her without repugnancy; yet ſhe was very glad ſhe was out of ſight, and gladder when ſhe was come to the place where ſhe lodged, out of which ſhe ſtirred not, until ſhe returned homewards the next morning: As for Timantes, he had a mind to ſtay ſome days in Amathonte, to enquire who this unknown Lady was; but ſince ſhe promiſed him, to let him hear of her at Paphos, he returned thither, after he walked over all the ſtreets of this ſtately Town, above twenty times, in hopes to find her, who was already in his heart; but after all his unprofitable queſt, he returned to Paphos, having brought with him one ſervant and two Lacquies, for Antimaques ſtayed behind by reaſon of ſome indiſpoſition he found in himſelf. In his return, he did nothing but muſe continually upon his adventure; yet according to his promiſe he reſolved to tell it unto none, unleſs ſhe brake promiſe with him; he examined all reaſons, and conſidered which of them it might be which cauſed her to deal thus with him, and there was nothing which his imagination did not ſuggeſt unto him; ſometimes he thought, that perhaps ſhe was not fair, but that thought vaniſhed upon conſideration of her fair hands, handſom ſtature, ſweet voice, and her admirable wit, which were ſtrong Arguments unto his faith that ſhe was Fair. Afterwards he ſuſpected her to be ſome woman that came to Amathonte upon ſome deſign of ſecret gallantry; but afterward conſidering that ſhe concealed her ſelf as well in the Labyrinth as at Amathonte, and that he ſaw no men with her, he changed his thoughts: At laſt he arrived at Paphos, and there he knew not what to do or think: In the mean time this adventure came ſo near his heart, that he thought upon nothing elſe, during the eight days of his longing expectation: As oft as he went out of his own lodging, he left word, that if any came to ſpeak with him upon any buſineſs, to bring them unto him: And he never came in, but he asked whether any were there to ſpeak with him, or brought him any Letters: His life was ſo unquiet, and his curioſity ſo full of impatience, that hours ſeemed days, and days ages. But whilſt Timantes was in this condition, Parthenia was in a confuſed irreſolution: Her firſt thoughts were to break promiſes with Timantes, and not to ſee him; yet ſhe continued not long in that mind; for conſidering that if ſhe broke with him, he was not obliged to keep promiſe with her, but divulging unto all the world this laſt meeting, they might come to gueſs the truth : ſo her firſt reſolution held not, but ſhe asked counſel of my Siſter. I pray Amaxita (ſaid ſhe unto her) tell me what you would do if you were in my condition? Ought I to break my promiſe with Timantes, or keep it? For my part, Madam, (replied Amaxita, who did all ſhe could to drive her out of her ſolitary humour) I cannot ſee any reaſon you have to break your promiſe with him, nor can I diſcover any ill that can come unto you by obſerving it; for if he do ſee you, then he will love you, and then the Oracle is fulfilled; and truly, Madam, I am ſo confident that Timantes is the man whom the gods have reſerved for you, that I dare not adviſe you to break your word with him : For you have met him twice in ſo ſtrange a manner as induceth me to this opinion : For do you not obſerve, that as unknown unto him as you are, he is unquiet, and as full of reſpective curioſity as ſome Lovers who have ſeen you a thouſand times, and who did not think more of you than Timantes doth? Though all you ſay were true, replied Parthenia, yet am I not much beholding to him, ſince his curioſity is not an effect of my merit; but becauſe naturally one loves to know that which he is ignorant of, eſpecially in ſome things : Yet I am confident, replied Amaxita, that if your voice had been harſh, your ſtature and compoſure ill favoured, your hands ugly, and your wit groſs, when you ſpoke unto him, his curioſity had not laſted half a quarter of an hour : I do not ſay that Timantes is in love with you; but I dare confidently aſſure you, that if you will, he will be: For I perceive by his expreſſions that there is ſuch a tender and paſſionate kind of inclination betwixt you and him, as uſeth to be between two who really love. By this account, ſaid Parthenia, you think my heart has the ſame inclination to Timantes as the heart of Timantes hath to me. Truly, Madam (replied ſhe, and ſmiled) If my reſpects I owe you would permit me, I ſhould freely and ingenuouſly confeſs, that I think Timantes had a ſtrong inclination to love you, and that you have alſo an inclination to ſuffer him he ſhould love you. Therefore I beſeech you conſider, being born in an Iſle where it is a ſhame not to be loved, and not to love; whether it be handſom to muſe away your life in this manner: If it be not, I would adviſe you to do more than all the Beauties of the Court can, and captivate the heart of Timantes, which would not be taken by all their Charms. Amaxita (ſaid Parthenia to her) to lay open the ſecret of my ſoul unto you, I muſt confeſs that I think the chief felicity of life conſiſts in the having ſoveraign authority over the heart of ſome one, and in a pleaſing communication of joys and ſorrows unto a ſuitable diſpoſition: This ſympathy of ſouls and ſpirits, doth doubtleſs find great ſweetneſs in pure affections; but yet, for all that, there is too much equality between two friends to find that ſatisfaction, as may be had in an affection of another nature: for one ſhall not find in friendſhip a blind obedience, ſecrets are commonly diſcloſed; and though friendſhip have a fire in it, as well as love hath, yet that fire is but a light without heat, whereas love both heats and lights; and indeed my dear Amaxita (purſued ſhe, and bluſhed) it muſt needs be confeſſed, that a pure and innocent love is the only joy of the world, if it be laſting; But the cruelty of it is, when a firm and conſtant ſoul contracts affection with a light and perfidious heart. But do you think, Madam (replied Amaxita) that it is an abſolute impoſſibility to find a conſtant lover? I do not think it impoſſible, ſaid Parthenia, but I think it a great difficulty, eſpecially amongſt thoſe who love only for beauty, and no other reaſon; the truth is, to make love laſting and perfect, there muſt no intereſt be mixed with it, he muſt love becauſe he is forced unto it: reaſon muſt be excluded, and not at all contribute: And indeed I confeſs Amaxita, that if I thought I ſhould find Timantes to be a man who could love me, without any conſideration of my quality, or my riches, or without grounding his paſſion upon that little pittance of Beauty which I have, I would do any thing to get his affection: I do not ſay I would commit any crime to purchaſe it; but I ſhould go a little further than that exact rule of prudence dence which would have one hazard nothing. I pray you, Madam, ſaid Amaxita, what hazard do you run, in this occaſion which preſents it ſelf? you know Timantes deſerves you, both by his birth, his riches, his perſon, his wit, and his virtue; moreover you know, the Prince your Brother loves him dearly, and you ſee Timantes courts you, and ſeeks you out in all places; moreover yet, it appears by the manner of your meetings, that it is he whom the Gods would have you marry: for it is not by any influence from your eyes, that you have captivated, or at leaſt filled him full of curioſity, and therefore, Madam, if you will follow my advice, keep your word with him, let him ſee you, but not know who you are; if he does not love you, yet you run no hazard, becauſe he knows not who you are; and if he do love you, then you have found in Timantes the man that muſt make you happy: But though I would keep my word with him and ſee him, replied ſhe, yet how ſhall I do it? unto whom can I truſt the ſecret? and how can I handſomly ſee him, unleſs he come hither? Moreover, ſince it ought not to be by that little beauty I have, that I muſt captivate him who muſt make me happy, I conceive it ought rather to be by my virtue than my wit, that I muſt make this conqueſt, and therefore I make a queſtion whether in conſenting that Timantes ſhall ſee me in ſecret, I bring my virtue in ſuſpicion, for certainly I have a moſt invincible averſion againſt any thing of immodeſty. Amaxita ſeeing there was no difficulty in the mind of Parthenia, but how to carry the matter handſomly, began to conſider how it might be done, and ſhe conſidered ſo well, that her imagination had contrived a way how to ſatisfie the Princeſs. But, Sir, it is fit I tell you, that the Principal reaſon which moved Amaxita to perſwade Parthenia that Timantes might ſpeak with her, was becauſe Philoxipes and Policrite had deſired her a thouſand times that ſhe would perſwade this Princeſs to quit her ſolitude, and not to rely ſo punctually upon the ſtrict words of the Oracle, which they thought was ill interpreted. This, Sir, was the motive which induced Amaxita unto what ſhe did, and to induce Parthenia to lay hold of this expedient which ſhe propoſed unto her, ſhe moved her to read over again the Oracle of Delphos, which was as I told you before in theſe words, That if ſhe would be happy, ſhe muſt not marry a man whom her eyes have captivated, and by conſequence (ſaid Amaxita) it muſt be concluded that there is one in the world who may love you and never ſee your eyes; for the Gods do never foretel things impoſſible; ſo that it is almoſt evident that Timantes is the man whom the gods have ſent to make you happy: Therefore, Madam, if you will take my judgment think no more upon it, but let him ſpeak with you. But I pray you, Amaxita, ſaid Parthenia, how can I go unto Paphos and not be known? and how can I ſee Timantes, but he muſt ſee my face? or talk with him, but he may gueſs who I am? However, after this cruel experience which I have had in the inconſtant reſolutions of thoſe who only love Beauty; I will not have Timantes know whether my eyes be fair or ugly, nor know my quality; for truly if I do conquer his heart, it ſhall not be by fading beauty which dies, and his affection dies with it, and which will leave me in ſuch a ſad deſpair, as I have had but too much tryal of. Amaxita hearing Parthenia ſay ſo, would not contradict her, becauſe ſhe thought it not impoſſible, but Timantes might fall in love with her, and not ſee her face, and that he was not of their opinion, who think the eyes only are the givers and receivers of love. But, Madam, ſaid ſhe, you muſt act your part, and therefore you muſt give it out you intend a journey of fifteen days, and in lieu of going to the place pretended, go ſecretly into Paphos, and lodge at a friends of my Brothers, and ſtay there all that time, during which time, upon ſome pretence which we will think upon at leiſure, I will procure that your Chamber ſhall be a ground room towards the Garden, with a Balcony which opens upon a Jeſſamine Arbor, which is much darker than any other; this friend is a woman of quality and virtue, her Husband and Son are both at Athens, and ſhe is much obliged unto my Brother, and he to her; ſhe it is we will truſt in the buſineſs. But if it ſhould come to be known I was at Paphos (ſaid Parthenia) what would people ſay? and what would they think? At the worſt (replied Amaxita) they can but ſay you had a mind to ſee a Horſe-race, and not be known; and indeed this was a handſom excuſe, for there was to be one, and the end of the race was to be behind the Ladies houſe; yet Parthenia could not bring her mind unto it, until the ſixth day when I came thither, where I was no ſooner come, but ſhe deſired to ask me concerning Timantes, purpoſely to know whether he had been ſecret, for I had the honour to ſee him after with the Prince Philoxipes. Amaxita in obedience to Parthenia's commands, asked me before her, whether the ſtranger of whom ſuch wonders were reported was ſtill at Paphos? and whether he was as pleaſant in the Court, as he was at firſt? Timantes, replied I, is queſtionleſs as compleat a Gallant as the World hath, but ſince a journey he took to ſee the Adonian feaſt, he is become much more reſerved, and unquiet than he was before; yet certainly it is by reaſon of ſome diſtemper in his body, not mind, for no ill accidents have any way croſſed him: Perhaps he is in love (ſaid Parthenia) No, no, replied I, for ſince his return from Amathonte, he never viſited one Lady: Then certainly (ſaid ſhe laughing, and looking upon Amaxita) the Adonian feaſt hath inſpired him with ſuch a melancholy, as it cannot be cured again. After this, paſſing from one diſcourſe to another, I began to relate what expectation there was of a Horſe-race to be at Paphos, ſo that Parthenia, whoſe heart deſired to ſee Timantes, took this occaſion to colour her deſign: then ſhe told my ſiſter, that ſhe would not eternally detain her from all manner of pleaſures, but would have her go and ſee this Horſe-race; and therefore (ſaid ſhe unto her) you ſhall have my Coach, and Megaſides ſhall go with you to Paphos, and bring you back when the ſport and Feaſt is done, that you may relate all the paſſages of it unto me. Amaxita hearing Parthenia ſay ſo, knew this was but a colour for her own voyage, ſo that ſeeming to think ſhe was in good earneſt, ſhe told her, that ſhe would not go unleſs ſhe went alſo, and in concluſion, the journey was agreed upon, and Amaxita's ſeeing the Horſe-race, was her umbrage: But for all this ſhe was full of anxious circumſpections, ſuch as were like to break off the voyage, and ſhe ſhe alledged ſo many obſcure and intangled reaſons, to make me underſtand what cauſe ſhe had to keep this journey cloſe, as I wondered, and afterwards ſhe made me ſwear a thouſand oaths of ſecrecy, though heaven knows I knew nothing then but that ſhe would go to ſee this Horſe-race; after which I went before to prepare her who was to entertain Parthenia, and order all things for the concealment of her voyage, my Mother her ſelf knew not that my Siſter wat at Paphos, and the matter was carried ſo handſomly, that none did ſo much as ſuſpect any thing; and certainly it was not a buſineſs of difficulty, for ſince Parthenia told none at her own houſe whither ſhe went, and ſince ſhe arrived in the night, and the houſe where ſhe lodged, was very near the gate of the Town where ſhe entered, it was not any eaſie matter for any to diſcover any thing, eſpecially Parthenia having no women with her which ſtirred out. In ſhort, Sir, Parthenia came to Paphos, hardly conceiting that ſhe came to ſee Timantes; and when ſhe was there, and Amaxita asking her whether ſhe would perform her promiſe? ſhe replied reſolutely that ſhe was not able to conſent unto it, and that ſhe would only ſee Timantes at the Race which was to be the next morning: It was in vain for Amaxita to tell her, her term was expired that day, for ſhe had ſetled her reſolution: Amaxita was in a hundred minds, whether or no ſhe ſhould acquaint Philoxipes with the buſineſs: But for all that, ſhe thought that the two Oracles which Parthenia had received, had made ſuch a deep impreſſion in her mind, that ſhe would be extreamly offended if ſhe ſhould have cauſed the Prince Philoxipes to have importuned her; ſo that fearing to incenſe her to no purpoſe, and thinking that if the Gods would have Timantes to marry Parthenia, they would find out the means to bring it about, ſhe did not reſiſt the Princeſs. However, the Horſe-race was to be the day following, and all the Court would be there, and ſince the houſe where Parthenia was, was uſed to entertain Ladies upon ſuch occaſions, ſhe who owed it could not deny thoſe who came that day to look out at the Windows, unleſs ſhe ſhould give cauſe of ſuſpicion that ſome were there whom ſhe would not have ſeen; therefore Parthenia was put into a Cloſet, whoſe Window was ſo dreſſed with boughs and leaves of Palm, through which one might ſee, and not be ſeen, and through which Parthenia ſaw the Horſe-race which was in a great plain before that window. I will not offer to deſcribe this Race unto you, Sir, it will ſuffice I tell you that Timantes appeared there in glory, and won the prize; But the moſt remarkable paſſage was, that Timantes, imagining that the unknown Lady who filled him ſo full of curioſity, was one of the Ladies of Paphos, and that ſhe would ſee this Race, did change his Motto, which he bore upon other occaſions, which repreſented a Phœnix upon his ſhield, with this Motto,

I ſtay until the Sun do burn me;

he now repreſented a Faggot ſet on fire by the heat of the Sun, which was Eclipſed, with theſe words,

It burns me though it be Eclipſed.

I leave you to imagine, Sir, how the ſight of this device ſurpriſed Parthenia, ſince the Cloſet wherein ſhe was ſhut up, was very low, and the Race ending juſt under it, ſhe might eaſily perceive this device upon the ſhield of Timantes; for all thoſe who were of this ſport, carried a Javelin and a Buckler. Parthenia no ſooner ſaw this device, but ſhe made the Application as Timantes would have wiſhed, and told it unto Amaxita, who taking that opportunity, asked her with a ſmile, whether ſhe would let that Sun which burned Timantes be always Eclipſed? As my Siſter did not ſpeak altogether ſeriouſly, ſhe anſwered her in the ſame manner; however Amaxita obſerved, that Parthenia was very glad Timantes had not forgot her; and though this device might be taken as much for a common piece of gallantry, as a mark of love, yet it touched to heart Parthenia, and obliged her: It ſeemed alſo, that Timantes then had a more melancholy air in his aſpect, than ordinary, and ſhe imagined that the reaſon perhaps was, becauſe ſhe had broke her promiſe with him; yet ſhe could not conſent to ſend him word that he ſhould come into the Garden by a back door which was under the Walls of the Town, and ſpeak unto her through the grates of her window: But, Sir, it was not long that ſhe was in this trouble, for the ſame gods who brought them twice to meet, brought them the third time to ſpeak together, and thus it came about. The Lodging of Timantes was ſo near Parthenia's, that the lodgings looked into the Garden; thoſe with whom Timantes lodged having no Garden of their own, and being people of good quality, and intimate friends unto this Lady where Parthenia lodged, they obtained leave of her to walk there ſometimes, and obtained the ſame liberty for Timantes: Timantes being melancholy and hot with Riding that day, he deſired to refreſh himſelf, and walk there that evening; and ſo he did, but all alone, and walked ſo a long time, afterward he ſat down in an Arbour of Jeſſamine, juſt under Parthenia's window, and there ſtayed near an hour, finding much pleaſure in muſing in a place where the air was ſo freſh and ſweet. The Sun was ſet, and hardly day enough to diſtinguiſh Flowers, when Parthenia opened her window over the Arbor of Jeſſamine, purpoſely to let in the ſweet ſmell which every Summer evening in Cyprus ariſeth from the ground: She no ſooner opened it, but ſhe ſaw the Moon ariſe, ſo that ſpeaking unto Amaxita, but not naming her, That Planet, ſaid ſhe unto her, is not Eclipſed, as that in the Device of Timantes was; it was long only of your ſelf (ſaid Amaxita unto her) that the Sun of him you named, ſhined not more bright than this Planet you behold. You may imagine, Sir, how Timantes was ſurpriſed, when he heard himſelf named, and thought it to be the voice of his amiable unknown Lady: Yet he was not ſure of it at firſt; for ſince Parthenia ſpoke not very loud, he was in ſome doubt, but to be ſatisfied, he ſtarted up in all haſte, and went unto the window gently; and he was no ſooner there, but Parthenia anſwering to what Amaxita ſaid, ſince it is the work of the gods to un-eclipſe the Planets, ſaid ſhe, it is therefore unto them Timantes muſt addreſs himſelf, if he would have them unvailed. I have already followed your counſel, Madam, (replied Timantes) ſince doubtleſs it was the gods that brought me hither, when it is only long of your ſelf that the Sun which burns me, though Eclipſed, does not reduce me unto aſhes if it ſhould diſcover its whole light. When Timantes came near, Parthenia not knowing who it was, pulled down her hood, and retired from the window: But Amaxita, not ſo frighted as ſhe was, knew it to be the voice of Timantes at firſt; ſo that this encounter more confirming her in her opinion that the gods would have Timantes and Parthenia marry, ſhe gave him a complement, and went unto the other ſide of the room to fetch Parthenia, who was very backward, but at laſt came unto the window: She did not truſt unto the mask of night to hide her beauty; for ſince the Moon ſhone, neither ſhe, nor Amaxita would appear before Timantes but with their hoods pulled down; ſo that he ſeeing ſhe was not diſpoſed to give him ſatisfaction: You muſt needs be, Madam, ſaid he unto her, what I ever thought you, that is, the faireſt perſon in the world, ſince you do not think night with all its vails can hide the luſtre of your eyes. However, Madam, I beſeech you ſhew me that which I know already. Let me receive ſome conſolation by hearing you ſpeak; and tell me why you would have me be a debtor unto chance for my good fortune and happineſs in meeting with you, after you had promiſed me the honour of talking with you, within eight days? When Timantes began to ſpeak, Parthenia was infinitely troubled, becauſe ſhe could not conceive how he ſhould come into the garden, unleſs he knew ſhe was there, and unleſs ſome had betrayed her; but when ſhe heard him attribute the meeting unto chance, ſhe grew more confident, and her mind was in diſpoſition to anſwer him with more tranquility; yet would ſhe know more preciſely how he came into the Garden, and did ſo earneſtly preſs him to tell her, that he told her how it was, and moreover told her ingenuouſly without any diſſimulation, that he did not doubt but to know unto whom he ſpoke, ſince ſhe was in a houſe ſo near his; yet he did not know who dwelt in the houſe. But after Timantes had told all ſhe deſired to know: You ſee, Madam, ſaid he unto her, that I tell you all I can, do the ſame I conjure you for me, and hide not your eyes ſo long, ſince certainly they carry their own light with them, I ſhall ſee them in ſpight of all obſcurity. Therefore for Heavens ſake, Madam, deny me not this favour; for I deſire it more paſſionately than I did ever any thing in my life. I do proteſt, Madam, though I have ſeen all that's fair in Cyprus, yet I find not one amongſt them all whom I deſire to ſee again with half that zeal I do your beauty. I never appeared in all theſe publick Feaſts, but with all the ſymptomes of a man who adores you as he doth the gods, that is, without knowing you. Therefore, again, and again I implore you, Madam, not to deny my ſuit. Sir, ſaid Parthenia, I would I could conſent unto what you ſeem ſo earneſtly to deſire: But truly there is ſomething ſo odd and fantaſtical in my face, that I cannot do as you deſire, unleſs I ſhould reſolve never to ſee you again. But if it be ſo, that my converſation does not glut you, the time may come in which you may know who I am without loſing me, therefore I pray content your ſelf at this time, that I ſuffer you to talk an hour of things indifferent. Of things indifferent (replied Timantes ſharply) alas, Madam, 'tis more than I can do, and I muſt tell you, that I can ſpeak of nothing but your ſelf, until you grant my deſire. Our converſation then will not be very pleaſant (replied Parthenia, and laughed) for you know ſo little of me, that we ſhall but ſtill repeat the ſame diſcourſe again, yet I am moſt certain, replied he, that I ſhall never be weary of it, and after I have told a thouſand and a thouſand times how I am charmed a thouſand times with the excellency of your voice, and more with the graces of your wit, yet I ſhall ſtill be delighted with repeating it again, provided you will not deprive me of the hopes of knowing you better hereafter than now I do. As long as you tell me nothing but that you have a ſtrong deſire to know who I am, replied Parthenia, I ſhall eaſily believe you; but that you ſhould perſwade me that as long as you are ignorant of who I am, yet that I ſhould have any power over your ſoul, this is a thing I cannot eaſily comprehend, and yet it is that, if any thing, will oblige me to tell you who I am; for truly to truſt all the ſecrets of my life unto one who has no affection to me, is a thing I cannot do; and therefore ſince it is impoſſible you ſhould love me unleſs you did know me, and ſince you cannot know me unleſs you love me firſt, I pray you therefore after a diſengagement of our promiſes at Amathonte, let us part for ever. Oh, Madam, ſaid he unto her, ſince the means to know you, is to love you; I do now moſt infallibly profeſs it; for truly, there is ſome ſuperior power which, whether I will or no, does force me unto it, and to love you better than ever any I yet know: Yet, Madam, I muſt declare this withal, that ſince I muſt and do love you, my love is love and not friendſhip-love;for as for my friends of either ſex, it is my mind that makes the choice, and I will know them long before I truſt them; But it is otherwiſe with my love, for it is above my reaſon, it is the work of my heart, not of my Brain: Therefore, Madam, ſince I ſenſibly find that inclination unto you, which I never found unto any elſe, I may well believe that this my inclination is love. For my part, ſaid Parthenia, I am not of your opinion, becauſe I am perſwaded, that if you talk long with me, though you did not know who I was, nor ſaw whether I were fair or foul, yet perhaps you might affect in the degree of friendſhip: for by long converſation one may come to know the ſoul of that perſon they converſe withall, and it is not impoſſible but friendſhip may ſpring from ſuch acquaintance,though they are ignorant both of quality and face: But as for love, Sir, it is of another nature, for it is beauty only which can claim the priviledge of creating love. Alas, Madam, ſaid he unto her, how little do you know what zeal love is, if you think that Beauty is the only cauſe of it? do you not conſider that if it were ſo, none but great beauties could create it? then two or three high beauties would engroſs all the Adorers in a great Court: but on the contrary we ſee it otherwiſe, and find ſome women who have neither much beauty nor great wit, yet are loved by very compleat men; and ſometimes it is ſeen alſo, that the faireſt women in the world cannot ſo much as win one ſingle heart unto their ſervice; and ſince ſo, Madam, love is a powerful effect of that ſympathy which operates whether we will or no; and believe me, Madam, I beſeech you, that ſince there are ſome men, yea and witty men, who love women who are not very fair, I may love you, whom I know already to be a great beauty, and whom I think to be very fair. However it be, Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, you ſhall not know it this long time: Is it poſſible, Madam, replied he, that you ſhould have any reaſon for doing ſo? Yes, anſwered ſhe, a moſt prevalent one, ſuch a one as if you render your ſelf hereafter worthy to know it, you will confeſs I do but what I ought to do Yet, Madam, replied he, though perhaps it concerns you not to let your ſelf be known here, yet dare you not truſt my diſcretion? I proteſt, Madam, that I never revealed unto any whoſoever, any thing which you did forbid me: at Amathonte I know it very well (ſaid ſhe purpoſely to puzle him) for I am informed as much from all your friends, and therefore knowing that you are able to keep a ſecret, I will truſt you with one, and acquaint you with the reſentments of my ſoul, to the end you may not be abſolutely ignorant of me: Know then that I am very ſincere, that I have a very tender heart, that my affection is a little Tyrannical, that I love virtue and honour, that I hate a divided heart, that I never will beſtow my own, but where I am fully convinced by all imaginable ways, that I ſhall ſoveraignly raign in his heart that ſhall have it; that I am a mortal enemy to inconſtancy, and to avoid that unhappineſs principally, I neither deſire to love, nor be loved: And more than this, Sir, never ask me, for I aſſure you, that you ſhall not obtain it. Oh, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) I beſeech you do not ſubvert the univerſal order of the world; I have known the faces of all my friends a long time before I could know their hearts, and you would have me know your heart a long time time before I muſt know your face; once more I beſeech you, Madam, be not ſo prepoſterous in your actions, but after you have ſhewed me your ſoul, let me ſee your fair eyes alſo. No, no, Madam, (ſaid he after a little pauſe) upon ſecond thoughts, I deſire nothing but what you pleaſe, and I confeſs, I ought to be ſo well ſatisfied with this rich diſcovery of your divine ſoul, that I ought to deſire no more: But, Madam, to the end you may know my ſoul as you do my quality, my ſpirit, and my perſon, be pleaſed to know, that whatſoever I promiſe, I always perform; that where I love, I love till death, unleſs I be forſaken or betrayed; that I am none of thoſe Lovers who profeſs ſervice that they may command; on the contrary, I would not be loved, but only to be the more captivated; I am not of their humour who value the wit of women, but only as an ornament unto there beauty; on the contrary I value their beauty only as an ornament unto their minds; ſo that not building the foundation of my love upon ſo tranſitory a ground, but upon ſuch as ſhall laſt as long as life; it will laſt as long alſo. If all this were true, replied Parthenia, and ſmiled, you ſhould not deſpair of knowing who I am: Since I believe all you ſay, Madam, ſaid he, I hope you will believe all that I ſay; you may enquire coucerning me of all thoſe that know me, but I can enquire of none but your ſelf: You might have ſaid, replied Parthenia, that it was not permitted you to enquire of any body elſe: However, Madam, ſaid he unto her, I beſeech you permit me to talk with you here, until you have had a longer tryal of my diſcretion: Parthenia then ſtayed a while before ſhe anſwered; but Timantes was ſo importunate and full of urging expreſſions, that indeed ſhe feared leſt he ſhould attempt more than ſhe would have him, to know who ſhe was; therefore beginning to ſpeak: I am contented, Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him) that you ſhall ſpeak unto me for ſome certain days, at the ſame hour, and in the ſame place, provided you ſwear unto me by Venus-Urania, that you will not tell unto any whoſoever without exception, how you met with the unknown perſon, nor reveal where ſhe is; for if you do, I ſhall infallibly know it, and I ſhall no ſooner know it, but I ſhall immediately reſolve never to ſpeak with you again, and take ſuch a courſe as you ſhall never know me, and therefore ſatisfie your ſelf with thus much. Madam, ſaid he unto her, ſince it is in your power to make laws, and ſince it is my duty to obſerve them, certainly you ſhall be obeyed: But I beſeech you, Madam, what ſecurity can I have in your promiſe, that I ſhall ſee you here to morrow at the ſame time and place? My word (replied ſhe.) But, Madam, ſaid he, you did not keep your word before, for the eight days were paſt, and yet I heard not from you. To ſet your mind at reſt, replied ſhe, I allow you to reveal all I have ſaid unto you, if I be not here to morrow. After this, Timantes retired, and aſſoon as he was gone, ſhe ſhut her window, and ſent to deſire her with whom ſhe lodged, that the door which was towards her neighbours houſe might be ſhut, leſt Timantes ſhould return and harken what they ſaid in her chamber; ſhe had a deſire to quit it, and did ſo, taking another one ſtory higher, which looked not into the Garden; moreover ſhe charged a-new all thoſe that knew of her being at Paphos to keep it ſecret, no other reaſon appearing unto them, but that Parthenia had no mind it ſhould be known that ſhe quitted her ſolitude to come and ſee any publique ſports, eſpecially, ſince ſhe did not lodge with the Prince her Brother, whither ſhe ſaid ſhe would not go, becauſe there it was impoſſible her voyage could be kept ſecret; ſhe had alſo this advantage, that the woman with whom ſhe lodged, was eaſie to be deceived. But after all theſe orders were given, and that ſhe was alone with Amaxita, ſhe began to diſcourſe of their adventure; one while ſhe was raviſhed with joy that Timantes had found her out, without her giving him any notice; other whiles one would have thought ſhe had been angry with her ſelf for ſeeing him at all; afterwards ſhe had an imagination, that Amaxita gave him notice, that ſhe was in the houſe, and that ſhe had cauſed it to be told unto Timantes what was her humour; for indeed ſaid ſhe unto her, he hath told me all that I could deſire a man ſhould ſay, or all that he could tell me if he had known my mind. This ought to perſwade you, Madam, replyed Amaxita, that it was the Gods who prompted him to ſpeak, for as for my part, you know I never was out of your ſight, nor have I any acquaintance with Timantes: I know it very well replyed Parthenia; but I know ſo little how it ſhould come to paſs, that Timantes ſhould find me out ſo often, and ſhould tell me almoſt all my own thoughts, that you muſt pardon me, if I had and ſtill have a little ſuſpicion of you; and ſince I muſt confeſs the truth unto you as unto a ſecond ſelf, I think that I did not accuſe you for it, to the end you might more powerfully perſwade me, that it was the pleaſure of the Gods Timantes ſhould love me; and I did poſitively believe all he told me, for I could not ſtifle the only pleaſant thought which I enjoy'd ſince my ſolitude, which is, my hopes to find a man capable of a conſtant love. But, Madam, (ſaid Amaxita unto her) why have you given orders contrary to the promiſe which you made of ſeeing Timantes again? The reaſon is, ſaid ſhe, becauſe I would ſpeak with him, but I would not have him know me, and becauſe I thought you would find a way to morrow that the garden door which I cauſed to be ſhut, may be open: For truly, until I am aſſured Timantes loves me, and aſſured by a thouſand tryals of his affection, I will not have him know yet who I am, or ſee me; but that which I would at preſent know, is, whether Timantes be faithful or no, and whether he hath not told our adventure, neither to the Prince, nor any other of his friends. After Parthenia had expreſſed her ſelf. Amaxita (who knew that Antimaques was in love with Dorida, and that Dorida wiſhed well unto me, and would truſt me with any thing) told her, that if ſhe would truſt it unto my diſcretion, I ſhould eaſily make a diſcovery of what ſhe deſired to know. At firſt Parthenia pauſed upon the propoſition, but afterwards ſhe was ſo well perſwaded of my fidelity, that ſhe truſted me with the ſecret. In the mean time Timantes had his ſhare in ſorrow; for after he was entered into the houſe where he lodged, he enquired, not telling any reaſons why he asked, what women thoſe were in the houſe which belonged to the Garden where he walkt, but he was amuſed when he was anſwered there was none but the Miſtreſs of the houſe, who was well in years, and ſome ſervants which waited upon her: Yet he very well knew, that ſhe unto whom he ſpoke, was neither a ſervant, nor old; for her converſation aſſured him of the firſt, and her fair hands, her ſweet voice, and handſom ſtature aſſured him of the ſecond: Alſo the two other times which he ſaw her, he knew by her colours which ſhe wore, that certainly ſhe was young, though by it he could not know her quality: So that all theſe circumſtances compared, they puzzled him exceedingly: He ſaw that all he knew of her was moſt admirable; and that ſhe had ſuch a charming Emphaſis in the accent of her voice, as any thing ſounded better in her mouth a thouſand times than in any other: He found her to be of ſuch ſharp, ſo gallant, and eaſie a ſpirit and wit, that he was raviſhed with her diſcourſe, and he believed ſhe was of ſuch a ſweet nature, as could love moſt tenderly, grounding his opinion upon her hatred againſt inconſtancy. But for all this (ſaid he, upon ſerious examination of the matter) there muſt needs be ſomething that is very ſtrange, either in the quality, or in the beauty of this woman; for why elſe ſhould ſhe be ſo nice as to hide her ſelf from a man whoſe acquaintance ſhe does not abſolutely reject? And yet ſhe muſt needs be fair, for I have ſeen as much as argues it; and ſhe muſt needs alſo be a woman of Quality, her language, her ſpirit, her wit, her port, does ſufficiently prove it, and convinceth me of theſe doubts. Whatſoever ſhe be (ſaid he) ſhe does infinitely pleaſe me: and though it be only to know her name, I muſt obey her; for ſhe hath told me, that if I do as ſhe would have me, I may not deſpair of knowing it hereafter, and yet it is a very odd way, that I ſhould know a thing by not enquiring of it; for he conſidered, how ſhe poſitively told him, that if he enquired of any one, ſhe could know it; and if ever ſhe knew he enquired of any one, he ſhould never know her, nor ſpeak unto her; therefore his curioſity wrought ſuch effects in his heart, as never did the like in any, ſince it hindered him from enquiring of that which he moſt earneſtly deſired to know: And truly, though Timantes had a moſt longing deſire to ask all his acquaintance who this amiable unknown one was, whom he already loved, and hardly knew it, yet he durſt not ſpeak of it, ſo much as to Antimaques, leſt he ſhould blab it unto Dorida: So that he paſſed over that night and the day following in extream impatience. In the mean time Amaxita, having ſent me unto him, I became his ſpie, and I kept all the day where he was, and at night reported unto my Siſter, how he ſeemed very reſerved unto all thoſe he met withal; that he refuſed ſupper with the Prince Philoxipes, or to go into the Walks upon the Sea-ſide, as he uſed, where all the Court did rendezvous, and that he retired unto his own lodging very timely, not rendering any reaſon why: So that Amaxita told all this unto the Princeſs; ſhe was exceedingly joyed, and more readily reſolved, not to fail in her promiſe unto Timantes, and in order to that, appointing Amaxita to get the Garden door open, and Amaxita knowing how to do it unknown unto the Miſtreſs of the houſe, all things were ſo handſomly carried, that at the appointed hour, Timantes came to the window of the low room where Parthenia was, under pretence of writing. But when Timantes came, he could ſee no more of Parthenia than before, but yet found her in a diſpoſition to receive him more civilly, the reports which ſhe had from me, giving her more ſatisfaction. She no ſooner ſaw him, but ſhe began to ſpeak: I deſire your pardon, Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him) for being perhaps a hinderance unto your pleaſure in walking by the ſea-ſide as you uſe, but that which comforts me a little is, that it hinders you from the ſight of all thoſe Beauties which uſe to walk there. It ſufficiently appears, Madam, (ſaid he unto her, after he had moſt reſpectively ſaluted her) That I hoped for greater pleaſure in your company, than in the ſight of all thoſe Beauties you ſpeak of, ſince I quitted them to come unto you; and therefore I need not any complement upon that. But, Madam, ſince you know all paſſages of the world ſo well, it ſeems you are not unknown unto any but me. 'Tis true, Sir, replied ſhe, but it is upon a reaſon ſo advantagious to you, that if I could now tell it, I am confident you would confeſs your ſelf obliged unto me for it: How much ſoever I am reſolved to honour you, replied he, yet I can hardly think I am obliged to thank you for denying me a thing which I deſire with as much zeal as the moſt violent Lovers do the enioyment of their Miſtreſſes. Yet it appears (ſaid Parthenia craftily) that the converſation you had here yeſterday, gave you no great ſatisfaction: For as for my part when I paſs any night away in any agreeable ſatisfaction, there remains in my countenance all the next day a great impreſſion of joy, whereas on the contrary, when I have been in any wearying company, melancholy ſads my eyes at leaſt four and twenty hours after it; and therefore if you be of my humour, I have cauſe to think you were weary of our converſation yeſterday; for I know you were very melancholy, and reſerved all the day after. 'Tis true, Madam, replied he, I was very reſerved, but it was upon a reaſon quite contrary to yours, ſince truly I am never ſo melancholy as after a great pleaſure. And this, Madam, which I enjoy in talking with you, is far from a ſerene delight, but on the contrary is ſo mixed with inquietude and curioſity, that it torments me as much as if you ſhould deprive me of all hopes; for you know me, and all that I do, but I cannot ſo much as know your name, or what you are, though I deſire it with ſuch a zealous paſſion as will never let me reſt till I be ſatisfied. But, Sir, ſaid Parthenia unto him, methinks you ſhould not be ſo vexed to know who I am, ſince if I be worth your thoughts, it depends upon your ſelf to know it hereafter, but if you have only a bare curioſity to know me, doubtleſs then it will be nothing difficult to overcome your ſelf without that ſatisfaction, ſince you need only come no more hither, but forget me, and there's an end. Do you think, Madam, ſaid he unto her, that it is ſuch an eaſie matter to forget you? I think indeed, ſaid ſhe, that it is a harder matter to remember me than to forget me. No, no, Madam, replied he, do not deceive your ſelf, I ſhall never forget you, nor be contented till I have obtained two moſt precious things from you, I mean, the ſight of your beauty, and the knowledge of your heart. The knowledge of the one, replyed ſhe, muſt obtain the ſight of the other; and therefore to teach you what you ought to do to obtain your deſires, Know, that before you ſee me, or know who I am, you muſt win my heart, and therefore conſider well with your ſelf, whether you can do all I would have you without knowing me; for that is the only way to win my heart. And ſince I am very ſincere, and will not diſguiſe my mind ſo much as my face, I will tell you, that for divers reaſons, which now I muſt conceal, I am reſolved never to entertain any affection which is built upon ſuch a fading foundation as Beauty and Riches are, upon which time and fortune have ſuch influences: I would have one love me by a natural inclination, by the knowledge of my ſoul, my mind, and my humour: Moreover, I would have him love me either ugly, or poor, as I am, or may be: I would have him love none but me, and love me extreamly, and always; to do nothing but what I would, nor to deſire any thing but what pleaſeth me; to obey me blindly, and without any repugnancy. I pray, Sir, after this, judge whether it be ſo eaſie as you think to injoy the ſight of me: For I ſhall never grant it but unto ſuch a one as hath won my heart, and my heart will never be won, but by ſuch ways as I have told you. Moreover, ſince blood and birth are not things ſo tranſitorie, ſince neither time nor fortune can hinder me from enjoying them till death, I will confeſs unto you that the houſe from whence I am deſcended is as noble as any in Cyprus: But after all this, Sir, ask me no more; for you will ask in vain. Whilſt Parthenia was ſpeaking, Timantes was in a maze of thoughts: For as all Greece is full of certain women who make publick profeſſion of an univerſal Gallantry, and who do not confine themſelves unto the limits of modeſty, but who by proſtituting their honours do enrich themſelves, and there was ſome ſuch in Cyprus, ſo his fears ſometimes ſuggeſted unto him, that Parthenia was one of them. But he found ſhe ſpoke in ſuch an air as perſwaded him to the contrary; and when he conſidered that ſhe was in the houſe of a woman of Quality and Honour, and that it is not the cuſtom of ſuch kind of perſons to hide their beauty, he repented of his former thoughts: And when Parthenia had told him all the qualifications which ſhe required to be in a Lover, he found his own humours deſcribed, and told her immediately, that he would engage himſelf unto all ſhe had propounded, provided ſhe would promiſe him, that after ſhe had made tryal of his conſtancy, ſhe would give him her heart, and ſhew her face. And theſe promiſes paſſed on both ſides in appearance, rather as bare complements and pieces of Gallantry, than any real promiſes. And though there was already a violent inclination in the heart of Timantes to love Parthenia, and a moſt ſtrong diſpoſition in Parthenia to love Timantes, yet ſince both of them were perſons of great wit and reaſon, they thought this ſo odd and unreaſonable, reaſonable, that they could not reſolve to ſpeak ſeriouſly, and many days paſſed before they could underſtand the real thoughts of each other in earneſt. In the mean time before Timantes went away, Parthenia made him ſwear not to ſpeak a word of any paſſages, nor to enquire of her, but that he ſhould ſtay until ſhe gave him aſſurance of her affection, and let him ſee whether ſhe was fair or foul. The truth is, Sir, Parthenia's wit did ſo charm Timantes, and ſhe had ſuch an abſolute power over him, that he durſt not tell ſo much as Antimaques his adventure, leſt he ſhould tell it unto ſome other. And it was eaſie for him to conceal it, becauſe Antimaques being in love with Dorida, he was continually every night with the Princeſs Policrite, ſo that Timantes could be at his appointed times unperceived; yet for all this, he indeavoured by one of his ſervants to ſuborn one of that Ladies houſe where Parthenia lodged, to tell who it was which lay there, but all buſineſſes were ſo handſomly and cloſely carried, that nothing could be known. In the mean time, ſince he feared that if this unknown Lady ſhould know how he broke promiſe with her in the enquiring who ſhe was, ſhe would caſt him off, he laboured by all means to ſtop the mouths of thoſe that were enquired of, and to oblige them unto ſilence: ſo that indeed Parthenia never knew it: 'tis true, he was every way ſo obſervant, and faithful, that ſhe had reaſon to be contented; for notwithſtanding all my obſervant eyes over him, both in all his words and actions, I could never report any thing unto my ſiſter which could diſpleaſe Parthenia, and indeed he much altered his manner of living, for his only deſign being to find out this lovely unknown one, and being perſwaded that ſhe was ſome Lady of Paphos, who came to that houſe only to talk with him, he went from viſit to viſit, not ſtaying long any where, hoping ſtill to diſcover by voice this Lady whom he ſo much deſired to know: but all his enquiry and viſits were in vain, for he could not find her; and Timantes became more deeply in love with Parthenia than any of her former Lovers who had ſeen her: He grew alſo much more unquiet in his mind, and certainly was tormented more than other Lovers uſe to be; ſometimes he would ſo complain unto Parthenia that ſhe would pity him, and ſometimes he would ſo dote, that he made her laugh: For my part, (ſaid he unto her when the Moon ſhined clear, and when he preſſed her to lift up her hood) I cannot indure you ſhould ſo long deny me what I ask, not that there is any neceſſity of your Beauty to make my paſſion indure, for ſince it began without it, it can continue without it: But that which makes me I cannot endure you ſhould uſe me thus, is, that you tell me you will let me have a ſight of you when I have won your heart, and perceiving that you are more and more careful to hide it, I have cauſe to think I am further off from making that illuſtrious conqueſt. You would have it at too cheap a rate (replied Parthenia) if you ſhould ſo ſoon win it, and therefore that you may the more eſteem me, I will hold you off a little longer. In the mean time I beſeech you, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) let your words form your Image, that I may adore it, and which paſſing from your mouth into my heart, it may there remain, until the real ſubſtance drive it out: for truly, Madam, I wander all the day long, from houſe to houſe, from Temple to Temple, and every where to ſeek you out: my imagination fancies your beauty every day in a hundred ſeveral Idea's, ſometimes I ſee you fair, ſometimes brown hair, ſometimes freſh complexion, ſometimes pale, ſometimes I am perſwaded that you have ſweet, languiſhing, and compaſſionate eyes, and ſometimes I think you have ſprightly and ſparkling eyes, ſuch as kindle fire in the ſouls of all thoſe that look upon them: ſometimes I think them gray, and ſometimes black, and not knowing what they are, I ſtill equally adore them, what ever they be: But I beſeech you, Madam, tell me only whether they be fair, or black, or gray, or blue, or what they are? When you have told me (replied ſhe craftily) what colour you deſire them to be, then perhaps I ſhall tell you which they are. Timantes at this was puzzled, for he durſt not tell which he deſired, leſt he ſhould hit wrong, nor did Parthenia poſitively promiſe him to tell which they were, ſo that not daring to anſwer preciſely, he began to accuſe her of Inhumanity, and ſhe interrupting him, accuſed him of weakneſs; for ſaid ſhe unto him, I perceive by your own words, that you would have me fair, becauſe you ſay your imagination fancies me to have the faireſt eyes in the world, and conſequently I have cauſe to fear, that if I be not ſo, you will change your opinion of me. Oh, Madam, ſaid he unto her, I beſeech you do me not ſo much wrong as to think, that though you be not fair, that I ſhall love you leſs: but however, as long as your eyes do not bely my imagination, I muſt ſtill think you are the faireſt perſon in the world: and I beſeech you, why ſhould I not proportion your beauty unto the excellency of your ſoul and wit; and therefore if you will be ſure of my fidelity, ſhew your ſelf as you are, and if aftet that, I do not adore you ſtill, though you ſhould be never ſo ugly, then hate me as much as I love you. Love is a moſt fantaſtical paſſion (ſaid ſhe unto him) Thoſe who are in love with any beauty, do profeſs that it is the ſoul they love, and that they only deſire the poſſeſſion of the heart, and not the beauty: That this is the limits of their hopes, and ſum of all their deſires. Yet I ſee Love is of ſuch a nature that it ſlights all that it enjoys, and prizeth that which it doth not enjoy. Fruition gluts deſires, and if ſo, you have more reaſon to thank me than complain againſt me: For truly, I begin where others end: I have confeſſed unto you, that I eſteem you: I have told you that I ſhould be glad to have you love me, and I have not forbidden the hopes of being loved: You have conſented not to ground your affection upon beauty, I have diſcovered my ſoul unto you; I have taught you which way one may obtain my heart, and I never told you it was invincible: But after all this you complain, and preſs me to ſhew you my face. Go, go, Sir, keep within the limits of our conditions, unleſs you would have me break off with you. There is ſo much charm in every word you ſpeak, replied Timantes, that you ſtill augment both my love and my curioſity: And therefore I moſt humbly beſeech you, Madam, Give me leave to beg this favour upon my knees. Let it content you that I attempt not violent courſes to know who you are, and that I have ſo much power over my ſelf as not to ask all my acquaintance about the Court. But, Madam, that I may ſtill continue in my obedience, and enquire of none elſe, I beſeech you give me leave ſometimes to ask your ſelf; And be not offended, I conjure you, if I importune you with my prayers and impatiencies. Did I not infinitely love you, I ſhould not be ſo deſirous: But ſince I love you beyond all expreſſions, I muſt needs entreat you, and preſs you to let me know whom I love. I know there are a rich Mine of Beauties in your mind; all that I can ſee of your perſon is moſt admirable; The thoughts of your heart do raviſh me: There is ſome ſecret charm in your converſation, which I never found in any other: You do ſo powerfully and pleaſingly captivate my ſpirits when you ſpeak, that I think I could look upon you, and not perceive whether you be fair or foul, you utter not a word, which pierceth not my heart as ſoon as my ear. But for all this (ſaid he and ſmiled) methinks I do not know you yet ſufficiently, and my curioſity is ſo violent to ſee your face, as well as your heart, that I cannot chuſe but beg the favour, and to truſt unto my love and diſcretion. Whilſt Timantes was talking thus, Parthenia bethought her ſelf of a very odd way to make tryal of his Conſtancy; therefore beginning to ſpeak unto him, and ſeeming to yield unto part of his deſires, I am content, ſaid ſhe, ſince I ſee you ſo much deſire it, not to deny you all you ask: But ſince I am reſolved not to confer favour upon favour, and to loaden you all at once, I will not let you know who I am, only I will let you ſee my face in open day; but upon condition that you ſhall not ſpeak unto me in the place where you ſhall ſee me, which ſhall be, if you pleaſe, to morrow morning at a little Church cloſe by the Gate. There I will be juſt two hours after the Sun is up: I will wear the ſame cloaths I did, when you ſaw me at the Feaſt of Adonis: I will ſit by the ſecond Pillar upon the right hand, and will lift up my hood as ſoon as I ſee you, to the end you may ſatisfie one part of your curioſity. I beſeech you, Madam, ſaid he unto her, why may you not now ſhew your face? I know it is too dark to ſee you as I would, but it will not hinder me from ſeeing you better to morrow. I ſee you have forgot one of our conditions, which was, to deſire nothing but what I ſhall pleaſe. How great ſoever your power is over me, Madam, ſaid he unto her, it cannot extend ſo far as to bound my deſires: And all I am able to do, is to hide them from you. After this Parthenia parted from Timantes, not conſenting to his deſire, telling him, that if he did offer to ſpeak unto her, or to follow her to morrow morning, ſhe would never ſee him again. So that Timantes promiſing all ſhe deſired, he went away full of hope and joy that he ſhould ſee her in the morning who had filled him ſo full of love and curioſity. But as thoſe hopes, whoſe cauſes are love, are very reſtleſs, ſo he could not ſleep all that night, but did riſe ſo early, that his men wondered, and the more, becauſe they ſaw him dreſs himſelf, as if he were to go unto ſome Ball, or great Feaſt, though it was only unto a little Church where few of any quality ever reſorted, and ſo early as women of Quality were hardly awake. But Parthenia was as buſie as Timantes was impatient; for ſhe was ſo careful to make ſure of the heart of Timantes, as nothing ſhould ever after be able to take it from her; and therefore ſhe reſolved to try whether he could love her after a belief that ſhe was not fair: And in order to that, ſhe dreſſed a woman of hers, who was well bodied, and about her height, in the ſame habit that ſhe wore at the Feaſt of Adonis; and ſince the woman had never been at Paphos before, ſhe could not be known. But, Sir, be pleaſed to know, that this woman had one of the ugliest faces in the world, for all the parts of her face were ſo unproportionable, that one would have ſworn they were never made one for another: So exceſſively ill favoured, that I never in all my life ſaw an object ſo diſpleaſing as the face of this woman. In the mean time, to the end that Timantes might be the more deluded, Amaxita followed this counterfeit Parthenia, as if ſhe had been her woman, and they went unto this Church in the Ladies Coach with whom Parthenia lodged. But for the more ſecurity, Parthenia would have my Siſter ſend for me, to be in the Church, and to fall in with Timantes as ſoon as he came in, to the end that I might keep him from ſpeaking to her, whoſe ſight was enough to blaſt a Lover, giving me orders to do as occaſion ſhould require, and to ſpeak what I thought fit to keep Timantes from diſcovering the fallacy. Yet Parthenia did not intend to keep Timantes long in that belief of her he ſhould ſee, but on the contrary, reſolved when ſhe had ſeen how he would ſpeak unto her after this innocent impoſture, to let him ſee that evening the woman with her, to the end that he might know his error, and to root this terrible Image out of his mind. To be ſhort, Sir, as this device was phantaſtically plotted, ſo was it cunningly executed. This woman went unto the Church earlier than the hour appointed, that ſhe might be there before he came: Yet it was not above a quarter of an hour, for he burned in ſuch impatience to have a ſight of her he loved, that he was alſo there before the hour appointed: But as I was there before him, and knew the buſineſs, I ſaw him enter earneſtly and haſtily: He was no ſooner there, but he looked towards the place where Parthenia told him ſhe would ſit, and ſaw a perſon of a handſom ſtature, waited upon by one who indeed was the ſame he ſaw with Parthenia at Amathonte. Moreover, he ſaw ſhe was in the ſame place nominated, and that ſhe was in the ſame dreſs and habit which he had formerly ſeen; ſo that he did not at all doubt, but that ſhe whom he ſaw was his beloved unknown Lady, and though there was a little difference between the height of this woman and that of Parthenia, yet the fancy of Timantes was ſo prejudicated, that he did not obſerve it: He advanced haſtily to the place where ſhe was. But as it was covenanted betwixt Parthenia and him, that he ſhould not ſpeak unto her in that place, ſo he ſet himſelf down ſome three or four paces upon the left hand over againſt her, that he might the better ſee her: He was no ſooner ſet, but Amaxita advertiſed this counterfeit Parthenia, who knew not Timantes, to put up her hood, which ſhe immediately did, lifting it up ſo cunningly, that he could not ſee her hands; for Parthenia ſo ordered her. But, Sir, I beſeech yot imagine how Timantes was amazed, who fancying the Idea of an admirable beauty, ſaw the uglieſt vizard in the world: His wonder was ſo great, Sir, that it appeared in his face and all his actions; his colour went and came twenty times in a minute: he congeed towards her with a louring look in ſpite of his teeth; and was ſo frighted at ſuch a monſtrous object, that he did not ſo much as ſtrive to hide his amazement, nor had he the leaſt ſuſpicion of any deluſion put upon him: So that being extreamly troubled at this adventure: Oh ye unjuſt gods (ſaid he to himſelf, as he told me afterwards) why did you put ſo ſweet a voice, and ſo rare a mind into ſuch an ugly body? And why did ye joyn ſuch an admirable ſtature and body, with ſuch fair hands, unto ſuch a Witches face? But how comes it to paſs (ſaid he immediately after) that this perſon ſhould know all the niceties and delicates of Love, ſo well as ſhe doth? Some one ſure has loved her, elſe how could ſhe ever know them? For my part (ſaid he, and ſighed) had I ſeen her face before I had known her mind, I ſhould never have made her ſo much as my confident, and been far from making her my Miſtreſs; and I think I ſhould have faln from love to averſion. Had ſhe been but indifferent ugly, or one of thoſe women who neither attract nor loath: Had ſhe any thing in her phyſiognomie which promiſed either wit or goodneſs, I ſhould have ſome inclination to love her, and zealouſly adore her. But what do I ſay? Can I forſake her, who hath the moſt charming wit, and the moſt divine ſoul of any woman in the world, and who hath moſt ſenſibly allured my heart? As Timantes was thus diſcourſing with himſelf, with as much ſorrow as Amaxira took pleaſure in obſerving him, and continually looking upon her whom he thought to be Parthenia; This woman forgetting Parthenia's order not to ſhew her hands, did pull her hood down, and did not hide them; ſo that Timantes eſpied them, when he was perhaps ready to reſolve upon the breaking off with Parthenia, though he would never confeſs it; he ſaw they were not the ſame ſnowy hands which he ſaw both at the Labyrinth, and at Amathonte, and alſo at the window where he talked with her. He ſaw, I ſay, that they were thick and ſhort, and not at all white; ſo that recollecting himſelf, he knew he was deceived, and was ſo glad, that there appeared nothing but joy in his face, as there appeared ſorrow before: Then was he ſorry that he did no better gloſs his firſt ſurpriſe, but to repair it, he reſolved to go to her who had only the habit of his beloved unknown Lady, ſaying, that it was not unto her that he made a promiſe not to ſpeak unto in the Church, nor to follow her, and ſince ſhe had broke her word with him, he was not obliged to keep his with her. Juſt as he was fixing upon this courſe, the counterfeit Parthenia went away with my Siſter, and perfectly undeceived him in her walk, ſince ſhe had nothing of that Majeſtick port which Parthenia had, tho' ſhe was of a handſom ſtature. In the mean time, ſince I ſaw he followed her, I met with him, before he could overtake her. Sir (ſaid I unto him, as I accoſted him) this Lady whom I ſaw you ſalute, is ſhe of Crete? No, replied he, (and was very angry that I interrupted him in his deſign) I believe ſhe is of Paphos: and becauſe I thought her to be ſome woman of quality, therefore I ſaluted her, though unknown. I thought, Sir, ſaid I unto him, and ſmiled, that it had not been the faſhion to ſalute Ladies who are unknown, unleſs they be ſome ſuperlative beauties; but I ſee your civility goes farther than ours. I have ſomething more to ſay than you have (anſwered he, and ſtill went on) for I am more inquiſitive than you are, and would gladly know who this Lady is: Certainly, Sir, (replied I, not ſeeming as if I deſigned to hinder him) your curioſity in this, is like theirs who have a deſire to ſee Monſters, and who never think they have ſeen all Egypt, if they have not ſeen thoſe dangerous Beaſts which devour paſſengers: However, ſaid he, I would gladly know who this Lady is: Sir, ſaid I, ſtill to keep him from following, I beleive it will be an eaſie matter to know that, for I know the Coach which brought her to the Church: I know it alſo, ſaid he to me, but I know not her that is in it: I will promiſe you to enquire, replied I, and to give you an account. In the mean time, the counterfeit Parthenia and my Siſter took Coach, and Timantes durſt not ſpeak to them in my preſence, as he intended, ſo fearful was he to incenſe his beloved unknown one: But when they were gone, and Timantes ſaluted them at parting, he put me in mind of my promiſe, miſe, and deſired me to perform it, colouring his curioſity with ſuch poor pretences, as I had much ado to keep from laughing; I knew well that he only deſired to know her, that he might be acquainted with her who ſent her: and you may well think, Sir, that at that time I would promiſe him any thing: After this, I went home with him: and preſently after that, I went to give my Siſter an account of what had paſſed. Since ſhe ſaid that Parthenia did this only as a tryal of Timantes his fidelity, ſhe would not acquaint her with the extream ſorrow that appeared in his eyes, when he ſaw the face of this ill-favoured woman, but told her only that he ſeemed to be ſurpriſed, that notwithſtanding he ſaluted her moſt civilly, and would not follow her when ſhe went out of the Church, never telling how the woman undeceived him by ſhewing her hands; ſo that Parthenia thinking that Timantes imagined her to be as ugly as that woman, began to repent her of that impoſture, fearing he would not return any more according to the ordinary appointment; for though ſhe did this only to make Timantes think ſhe was not fair, yet ſhe could not indure that he ſhould have ſuch a horrible imagination of her, ſo that ſhe waited for the evening with a reſtleſs impatience, ſometimes ſhe entertained her ſelf with thoſe joys ſhe ſhould have if Timantes did return, ſince then it was an infallible ſign that uglineſs would not alter his mind; otherwhiles ſhe feared that he would not come at all; ſo that toſſing her thoughts continually between hopes and fears, ſhe paſſed away the day with as much perplexity, as Amaxita did with pleaſure, in remembrance of all ſhe ſaw in the mind of Timantes, unto whom Parthenia commanded me to tell, that I could not learn who that Lady was whom he ſaw in the Church: However, night being come, Timantes did not fail to come unto Parthenia, according to his cuſtom. But ſhe had no ſooner opened the window, than ſhe began to ſpeak unto him: Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, are you yet ſatisfied? can you find a heart to love ſuch a one as you ſaw this morning in the Church? To ſhew you, Madam, ſaid he unto her and ſmiled, that I can always take delight in ſeeing you, I beſeech you lift up your hood which hides you, for ſince I ſaw you in the morning, methinks you ſhould conceal your ſelf no longer: Why, Sir, ſaid ſhe, do you think you ſaw me? Indeed I do not, ſaid he unto her, and therefore I am come to complain againſt you for breaking promiſe, and conſequently diſobliged me from keeping promiſe with you: No, no, Madam, ſaid he, never deny the truth, for if you will deceive me, you muſt not only give your habit unto her who did ſo ſcurvily perſonate you, but you muſt give her your hands alſo, your air, and your port: yet I confeſs that at firſt the confidence which I had in your ſincerity, deceived me, and my own eyes betrayed me; but yet my heart did quickly find it was not you. However (ſaid ſhe unto him, and confeſſed the impoſture) I pray you tell me unto what height you hated me, when you thought that I was ſhe you ſaw? I do proteſt, Madam, ſaid he unto her, I had not one thought which could offend you, and I was more angry with the gods than you: But yet (replied Parthenia) what thoughts had you at that time? Since you will have me confeſs, replied he, I will tell you, that I murmured againſt the gods, for placing ſo many oppoſites and contrarieties in one perſon: yet I murmured only for the love of you; I had reſpect unto your honour, and not mine own; and I had not one deſire but what was for your advantage. Ah, Sir, you are not ſincere, (replied Parthenia, and interrupted him) but yet I wiſh you were, and would really tell me whether you would not have forſaken me, if I were ſuch a one as you ſaw? Since you deſire I ſhould lay open all my heart unto you (anſwered Timantes) I muſt tell you, that if you were ſuch a one, and could not ſpeak, I think I ſhould have much ado to continue my affection: but if on the contrary, you were ſuch a one as I ſaw, and would ſpeak always as you do, I would eternally follow you. But, Sir, replied Parthenia, I would not have you diſſemble, nor ſpeak in raillery; but in very ſerious earneſt: I will, Madam, ſaid he unto her, and the more exactly to obey you, I do proteſt before the gods who hear me, and as I hope they will aſſiſt me, that what I ſay is moſt really true; and I aſſure you, Madam, my heart is ſo abſolutely tied unto you, that I will never diſengage my ſelf: yet I muſt confeſs, Madam, that if you be as fair as I think you are, I believe I ſhall perhaps love you a little more than I do; but ſtill I muſt confidently aſſure you, that though you be not, I ſhall not love you leſs: Ah, Sir, replied ſhe, this cannot be, for ſince you can love me more, if I were fair, you muſt needs love me leſs, if I be not: yet, Sir, this is moſt certainly true, that though perhaps I be not ill favoured, yet I ſhall be: and therefore if you cannot love me unleſs I be fair, I pray cou ceaſe loving me now; for I ever told you from the firſt beginning of our acquaintance, that I never can endure a heart which can change, I would have one ſhould always love me alike, and if I ſhould love you one day, I ſhould love you ever, which can never be, if you can love me leſs; and indeed how is it poſſible one ſhould endure without high anger, and juſt reſentment, that one ſhould fall back from love to luke-warmneſs, to ſee ones ſelf ſlighted when one ſhould be moſt eſteemed: and yet, Sir, this is ordinary, and happens a thouſand and a thouſand times, and will do again: and the cruelty of the buſineſs is, that they both become equally inſupportable; and if there be any difference between the ſlighter and the ſlighted, between the party who falls off from love, and the party who is conſtant, certainly he that falls off is leaſt to be pitied: this inconſtant doth certainly loſe ſome pleaſure, in loſing his affection, but he can eaſily recover it in others; whereas on the contrary, a conſtant perſon in loſing the ſweets of being loved, doth at the ſame time loſe all the ſweets of his life, and is overwhelmed with all ſorts of ſorrows; and indeed, how is it poſſible he ſhould ever think of any thing that hath the name of a diverſion, how can he be able to live unleſs to revenge. Therefore, Sir, conſider ſeriouſly, whether or no you can be conſtant, do not make me more miſerable than I am, in making me hope for a good which I ſhall be deprived of. I do proteſt unto you, Madam, ſaid he unto her, that I think it an abſolute impoſſibility that ever I ſhall love you leſs: the thing which moſt perplexeth me, replied Parthenia, is, that when I ask any aſſurances of affection, the moſt inconſtant man in the world does think he ſhall never be inconſtant, and he will tell me the very ſame things that the moſt faithful Lover can. Madam, ſaid Timantes to her, ſince there is no ways to make ſure of the time to come, but by what is paſt, and what is preſent, I deſerve not to be puniſhed as an inconſtant man, becauſe I expreſs my real and true thoughts by the ſame words that a perfidious Lover expreſſeth his; therefore I beſeech you, be pleaſed to make tryal of my conſtancy, by any manner of way your wit can deviſe: but then, Madam, I beſeech you firſt, before you put me to the Teſt, tell me who you are, you muſt diſcover your fair eyes unto me, and ſtuff not my imagination with the Idea of a witch, as lately you would. Then, Sir, Parthenia thinking that perhaps Timantes was not fully undeceived of the opinion which he had, that ſhe whom he ſaw in the Church was really her ſelf, and therefore ſhe would have that woman ſpeak to him open faced, ſo that Timantes ſeeing them both at once, might plainly ſee, ſhe was not the ſame he ſaw in the Church. But as ſoon as Timantes ſaw her, and ſhe retired again, he began to ſpeak: no, no, Madam, ſaid he unto Parthenia, you need not ſhew me this woman twice, thereby to undeceive me, my error laſted not a minute, and my heart did not long fancy an image that was unworthy of your ſelf. You tell me too much to be believed, replied Parthenia; and to ſay truly (added ſhe and ſmiled) I cannot altogether blame you, though you ſhould not tell me the whole truth at this time; for truly I can hardly endure to let this woman ſerve me, ſhe is ſo ill favoured, and therefore I ought not to think it ſtrange, that another ſhould be backward to ſerve ſuch a reſemblance as ſhe hath for a Miſtreſs. After this, their converſation was ſometimes mingled with a thouſand ſincere proteſtations of eternal affection; another while with pleaſing joys of mind, which made both Timantes and Parthenia know, that they were worthy of each other, and that they loved more than they would ſpeak of. In the mean while, ſince the moſt difficult things in the world unto a Lover is, to keep lockt up in his heart all his adventures, and never tell them unto any; Timantes was of the ſame mind, and therefore altering his intentions of hiding it from Antimaques, leſt he ſhould be telling it to Dorida, he reſolved to acquaint him; and on the contrary thought it an eaſie matter for one lover to keep cloſe the ſecrets of another; ſo that after he had left Parthenia, and was returned home, he ſtayed until Antimaques was returned from Policrite, to the end he might acquaint him with all the adventure, and ask his counſel which way he ſhould ſatisfie both his love and his curioſity: yet before he would open unto Antimaques, he made him promiſe more than once, never to ſpeak of it unto any whoſoever, and then he told his adventure:. At firſt Antimaques harkened unto it as a pretty pleaſant ſtory, and as a very merry and phantaſtical adventure; not thinking that his friend was really in love with one he never knew: But when he heard him aggravate his inquietudes, he knew that his curioſity was of an amorous nature, for which he began to chide him: But when he perceived that Timantes was the more ſerious he began to pity and laugh at him. Then Antimaques asked him pardon for wondering at the oddneſs and novelty of the adventure; and told him that he could not believe it to be any more than a bare piece of gallantry, and not a real paſſion: But ſince I perceive you are really in love, I do infinitely pity you; and ſo much the more, becauſe one of theſe things muſt neceſſarily be, either ſhe whom you love is very fantaſtical, or elſe ſhe is foul, or elſe a woman of inferiour quality, and I pray heaven ſhe be not ſomething worſe than all theſe, and that you be not cozened. Ah, cruel and unjuſt friend (ſaid he unto him) it ſeems you know her whom I adore. I know her as much as you do (anſwered Antimaques) for it was I who firſt ſhewed her unto you in the Labyrinth. 'Tis true, ſaid Timantes, that you then ſaw her handſom ſtature and proportion, her fair hands; you heard her voice and her excellent wit, yet all theſe are nothing in compariſon of what I know: For I find ſuch a charm in her converſation as raviſheth me; and though ſhe will not tell me who ſhe is, yet I can diſcover as much as aſſures me of the greatneſs of her mind, of the nobleneſs of her birth, the generoſity of her ſoul, and alſo the beauty of her face: For there is ſuch a kind of charming air, and gallantry in her ſpeech, as any one may know ſhe is fair, and never ſee her. Alas, Sir, (cried Antimaques) I cannot chuſe but pity you, unto what a cruel point are you arrived? And I cannot chuſe but pity you the more, becauſe I do not ſee which way I ſhould ſerve you, ſince you forbid me to ſpeak of it unto any, and conſequently I cannot enquire who ſhe is you love: And yet I think that if you will follow my counſel, you may perhaps have ſome light of that which you deſire to know. Timantes then asked him, what he would adviſe him to do? I perceive, replied he, by what you have told me, that you have employed all your arguments to perſwade her you love, to let you know who ſhe is: You have uſed your beſt Rhetorick and reaſons; you have earneſtly entreated her; you have added complaints unto your reaſons and prayers, but I do not ſee you have tryed the eloquence of Liberality. Love would have offerings and ſacrifices as well as the reſt of the gods; and therefore if you will be rul'd by me, find out a handſom pretence of preſenting a rich preſent unto her: If ſhe be ſuch a one as you think her, ſhe will refuſe it, and not ſhew her ſelf after it: Or if ſhe be not ſuch a one, and fair, ſhe will take it, and let you ſee her. If it be the firſt of theſe, you have diſcovered a new beauty in her ſoul; and if the ſecond, you have at leaſt ſatisfied your curioſity: And however, if ſhe reſiſt your perſwaſions, your ſighs, and your preſents, you will reap ſo much ſatisfaction, as to ſee that I ſhall not condemn your paſſion. Though I know very well, replied Timantes, that Liberality is inſeparable from Love, yet I cannot chuſe but fear to incenſe the perſon whom I love in preſenting it. But if I do follow your counſel, the Preſent muſt be ſo rich and magnificent, as that ſhe may judge of the meaſure of my love by it. Then Timantes reſolving to follow the counſel of Antimaques, he choſe amongſt all his Jewels, that which was moſt rich and rare, and the number out of which it was taken was not ſmall: For as perſons of his Quality uſe always to carry many with them when they travel, ſo Timantes being very rich and magnificent, he had a great abundance of Jewels: And after he had taken one of them, which he thought to be moſt worthy of her he loved, and put it into a very magnificent box enamelled with gold, he reſolved to preſent it unto her the next morning, with ſuch a complement as might make it acceptable. Then after he had talked a while with her of ſeveral pleaſant Subjects, Timantes who was accuſtomed to complain, and knowing that nothing pleaſeth beauties better than to complain of ſomething, he began thus; How long, Madam, muſt I love you (ſaid he unto her) without giving any teſtimonies of my love? When ſhall I obtain ſo much liberty as to do ſuch things as love uſeth to inſpire into ſuch as are under his empire? Did I know you, and were it permitted me to manifeſt my paſſion, I ſhould be as forward in my expreſſions as the moſt paſſionate Lovers, and as magnificently you ſhould be courted, with as many Muſick entertainments as there are days: I ſhould ere now have made three or four publick Feaſts; the Ball ſhould be continually left with you, and you ſhould have ſeen whether we know how to treat in Crete, as well as they do in Cyprus. Moreover, ſince I am confident that I have many Rivals, I ſhould let you ſee that perhaps they were not worthy to be preferred before me: I ſhould follow, and court you in all places: I would endeavour to be a friend unto your friends, and an enemy unto your enemies: I would not look upon any but ſuch as you favour, and I ſhould find out a thouſand ways to let you ſee the grandure and merit of my paſſion; But as things are, what ſhould I do to expreſs my love? You may obey me, ſaid Parthenia, and that's enough; for in doing ſo, I ſhall think my ſelf as much obliged, as by all you tell me you would do if you knew me. That is ſo little, replied he, that I cannot beleive it will oblige you at all, Madam, or that you can ſo much as eſteem me for it; for thereby you cannot know whether I be generous or no, you will be ignorant whether I be liberal or covetous. I may have a thouſand virtues or vices which you can never ſee: and therefore, I beſeech you, Madam, let me not be confined unto ſuch narrow limits, but give love leave to appear ſome way or other: To make it appear in my eyes, anſwered Parthenia, it muſt be hid from the eyes of all others: At leaſt, Madam, ſaid he unto her, give me leave to regulate my whole life according to your directions, and that I may ask your advice in all my actions. As for that, replied Parthenia, I ſhall moſt willingly conſent unto it; for I deſire nothing more than to know your heart. Then, I beſeech you do me that honour, Madam, (ſaid he unto her, and preſented unto her the enamelled box in which the Jewel was) as to tell me to morrow whether this which I preſent unto your fair hand be worthy to be offered unto a great Princeſs; for I deſign it unto one who certainly merits to be a Queen. At the firſt Parthenia did not think that it was intended unto her, but perhaps unto Policrite, or Aretaphile, and therefore without any difficulty ſhe took it, yet ſhe no ſooner had it in her hand, but ſhe changed her opinion, and thought it intended unto her. This imagination did ſwell her heart both with anger and curioſity: The firſt of theſe, becauſe ſhe thought Timantes did not think of her as ſhe would have him; and the ſecond, becauſe ſhe would ſee whether Timantes would give it unto her; therefore ſeeming as if ſhe never thought to have any ſhare in his liberality, ſhe told him that ſhe would not ſtay ſo long as to morrow before ſhe gave him her opinion of it, but would go unto the Candle which was at the further end of the chamber, and ſee whether this which he would give was worthy of himſelf; for certainly (ſaid ſhe moſt obligingly) if it be worthy of your ſelf, it is worthy of her you intend it for, whoſoever ſhe be. In ſaying ſo, ſhe went to ſee what it was which Timantes put into her hand, with intention to reſtore it unto him the ſame hour; and he alſo went away as well as ſhe, the better to ſhew that he would not take it again: So that Parthenia hearing him walk, went back to the window purpoſely to call him, but he was already gone out of the Jeſſamine Arbour which was under the window: So that after ſhe had ſtayed a long while to ſee whether he would return, and hearing nothing of him, ſhe ſhut the window, and went to look upon that which Timantes had left with her. She did not look upon it alone, for ſhe ſhewed it unto Amaxita, who was not a little raviſhed at the luſtre of it; but Parthenia did leſs regard all thoſe Pearls and Diamonds, than ſhe did a Letter which ſhe found with them in the box, which was thus written.

Madam,

Since there is no King but receives Tribute from his Subjects, permit me, I beſeech you, ſince I am not only your Subject, but your vaſſal, to give what I can, though not what I ought. As you are my Goddeſs, I muſt preſent you with offerings and ſacrifices; and as you are the Queen of my heart, I muſt pay you Tribute. Therefore I beſeech you to accept of my offering, not to let you ſee that I am liberal, but to ſhew that I am not covetous. I beſeech you do not think that I have any thoughts of purchaſing your heart by it: For I know the price is eneſtimable, and that all the Gold, Pearls, Diamonds, and Rubies which the Sun ever produced ſince it ſhined upon the Univerſe, is not able to pay it: And if ever I ſhall hope to be ſo bleſſed hereafter as to enjoy it, I muſt have recourſe unto my tears, and ſighs, and prayers, and not unto Pearls and Diamonds, and ſuch like. However, I moſt humbly beſeech you, be not offended at my boldneſs, nor take it ill from one who having given you his whole heart, may give you what he thinks inferiour to it alſo: And therefore, I beſeech you do not hate me for it, nor look more coldly upon me to morrow, unleſs you will overwhelm with ſorrows your moſt Adorer

Timantes.

After Parthenia had read this Letter, ſhe gave it unto Amaxita, who reading it alſo, could not ſufficiently admire the liberality of Timantes, and told Parthenia, that if his love were meaſured by his gift, he loved her better than ever any could. I know not, replied Parthenia, whether he love me as much as you talk of, but I am ſure he does neither ſufficiently eſteem me, nor know me at all: For it ſeems he thinks to blind my eyes, and win my heart with Diamonds, as Children with toys; he thinks me of a weak mind, and mercenary ſoul; and yet I muſt confeſs he is ſomething excuſable; for my manner of dealing with him is ſo phantaſtical and extraordinary, that I ought not to think much of him; nor am I reſolved to treat him rigorouſly, but will only let him ſee he was miſtaken in his thoughts that I would receive a preſent of any importance from him; and that he may not doubt of my generoſity, I will not only refuſe what he offers me, but I will preſent him with a gift, and a gift of that magnificence, as he may conjecture at my quality and riches; for the gods have not menaced me with misfortunes, though he who is to marry me do know that my birth and quality is not baſe. Parthenia was as good as her word; for ſhe did not only put thoſe things which Timantes gave her into the box, but ſhe put alſo into it the Caſe of a Picture ſet with Diamonds of a moſt conſiderable greatneſs. She did not fear they would be known to be hers, though Timantes ſhould ſhew them unto all in Paphos; for ſhe lately got them made in Salamis, purpoſely to put the Picture of Policrite in it, which ſhe took out before ſhe ſent it unto Timantes; Alſo ſhe anſwered the Letter of Timantes in another hand than ſhe uſually writes: After which I procured a truſty perſon to carry this box unto him in the morning betimes: and the matter was ſo well carryed, that it was given unto one of Timantes his ſervants, whom he put much confidence in, to give unto his Maſter: This was as well as Parthenia deſired; For the ſervant of Timantes knew not the man who gave it unto him, nor took any notice of him, nor ever was like, for he was not one of Paphos, but departed the next morning into his own Countrey: So that Timantes when he awaked was ſtrangely aſtoniſhed, to ſee that upon the Table which he thought was in the hands of his unknown Miſtreſs. At firſt he thought his eyes deceived him, or elſe that he dreamt, and was not well awaked. But his ſervant telling him, that a man whom he knew not, nor would tell his name, nor would ſtay until he awaked, did charge him to give it unto him, then he thought it to be true. But ſince he imagined that his admired unknown one had ſent back his preſent, he was exceeding ſorry, and ſo much the more, becauſe he feared, that ſince ſhe was ſo generous as to refuſe a gift of that value, ſhe would be offended at him: Therefore he opened the box with much impatience, not to ſee whether all his Jewels were there, but to ſee whether ſhe had returned an Anſwer unto his Letter. In the mean time he was infinitely aſtoniſhed to ſee upon the top of all his own Jewels, that Rich Picture Caſe which Parthenia ſent him, and which he was certain was not his: He no ſooner ſaw it, but hoping her Picture was within it, he never conſidered the beauty and richneſs of it, but opened it in all haſte; but in lieu of ſeeing what he ſo extreamly deſired, he ſaw theſe words written in the place of the Picture.

This Caſe will ſerve hereafter to put my Picture in, if you render your ſelf worthy of it.

Ah moſt cruel Lady (ſaid he, as I heard afterwards) will you never be weary with making tryal of my patience, and let me ſee what I ſo much adore? After this he found a Letter containing theſe words.

To the too Inquiſitive Timantes.

Sir,

I Am ſo fully perſwaded that Liberality is a virtue, and a virtue moſt Heroick, that I will never do any thing which may make you think me guilty of its oppoſite vice; and therefore I have ſent back your rich preſent, and ſend it without any ſharp reprehenſions: For ſince you do not know who I am, I ought not to be offended at that which would be injurious to me if you did: Yet I muſt complain a little, that after ſo much converſe with you, when I did not hide my heart as I did my face, you ſhould not have ſo good an opinion of me, as to think that I would refuſe your offer: But I will not break with you for this, though for no other conſideration, but to give you cauſe to know me better. However, to repair your faults, I enjoyn you to keep this caſe which I ſend you, without ſhewing unto any; for if you do, you ſhall never ſee my Picture nor my ſelf.

As Timantes ended the reading of this Letter, Antimaques entered, who found his friend much taken up with this new adventure, which he related unto him, notwithwithſtanding the prohibition of Parthenia, thinking it no treaſon to make that man his confident, whom he loved as a ſecond ſelf: But as Timantes was aſtoniſhed, ſo Antimaques was much more, having no reaſon after this, to doubt neither of the quality or generoſity of this unknown Lady. For indeed the preſent which Timantes gave her was ſo rich, that it was an argument of a great ſoul to refuſe it; and the Caſe which Parthenia ſent him was ſo magnificent, that ſhe muſt be both rich and liberal who gave it: ſo that Antimaques after this confeſſed, that Timantes had reaſon to proſecute his adventure, and to try how far it would go; he moved him to ſhew this Caſe unto ſome who perhaps might know it, and thereby to learn where it was made: he moved him alſo to ſhew her Letter, thereby to find out the writer by the writing: But ſince Timantes obſerved in diſcourſe with his beloved unknown one, that ſhe knew all paſſages in the World, he durſt not put it to the venture, but deſired Antimaques a thouſand and a thouſand times, not to reveal his ſecret unto any, yet he had ſometimes a great deſire to ſpeak himſelf unto the Lady at whoſe houſe Parthenia lodged: but ſhe had ſo often told him, that if ever he enquired of her, ſhe would then never ſee him more, that he durſt no attempt it. In the mean time, he waited for night with much impatience; yet he was much unreſolved what to do with the Picture caſe which Parthenia ſent him: for ſince it came from the hands of her he loved, he had no will to part with it: on the other ſide, it was ſo rich that he thought it were to be leſs generous than ſhe, if he did not reſtore it; ſo that not knowing what he ſhould do with it, he carried it unto the place of meeting: but he was not ſo happy as he hoped to be, for Parthenia, to perplex him the more, ſent Amaxita to tell him, ſhe could not ſee him that night; and as Timantes asked her the reaſon, ſhe gave him ſome cauſe to think by her anſwer (though ſhe told him not ſo expreſly) that it was becauſe ſhe was preparing her ſelf to go unto a general Ball, which the Princeſs Policrite kept the next day: ſo that Timantes raviſhed that Amaxita had told him this e're ever ſhe was aware, began to reſolve not to fail being at this meeting, and there to talk with all the Ladies, ſo that he made no queſtion but to find her whom he looked for: but ſince he hoped to pick ſomething out of Amaxita, he talked with her a long time, and ſince he collected by her diſcourſe that ſhe was of Parthenia's Cabinet council, he told her, a hundred things to tell her, and began to aggravate his ſorrows, that he could not reſolve to reſtore the Picture Caſe which ſhe ſent him, and which he thought too rich to keep: yet (ſaid he unto her, at the end of their diſcourſe) I do conjure you to tell that excellent Lady, I will reſtore the Caſe that day ſhe gives me her Picture; but to the end ſhe ſhould not think I keep it out of any covetous inclination, I will within this four days proclaim a Horſe-race, and will give that for the prize which I preſumed to offer unto her, and ſo I may ſafely keep that preſent which otherwiſe might make me ſuſpected of covetouſneſs. Amaxita uſed all her Rhetorick to perſwade him to an alteration of his reſolution, but all in vain: However they parted, agreeing that the day following at coming from the Ball, he ſhould come unto the uſual place of meeting. After this Timantes was all hopes and joys, for he believed he ſhould know this unknown one by her voice, or at leaſt he would ſet ſuch ſpies about the houſe whither ſhe would come into at her return from the Ball, as ſhould tell him who ſhe was. Then he prepared himſelf with all care poſſible, and went unto the Ball ſo timely, that the Hall was not made clean when he came there. In the mean while I was adviſed by Amaxita to obſerve Timantes very cloſe, and to render her an account a little before the Ball ended: I was ſo forward to do the Princeſs of Salamis any ſervice, and conſidering that in this I might alſo ſerve Timantes, and the Prince Philoxipes, who I knew deſired the Marriage, that I was almoſt aſſoon in the place of aſſembly as he was: For my part, I never had ſo much pleaſure in all my life, as I had that day in obſerving Timantes, for there did not one beauty enter, which I perceived by his eyes, he did not wiſh might prove his unknown one; and not one entered which was foul, but he feared that was ſhe, and I ſaw ſo many ſeveral turbulencies in his countenance, that after I laughed at him, I could not chuſe but pity him: That which did moſt ſtick in his ſtomack was, that there were at this aſſembly three or four women of Paphos, who were very rich and very ill favoured, and except the Queen Policrite, Timoclia, and one more, he ſaw not one beauty there as was likely to ſend ſuch a preſent as he received. In the mean time he knew it was not one of thoſe four, for he knew it by their tones, and ſaw moreover it could not be the two firſt, who were both married and virtuous; and he knew it could not be the other two, for they had both of them declared Servants, and Servants whom they did not hate: Thus not knowing what to think, he went from place to place, talking to all the fair ones, and foul ones, one after another, but could not find her he looked for: then as he was walking from one to another, a Lady of Amathonte, a high beauty, and one whom Policrite received as a perſon of quality, did enter; ſhe being wonderful fair, and he having never ſeen her before, though ſhe had been three days in Paphos, he looked upon her with hopes that this was ſhe he loved; and hearing her ſpeak, he thought he heard ſomething in the ſound of her voice which reſembled his unknown one, ſo that being raviſhed with joy, he waited till the complements between Policrite and ſhe was paſſed, and ſhe ſeated in her place; and ſhe was no ſooner ſet, but Timantes, according to the freedom of our Court, talked to her, to the end he might move her to anſwer him; but this Lady being one of that country whoſe cuſtom is not to talk with any ſhe knows not, had much ado to anſwer him: Beſides, ſhe was as dull as ſhe was fair, and when ſhe did anſwer, it was ſo confuſedly, and little to the purpoſe, that Timantes hardly underſtood what ſhe ſaid. However, his imagination being foreſtalled, he thought her ſtupidity and ſilence, was only affected, and that ſhe would diſguiſe her ſelf, therefore he continued on, ſtill hoping ſhe would ſpeak more; but long did he ſtay before he could get any thing from her, unleſs a yea or no: yet at laſt he found his error, for a man of Amathonte coming to her, ſhe talk'd to him ſo freely after the ruſticity of her country, as fully undeceived Timantes, and ſince there was not one woman of any reaſonable quality in all the aſſembly which he had not ſpoke unto, or heard ſpeak, he ſat down, but ſo ſadly, that he minded nothing which paſſed in the company; yet they forced him to dance, but it was ſo careleſly, and far from his accuſtomed garb, that Policrite could not chuſe but chide him. In the mean time, ſince I thought the Ball would quickly end, I went out, to render an account of my obſervations unto my Siſter, and told her exactly to the leaſt circumſtance all his actions, nameing all the principal Ladies of the aſſembly which Timantes talked with, not forgetting the Lady of Amathonte: I told her alſo that I thought there were men about the houſe watching who entered, but I did not think they could know me, becauſe it was very dark: After I had told all I knew, I went out at another door than I entered at. But Amaxita had no ſooner well informed Parthenia of all paſſages, but Timantes came unto his accuſtomed place. However, Parthenia the more to deceive him, wore many Jewels that night, more than uſual; for though it was dark, yet there was ſo much dim light from the Moon, the Stars, and Candle which was at the further end of the room, as might make the Diamonds ſparkle: ſo that Timantes knowing that Parthenia was better dreſſed than ordinary; he thought then that ſhe had really been at the Ball: though he knew he had ſpoken unto all the Ladies, and knew that none of them was her he talked unto then: Moreover ſince he underſtood from his ſpies, that there entered none into the houſe but one man, he thought again ſhe was not at the Ball: ſo that he was driven to ſuch a cruel neceſſity, as he knew not what to think: But to compleat his amazement, Parthenia no ſooner ſaw him, but not giving him ſo much leaſure as to ſpeak. Well, Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him) what think you of the ſpirit of the Amathontine Lady, with whom you talked longer than with any Lady of Paphos? do you not fear that all the Ladies of our Court ſhould hate you, for preferring a Lady of that Country before them? and do you not further think I may well be Jealous? I pray Heavens, Madam, ſaid he, that it be the laſt of theſe, for ſince that paſſion cannot be in your heart, but it muſt ariſe from another, I ſhould think my ſelf very happy; for then you muſt love me, and let me ſee you, and conſequently I muſt not be driven to the cruel neceſſity of ſeeking you out every where, and finding you no where, but here where I cannot ſee you with a full ſatisfaction. But, Madam, I beſeech you tell me ſincerely, whether you were at the Ball or no? Is it not a ſufficient anſwer, ſaid ſhe, to tell you all that paſſed in this meeting? and then ſhe told him all that Amaxita had related unto her, and ſo puzzled him, that he knew not what to think. But yet (ſaid ſhe unto him) who would you wiſh me to be of all the Ladies you ſaw with Policrite? I wiſh you were none but your ſelf, replied he, and that I could know who you are, for if you uſe me thus long, I ſhall infallibly loſe my wits and reaſon. Very well (anſwered Parthenia and ſmiled) I begin to think ſo, and that which makes me moſt fear it, is, that unleſs you had been out of your wits and reaſon, you would never have offered me ſuch a rich gift, which I could not accept of, without a ſtain unto my virtue. You may think it from another conjecture, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) for after you had ſent me ſuch a glorious example of generoſity, and ſent me back my gift with another more rich than mine, yet I keep it without rendring you thanks: yet I ſhall keep it no longer than until you are pleaſed to honour me with your Picture, which you have not forbidden me to hope for. So did my woman tell me, replied Parthenia, but I muſt tell you, there are many things to be done, before I give you my Picture, for I will be firſt well aſſured of your heart for ever; but until then, I pray tell me, who do you think of all the beauties you have ſeen in Cyprus, does in your judgment beſt deſerve the prize? You have ſo accuſtomed me to make no uſe of my eyes (ſaid he unto her) that I think them to be very ill Judges of beauty; for ſince I think upon none but that of your ſoul, and mind, and cannot ſee yours, I cannot tell whether I ſhould love the fair or the brown. Parthenia did then exceedingly preſs him to tell her whether he liked the beauty of Policrite or Aretaphile better, purpoſely to prepoſſeſs him with what he ſhould hereafter find hers to be; but do what ſhe could, he could not clearly expreſs himſelf, becauſe he knew not the complexion of her he ſpoke unto; but ſtriving to divert the diſcourſe, he told her, how all the men and women in Cyprus (except one woman, whoſe judgement was oppoſite to all others) told him that all the beauty he had ſeen was nothing comparable to the beauty of the Princeſs of Salamis. Parthenia hearing her ſelf named, did think at firſt, that perhaps Timantes knew who ſhe was, but ſhe was miſtaken; for Timantes going on with his diſcourſe: 'Tis true, ſaid he, I do believe this ſingular woman as much as I do all the reſt; eſpecially becauſe ſhe is one of a good wit. Wit, replied ſhe, is not ſo neceſſary to judge of beauty: But there is a neceſſity of Juſtice and Impartiality, and without envy at the beauty of another. But I pray tell me, ſaid Parthenia, who is the woman which ſpeaks thus in diſadvantage of the Princeſs of Salamis? Timantes thinking of no inconveniency by naming this Lady, needed not many entreaties: But he had no ſooner named her, than Parthenia began to wonder at her injuſtice. I beſeech you, Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, do not judge of the Princeſs of Salamis and her beauty by the reports of this woman, who without reaſon hates her. But if ſhe be ſo amiable as they ſay ſhe is, replied Timantes, how is it poſſible ſhe ſhould hate her? No, no, Sir, replied Parthenia, do not deceive your ſelf, you muſt never judge of the beauty of one fair one, by the reports of another beauty: For I am confident that amongſt a hundred, you will not find two that are juſt, but every one will think to add glory unto themſelves by detracting from others. The truth is, ſaid Timantes, I did wonder very much this woman ſhould be ſo oppoſite unto the judgement of all others, concerning the Princeſs of Salamis. I pray tell me, ſaid Parthenia, what ſhe did ſay in particular of her? For I take the greateſt pleaſure in the world to ſee envy and jealouſie work in the ſpirits of thoſe who are inſpired with thoſe humours. Since it is your pleaſure, Madam, ſaid he unto her, I will confeſs, that after I had the honour to meet you the firſt time in the Labyrinth, and could not find you in any place after, nor none could tell me who you were, I had an imagination that you were this Princeſs whereof we ſpeak: Yet I durſt never reveal my thoughts unto any but this Lady, who was my indifferent good friend; but ſhe kept me not long in that errour; for ſhe told me the Princeſs of Salamis, had a ſhrill voice not at all ſweet; that ſhe was groſs and ill made; that ſhe had white, but not handſom and fair hands. The truth is, ſaid Parthenia, There is no certain concluſions to be made by the reports of others; and ſince I love Parthenia very well, but do not love her who ſpeaks againſt her, perhaps I ſhall be partial, and favour the one, and wrong the other, therefore I would have you ſee the Princeſs of Salamis, and be judge your ſelf. In the mean time I am beholding to you, for thinking me to be her; for though ſhe were not as all report her, yet my obligation is not the leſs, ſince your imagination fancied me to be ſo, and not as that Lady deſcribed her. 'Tis true, replied Timantes, That I fancied your Idea like that of the Princeſs of Salamis, be ſhe as fair as ſhe can be. However (ſaid Parthenia, exceedingly deſiring to know what Timantes would think of her beauty) I pray do me ſo much favour as to ſee that Princeſs. How can I ſee her, Madam? replied he; for the Prince Philoxipes asked her leave to bring me into her deſart, and ſhe would not honour me ſo far: And to tell you truly, Madam, all my curioſity is confined unto your ſelf, and I deſire to ſee none elſe: Yet I ſhould think my ſelf obliged to you (anſwered ſhe) if you would ſee her. Once more, Madam, ſaid he, pray tell me how I can ſee her? You may eaſily do it (ſaid Parthenia) for I know ſhe goes almoſt every day unto a little Temple of Venus Urania, not above thirty furlongs from her houſe, towards Amathonte. I do know the Temple, ſaid he, for it was ſhewed unto me as I went unto the Adonian Feaſt. Since ſo, ſaid ſhe, I pray you go thither to morrow; for I confeſs I ſhould be very glad if the beauty of that Princeſs ſhould pleaſe you, to the end you may hereafter ſuſpect the reports of that Lady who I love not, and may put her out of the Catalogue of your friends. Alas, Madam, ſaid Timantes, there is no neceſſity of my ſeeing the Princeſs of Salamis, for I know enough from you to make me diſcard that Lady from the number of my friends; for ſince ſhe does not pleaſe you, ſhe cannot me. No, no, ſaid ſhe, I would not have you do ſo out of complacency, but out of reaſon, therefore I conjure you to do as I deſire. But, Madam, ſaid he, if this Princeſs be as fair as reports make her, methinks you ſhould have ſome care of my heart, in expoſing it unto ſo great a danger: at leaſt you ſhould ſhew me your eyes, that I may with them defend my ſelf againſt hers. On the contrary, ſaid ſhe, ſince I do intend never to give my entire affection until I am firſt moſt certainly aſſured of yours, I wiſh the Princeſs of Salamis were a thouſand times fairer than ſhe is, that ſhe might be a ſtronger tryal of your conſtancy: For ſince I value not a perfidious inconſtant heart, nor would be loved for beauty if I had it, but would have good ſecurity againſt all thoſe evils which beauty cauſes, I ſhould be glad you ſaw all the beauties in Cyprus, to the end I might not fear it. In concluſion, Sir, Parthenia ordered the matter with ſo much art, that Timantes promiſed to go next morning and ſee whether the Princeſs of Salamis were at that Temple, not having the leaſt ſuſpicion of the truth, nor thinking ſhe had any other deſign in her commands, but only that ſhe loved to be punctually obeyed: So that he prepared himſelf for it: And after he went from her, Parthenia gave all requiſite orders for her journey in the morning, and ſo did he: Amaxita writ a Letter unto me to ſend a Coach by break of day; for Parthenia would not make uſe of the Ladies with whom ſhe lodged, becauſe Timantes knew it. So ſhe did riſe betimes in the morning, and dreſſed her ſelf in her richeſt habit, and neglected nothing which might ſet her ſelf out with advantage: When ſhe was all ready, and had looked the laſt time in her glaſs, Amaxita asked what was her deſign? not being yet ſatisfied with all the reaſons ſhe had told her, I would exactly know, ſaid ſhe, what Timantes will think of me, which I can never do, if I ſhew my ſelf unto him, and diſcover who I am. But, Madam, (ſaid Amaxita unto her) ſince you do not fear that your beauty will attract the heart of Timantes, why do you not tell him the truth? No, replied Parthenia, Parthenia, I have not changed my mind; but ſtill fear the menaces of the gods, and theſe fears are my reaſons why I go ſo fantaſtically to work. But for all that, Madam (ſaid Amaxita) I am confident Timantes will think you the faireſt that ever he ſaw: and I believe all the excellings of your ſpirit, your ſoul, your hands, your ſtature, and your voice will have much ado to hold out againſt the glory of your eyes; and therefore if you think you cannot marry him, if perchance he ſhould be in love with your beauty as well as with your ſoul, never expoſe him unto that danger, but ſeek out ſome other way to make tryal of his fidelity. Yet Parthenia would not harken unto Amaxita: But not well knowing what ſhe ſhould think if Timantes ſhould commend her either too much or too little: She went into the Temple ſo early, as ſhe was in no danger to be known in the Town: She went alſo by a blind way, to the end that ſhe might come as if ſhe came from Salamis: for ſo her Deſart was called: But ſince ſhe feared that if Timantes did ſee her in the Temple, he would know her by her ſtature: aſſoon as ſhe came, ſhe offered her ſacrifice; and afterwards ſeeing that Timantes was not come, ſhe went unto the Sacrificers houſe, under pretence of reſting her ſelf, whoſe houſe was cloſe by the way as one comes from Paphos. So that being in a Parlor, ſhe leaned againſt the window talking with Amaxita, whoſe hood was up as well as hers; for in favour of their deſign the Sun did not then ſhine. She had not ſtood there a quarter of an hour, but Amaxita eſpied Timantes coming towards the place where they were, having with him only one ſervant, and ſhe no ſooner eſpied him, but ſhe ſhewed him unto Parthenia, juſt as Timantes turned his eyes towards them, but it was ſo far off as he could not diſcern her beauty, and thefore he advanced with no haſte; but when he was ſo near Parthenia as to diſtinguiſh that attracts in her face, he made no queſtion but ſhe was the Princeſs of Salamis, and was ſo ſurpriſed at the luſtre of her beauty, that he changed colour, and confeſſed to himſelf, that the Idea which he had fancyed of his beloved unknown Lady, was not fairer, nor ſo fair as this Princeſs: he went then as gently as poſſible, he gazed upon her with attention full of rapture, and bowed unto her with moſt reverent reſpect, and did not go into the Temple until he had ſeriouſly contemplated upon it, and meeting with one of the ſacrificers of that place going into the Temple, he ſtayed and fell into diſcourſe with him, purpoſely for a pretence of looking longer upon her; at firſt he intended to go unto her as upon a viſit, knowing ſhe was not ignorant he was the friend of the Prince her Brother, but having only one ſervant with him, and being in a courſe and common habit, he could not find a mind to be ſo near a perſon of that Beauty and Majeſty, who ſtruck ſo high an admiration and reſpect into him; therefore ſince the ſacrificer went into the Temple, and he durſt ſtay no longer there, he went into the Temple alſo, hoping ſtill he ſhould ſee her again at his coming out: But Parthenia having no intention he ſhould ſpeak unto her, or follow her, aſſoon as ſhe ſaw him gone into the Temple, ſhe took Coach, and went towards the place of her ſolitude, yet ſhe went out of it again, aſſoon as ſhe was in a wood about two furlongs diſtant from the Temple; and ſince ſhe would not come unto Paphos until it was night, nor meet with Timantes in the way, ſhe took a blind way through the forreſt which went unto the houſe of one who was acquainted with my Siſter, and there ſhe paſſed away the reſt of the day. In the mean while, Sir, ſince Parthenia had obſerved that her beauty had produced its cuſtomary effects upon the ſpirits of Timantes, to wit, admiration, and turbulency, ſhe knew not whether ſhe ſhould be glad or angry, yet ſhe deſired to pleaſe Timantes; but for all that, when ſhe conſidered the menaces of the gods, ſhe could not chuſe but be ſorrowful, that her beauty had any influence upon the mind of her Lover, and feared, that ſince he was ſo ſenſible, he would not be ſo conſtant, as ſhe wiſhed and hoped. However, (ſaid Amaxita to her, and laughed) though Timantes do change the object of his paſſion, yet is he not inconſtant, becauſe ſtill he loves none but you: I aſſure you, anſwered ſhe, that if he ſhould, I ſhould be no leſs jealous of my ſelf than any other: Oh, Madam, (ſaid Amaxita, and interrupted her) it is not poſſible you ſhould ſo ſcrupulouſly rely upon the Oracle, as to have any ſuch thought, and be jealous of your ſelf; for would you have Timantes have no eyes? or in having be worſe, and think you not handſom? Truly Amaxita, replied ſhe, you put me to the queſtion, for I ſhould be ſorry to ſeem ugly in his eye, and yet I would not have him dote too much upon beauty, and if I ſhould find that he prefers the Princeſs of Salamis before his unknown Miſtreſs, I do confeſs I ſhould be very ſorry: Truly, Madam, replied Amaxita, I cannot believe you, and I am confident, that maugre all the menaces of the Gods, you do not think as you ſpeak, ſince certainly it is not poſſible any beauty ſhould be an enemy unto her own charms. But, Sir, whilſt Parthenia and Amaxita were thus talking, Timantes was entertaining himſelf very ſweetly with the rare beauty which he had ſeen. Is it not poſſible, would he ſay, to joyn the ſpirit of my beloved unknown one, to the beauty of her I ſaw? Alas, alas, I would it were, that I might be the happieſt man alive, in the enjoyment of the moſt accompliſht perſon in the world; but that would be too much, and if there were a woman in the world ſo fair as the Princeſs of Salamis, and whoſe ſpirit were as great and ſweet as hers I love, there would be more Altars erected unto her, than either unto Venus-Anadiomena, or to Venus Urania: Be contented therefore with what the Gods have given unto her whom I adore, and wiſh only that ſhe be but a little leſs fair than the Princeſs of Salamis. Timantes was not long in theſe thoughts, for his hot deſire of ſeeing this wonder of beauty again, moved him to go out of the Temple almoſt as ſoon as he came into it: But ſore was he grieved, to underſtand from thoſe that looked to his horſes, that the Princeſs of Salamis was gone, he asked which way ſhe went, and followed a while, but ſince ſhe was in the wood before he took horſe, he could not overtake her, therefore he returned towards Paphos, ſo raviſhed with the beauty of this Princeſs, that he almoſt feared his falling in love with her. In the mean time, ſince his unknown Lady did not prohibit him from ſpeaking of this journey, he told every one where he had been, only concealed the cauſe; and the chiefeſt motive which induced him ſo to do, was, becauſe he colud not forbear commending the beauty of the Princeſs of Salamis, which he knew he durſt not do to the height, when he ſpoke with his unknown one at night, for he knew that it was the greateſt indiſcretion in the world for any Lover to commend the beauty of another before his Miſtreſs, and the moſt of all in him, becauſe his Miſtreſs would not have him ſo inamoured with the beauty of the body as the mind, ſo that he did nothing but extol the beauty of the Princeſs of Salamis, unto all the men he met with that day, he told it unto Philoxipes, Policrite, and Dorida; and he went himſelf to tell that Lady who ſo diſcommended this Princeſs, that ſhe knew not what beauty was; he had not the leaſt ſuſpicion that this Princeſs was his unknown Lady, ſuppoſing it a thing impoſſible, that a woman ſo fair, could hide her beauty from a man that was in love with her, eſpecially from one ſhe hated not, and whom ſhe wiſhed eternally to love her: for being ignorant of the Oracles which the Princeſs received, he could not gueſs at the true cauſe of her ſo fantaſtical and extraordinary proceedings: None could think it ſtrange, that the Princeſs ſhould come ſo near Paphos as this Temple, and not come into the Town, becauſe it was her ordinary humour. But Philoxipes and Policrite murmured a little that ſhe did not ſend to know how they did, imagining no other reaſon, but that ſhe had no deſire to have it known ſhe was there, for fear ſhe ſhould be invited to come into the Town: However, night being come, Timantes went unto his accuſtomed place of meeting, being reſolved to commend the beauty of the Princeſs of Salamis, but not too highly for the reaſons aforeſaid: He was no ſooner there, but Parthenia asked him, what he thought of the Princeſs of Salamis? I think ſhe is very fair, replied he, and I think that e who told me otherwiſe, did her much wrong, for truly if that Princeſs had a mind anſwerable to her eyes, and a ſoul as fair as her face, queſtionleſs ſhe were a rare woman: But though ſhe be only fair, replied Parthenia, is it not poſſible to love her? Yes, (replied he, and ſmiled) if thoſe that look upon her were all eyes and no ſpirit: No, no, ſaid Parthenia, do not diſſemble, I ſee you have a mind to anſwer me according to my thoughts, and not your own; and to tell me rather what I would have you ſay, than what you think: Suppoſe I did, Madam, replied he, is it a crime to be complacential? Compliance, ſaid ſhe, ought not to go ſo far as to diſſemble ones thoughts, it is enough if it ſubmit unto them, and too much to hide them; true delight conſiſts in conformity of thoughts, and not of words only; and truly I am more joyed to ſee one whom I love, think juſt as I do, than I am to ſee them who for my ſake force themſelves in every thing to a complacency: certainly there is nothing more ſweet and pleaſing than this ſympathy of ſpirits, thoughts and opinions; therefore never ſtrive to find out what I would wiſh you to ſay, but be clear and ingenuous, and ſpeak your own thoughts, for you cannot deceive me. Madam, replied he, I do ever ſpeak ſincerely unto you, you ask me whether the Princeſs of Salamis be fair? I anſwer you that ſhe is very fair, am I far from the truth? Parthenia being then angred to think her Beauty had not ſo much pierced the heart of Timantes as ſhe thought, began to ſpeak in a little higher tone: You commend the Beauty of the Princeſs of Salamis very coldly (ſaid ſhe unto him) that it is plain to ſee, you do it out of complacency only, or elſe out of ſubtilty to perſwade me your heart is not ſenſible of beauty. 'Tis moſt true, Madam, replyed he, I am at this time ſenſible of nothing but your ſpirit and ſoul, and all I know of you: and therefore, Madam do not wonder (ſaid he, thinking that he could not pleaſe her better) if I be not ſo much charmed with the Beauty of this Princeſs, as I ſhould have been, if I had not been in love with you: And truly, Madam, my deſires of returning hither were ſo hot, that I did not ſpend much time in contemplation of her. This, Sir, was the conference between Timantes and Parthenia that night, Timantes hardly daring to commend the Beauty of the Princeſs of Salamis, though Parthenia ſeemed to deſire it, and Parthenia not well knowing whether ſhe ſhould commend him for it, or no: But after he was gone, ſhe reſolved with her ſelf, and concluded that her Beauty did not charm him, and was miſtaken when ſhe thought to ſee nothing but ſigns of admiration in his face and actions: No, no, ſaid ſhe unto Amaxita, certainly I am deceived, and all that which I thought to be admiration is only aſtoniſhment; Timantes queſtionleſs is ſurpriſed, but it is to ſee that the world ſhould ſo much commend me with ſo little cauſe; certainly he loves beauty in another ſhape than that which the gods have given unto me; there is ſomething in my face which diſtaſts his eyes, and will certainly make me to loſe all that my ſpirit hath gotten. Madam, (ſaid Amaxita unto her) you ſaid you would not have Timantes love you for your beauty: 'Tis true, ſaid ſhe, but however, I would not have him hate me becauſe he finds ſomething in my face which does not pleaſe him: I know Amaxita (ſaid ſhe) that this I ſay ſeems unreaſonable unto you, but I cannot help it, for had you tryed as I have done, what a monſtrous miſery it is to be ſlighted by him who once adored me, you would excuſe all my imperfections and weakneſſes, and would confeſs, I had reaſon to try all ways poſſible, which might make me know the heart of Timantes. However, Sir, Parthenia was not long in the belief that her beauty did diſpleaſe her lover, for as it was my chance to be in three or four places where he had ſo highly extolled her, the next morning I acquainted my Siſter, and ſhe Parthenia with it, and ſince I thought there was never any danger in telling a beauty that ſhe was extolled, I told the ſtory with as many aggravations as I could, and therefore ſaid, I think Timantes was as much in love with her beauty as her ſpirit. Madam, ſaid Amaxita to her, it may truly be ſaid that Timantes loves two and is not inconſtant, ſince he loves but one perſon, and by giving his heart to one, he does not take it from the other; and it may be further ſaid, that you have a Rival whom you cannot hate, for I do not think your ſpirit can envy the power of your eyes, nor your eyes oppoſe the conqueſts of your ſpirit. Parthenia hearkned unto all that Amaxita ſaid, and never gave her anſwer; but after I was gone, and ſhe had commanded me to keep an obſervant eye ſtill over Timantes, ſhe did complain of him almoſt as much for extolling her beauty too high unto others, as ſhe did for extolling it too little the night before unto her, and finding that he did not ſpeak ſincerely, ſhe was very ſad, yet not ſo much as when ſhe thought that ſhe did not pleaſe his eye, and when Amaxita asked her what ſecurity ſhe deſired of the heart of Timantes? ſhe told her that ſhe did not know her ſelf: Truly, Madam, ſaid Amaxita to her, I cannot ſee you can either expect or deſire better aſſurance than you have, that Timantes is the man whom the gods would have you to marry; for he began to love you without the power of your beauty, and not knowing whether you were noble or rich: he ſtill loves you, and knows not that you are fair, and loves you in a place where there are a thouſand ſhining beauties, who do all they can to engage his heart; you would have perſwaded him that you were ill-favoured, and indeed he had great reaſon to ſuſpect it; yet for all this he continues loving you; you have alſo imployed your own beauty to make tryal of his conſtancy, and you ſee he is faithful to you, that he dares not commend her in your preſence, for fear certainly he ſhould thereby give you cauſe to think that he can be ſenſible of beauty. All that you ſay is true, replied Parthenia, but yet for all this, if Timantes can ſuffer his heart to be drawn from his unknown Miſtreſs, by the charms that are in the beauty of the Princeſs of Salamis, though his unknown Miſtreſs and this Princeſs be all one, yet I have reaſon to fear, that if he can quit my ſpirit for my beauty, he may hereafter quit both my ſpirit and my beauty, for ſome other perſon, unto whom the grace of novelty will give advantage; ſo that to have better aſſurance of the heart of Timantes, I will yet try what abſence will do, which queſtionleſs is the ſtrongeſt teſt of all others, therefore I will return into my ſolitude, and return without ſo much as bidding him adieu, fearing that if he ſhould know, he would ſet ſo many ſpies about the houſe, that he might follow me. Amaxita did oppoſe her deſign, and perſwaded her as much as ſhe could to let Timantes know of her departure, but all in vain, for ſhe would not hearken unto her; yet ſhe could not depart the next morning, becauſe ſome orders were to be taken for the privacy of her journey, ſo that ſhe ſaw

Timantes once more, whom ſhe chid for the exceſſive applauds which he gave the Princeſs of Salamis, and for not ſpeaking unto her in the ſame terms when he told her his opinion; and therefore, ſaid ſhe unto him, I have cauſe to believe that they who accuſe you of being in love with her had reaſon for it: but I pray you if it be ſo confeſs it unto me, I conjure you unto it, to the end I may not ingage my ſelf in any further affection, and that I may be no impediment unto you in that conqueſt: but, Sir, deceive not your ſelf, you will not find ſo eaſie a matter as may be you think; I know Parthenia, and I know ſhe is harder to pleaſe than I am, and more delicate; ſo that in all likelyhood, if you quit me for her, you will loſe me, and not find her. Timantes hearing Parthenia ſay ſo, did proteſt that he was not in love with the Princeſs of Salamis, nor ever would be: You promiſe me now, ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled, more than I ask, and it will be ſufficient if you only aſſure me you do not love her at preſent; as for the time to come you are a little too bold with it, if you ſpeak for it with as much certainty as for the preſent. But, Madam, ſaid he unto her, ſince I am not at preſent in love with the Princeſs of Salamis, it follows of neceſſity I never ſhall be, for as I do not ſeek to ſee her, ſo though I would I cannot, ſince ſhe hath already denied me that honour, and therefore it is not likely I ever ſhall: I do confeſs (ſince you know I ſaid it in other places) that the Princeſs of Salamis is the faireſt that ever my eye beheld, but ſince I find a greater beauty in your mind and ſpirit, than in her face, and ſince I am reſolved to ſerve you all my life, and never ſee her again, it doth of neceſſary conſequence follow, that I do not love her, and that I ſhall for ever love you. However once more let me tell you, ſaid Parthenia, it is good to ſubmit unto the providence of the gods, for the time to come: Why, Madam, ſaid he, have you not told me a hundred times that you would not value any affection which you were not ſure would be eternal? ſo that you had an eye unto things to come, as well as things paſt and preſent. However it be, ſaid Parthenia, I would not have you anſwer equally for the preſent and the future, leſt you make me ſuſpect both.

both: After much ſuch diſcourſe as this, Timantes retired, and the next morning Parthenia returned to her ſolitude, leaving a Letter with me for Timantes, with orders to convey it ſo ſecretly unto him, that he could not ſuſpect or gueſs how it came; but ſince the difficulty was, to find out a way how Timantes might anſwer, and not know which way his Letters went. I was a long time before my invention could hit on it, but at laſt I found out a way to convey Parthenia's Letter to him, and his anſwer to her, unknown to him by whom, and thus I went to work. I ſent the firſt Letter of Parthenia to Timantes as I ſent the Jewels, that is to ſay, by an unknown perſon, who gave it unto his ſervant; but I added a note unto this Letter, counterfeiting my hand as Parthenia did hers, by which I intimated unto him, if he would return an anſwer, he ſhould give his Letter unto one who in the morning early ſhould be at the ſtatue of Venus in the great Temple of Paphos; and to the end that the matter might be carried with more ſafety, I employed one of my friends, and made him believe, that it did highly concern me (upon a deſign which hereafter I would impart to him, when I had commiſſion for it from a perſon who had abſolute power over me) to receive ſome Letters which none ſhould know by whom I received them, nor for whom I received them; and I did ſo entangle the matter, that he could never know whether I negotiated for my ſelf or for another, or whether it concerned matter of State, or matter of Gallantry, ſo that he not knowing whether I tranſacted in things concerning love or ambition, he did as I deſired him, and I giving him full inſtructions, and he being both bold and truſty, the buſineſs was done as well as I could wiſh: He delivered the Letter which Parthenia left at parting, and which did extreamly ſurpriſe Timantes, and it was thus indited.

To Timantes.

SIR,

IN this reſoluion which I have fixed upon, to try whether the affection which you profeſs unto me, will abide abſence, and ſurmount it, I think you are a little beholding unto me, for ſparing you the labour of bidding me adieu, think if you will, that I ſpared my ſelf that labour, for ſince I hide my face from you, it is but juſt I tell you that which my eyes would have done if you had ſeen them. If during this abſence I underſtand you continue faithful unto me, and that really you are not in love with the Princeſs of Salamis to my prejudice, perhaps at our next meeting you ſhall know who I am. In the mean time remember it is not permitted you to enquire who gives you my Letters, nor who receives your anſwers; know that it concerns your good if you love me, and mine alſo: Adieu.

¶ This Letter did not only ſurpriſe, but extreamly grieve Timantes, and he was ſo paſſionately both in love and ſorrow for her abſence, that he was nothing but a lump of Melancholly, and ſo continued many days. The greateſt augmentation of his inquietudes, was, that it was not permitted him to enquire of that which he had the greateſt deſire to know; and that he was not able to keep within thoſe ſtrait limits which were preſcribed him. He went himſelf to carry his anſwer unto my friend who expected it in the place which I directed him to: but he was exceedingly ſurpriſed when he ſaw him to be a man he knew not, and a man of Quality: He offered any thing unto him if he would tell him unto whom he was to give that Letter, but all in vain, inſomuch as he was driven to the neceſſity of conjuring him not to tell he asked the queſtion. So that my friend giving me the Letter which could have no ſuſpicion, I ſent it unto Parthenia, who found theſe words.

Madam,

IN thinking to ſpare me the ſorrows of bidding you adieu, you have drowned me in them. What can you think, Madam, will become of a man who adores you, who knows not who you are, nor whither you go, but is ignorant whether you will ever return for him, or ever return at all? For Heavens ſake, Madam, have ſome compaſſion upon my conſtancy, and never fear that the Princeſs of Salamis will drive drive you out of my heart: I do admire her, I confeſs, but I will not love her, as I told you before, I will not ſee her. In the mean time, I beſeech you, put not my patience to the utmoſt rack, unleſs it be your deſign to make me deſpair, or unleſs you would put me to death not only for love, but alſo for curioſity. Return, Madam, I beſeech you, if you be gone, or ſhew your ſelf unto me, if you be not: For truly I cannot imagine where you are, or who you can be; and I am perſwaded that if your inhumanity laſt a little longer, I ſhall not know my ſelf: Yet I am moſt certain, that nothing can prevent me from being the moſt faithful of your Lovers, and the moſt zealous of your Adorers, Timantes.

This, Sir, was the anſwer which I ſent unto Parthenia, who writ many times to Timantes, and he alſo unto her: Yet ſince the beauty of this Princeſs who he ſaw in that little Temple which is in the way towards Amathonte, did make a deep impreſſion in his heart, he ſpoke of her very much; ſo that Antimaques who was in love with Dorida, and would have been even raviſhed with joy to ſee him married unto Parthenia, he always was hinting unto him that it was only this Princeſs that he could marry with honour, and not with an unknown woman, who perhaps had no beauty, or at leaſt was of ſome fantaſtical diſpoſition. Timantes then did remember him of his promiſe not to condemn his paſſion, if the unknown Lady did refuſe his preſent: But Antimaques anſwered that when he ſaid ſo, he did not think there was in Cyprus any match for him ſo advantagious as this of this Princeſs; but now he underſtood that the Prince Philoxipes did really wiſh that he ſhould marry his Siſter, he could not be any longer in his firſt opinion: For I pray you, Sir, ſaid he unto him, do but compare your unknown Lady with Parthenia a little; as for her quality, it is moſt certain it cannot be more high, nor ſo high, for there is none in all the Iſle that is comparable unto her; as for her beauty, according to your own deſcription, the compariſon muſt needs be as unequal; as for her virtue, you know what high reputation ſhe hath; and as for her ſpirit, the world knows no equal, and would you prefer you know not who, before her? Doubtleſs I would, replied Timantes, for I love her, and ſhe does not hate me: as for the Princeſs of Salamis, though I could love her, and though her raviſhing beauty ſhould force me to be perfidious, yet it were very doubtful whether ſhe could love me; for I have heard ſay ſhe is of a nice ſpirit, and few men can pleaſe her, though many not without ſome merit have courted her, therefore I pray you talk no more of this Princeſs, whoſe Idea is but too deeply imprinted already in my imagination. In the mean time, Dorida, who for the intereſt ſhe had in Antimaques, deſired that Timantes might ſtay in Cyprus, uſed all her arguments to perſwade Policrite, that ſhe would importune the Princeſs of Salamis to quit her ſolitude; ſo that unknown to Parthenia, Philoxipes, Policrite, Dorida, and Antimaques, plotted her marriage with Timantes: and truly it was happy they did ſo; for otherwiſe, I think Parthenia would never have made her ſelf known unto Timantes; for ſince her reaſon was not quite prejudicated, ſhe would often think her proceedings with him ſo fantaſtical, that ſhe could not believe Timantes could really eſteem her; and as an effect of this opinion, ſhe did ſo firmly reſolve never to diſcover her ſelf, but to break off abſolutely with him, that Amaxita quite deſpaired of ever altering her. In the mean time, Philoxipes knowing that Timantes thought his Siſter very fair, he thought that if he could make her like him, as well as he liked her, the deſign ſo much deſired might happily take effect: But ſince ſhe could never like Timantes unleſs ſhe ſaw him; and ſince Philoxipes knew not that ſhe knew him as well as he did, he reſolved to carry him unto the Princeſs, and to ſurpriſe her in her ſolitude: But Timantes excuſed himſelf ſaying, he reſpected her more than to force her to ſee a man whom ſhe did not think worthy of that honour, and had denied it before, adding further, that it would be a means to make her hate him: ſo that Timantes refuſing to go in a civil complement, Philoxipes knew not what to think: But Antimaques who was acquainted with the paſſage, told it unto Dorida, to the end ſhe might tell Policrite, that the reaſon why Timantes would not go to ſee the Princeſs of Salamis, was, becauſe he would not expoſe himſelf unto the danger of falling in love with one who perhaps would be inſenſible of him: So that Dorida preparing the mind of Policrite, and Policrite the mind of Philoxipes, it was plotted and reſolved amongſt them, to get out Timantes under colour of taking a journey of pleaſure, and in lieu of carrying him unto the pretended place, to carry him unto the Princeſs: But ſince the Prince Philoxipes knew the humour of Parthenia, it was thought expedient to gain Amaxita; therefore he made a viſit unto the Princeſs, and negotiated the matter ſo dextrouſly, that he found an opportunity (whilſt Parthenia was dreſſing her ſelf, for it was very early) to talk with Amaxita in her chamber, and imparted unto her their deſign of marrying the Princeſs his Siſter unto Timantes. Let us tell her, ſaid he, to ſatisfie her concerning the Oracles which ſhe received, that he is fallen in love with her reputation, and with the commendation which every one gives of her ſpirit. At firſt, Amaxita thought that the Prince Philoxipes knew ſomething of the paſſages between Timantes and Parthenia, but ſhe was greatly undeceived of that, by ſeveral paſſages he told her: ſo that ſeeing it was the zeal and earneſt deſire of this Prince to promote this Marriage, ſhe reſolved to impart the ſecret of all the ſtory unto him, conceiving that if ſhe did not, perhaps the Prince Philoxipes (when he ſaw the amazement that Timantes would be in, when ſeeing and hearing Parthenia ſpeak, he would know her, and his unknown one to be one and the ſame perſon) would not know what to think, and perhaps would have ſome diſadvantagious thought of Parthenia; therefore ſhe entreated the Prince Philoxipes to believe the ſincerity of her words, and conjured him not to diſcover what ſhe had imparted, aggravating the ſcruple which Parthenia made, to marry a man who was in love with her beauty; ſo that Philoxipes crediting all that my Siſter told him, he was ſo ſtrongly confirmed in his deſign, that he thought of nothing elſe but how to promote it: He concluded then with Amaxita upon the day when he would bring Timantes unto Parthenia, to the end that the Princeſs might not be that day in her negligent dreſs, though ſhe ſhould not be acquainted with the reaſon: After which he returned into Paphos, where Timantes was droning out a life of melancholy, for he was profoundly in love with his unknown Miſtreſs, and could not forget the beauty of the Princeſs of Salamis, from whom he received divers Letters, not knowing them to be from her. In the mean time Parthenia was almoſt abſolutely reſolved to diſengage her ſelf from the affection of Timantes, for ſhe ſtood upon ſuch terms of honour, that ſhe could not reſolve to make her ſelf known unto him, after all this fantaſtical gallantry: And indeed ſhe writ unto him at if it were to be the laſt he ſhould ever receive from her: Yet I think it was not her full intention, for I think ſhe writ another after it, purpoſely to know his ſorrows after this ſad news, and the better to know how he loved her. However, Timantes received the Letter after he had engaged himſelf to Policrite and Philoxipes to go the next morning unto a place where yet he never had been; not thinking that it was unto the Princeſs of Salamis. But ſince he grieved exceſſively at the Letter from Parthenia, he did what he could to diſ-engage himſelf, but he could not; all his pretences would not ſerve for an excuſe, nor content Philoxipes: He went himſelf to Timantes to oblige him unto this journey. Policrite ſent ſeveral times unto him, and ſent him poſitive word, that for her part ſhe would not go, unleſs he did. So that as ſad as he was, there was a neceſſity of going with them; but Heavens know it was with ſo much unwillingneſs and ſorrow, that it appeared in his face, in his words, and in his habit; for it was careleſs. He did ſtrive, and force himſelf to ſeem a little pleaſant, but his ſorrows were ſtronger than himſelf. Philoxipes would have exceedingly grieved had he not known the cauſe; but my Siſter did write unto him, intimating it, and her deſires, of haſtening the execution of the deſign. I forgot to tell you, Sir, how Timantes anſwered Parthenia's Letter that night, and I ſent it away ſo, that ſhe received it two hours before Philoxipes and Timantes came unto her: But never was there ſuch a condoling Letter writen; it moved Parthenia to repent of her rigid dealing with him: In the mean time Amaxita knowing that ſome company would come that day, was much puzzled how to get her out of her negligent dreſs, and bethought her ſelf of a way how to move her unto it. the Princeſs long ſince promiſed my Siſter to ſuffer her to take her Picture, and therefore my Siſter told her that I had writ unto her by him who brought the Letter from Timantes, intimating that the Limner would be there that day, and would infallibly be there within two hours. So that Amaxita in this conſideration entreated the Princeſs to dreſs her ſelf as well as poſſibly ſhe could. The Princeſs told her at firſt, that he ſhould ſtay until to morrow: but Amaxita told her, the Limner was ſo full of work, that he could not ſtay ſo long, and that there was no time to ſpare: So that Parthenia, loving my Siſter very well, did let her women dreſs her as if ſhe were going unto ſome publick Feaſt, Amaxita telling her that the Limner was to work upon her clothes that day, and that the better dreſſed ſhe was, the more lovely would her face look, and would inſpire a handſom fancy into the Limner, and alſo that it was neceſſary that Parthenia was to dreſs her ſelf, to the end he might draw her whole Picture. But whilſt Amaxita was makeing choice of ſuch Jewels and clothes as ſhe deſired Parthenia to wear that day, Timantes not knowing whither he was carried, left the conduct of himſelf to the Prince Philoxipes, and the Princeſs Policrite; Antimaques made one in this voyage as well as Dorida, and I had the honour to be there alſo, Philoxipes knowing by my Siſter, that I was a confident in the buſineſs. But, Sir, the more melancholly Timantes was, the more inclination had Philoxipes and Policrite to be merry, being more fully perſwaded that he was the man whom the Gods had reſerved for a happineſs unto the Princeſs of Salamis, ſince it is hardly poſſible without ſome ſpecial order of divine providence, that Timantes ſhould love Parthenia in ſo odd a way. In the mean time this gallant company went on, and came at laſt ſo near that Deſart of the Princeſs of Salamis, that Timantes coming out of a deep ſtudy, asked whoſe houſe that was and whither it was they went unto? It is the ſame that we go unto, ſaid Philoxipes, but you ſhall not know whoſe it is, until you have ſeen her who will entertain us. Timantes was ſo deep in his melancholy, that he never minded this indirect anſwer, or had any ſuſpicion. We came unto the Baſe Court of the Caſtle, and then went on foot: Timantes led Policrite, and Antimaques Dorida: As for Philoxipes, he told the Princeſs his Wife, and Timantes, he would go before, and acquaint them they were come; ſo that commanding me to follow him, we went before unto Parthenia's chamber, who had newly done dreſſing her ſelf, and who being told by ſome of her ſervants that the Prince her Brother, and Princeſs her Siſter was come, ſhe was coming in haſte to entertain them: So that Philoxipes giving her his hand after he had ſaluted her, he did not oppoſe her civility which ſhe intended unto Policrite, but led her unto the midſt of the outer room where they met. Sir, it is a moſt difficult matter to relate how Timantes was amazed when he ſaw the Princeſs of Salamis appear, whom he knew at firſt, though he never ſaw her but once before; and how the Princeſs of Salamis was ſurpriſed when ſhe ſaw Timantes, who knew aſſoon as ever ſhe ſpoke that his unknown Miſtreſs and ſhe were one and the ſame; certainly this adventure was full of wonder, at the very firſt Parthenia bluſht: and in lieu of advancing towards Policrite, ſhe thought to ſtop; Timantes did the ſame, and never were two perſons of ſuch ſpirits as they ſo planetſtruck with amazement; yet Timantes amidſt his wonder, had ſome glimps of joy aſwel as ſorrow, the firſt of theſe, becauſe the beauty of Parthenia made ſuch a print in his heart, as he could not but joy at the ſight of ſuch a beauty; the ſecond, becauſe as things ſtood between him and his unknown Miſtreſs, he feared leſt this viſit would ruine him in her opinion. But when Parthenia was a little recollected from her firſt aſtoniſhment, and with much ado was able to tell Policrite ſhe was glad to ſee her, Timantes fell into a ſecond fit of wonder, much greater than the firſt; for Parthenia had no ſooner pronounced four words, but he perfectly knew her voice, and made no queſtion in the world but that ſhe was his unknown Miſtreſs: but yet this laſt amazement was much different from the firſt; for he was beyond all expectation joyed to find, that all he loved in two perſons were conjoyned in one, and that his unknown Miſtreſs and Parthenia were one and the ſame, the motions of his heart did beat in his eyes; joy danced in his looks, and he had much ado to hinder his expreſſions of it; eſpecially when Policrite having ended her own complements, preſented him unto Parthenia, who ſaluted him civilly, but yet very faintly; for ſince ſhe was ignorant how Timantes was compelled to come unto her, ſhe thought that ſince he was ſo jocund after ſuch a Letter as ſhe ſent him, that he did not love her; ſo that though ſhe was not uncivil, yet he obſerved ſhe was angry: Alſo ſhe was ſo aſhamed, that Timantes ſhould know her, that ſhe could no longer hide her ſelf from him, and that it was no obligement in her, the making her ſelf known unto him, that all her thoughts were ſo intangled and confuſed, that ſhe knew not what to do or think, yet ſhe imagined there was ſome ſecret deſign or other in this viſit, and ſhe ſuſpected that Amazita had revealed her ſecret; ſhe looked earneſtly in her eyes to find in them a confirmation of her ſuſpicion, but ſhe could not diſcover any thing by them. In the mean while Philoxipes began to chide his ſiſter and laugh, becauſe ſhe was not ſufficiently joyed at the ſight of Policrite, and becauſe of her incivility in not thanking her for bringing to her the braveſt and moſt gallant man in the world, in bringing Timantes: I believe, ſaid ſhe unto her, that the Princeſs my Siſter is ſo well perſwaded of my affection, as ſhe will not doubt but I am raviſhed with joy to ſee her, and as for this illuſtrious ſtranger (added ſhe and bluſhed) I think he hath ſo little cauſe to thank you for bringing him hither, as I have not ſo much intereſt in him, as to thank you my ſelf for him. I aſſure you, Madam, (replied Timantes, and looked upon her with equal love and joy) I think my ſelf ſo happy in the honour of ſeeing you this day, that if you had any intereſt in me, you would render abundance of thanks for me unto the Prince Philoxipes, and ſo much the more (ſaid he, thinking to juſtifie himſelf, and not thinking that the company took any notice) becauſe the Prince Philoxipes forced that happineſs upon me, in compelling me to come hither, where I ſhould have feared to diſturb your ſolitude. After this Parthenia brought all this good company into her chamber, her mind being as full of various thoughts, as the mind of Timantes, whoſe eyes were ſtill fixed upon hers, and ſhe on the contrary durſt not look upon him, but ſhunned his looks as much as ſhe could: In the mean while Philoxipes and Policrite, asked her how it came to paſs ſhe was ſo finely dreſſed in a deſart, and afterward chid her for coming near Paphos, and never ſending to ſee how they did; and thus the time was ſpent until dinner. But as Timantes did burn with deſire to tell his adored unknown Miſtreſs that he knew her, ſo he watched the opportunity (whilſt Philoxipes and Policrite were talking of the beſt expedients to get Parthenia's conſent unto their deſires) to addreſs himſelf unto her, and to talk with her when none heard. Why, Madam, ſaid he unto her, have you ſo long Eclipſed the greateſt beauty in the World? why would you rather put it to hazard than give your conſent that I ſhould ſee you? The laſt Letter which your unknown Miſtreſs writ unto you (ſaid ſhe unto him) has ſo little reached your heart, that I cannot tell whether her acquaintance with you, will be ſo pleaſing as you imagine; or whether the conſolation which you look for from the Princeſs of Salamis will be ſo great as you hoped: it was not ſhe whom you ſaw at the Temple, but ſhe whom you ſaw at Paphos, whom I deſired you ſhould love. Timantes hearing Parthenia ſay ſo, proteſted that he never intended to come and ſee her, but that the Prince Philoxipes had deceived him, and forced him to come whether he would or no, and that ſhe might obſerve by his negligent habit, that he had no ſuch intentions when he roſe in the morning. The truth is, Sir, he ſet all his Rhetorick upon the rack for arguments to perſwade her, and make her believe, that he had no intention of ſeeing the Princeſs of Salamis, and ſaid aſmuch as if he were to juſtifie himſelf for intending a viſit unto her moſt mortal enemy, or as if his unknown Miſtreſs and the Princeſs of Salamis, were not all one perſon; and he was in a fair way to make his peace, when Philoxipes and Policrite came towards them; Philoxipes taking Parthenia aſide to talk with her in private, and Policrite to talk with Timantes. But, Sir, why ſhould I ſo long hinder you from knowing the good fortune and happineſs of theſe two Lovers, which is a happy Omen of your own? Therefore let me tell you, without making any particularities, that Philoxipes let the Princeſs of Salamis underſtand, that he knew how Timantes loved her, and ſhe made no difficulty to confeſs ſhe did not hate him. Afterwards he made it apparent unto her, that the Oracles were accompliſhed, ſince Timantes loved her without the influence of her beauty, and he perſwaded her to put the fidelity of Timantes unto no further tryals, proteſting unto her, that he durſt anſwer for his conſtancy. On the other ſide; Policrite told Timantes, that Philoxipes knew of his paſſion and approved of it. Thus were all things ſo proſperouſly tranſacted, that it was reſolved upon, before Philoxipes returned unto Paphos, Antimaques ſhould return to Crete to procure the conſent of Timantes his Father. In the mean time, leſt ſolitude ſhould infuſe freſh ſcruples, and more Phantaſtical thoughts in Parthenia, Philoxipes would have Policrite carry her unto his ſtately houſe of Claria, and there continue with her before ſhe returned to Court. In concluſion, Sir, all things were happily compoſed; Parthenia pardoned Amaxita for revealing her ſecret; Timantes rendered a million of thanks to the Prince Philoxipes, and was infinitely more in love with Parthenia than before, but durſt not tell her as much, leſt ſhe ſhould think he loved her beauty more than her ſoul. Antimaques returned with the conſent of Timantes his Father; and to recompence his pains, a match was made up between him and Dorida, and they were married eight days after Timantes and Parthenia. I ſhall not trouble you, Sir, with a relation of the great rejoycings in Paphos, for you are not concerned in them, only let me tell you this, Sir, that never were two ſo happy as Timantes and Parthenia; and to let this Princeſs ſee he loved her above Parents, Country, and all the World, he would not go into Crete, but reſolved to dwell in Cyprus. The King, for Philoxipes his ſake, conferred upon him the Government of one of the principal parts of the Iſle: So that Parthenia found a full accompliſhment of her joys, inſomuch, as you, Sir, have reaſon to hope, that the ſame gods who declared her happineſs and yours at the ſame time, would produce the ſame happy events unto you, Sir, as unto her. Alſo it was the Prince Philoxipes his pleaſure, that I ſhould come and acquaint you with the happy concluſion of this adventure, that you might with greater hopes wait for a happy end of all your misfortunes, and for an accompliſhment of your felicity, which he deſires, with all his heart, and wiſhes with as much zeal as he doth his own.

Megaſides having ended his ſtory, Cyrus expreſſed a thouſand thanks to the Prince Philoxipes for the hopes he gave him of an end unto his miſeries; and thanking Megaſides in particular for his exact relation of this pleaſant adventure, he thought he had good reaſon to hope, that ſince the gods had made Parthenia ſo happy ſo odd a way, they would alſo make him happy after all his miſeries. After this Cyrus asked Leontidas where he met with Megaſides, and he was anſwered, at Milete: then he diſmiſſed them, aſſuring Megaſides and Leontidas, that he would take orders for their diſpatch, as ſoon as he had taken a little reſt. But they both beſeeched him to give them ſo much leave as to ſtay and ſee the end of the Siege of Sardis: Leontidas importuning him to ſend his orders unto Thraſibulus by ſome other; and Megaſides deſired he might not return unto Cyprus but with news of a new Victory, to the end he might be more joyfully welcomed by Philoxipes. Cyrus conſented unto their requeſts, and giving them both thanks and commendations, he bad them retire unto their reſt, being himſelf in more quietneſs of ſpirit than he was the day before; for though the Oracle of Babylon did threaten him; and the Sybil declared ſad things unto him, yet ſince Venus Urania ſpoke him fair, he did not ſo ſadly reſent the reſt, nor deſpaired of happineſs, ſince he might as well believe the one as the other. Thus this news did invigorate his ſpirits amidſt his ſufferings: He had freſh hopes of happy ſucceſs in his Siege of Sardis, and hoped alſo that the unjuſt jealouſie of Mandana would ſhortly end: So that after he had given ſome Military orders, he refreſhed himſelf with two or three hours of ſound ſerene ſleep: His Dreams alſo which uſed to be horrid, now ſmiled upon him, and he ſaw Mandana, and Mandana not jealous nor angry: He thought he ſaw her ſitting in an Arbour ſet round with Flowers, and that ſhe called him with as much ſweetneſs in her voice as in her eyes; but as he was going unto her, and ready to kneel unto his Princeſs, he thought he heard a great noiſe, which made her vaniſh, and him awake, very ſorry he could no longer enjoy ſo fair and ſweet a viſion.

PART VI. BOOK II.

CYRUS, as ſoon as he was awake, began to think how he might turn his pleaſing dreams into real enjoyments of Mandana, but ſince that could not be, unleſs Sardis were taken; the getting of that famous Town was the object of all his wiſhes and thoughts. Never was this victorious Prince ſo greedy of Conqueſt as at this time. Nor did he neglect any thing that might further his deſign, but did ſo often hazard his life at that Siege, that if Fortune had not had a greater care of his life than himſelf, his Rivals had triumphed over his ruine without any quarrel among themſelves. But this Prince was too powerfully protected by Heaven, to fall in ſo juſt a war, though thoſe who judge of things according to appearances, and conſider not that the ſecrets of Soveraign power are inſcrutable, did think him to be forſaken. Mean while, the ceſſation of hoſtility, until the dead of both ſides were brought off, being ended, both the Aſſaulters and the Aſſaulted began both to uſe all endeavours to compaſs their deſired ends. Cyrus attempted to raiſe another Sconce under the Counterſcarp of the Ditch, oppoſite unto that which he made before; to the end that when he made a ſecond Aſſault, this might facilitate his deſign; and that when he was Maſter of two Paſſes over the Ditch, he might make a ſcalado in two ſeveral places at once without the loſs of many men: Yet this was not done without a Council of War: But ſince this Prince never propounded any thing without deep judgement, and which was not advantageous to the common cauſe, both his Friends and his Rivals were forced always to approve of what he ſaid: Yet would the King of Aſſyria ſometimes oppoſe him out of pure obſtinacy: And if the wiſdom and prudence of Mazares had not ſometimes interpoſed, and tempered the violence of the Aſſyrian Prince, perhaps the combat between Cyrus and him would have been fought before the War, and by conſequence before Mandana was at liberty: For ſo was the condition between Cyrus and this Prince, to put to hazard that in a ſingle Duel which he had won, and ſo juſtly merited by ſo many general Combats, by the taking of ſo many Towns, by the conqueſt of ſo many Provinces and Kingdoms, and by the winning of ſo many Battels. 'Tis true, all the Friends of Cyrus had an obſervant eye over them; and more true, that Cyrus himſelf had ſometimes pity upon this Prince, who without all doubt had many excellent qualities: For when he conſidered how he was a great King, that he had loſt a great Kingdom, and the prime Town in the World, and that the Violence of his paſſion, forced him to ſerve in the Army of his conqueror and Rival, and alſo enemy, that he was certainly hated of Mandana, he excuſed his imperfections and weakneſſes, and deferred his revenge until after Mandana's releaſement when he might with honour take it: yet would he augment his ſorrows, by letting him know what the Oracle of Venus Vrania had ſaid in his commendations, that he might have leſs confidence in that which he received from Jupiter-Belus at Babylon. It was not only envie to take all hopes from a Rival, which moved Cyrus to publiſh this Oracle, but as his reaſon why he would not divulge the ſad anſwer of the Sybil, was, becauſe he would not dishearten his ſouldiers: ſo on the contrary, he deſired they ſhould know this Oracle, that it might invigorate their ſpirits, and give them freſh hearts to fight, knowing well that hopes of Victory in a Souldier is a Battel more than half won. But ſince his modeſty would not permit him to offer any prophanation, by altering any thing which the gods had ſaid, he deſired Megaſides and Leontidas to leave out what the Oracle of Venus Vrania had ſpoken in his commendations, and to publiſh only what related unto an end of his miſeries: For though this Oracle did not poſitively ſay that Cyrus ſhould take Sardis, that he ſhould releaſe Mandana, and vanquiſh all his Rivals; yet ſince they fortold him to be happy, theſe things muſt conſequently enſue, ſince moſt certainly he could never be happy without Mandana, and he could never get Mandana without a conqueſt of his Rivals and enemies; therefore by neceſſary inference, he was to obtain this Victory, before he could enjoy this Princeſs. That Oracle then was no ſooner publiſhed by Megaſides, and principally by Leontidas, who was acquainted with all the officers in the Army, but it produced thoſe effects which Cyrus expected; freſh valour was infuſed into all his troops, and new ſorrows ſeiſed upon the King of Aſſyria's heart; all the mountainous hopes he had in the promiſes of Jupiter-Belus began to ſhrink into Mole-hills, by reaſon of this Oracle; but ſince he thought that by murmuring againſt the gods would but the more incenſe them, he was ſilently huſht, and hated Cyrus the more, though he did not leſs eſteem him. As for Mazares, ſince he expected nothing but miſery, his reaſon did ſurmount his paſſion, and he had no other hopes but to participate with Cyrus in the danger and glory of releaſing Mandada, and therefore theſe promiſes of the gods unto Cyrus, the King of Aſſyria, did little fret his heart: tis true, he was always ſo miſerable, that Fortune could hardly be more incenſed againſt him than ſhe was, but ſince he was not leſs prudent than unfortunate, nor leſs generous than prudent, Cyrus began to eſteem him infinitely, and keep cloſe ſociety with him; both of them did complain unto each other of the King of Aſſyria's violent humour, and at laſt did ſo accuſtom themſelves unto civility, that they did not only eſteem, but think each other worthy of Mandana; yet they never ſpake of her but ſighed, and as they went from quarter to quarter, viſiting the guards which Cyrus kept upon all the avenues of Sardis, Mandana was the only object of their diſcourſe, unleſs when they were obliged to ſpeak of ſomething which related unto the Siege. How happy are you, Sir, would Mazares ſay unto him, in being not only loved by the moſt glorious Princeſs of the World, but alſo in never having done any thing which might diſpleaſe her; I wiſh unto the Heavens, that ſince it was my bitter fate to be hated, that it might be unjuſtly, and that I could not upbraid my ſelf with meriting her hate, by my deceiving her, and carrying her away from Sinope. There is both ſo much love, and prudence, and generoſity, in your expreſſions, Sir, replied Cyrus, that I would not have my Princeſs hear you. No, no, Sir, (ſaid Mazares ſadly) never fear the Princeſs Mandana, ſince ſhe has ſlighted the King of Aſſyria for you, and ſince ſhe had rather ſee all Aſia in arms than you unfaithful; ſince ſhe has held out againſt all the ſubmiſſive attempts of the Pontean King; and has hated me ſo far, as to deny that liberty which I offered her, you may well be confident, that nothing will alter the conſtant heart of that Princeſs. Whilſt Mazares was talking thus, Cyrus hearkened and ſighed, ſeeing him to be more miſerable than he thought him: nor would he acquaint him with his condition in Mandana's thoughts, leſt he ſhould revive ſome hopes in the heart of his generous Rival, and kindle that fire which was not quite extinguiſhed. In the mean time Cyrus neglected not the erecting of that ſconce which he intended, and was reſolved upon by the council of War, but it was not done without much difficulty; for the King of Pontus knowing the importance of it, did ſally out three times upon them; yet Cyrus knowing well that one of the greateſt ſecrets in War is, never to quit the firſt deſign for a ſecond, becauſe then ſudden orders can never be ſo prudently given, ven, nor punctually executed, as thoſe which are deliberatly pondered, therefore he commanded this ſconce to be proſecuted with all the power he had; and ſince his army was numerous, he thought that let the Enemies make what Sallies they could, he was able to beat them in again. The King of Aſſyria, the King of Phrygia, and the King of Hircania, had each their ſeveral Quarters to make good; and the Stranger Anaxaris fought that day next Cyrus, he thinking it a ſufficient recompence of his Valour, to have this Renowned Heroe a witneſs of it: And it muſt be acknowledged, that as the commendations of Cyrus was noble Rewards for the Acts of Anaxaris, ſo the Acts of Anaxaris did deſerve the commendations of Cyrus. Amongſt all the reſt of his bravery during this Siege, the erecting of this Sconce was one of the moſt remarkable; for he did ſuch things as could never be equalled by any but by the valour of Cyrus only, who queſtionleſs upon this occaſion did ſuch things as can hardly be related without ſuſpicion of truth. Above twenty times was he beaten off by the enemy, and as often did he repulſe them into the town, he loſt and regained that quarter of the ditch where he intended the Sconce; but at laſt he wearied his enemies, and perfected his deſign: The Sallies which the beſieged made in other places did thrive no better: Cyrus ſuſtained ſome loſs of men, but not comparable to his enemies: Araſpes, who ſince the death of Panthea did ſigh out a life of ſorrows, was wounded at this bout, where he fought more with deſign to die than vanquiſh, but ſo it did not prove, for there was no mortality in the wound he receiv'd, but was rather a means to ſave his life than to put it in danger. The King of Aſſyria was in thoughts of death alſo at this time: But the advantage was clear on Cyrus his ſide: For he had finiſhed his ſconce, he had killed many Lydians, and took abundance of priſoners. He underſtood from ſome of them after the Fight was ended, and he returned to his Tent, that the King of Pontus to keep up the people, told them of great Relief to come from Thrace, that the Bactrians alſo would ſend Auxiliaries, and that e're long Cyrus would be forced to raiſe the Siege. He underſtood from them alſo more certainly than before, that Creſſus had no power in the Cittadel, and that the King of Pontus had ſo tampered, that he was abſolute maſter of the Souldiery. Theſe Priſoners alſo told him, how there came a Lady late unto the Cittadel, unto whom the King of Pontus moved Crœſſus to give protection. How could this Lady, ſaid Cyrus, get into Sardis, ſince it is compaſſed about with two hundred thouſand men? No, Sir, ſaid one of thoſe Priſoners, ſhe came in before unknown whom ſhe was, though they ſay ſhe is of ſome great Quality. There is alſo a man, whoſe name is Heracleon (who is a moſt gallant man) that promiſed Crœſſus to bring great ſuccours unto him: They ſay alſo, that he has been long in Sardis concealed; but I can give no further ſatisfaction in the adventure, only this, that he is a man of ſome great Quality. After this Cyrus retired, and moſt part of theſe priſoners took up Arms under him. The day following, thoſe Deputies which Leontidas ſpoke of, arrived, and in the name of the people who ſent them, did ſwear inviolable fidelity to him. They came from Gnide, from Cavia, from the Territories of Xanthes, and from Licia; the Cauniens alſo, and the Meleſians ſent their Deputies, ſo that Fortune ſmiled upon Cyrus from all ſides. And truly, if ambition only had been his aim, and if glory only had been his wiſh, he had full cauſe of contentment; but ſince Love only was the engine of his ſoul, he reliſhed nothing but what conduced to Mandana's releaſement, and he would freely have quitted all his Conqueſts upon that condition. However he received all theſe Deputies with much ſweetneſs, and treated them moſt magnificently. He aſſured them of protection againſt all their enemies; and told them he would ſo mediate the matter with Ciaxaris, as he ſhould look upon them like ancient and faithful Subjects. In concluſion, they were ſo charmed with his ſweet expreſſions, that he made himſelf as much a Maſter of their hearts by his ſweetneſs, as he had made himſelf Maſter of their Countrey by force of Arms. Their greateſt admiration was, to ſee a Prince ſo young, ſo expert in all their Cuſtoms and Laws, and able to give them as ſound advice in the management of publick affairs, as if he had been brought up amongſt them, and had nothing to do but govern them: He ſpoke unto them all in their ſeveral Languages, and filled them all ſo full of wonder, that they returned not only charmed with his preſence, his ſpirit, his virtue, and his ſweetneſs, but alſo with his gifts, and went with reſolutions to incite their Citizens unto ſome act which might redound unto the glory of Cyrus: And they did conſtitute every year for ever a day of thanks to be rendered unto the gods for bringing them under the power of Cyrus. In the mean while to teſtifie more confidence in the people which expreſſed ſo much affection, he confirmed all their Laws and Priviledges, remitted unto them all Tributes, and required nothing from them but aſſurances of unalterable fidelity: Calling back the Army which Thraſibulus, and Harpagus commanded; ſent orders for the firſt of theſe to march with them unto him, and leaving the other in the arms of his dear Alcionida: And though Cyrus was ſo well verſed in the Politicks, as that he knew it contrary to cuſtom to draw off his Army ſo ſoon from a new conquered Country; yet ſince this Lydian War was the main hinge upon which all the reſt moved, and ſince he left Garriſons in ſome places of greateſt ſtrength, he did not think the hazard was great, but thought it better to fortifie his own Forces; not knowing how long the Siege might laſt; and knowing that the taking of ſo great a Town as Sardis, might require as great an Army as his. However, Cyrus neglected nothing, he ſent to ſee how Seſoſtris recovered, who was ſo well, that he ſent Cyrus word, he ſhould ere long come and hazard that life in his ſervice which he had preſerved. Cyrus alſo ſent a complement to the Princeſs Araminta, and was as good as his word in not ſuffering Phraartes to come unto her during the Siege: nor did he forget Cleonice and Doraliſa, nor any of the Lady Priſoners: But though he did moſt gloriouſly acquit himſelf of all he had to do, either as a Lover, or as a Friend, or as an Enemy, or as a Prince, or as the General of an Army, or as a Conquerour, yet Mandana's unjuſt charging him with infidelity, did grate upon his very heart: and as oft as this angry thought came into his mind, he thought alſo he had ſome reaſon to fear her conſtancy: Since commonly thoſe who lightly ſuſpect others are guilty themſelves: yet did he preſently repent of ſuch a thought, which had much more troubled him, if he had not received intelligence that the people of Sardis began to conſider that their riches would not fill their bellies, and that there was likelyhood of a hungry ſedition to riſe amongſt them, ſo that their Town would be thereby more pregnable: And indeed there was great probability of it, though Crœſſus, and the King of Pontus did all they could, the one to ſave his Crown, the other his Miſtreſs; but they were in extream fears of both: Yet leſt the people ſhould deſpair, they concealed their fears, and divulged that Relief was coming; that the Army of Cyrus waſted every day, and that he would in a ſhort time be forced to raiſe his Siege: That the people which he had conquered did revolt, and conſequently he would not be in any condition of new Conqueſts. Moreover the King of Pontus gave out, that Cyrus did not now care for Mandana who was the cauſe of the War, but that he was in love with the Princeſs Araminta; ſo that within this ſhort time all would be made good friends: So that theſe reports being divulged, the people ſuffered their miſeries more patiently, in hopes ere long to ſee an end of them. The King of Pontus alſo received another advantage; for this report coming out of the Town into the Cittadel, and from the mouths of the people unto the Souldiers: So that Mandana's women heard what was talked in Sardis: the Guards told them aloud (thinking it would be welcome news that they ſhould ere long come out of priſon) that the Peace was almoſt concluded between the King of Pontus and Cyrus; adding, that the firſt of theſe was to marry Mandana, and Cyrus Araminta. Marteſia did not credit theſe reports, though they confirmed Mandana's Jealouſie; and though they made no impreſſion in the ſpirit of Marteſia, yet they did in Areatina, who told all ſhe heard unto a woman belonging to the Princeſs Palmis, and in ſo loud a voice as Mandana in the next room over-heard her: It did ſo ſurpriſe her, that the Princeſs of Lydia who was with her, did ask her, why ſhe did ſo ſuddenly change her colour? Mandana being one who loved not to confeſs her own weakneſs; but what confidence ſoever ſhe had in the diſcretion of the Princeſs Palmis, yet ſhe concealed her jealouſie; but now ſeeing it was become publick talk, ſhe reſolved to acquaint her, deſiring leave firſt to ask Arianita where ſhe had theſe reports. Arianita being ſurpriſed that Mandana ſhould over-hear her, would have denied her words; but Mandana told her abſolutely ſhe did ſpeak them, and ſhe would know the truth; ſo that at laſt ſhe told her all. Theſe two Princeſſes then retiring themſelves: For my part, ſaid the Princeſs Palmis, I cannot find any reaſon why you ſhould fear that this talk of the Guards ſhould be true: For is it probable or credible, that the greateſt Prince in the world ſhould be capable of ſo much unworthineſs? Though he were perfidious, and could not preſerve his heart, yet certainly he would never make conditions of peace by diſpoſing of you, but would ſet you at liberty: He may perhaps reſtore the Kingdom of Pontus unto the Brother of his new Miſtreſs, but has nothing to do in the diſpoſing of the King of Medes's Daughter, whoſe Army he commands; and therefore I am confident Cyrus is innocent, and theſe reports of the Guards are only thoſe vain popularities which ſuch kind of people uſually vent,though there be no appearance of truth in them. No, no, Madam, (replied Mandana ſadly) the news is not all falſe, nor do I think it all true: I do not think the perfidie of Cyrus ſo high as to make his conditions of peace with me: Yet certainly he loves not me, but the Princeſs Araminta; and I muſt confeſs that I have ſuch probable conjectures of his crime, that I do not doubt it. I confeſs alſo I have concealed my ſuſpicions from you, becauſe I could not poſſeſs you ſo ſoon with an ill opinion of that man whom I had ſo highly commended unto you. But I pray you (ſaid the Princeſs Palmis) what proofs have you of Cyrus his inconſtancy, who hath teſtified ſo many ſigns of unalterable conſtancy? and done more for you, than any did for any? Be pleaſed to know, replied ſhe, that a while before the King of Pontus went to fight the Battel which he loſt,he came into my chamber with more glimps of joy in his face than uſually: Madam, (ſaid he unto me) I beſeech you pardon me, if I acquaint you with a thing, which doubtleſs will not pleaſe you, but ſince it concerns you no leſs than me, I think it my duty to let you know it. Sir, ſaid I unto him, and ſighed, you have ſo accuſtomed me to ill news ſince I have been in your power, that though you ſhould tell me any thing which will not pleaſe, yet I ſhall hear it. I think, Madam, ſaid he unto her, that it will diſpleaſe you to hear that Cyrus, whom you prefer before all the Princes in the World, and who indeed does merit all his glory, hath preferred one before you, that is inferior to you in all things: I do not deſire, Madam, you ſhould believe me, but believe your own eyes. After this he gave me a Letter, telling me it was from the Princeſs his Siſter, and which indeed was ſo; adding, that it was taken from a man who was taken priſoner: But, Madam, ſaid Mandana, that you may ſee what cauſe I have to ſuſpect and grieve, I pray you read this Letter from the Princeſs Araminta, which the King of Pontus left with me; I need not tell you how this Princeſs was in love with Spitridates, Son to Arſomenes King of Bithynia; nor need I tell you how Spitridates does wonderfully reſemble Cyrus; for perſons of your quality and wiſdom know all theſe adventures: After this, Mandana did give the Princeſs Araminta's Letter unto the Princeſs Palmis, and the King of Pontus finding in it matter enough to make Mandana jealous, reſolved to give it unto her, thereby to poiſon her opinion of Cyrus, and the Princeſs Palmis opening this Letter found theſe words.

Araminta unto Spitridates.

SIR,

I Conceive you have reaſon of wonder, to ſee one whom you have driven to the neceſſity of juſtifying her ſelf, almoſt confeſs all things that you can accuſe her of: In the mean time I cannot deny, but that I am extreamly obliged unto the Illuſtrious Cyrus, who hath had more reſpect of me, than ever Conquerour had of a Captive, and that I have as much of him, looking upon him as the greateſt Prince in the world, and

and the moſt glorious Conquerour: Nor can I deny, but he does wonderfully reſemble you, and that the ſight of him does extreamly delight me. After all this, I wonder you ſhould write unto me, that it ſhould be reported I have conquered the Conquerour of all Aſia, and that my heart is his moſt illuſtrious conqueſt; for conſidering all I have done for you, this is extream injuſtice; there was no neceſſity that you ſhould tell me, that before you were in Priſon, you heard of his reſpects unto me, and mine to him, for I confeſs it; and leſs need to write unto me how they report a hundred particular paſſages 'twixt him and me, for you cannot do it without a wrong unto me. Return Spitridates, return, and render your ſelf worthy of my juſtification, repent of your accuſation: 'Tis true, I cannot much grieve, ſince the takeing of Sardis will let you know what the deſigns of Cyrus and my ſelf are. I do not ſay this Prince hath promiſed to ſet you at liberty, for you will perhaps think he would not do it, but only to recompence you for taking from you one who heretofore was moſt dear unto you. After this, I have no more to ſay, but that ſince it is the voice of the people which accuſeth me, I do expect and wait until the ſame do let you know I never did any thing which I ought not to do, nor ever had the leaſt thought which I ought not to think, and that I love none but whom I will love unto the death of Araminta.

As ſoon as the Princeſs Palmis had read this Letter, Mandana began to ſpeak. Well, Madam, ſaid ſhe unto her, is it not reaſon that ſince the Prince Spitridates is jealous of the Princeſs Araminta, I ſhould ſuſpect the fidelity of Cyrus? muſt there not needs be ſome truth in that which is ſo generally ſpoken both in Bithynia and Lydia, in Chalcidonia and in Sardis? Moreover, Madam, I am moſt certain this is the hand of Araminta, for I have ſeveral times ſeen hers, when the King of Pontus was a hoſtage in the King my Fathers Court; ſo that I cannot think there is an Impoſture in it: Moreover I cannot ſuſpect the King of Pontus of Forgery, for I have ſeen the Servant whom Spitridates ſent with the Letter, and he is the very ſame ſervant which I preferred unto Cyrus when he went unto Themiſcyra: But did this Servant tell you that Cyrus was in love with Araminta? (replied the Princeſs Palmis) He did not directly ſay ſo (replied ſhe) but he ſaid Cyrus did render as much honour unto Araminta, as if ſhe were at Heraclea, he viſited her very often, and held long diſcourſes with her: Moreover, this meſſenger from Spitridates tells me one thing, which puts me out of doubt that there is a great league of ſecrecy between Cyrus and Araminta; for he tells me, that when he was brought before Cyrus, and the Letters which I had about me preſented unto him, he ſent it immediately unto Araminta by Chriſantes, not knowing from whence it came, and it was only by Araminta's anſwer I came to know it was from Spitridates; this meſſenger had orders to go unto this Princeſs with Chriſantes, who gave her this Letter directed to her from Cyrus, who was ſo full of reſpect unto her, that he ſent it unopened, though by the Laws of War he might have done it without any incivility. But the better to let you ſee what this ſecret buſineſs was, the man ſays that the Princeſs Araminta ſent back the Letter of Spitridates unto Cyrus by Chriſantes, with the Letter which ſhe writ unto him from her ſelf, and that afterward Cyrus ſent it back again with his anſwer unto her. I beſeech you, Madam, judge whether I need to doubt of the infidelity of Cyrus, for if he were not a Lover of Araminta, ſhe would never have ſent him Spitridates his Letter, it had been enough if ſhe had ſent him word that it concerned no matters of State or War. But certainly ſhe intends to ſacrifice Spitridates unto Cyrus, and ſent his Letter to know of him what ſhe ſhould anſwer. For all this, ſaid the Princeſs Palmis, it ſeems Araminta would juſtifie her ſelf, ſince ſhe ſays Spitridates hath no cauſe to be jealous: Alas, Madam, replied Mandana, I find more crime in Cyrus, than I do innocency in Araminta, for ſhe does ſo weakly juſtifie her ſelf, that ſhe ſeems rather to prepare Spitridates for her inconſtancy, than to cure his jealouſie; ſhe confeſſeth almoſt all he can accuſe her of, and defers her juſtification until after the taking of Sardis: never telling him, ſhe will be ſtill his, and not the Lover of Cyrus; ſhe began to make him hope for Liberty, but ſhe ended in telling him, ſhe would love him until death whom ſhe loved at that preſent, but never tells him whether it be he ſhe loves or no; ſhe might as well have ſaid, Araminta is inconſtant, becauſe ſhe thinks Cyrus more amiable than Spitridates, and more happy; a mixture of ambition and love is not amiſs, and by enrertaining the paſſion of this Prince, ſhe reneweth the Crown in her, and Crowns her own head with all his Lawrels: The truth is, Madam, it is not ſtrange that the Conquerour of all Aſia, ſhould conquer Araminta's heart; and leſs wonder if I ſhould murmur, that Cyrus ſhould be conquered by a captive Princeſs, than for her to be moved with the tears of a Conquerour: But, Madam, it muſt be confeſſed his height of injuſtice in him to forſake me after all this I have done for him, after he had been the cauſe of all the miſeries in my life; after I have for his ſake ſlighted the greateſt Princes in the world, and after I had overcome my own ſpirit and heart for his ſake: Yet, Madam, it is but too true, that Cyrus has forſaken me, and had rather loſe the reward of all his paſt ſervices, than remain faithful. Truly, Madam, ſaid the Princeſs Palmis, methinks you condemn Cyrus upon no good ground, for though there be ſome appearances againſt him, yet they are no convincing proofs; and you ought not to condemn him as a criminal. I believe (ſaid Mandana, and ſighed) that the taking of Sardis will make his crime apparent; and as for this pretended peace, which is talked of unto Araminta, I am confident it is nothing but common brute without ground: However, ſaid the Princeſs Palmis, defer your judgment until the end of the Siege, and then you may ſee the innocency or crime of Cyrus, and indeed it is not ſafe to cenſure until then, and then either to thank him for your liberty, or chide him for his inconſtancy. Oh, I pray unto the gods that you may have then ſo much power with him, as to make him be gentle unto the conquered, as hitherto he hath been. Though I ſhould have no power with him, replied Mandana, yet I am confident he would treat the King your Father very well; but as for matter of chiding, ſaid ſhe, I have already done it: and then Mandana told Palmis how ſhe had writ unto him, and by whom, who was one of thoſe aſſaſſinates which ſhould have killed Cyrus at the inſtigation of the coward Artanus, and whom Cyrus did afterwards moſt generouſly pardon, when he fell into his power. In the mean time, he never anſwers me, though the man promiſed me to return or dye: But Mandana's expectations were in vain; for as cunning as the man was, he was ſuſpected and ſtayed, ſo that he could not return to the Cittadel, they ſearched him whether he had any Letters, and found about him that of Cyrus, which was moſt carefully ſealed, and Pactias before whom he was brought, ſent it immedately unto the King of Pontus: Thus was the unhappy Mandana deprived of the comfort in receiving a Letter from Cyrus, which queſtionleſs would have convinced her of the error wherein ſhe was; yet was ſhe very happy in having the ſociety of a perſon ſo full of ſpirit and goodneſs as the Princeſs Palmis to comfort her in her miſeries, and certainly did retaliate comfort for comfort, yet had they one more addition of ſorrows; for the King of Pontus conceiving another Chamber in the Fort did require fewer Guards, and by conſequence more ſafe, ſince it is an eaſier matter to find few, than many faithful, he would have them removed thither: But ſince they could only paſs into it by a great high Tarraſs, from whence they might diſcover all about the Town, they had a view of all the Army of Cyrus which were about it; yet as their relations were different, ſo they turned their looks ſeveral ways: For Mandana looked towards the beſiegers, where ſhe knew Cyrus, though ſhe thought him unfaithful; and the Princeſs Palmis looked towards that part of the Town where ſhe knew the Prince Artamas was priſoner, but the love of her Country, her tenderneſs towards the King her Father, and the Prince Myrſiles, drew ſome of her tears for them, and for the Prince Artamas: And after ſhe had ſeriouſly conſidered the huge Army which covered all the Plains as far as ſhe could ſee: Alas (ſaid ſhe, and turned towards Mandana ſadly) you have ſo much comfort, Madam, as to ſee your Releaſer amongſt this vaſt multitude of men. Alas, Madam (replied Mandana) a perfidious Prince ſhall never be my Deliverer, and I ſhall have more joy to ſee the Prince Artamas out of Priſon, ſince he is your Adorer, than to ſee Cyrus victorious, ſince he loves not me. The diſcourſe of theſe two great Princeſſes was not long, for their Guards would not permit them to be long in that place. So they entered into their new lodgings; and they entered ſighing, though ſhe who had the leaſt cauſe was moſt ſad; but her errour was the more excuſable, becauſe if ſhe had really loſt the heart of her illuſtrious Cyrus, ſhe had loſt the greateſt Jewel in the world. Whilſt then this fair and ſad Princeſs was with ſo much injuſtice lamenting her loſs, and whilſt Crœſſus was with as much reaſon trembling at his; whilſt the King of Pontus was in deſpair, and whilſt the Prince Artamas endured his priſon patiently, Cyrus was thinking of nothing but how to releaſe Mandana: He complained of her Jealouſie, but it was with ſo much reverent reſpect, as ſhe would have been fully ſatisfied, had ſhe known it. In the mean while, it vexed him to ſee Sardis hold out longer than he expected; and he reſolved upon the loſs of many men rather than not to carry it the next Aſſault: and becauſe he would not receive a baffle, he ſtayed ſome days until Scaling-Ladders were in readineſs. In which interim ſome deſign or other was ſtill on foot, either in preventing victuals from coming to the Town, or in cutting off ſome Water from the enemy; or in repulſing of Sallies, which were every day made: The reaſon which made the King of Pontus ſo frequent in his Sallies, and hazard ſo many men in them, was, he could the better pry into the encampment of his Enemies, and ſpie an opportunity, if need ſhould be, of carrying away the Princeſs Mandana: By this means alſo, he could either ſend out Spies into the Army of Cyrus, or elſe to ſolicite for Relief. Things ſtanding on theſe tearms, the King of Pontus made a Sally in the night time on that Quarter where Cyrus commanded in Perſon. At firſt he killed many men, fell into the Trenches, and ſlew all that ſtood in their way, and gave an Allarm unto all the Camp; but Cyrus did quickly ſtop their fury by his preſence; for his voice was no ſooner heard both amongſt his own men, and his Enemies, but the one ſtruck with fury, and the other with fear, the Enemy fled, and his men followed ſo cloſe, that they were ready to enter the Town with them; but ſo few of the Enemy entered, as ſince that they had no great mind of making Sallies on Cyrus his ſide. The Egyptians and Medes being upon the Guard that night, had their ſhare in the glory of that Action; who yet were beholding to Cyrus for their valour, who being as ſweet after Victory, as valiant in fighting, had a great care of all wounded men as well friends as enemies, and ſo much the rather, becauſe he underſtood that there was an Egyptian of quality taken priſoner, who before he rendered himſelf, did ſo gallantly diſpute for his Liberty, as he was wounded in ſeveral places, and yet fought till he fell from his Horſe, ſo was forced to yield. Cyrus enquired his name in the preſence of many Egyptian Officers about him;but they knew not, and were extreamly impatient to know whom this valiant man of their Nation ſhould be: But when they heard his name was Heracleon, they could not chuſe but murmur amongſt themſelves, and ſeem aſtoniſhed, eſpecially when they heard afterwards that Cyrus commanded that a great care ſhould be had of him, and placed him in one of his own Tents. There was an Egyptian Officer whoſe name was Miris, could not hold from grumbling at this indulgency of Cyrus to him. Oh, Sir, ſaid he, be not ſo ſweet as to preſerve the life of the moſt wicked man upon earth, infinitely unworthy the protection of ſo virtuous a Prince. If he be ſuch a one as you ſay, replied Cyrus, the gods will puniſh him without me. But who is this Heracleon? Sir, replied Miris, he is a man moſt unworthy of his birth, which indeed is noble: He is a Rival to the generous Seſoſtris, he is an Enemy to his Country, an Aſſaſſinate of Kings, and a man whoſe love and ambition prompts unto all imaginable Villanies: Therefore I conjure you, as you tender the intereſt of Seſoſtris, to command he be leſs eſteemed,and more carefully guarded, leſt he eſcape, or kill himſelf when he ſees he's known: For, Sir, it doth much import Seſoſtris,ſince Heracleon is in your power, that this wretch do not die, before he let him know that which he only can inform him. Cyrus having obſerved that Seſoſtris loved Miris very well, did hearken unto him, and commanded that Heracleon ſhould be carefully guarded, that his words ſhould be carefully obſerved: commanding alſo, at the requeſt of Miris, that an account be given of his wounds, to the end, that if he be in danger, he may be moved to confeſs what concerned the Prince Seſoſtris: However, Sir, ſaid Miris, I beſeech you, as you reſpect the intereſt of this great Prince, Sir, to let me have two hours diſcourſe and audience, as ſoon as conveniently you can; that I may acquaint you, how it concerns Seſoſtris to know what only Heracleon can tell him, and that you may know alſo what difference to put between theſe two Rivals; for ſince I moſt exactly know all paſſages between them, and ſince the Prince Seſoſtris commanded me to acquaint you with it as ſoon as I met with a favourable opportunity, I ſhould be exceedingly glad ſince you have his enemy in your hands, to acquaint you with his adventures. The ſtory will extreamly pleaſe (replied Cyrus) for ever ſince the firſt I ſaw Seſoſtris, I have had a great deſire to know his fortunes; therefore I promiſe you to manage my matters ſo, as I will find ſome hours of audience before I ſleep; and indeed Cyrus was as good as his word; for after he had ſpent all the reſt of that day, and the beginning of the night in giving orders, he retired ſomething ſooner than ordinary: Yet firſt he underſtood, that at the firſt Heracleon would hardly ſuffer himſelf to be dreſſed, and raved as if he had been mad, but at laſt he ſuffered his wounds to be dreſſed, which proved very dangerous, yet not impoſſible to be healed; and though they were not, yet it would be long ere he died of them. At laſt Cyrus ſent for Miris to give him audience, conjuring him to make an exact relation of Seſoſtris his life: For, ſaid Cyrus, your hints concerning Heracleon makes me deſirous to know more, ſo alſo there is a ſecret kind of inclination in me, which makes me to deſire a more exact knowledge of his intereſts. I aſſure you, Sir, replied Miris, you cannot have a greater deſire to know, than I have to acquaint you with his adventures. Since ſo, ſaid Cyrus, let us loſe no time in diſcourſe of any thing elſe. Then Miris, in obedience unto the commands of Cyrus, began thus.

The Hiſtory of Seſoſtris and Timareta.

SIR,

TO inform you rightly concerning Seſoſtris, and the cauſe of his misfortunes, I muſt not only relate the Hiſtory of his Life, but his Fathers alſo; and I muſt exactly bring in the ſtory of all Egypt in general, as well as his in particular: So far is the original and ſource of his misfortunes fetched. Therefore, I beſeech you, Sir, do not wonder if I begin my diſcourſe with things which at firſt ſight ſeem impertinent unto my diſcourſe, yet by the ſequel you ſhall find that they are eſſentially neceſſary. I beſeech you alſo, Sir, give me leave to relate many things particularly which Fame doubtleſs hath already brought unto your ears; yet it is impoſſible you ſhould perfectly underſtand the adventures which have dependency upon them, ſince it is not credible your Infancy could be capable of them; nor indeed poſſible in your riper years, that the Conquerour of all Aſia ſhould have ſo much leiſure from his illuſtrious Conqueſt, as to enquire of all the paſſages in Africa. Give me leave to tell you then, Sir, that Seſoſtris is the Son of Apriez, that Renowned, but unfortunate King, who after a long and happy Reign, brought home ſo many glorious advantages from the Wars with Tyre and Sidon, was at laſt thrown out of his Throne. This Apriez boaſts of his deſcent from the Race of the firſt Seſoſtris, ſo famous for his Virtues and Victories: For Pſammethicus his great Grandfather was ſo. 'Tis true, this Prince from whom Apriez deſcended, was himſelf ſufficiently adorned with glory, without any derivatives from his Predeceſſors, ſince it was he who had the honour to defeat eleven Kings, or rather ſo many Tyrants, which during a vacancy upon the Throne, divided all the Kingdom into ſo many illegitimate powers. This is, Sir, the extraction of Seſoſtris: And I know, Sir, you will wonder when I tell you that Amaſis, who this day Reigns in Egypt, hath a Son of Apriez, and a Son who commands all the Forces of Amaſis, Conquerour of the late King his Father: But, Sir, if you will be pleaſed to lend as much patience as to hear me, your wonder will vaniſh, and all that which did ſeem incredible, will eaſily be believed. To return then unto the ſource of Seſoſtris his misfortunes, it is expedient, as I ſaid before, to acquaint you with the misfortunes of the King his Father; and afterwards tell you how Amaſis came unto the Throne, for theſe are the hinges of all the Hiſtory. I have already told you, Sir, how happily Apriez reigned: happy in Wars, happy in peace, and as happy alſo in his marriage, not only in a Princeſs of moſt admirable beauty and virtue, but alſo in a ſon born the firſt year of her marriage: a ſon who from his very cradle ſeemed to be what you ſee him at this day; and all the interim of his infancy was full of illuſtrious hopes. Thus was Apriez the happieſt of all the Kings upon Earth, Maſter of the moſt abundant of rich Kingdoms in the World; never was Egypt in ſweeter tranquility, never did the Floods of Nilus make our fields more fertile, and never was the Monarchy more firmly eſtabliſhed than it ſeemed to be at that time: Yet, Sir, this Serenity was quickly overclowded; but that you may the better ſee which way the gods did bring it about, be pleaſed to know, that Amaſis (who at this day reigns, and whoſe birth was more noble than his enemies report) was then in the Court, harbouring ſo much ambition ſecretly in his heart, as ſeldom did ſuffer him to be in reſt. There was in the Court at the ſame time, a Princeſs, whoſe name was Ladice, who had been married, who being a Widdow, obtained the Queens favour, and conſequently the Kings, for it is the cuſtom of Egypt, that all Husbands do in general reſpect their Wives, and eſpecially Kings their Queens, grounding this laudable cuſtom upon the excellent example of Oſiris, who was infinitely uxorious unto Iſis; and this way Ladice, poſſeſſing the heart of the Queen, was in great credit with the King; and as thoſe in favour are always looked upon, ſo Amaſis whoſe ſpirit was as great as his ambition, perceiving the power which Ladice had with the Queen, began to apply himſelf unto her more than any other, before her favour was much divulged in the world; to the end he might perſwade this Princeſs, that this was not the reaſon why he ſaw her more than he was accuſtomed: For Amaſis being of a penetrating ſpirit, and knowing the humours both of the Queen and Ladice, though the favours of this Princeſs were at firſt but ſmall in ſhew, yet he foreſaw that undoubtedly they would augment, and therefore to ſet a better price upon his ſervices, he began betimes to declare himſelf to be a devoted friend unto Ladice: and indeed this Princeſs, who was extreamly pleaſed with the ſpirit of Amaſis, was not long before ſhe became his friend as much as he hers, and more, for he loved her becauſe of her favour, and ſhe loved him only in reſpect of his merit and perſon. In the mean time, when Amaſis ſaw he was not miſtaken in his conjectures, but that Ladice did grow more and more in favour, the better to cloak his ambition, he made the Princeſs think he loved her, and ſo handſomly managed the matter, that ſhe was not angry with him for it: I will not tell you, Sir, which way he diſcovered his paſſion to her, nor how Ladice accepted it, becauſe I intend not a relation of his or her hiſtory: only this, that Ladice being both fair and a favourite, all the men of any quality in the Court, did apply themſelves to ſerve her, ſo that ſhe neither accepting nor rejecting any of them, ſhe was abſolute Miſtreſs of the hearts of all the Grandees of Egypt: and ſince this Princeſs did love the State, ſhe made uſe of their loves, as well as her beauty and favour, to keep them from any rebellions in the Kingdom, and inſeparably to unite them unto the King's intereſt: and the truth is, ſhe did negotiate with ſo much wiſdom and generoſity, that ſhe merited eternal glory, for ſhe did diſſipate ſeveral factions, ſhattered many confederacies and plots, and reduced them all unto the King's obedience. In the mean time Amaſis, who in the eyes of all the world ſeemed only the friend of Ladice, did really become her Lover, and a Lover loved, becauſe ſhe had a belief that he was the only man who loved her, in conſideration of her perſon, and not of her favour, not knowing that his ſoul was filled fuller of ſecret ambition, than it was of love: yet did ſhe find ſome difficulties in the matter, for there was then no ſuitable Proportion between Amaſis and his Rivals, nor between him and her ſelf; yet notwithſtanding, ſince ſhe did moſt paſſionately love him, and thought her ſelf obliged; and ſince he courted her with unequal reſpects, and had ſerved the King in many occaſions with much fidelity, ſince he got much glory in the War with Tyre and Sydon, and ſince her inclination prompted her to prefer him before all the World, and ſince her ſoul was diſengaged from all others, ſhe could with more eaſe overcome all other obſtacles, and reſolve to marry him, if ſhe could have any infallible aſſurance that thoſe who then courted her, and whom ſhe kept from diſturbing the ſtate, would not renew all their factions, eſpecially at that time when the King was ingaged in a war with the Cyrenians: But Amaſis being in great favour, and knowing all her thoughts, and all the impediments of his happineſs, he redoubled his courtſhip and ſuit for ſome further aſſurances of her affection; for ſince he ſaw a neceſſity of his going to the Wars with the King, and knew that ſome of his Rivals would ſtay behind with the Queen, he feared leſt in his abſence Ladice ſhould change her mind, ſo that ſeeming deſperate, he told her abſolutely he would not go with the Army, that he had rather loſe his honour, than hazard the loſs of her affection; and was ſo reſolute in his expreſſions, that indeed ſhe thought he would not go. However, Sir, Ladice loving Amaſis very well, and having reſolved to marry him aſſoon as this War was ended, this ambitious Lover found it no knotty matter to win her unto a marriage in ſecret: And indeed Ladice's heart being as full of Love, as the heart of this ſecret Lover was full of ambition; a few days after the King's departure they were married privately in a little Church, without any other witneſſes but the officers of the Ceremony, except one of her women, in whom ſhe truſted: By this means Amaſis was in a quality to enjoy the benefit of Ladice's favour, which he deſired more than the enjoyment of her beauty: However, Amaſis went now to the Army, and was husband to the fair Ladice: But to put her ſelf into a condition of publiſhing her marriage after the War, ſhe procured the King by the Queen's mediation to make him one of his Lieutenant Generals, his fidelity and courage being the pretence of her ſuit, though it ſeemed ſomething extraordinary to the Queen, yet the Queen condeſcended unto it. In the mean while this War wanted a plauſible gloſs, for it was ſaid Apriez did make it, only to ſecure the Grandees of his Dominions, leſt they ſhould ruffle into a civil War; however the beginning was proſperous enough, Amaſis performed very conſiderable ſervices, he won the hearts of the ſouldiers, and was Maſter of the Army: whenſoever Apriez encountered with his enemies, he bafled them; ſo that though no main battel had been yet fought, yet there was enough done to get a reputation unto his Army, and ſtrike a terrour into the enemies countrey. This being the ſtate of things, Apriez gave Amaſis the command of ten Thouſand men in his Army, with them to aſſault the enemies upon another ſide, thereby to ſeparate their Forces, and then more eaſily to conquer them: but things did not ſucceed according to his deſign, for the Cyrenians would not divide themſelves, ſo that not ſeparating their Army, they did that which Apriez would have done, which was, they forced him to fight and vanquiſhed him: his Army was ſo abſolutely defeated, that he was forced to return unto Sais, where he left his Queen, and where he arrived full of ſhame and ſorrows; for he had not only loſt the Battel, but the loſs of Blood was ſo much, that it put all Egypt into mourning. Apriez in his return to Sais, ſent for Amaſis to come unto him, and commanded him to draw off thoſe Forces under his command from the enemies country, and keep them upon the frontiers; leaving order unto the other Lieutenant Generals, to rally as many as they could of his ſhattered Army: Amaſis obeying the King, was very glad he had no ſhare in the diſhonour in this defeat, and that he was able to tell Ladice that he had done nothing unworthy of the honour ſhe did him. In the mean time, the loſs of this Battel cauſed a general revolt in all Egypt, both people and Souldiers began to murmur, and an univerſal report went all over, that Apriez did ſuffer himſelf voluntarily to be vanquiſhed; that he divided his Army purpoſely to ruin ſome Grandees of his Dominions, whom he thought did trouble him, hoping after that to reign more imperiouſly over them, and become more Tyrannical. However, Sir, whether the Souldiers ſpoke this from themſelves, or from the inſtigation of Amaſis; it is moſt certain, that all the rallied troops, with thoſe which Amaſis brought upon the frontiers, did ſeem to revolt, and make head againſt their Prince: Apriez no ſooner heard this, but to calm this mutiny, reſolved to ſend Amaſis to the Army, looking upon him as a plauſible man with the Souldiers, and faithful unto him. Amaſis accepting of this commiſſion, prepared to go unto the Army; but before he went, Ladice uſued all her perſwaſions and arguments which could move him to do the King and his Country good ſervice upon this occaſion; adding unto all her prayers, that if he could at this time pacifie the Army, and by conſequence all Egypt, ſhe would then acquaint both the King and the Queen with her marriage, who could not poſſibly diſapprove of it, after ſuch a conſiderable ſervice. But, Sir, ſince Amaſis married Ladice more for ambition than love, he could not keep within thoſe limits which this generous Princeſs preſcribed him: yet, when he came firſt unto the Army, he began to do like a faithful ſubject; and I am perſwaded, whate're his enemies ſay, that then he had none but good intentions, and as ambitious as he was, would have made himſelf a fortune by noble ways: He drew up all his Army into Battallia, and calling all the officers together he ſhewed them their fault, and the injuſtice of their proceedings. But whilſt he was thus ſpeaking unto them, an Egyptian took a Helmet, and putting it upon the head of Amaſis, as is uſed at the coronation of our Kings; let me put thee into the poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Egypt (ſaid the Souldier unto him) and talk no more to us of obeying Apriez, for we will not have a King that hath been conquered. The inſolent ſpeech of this Souldier, being prompted unto it by many others, was ſeconded by a general acclamation; ſo that Amaſis ſaw it was in his choice whether he would be King or no. This rouſing up the ambition of his ſoul, he conſulted not with generoſity, or reaſon, or glory, which forbids any to reign by unjuſt ways, but did blindly, and totally ſubmit unto his ambition: Yet at firſt he rejected the propoſition, but yet ſo faintly, and after ſuch a manner as made all the Souldiers ſecond their acclamations, and ſay Amaſis muſt be their Soveraign. Then, Sir, Amaſis began to ſpeak as a man who was forced to receive the Soveraign power, yet he would not directly take upon him the Quality of a King; but told them that to acknowledge their confidence in him he would be their Protector, and promiſed never to leave them until he had obtained their pardon, and alſo new Priviledges: But the more Amaſis excuſed himſelf, the more violent were all the Officers and Souldiers, who all unanimouſly ſaid they would have him to by their King. However Amaſis diſpatched a meſſenger to the Court, and to let Apriez know how ſorry he was for this accident; aſſuring him, that he would not ſeem to accept of any part of this power which the Souldiers gave him, but only to reduce them unto obedience: But at the ſame time he ſent one of his ſervants ſecretly unto the Princeſs Ladice, conjuring her to retire from the Court, and to come and receive a Crown which the gods by his hand did offer her. In the mean time the King was advertiſed by ſome faithful Officers of the Army how things paſſed, and he grew into ſuch a choler againſt Amaſis, that in lieu of diſſembling his reſentments, he railed againſt him as a Rebel, and diſpatched a man of good Quality, named Paterbenis with orders to joyn with ſome few Officers who were faithful, and to ſeize upon the perſon of Amaſis, or elſe kill him if they could not take him. On the other ſide, Ladice, who was truly generous, and did extreamly diſapprove of his manner of acting, though ſhe did extreamly love Amaſis, yet ſhe ſent him word, that ſhe was ſo far from removing away from the Court, or participating of his Crime, as ſhe would declare, that if he did not quickly return unto his duty, ſhe would become his moſt mortal Enemy: Yet did ſhe endeavour to gloſs the matter at Court as much as ſhe could; but all in vain; for Apriez being reſolved already upon his courſe, diſpatched Paterbenis with his Commiſſion, yet it took not ſucceſs; for as ſecret as it was carried, Amaſis did know it: So that when Paterbenis came to the Camp, he found him he was already acquainted with the buſineſs of his voyage. When he came unto him, he found him buſie in exhorting the Souldiers to draw up into Battalia, and to defend his life which Apriez would take from him by ſome amongſt them. Paterbenes coming to him as Amaſis was thus buſied, he reſolved to ſpeak unto him as if the King did credit all which Amaſis told him, and as if he did not ſuſpect his fidelity; to the end he might gain more time to plot with thoſe Officers of the Army who advertiſed Apriez of the truth: But Amaſis knowing the cauſe of his coming, gave him no time to talk: No, no, Paterbenis, ſaid he unto him, Diſſemble not that which I know as well as your ſelf; You come with intentions to carry my head unto Apriez, but I cannot believe theſe Souldiers who Crowned it will ſuffer you; therefore I adviſe you to return immediately, and tell that Prince who ſent you, that if he defend his Crown as well as I ſhall my head, I ſhall not be King a long while. Paterbenis would have replyed unto this bold language, but there was ſuch an acclamation amongſt the Souldiers at the anſwer of Amaſis, as the Meſſenger ſaw his beſt courſe was to return; for the Souldiers began to threaten him with inſolent menaces. Paterbenis then returned to Sais, where Apriez was in his ſtately Palace which he had newly built; yet he found but faint entertainment from him; for this unfortunate King ſeeing the ill ſucceſs of his voyage, believed he did comply with Amaſis, ſo that upon the information of ſome Souldiers who followed him, who affirmed that if he had ſtayed a little longer in the Army, there had been a mutiny, he did not only arreſt him, but put him to death. This haſty and violent death did ruin Apriez; for Paterbenis being a man of much integrity and known honeſty to all the world, the people of Sais did exceedingly murmur at it. All the friends of Amaſis fearing the like treatment from the King, ſince he was capable of ſo unjuſt an act, did take their friends part, and went unto him, and amongſt the reſt, the Father of Heracleon: So that in leſs than a moneth, Amaſis had a formidable Army which ſtill did every day encreaſe from all the Provinces of Egypt. In the mean time, the heart of Amaſis was very reſtleſs; love of Ladice did ſtrive with his ambition, yet could not vanquiſh it, and ſo much the leſs, becauſe his marriage with her being not known, ſhe was in leſs danger of Apriez his violence; but alas, this unfortunate Princeſs was much to be lamented; for ſhe was not only forced to ſeparate from her dearly loved Amaſis, but ſhe perceived ſhe was with child, and conſequently muſt tell the Queen (whom ſhe tenderly loved, and who tenderly loved her) that ſhe was Wife to him who would pull her from the Throne. Being put to this extremity, ſhe conſulted with all her thoughts and endeavours how to win Amaſis unto repentance; and in order to that, ſhe ſent to acquaint Amaſis with her condition; and after a thouſand moſt tender and perſwaſive arguments and invitations, ſhe ſent to tell him, that if he would not condeſend unto her deſires, ſhe would acquaint the King how ſhe was his wife, and ſhared in his crime, and ſo conſequently, the next news he ſhould hear, would doubtleſs be, that he had loſt both a Wife and a Child; ſince it was not probable, but he who put to death the innocent, would take the ſame courſe with the Wife of an Uſurper who confeſſed her ſelf culpable. But all the perſwaſions and threats of Ladice were in vain: For Amaſis did think that the Queen loved her better than to ſee her periſh, and that Ladice was wiſer than to accuſe her ſelf, and therefore he ſent her word, that he thought himſelf unworthy of that honour which ſhe had done him, unleſs he purſued his deſign, and ſet her upon a Throne. To that end he cauſed it to be proclaimed, that he was deſcended from the Line of the firſt Kings of Egypt, from whom the Predeceſſors of Apriez had uſurped the Soveraign Power: So that to give ſome colourable gloſs to his rotten cauſe, he made it paſs for good, and ſtrengthned himſelf the more: Apriez, ſeeing himſelf forſaken of his own Subjects, and particularly of Heracleon's Father who was a man of great power, made uſe of ſome Auxiliary Forces; The Ionians, the Carians, and ſome other Aſiatick people, raiſed him thirty thouſand men; ſo that being in the head of this Army, he went out of Says with reſolutions to fight. One thing is here obſervable, which never perhaps was ſeen before; the right King of Egypt had not one Egyptian in his Army, which was compoſed of all Strangers; and on the contrary, all the Army of the Uſurper was compoſed of natural Subjects, who fought againſt their right King. In the mean time, the miſerable Ladice having not power to execute the meſſage ſhe ſent unto Amaſis, hoping ſtill to move his heart, ſhe remained in unconceivable ſorrows: for ſhe knew, that had not ſhe been a Mediator for him, he could never have arrived at that paſs: So that looking upon her ſelf as the only cauſe of his crime, of her Countrys deſolation, and of the States ruin, there was not a day but ſhe deſired death. Nor did ſhe know what ſhe ſhould ask from the gods: But ever reſigning her ſelf unto their will, ſhe waited for the ſucceſs of War with more reſtleſsneſs of mind than did the Queen. Seſoſtris her only ſon was then ſome four or five years old, but his innocency could not prevent the Fate of his Father, for the more unjuſt ſide was the more fortunate: But not to ſtay you too long, Sir, in this part of my ſtory, I ſhall only in a few words tell you, how the Army of Apriez, and that of Amaſis joyning near Memphis, where thoſe high aſpiring Pyramids look over all the reſt of Egypt, this fatal Battel to Apriez was loſt: At the firſt encounter he was wounded, and a while after taken; and laſtly, in a moſt ſtrange manner, loſt his life: for thoſe into whoſe hands he fell, diſagreeing who ſhould have the honour of preſenting him unto Amaſis, did quarrel amongſt themſelves amidſt a Battel, and that with ſo much rage and fury, that one of them thinking his ſide the weaker, did deſperately turn towards this unfortunate King who ſtood in the midſt of them, and with an unexampled inhumanity killed him, rather than his companions ſhould enjoy that advantage which he could not get himſelf. Thus, Sir, you ſee how this miſerable King loſt both his life and Kingdom, and upon what Title Amaſis came unto it. You may imagine how ſad this news was unto the Queen, when ſhe heard her Husband had loſt both

Kingdom and life, and conſequently, the young Seſoſtris the Crown. But how great ſoever her ſorrows were, yet were they leſs than the Generoſity of Ladice, who could never enjoy any comfort in being the Wife of an Uſurper. This ſad Queen endeavoured all ſhe could to move the people of Sais unto fidelity, and oppoſe Amaſis; but the hatred of the Inhabitants againſt Apriez was ſo high, as that they were ſo far from doing as ſhe deſired, though it was in a little River of Tears, ſhewing unto them her young Son, that they mutined afreſh, and would all take the ſtronger ſide: So that this deplorable Queen, fearing they would ſeiſe upon her perſon, and her young Son, was forced to fly the Town in the night, and to retire with a very ſmall number unto a ſtrong Caſtle which was ſome thirty furlongs from Sais; as ſhe had reſolved from the firſt in caſe of neceſſity. As ſhe was ready to depart, accompanied with her dear Ladice, there came a Meſſenger from Amaſis to the Princeſs his Wife, to tell her of his Victory, and alſo to will her not to engage her ſelf in the misfortunes of the Queen, unto whom for her ſake, he would leave a Province in Egypt upon condition ſhe would put the young Seſoſtris in his hands. Ladice no ſooner heard this propoſition, but ſhe exclamed againſt Amaſis, and told the Meſſenger whatſoever the Queen could deſire. Go (ſaid ſhe unto him) and tell Amaſis, that I was born a Subject unto a King before I was his Wife; and my being married could not diſoblige me from my firſt duty, nor ever ſhall, unleſs he will reſtore unto the young Seſoſtris that Crown which he uſurped from the unfortunate Apriez: After which, not ſuffering him to ſpeak a word more, ſhe went unto the Queen, who ſtayed for her to depart. Never was flight more happy than this; for the Queen was no ſooner out of the Town, but the people were in her houſe, to execute that order which Amaſis had ſent by him who ſpoke to Ladice; which order was, that the Inhabitants ſhould be in Arms, and ſecure the perſons of the Queen of Seſoſtris, and Ladice. But the gods, who doubtleſs were pleaſed to preſerve Seſoſtris, moved this Envoy of Amaſis to ſpeak unto Ladice, before he did unto the Inhabitants.

Thus this young Prince, and theſe two unfortunate Princeſſes eſcaped from the Victory of Amaſis, This great Queen was alſo ſo happy in her flight, that none of them knew which way ſhe went: But ſince they could not be ignorant long, Ladice, who would not be delivered in a houſe which might come into the hands of Amaſis, adviſed the Queen not to ſtay in it, but to go further off where they ſhould not be ſo ſoon found: And ſo they did. But alas, theſe two Princeſſes had not ſooner any leaſure to reckon up the ſum of their preſent miſeries, and lament them together, but they were given to underſtand that all took part with the Conquerour; that high and low Eyypt did both of them acknowledge his power, and that all the Provincial Towns ſent their Deputies to promiſe fidelity: That Sais, Thebes, Memphis, Bubaſtis, Sienna, Buſiris, Canope, and Aniſis did ſubmit: and that Amaſis was Maſter of all Egypt, except Elephantine, which yet took time of conſideration. They underſtood, that all the Calaſires and Hermobites (for ſo we call the Noblemen amongſt us) did obey him without murmur, becauſe they all hoped Amaſis would let them have more power than they had under Apriez. So that ſeeing no hopes of any relief from any ſide, the Queen was in the moſt deplorable condition of any in the world: From the ſterile Deſarts of Lybia ſhe could expect no relief, which is on the Weſt ſide of Egypt; on the South, the Cataracts of Nilus and the Mountains block up all Paſſes; and on the Eaſt, doubtleſs, Sir, you know the vaſt Fenns along that Province which is called Barathra, and which ſeparates Syria from Egypt, do hinder the march of any Troops; and on the North ſide, the ways are all inacceſſible; neither could the Queen expect any relief from the Ionians, nor the Carians, who loſt all their Forces at the laſt Battel: Egypt within was all revolted, ſo that ſhe had no way but to fly, or dye. This great Queen had a man with her, whoſe name was Amenophis, Brother unto my Mother, a man of extraordinary ſpirit and virtue, brought up in the houſe of the late King, whoſe fidelity was well known unto the Queen, and Ladice, and unto whom he was a profeſſed friend: Amenophis, to chear up the courage of the Queen, and to perſwade her to ſubmit her ſelf unto the pleaſure of the gods for better fortune,adviſed her to think of no courſe, conſidering the ſtate of things, but how to hide her ſelf, and the Prince Seſoſtris, and to ſee whether tract of time would alter the face of things. The Queen then referring the conduct of her ſelf unto the prudence of Amenophis; he reſolved for Elephantine, which yet had not totally ſubmitted. But, Sir, be pleaſed to know, that when the Battel was fought, the River Nilus began to riſe, ſo that when the Queen took a reſolution to quit that place where ſhe was, to ſeek a ſanctuary further off, this River, according to its cuſtom, over-flowed all the Country, ſo that ſhe was forced to change the place as much out of neceſſity as reaſon; for when this Deluge was at the height, all Egypt was water, unleſs Hills, and Towns built upon them, which ſeemed like little Iſlands, and the Campaigne like Sea at that time about them. Amenophis then provided a Boat to tranſport this deplorable company: And as this ſwelling of Nilus did on the one ſide trouble them, ſo on the other, it kept them from falling into the power of Amaſis, who by reaſon of this Inundation could not ſend any Troops from Says, nor make any exact ſearch for the Princeſſes. But, I beſeech you, Sir, imagine a little not only in what a pitiful condition the Queen, and the young Prince her Son were, but alſo in what a ſad caſe that unhappy Ladice was: For ſince ſhe now grew big, though it was not perceived, yet ſince ſhe was to go with the Queen to juſtifie her ſelf, ſhe muſt needs tell that ſhe was Wife unto Amaſis. However, ſhe was reſolved not to forſake her, nor did not: Amenophis having provided all things neceſſary for fifteen days, they imbarqued from the place where they were, though the houſe was not near water when the River was within its Channel. Their Boat at one end had a Cabin covered with Canvas; under which was the Queen, Seſoſtris, Ladice, and two women of the Queens: At the other end was Amenophis, two Servants, and the Rowers. Imagine, Sir, in what a condition this Queen was, who of a great Kingdom had nothing left but a little Cock-boat, in danger to periſh by the impetuoſity of the Nile, by the

Crocodiles, by the Hypopothames, and a thouſand moſt horrid Monſters wherewith that River is filled: which way ſoever they looked, they could ſee nothing but water, which was making the land of her enemies fertile, if ſhe caſt her eyes upon poor Seſoſtris, they ſwam in tears, to ſee in his face ſo many ſigns of grandure in ſo deſpicable a fortune, and to find ſo many ſymptomes of a great heart in ſo tender an age, for he was not at all diſmaid at the toſſing of the waves, and bounding of the Boat: Thus this miſerable Queen, not knowing which way to look for any conſolation, turned towards her dear Ladice; but in lieu of finding any in her eyes, ſhe ſaw them ſwim in tears, and full of ſo much melancholy, that her own was more augmented, Amenophis only was he who gave her ſome comfort: However, the River Nile was not ſo troubleſome as ſhe apprehended, becauſe it was not ſo great where ſhe croſſed, as it was in the Province of Delta, whoſe ſcituation is very low, and nothing to be ſeen but the form of this Greek Letter, whoſe name it carries; ſo that after eight or ten days rowing, they found ſome Towns where they might refreſh and reſt themſelves in the night. I forgot to tell you, Sir, that the Queen, Seſoſtris, and Ladice had no ſuch ſigns of greatneſs in their garments, leſt they ſhould be known; and truly I think they needed no diſguiſement, for though the habit of a Queen and a Shepherd be very different, yet ſorrows had ſo changed the countenances of theſe Princeſſes, that they were leſs knowable than any diſguiſe of garments could make them; only they had all their Jewels about them, in caſe of need. But, Sir, I have ſo many things to relate, that I ſhall not ſpend any time in telling you, how they were twice in danger of drowning, by certain Winds, which blow always when the Nile is high, they are called the Eteſian Winds, and I have ſo many other things to relate which will move your pity, that I ſhall not meddle with this: But let me tell you, Sir, that after all imaginable impediments of this dangerous Voyage, they came at laſt into a Town, ſcituated upon a high Hill, and with works to repulſe the waves, which is not above ſixty furlongs from Elephantine; in this place Amenophis heard how that Town was at laſt reſolved to obey Amaſis, and that deputies were going to ſwear fealty to their new King. Thus after a long and dangerous voyage, hoping to find a place of Sanctuary, the Queen was loaded with a new burthen of ſorrows, ſo that ſhe had no way now but to hide her ſelf: But the better to do ſo, they muſt not go unto Elephantine, and therefore the Queen conſulted with Amenophis, who was well acquainted with that Country, and upon better thoughts he remembered a Shepherd of his acquaintance, whoſe Father heretofore ſerved his, and who dwelt in a very ſolitary place and pleaſant, where the Queen might be both ſafe and convenient: ſo that without more ado, they went that way, and the next morning came to a little Iſle, which doubtleſs the gods did purpoſely create for a Sanctuary and place of retreat unto this great Princeſs: for, Sir, I am confident that nature never framed ſuch a place as this; it is about fifteen or ſixteen furlongs in length, and ſomething oval, in the midſt of it is an high hill, where one may retire when Nilus is high, and where the paſtures are only inhabited by Shepherds, in Cabines, this hill is full of Sicomores, whoſe ſhadow is very delightful, and at the foot of it unto the River banks, are meadows, ſo thick, ſo freſh, ſo ſweet, and fair, as it ſeemed to be a moſt fertile land: a million of water-trees did ſhadow theſe pleaſant meadows in divers places, and as if the gods had deſigned that thoſe who inhabit it ſhould not be diſcovered by paſſengers in Boats, it is ſet round about with a thick and high hedge of Oſiers, and roſe-trees, which grow ſo cloſe to the water, and adorn it, and as if it did both invite and forbid an entrance unto all thoſe that came unto it, all the Roſe-trees were intermingled with a kind of wild Lillies, which grow along the River Nilus, and whoſe odour perfumes the whole Iſle. This, Sir, was the pleaſant deſart which ſerved for a Sanctuary and retreat unto the Queen. Amenophis was no ſooner landed, but he went to ſeek him who he knew lived there, and having found him, he diſpoſed him to entertain ſome perſons which fled from the perſecution of the new King, yet not telling who they were, though he enjoyned cloſe ſecrecy: then they went unto his houſe which was the greateſt and neareſt in all the Iſle, which had not above ten or twelve in all, and they ſo ſeparated one from another, that they might eaſily go in and out undiſcovered by any: he found this Shepherd had wit enough, but ſomething covetous, which fault the more pleaſed Amenophis, who having wherewith to ſatisfie the humour of the man, thought he would make him very faithful to the Queen; and indeed he was ſo, for he never ſpoke a word unto any of the reſt in the Iſle; ſince it was late when they landed, none did diſcover them, all the Shepherds being buſie in driving their flocks unto their folds, ſo that Amenophis had all that night to inſtruct his Shepherd, whoſe name was Traſeas, a married man, whoſe Wife was called Nicetis: he told them then (after a good reward in hand, and large promiſes of more if they were faithful) his beſt courſe was to ſay unto the reſt of the Shepherds, that theſe people in his houſe were forced out of their homes by the floods, which when it was paſſed would return, and in the mean time ſtay here, that they dwelt beyond Elephantine: Since they were already ſufficiently diſguiſed, they ſtood in need of no great change of Garments; the men which rowed the Boat were kept there for the wafting of their two ſervants into any Town to fetch ſuch things as they needed: So that this little retreat for its tranquility, did ſo ſatisfie the Queen, that ſhe hoped the gods would preſerve Seſoſtris for ſome better fortune: but yet the ſighs and tears of Ladice redoubled; for ſeeing ſhe muſt make known her Marriage unto the Queen, unleſs ſhe would diſhonour her ſelf in her opinion, ſhe reſolved upon it the third day they came into the Iſle: As ſhe was then in the morning with this Princeſs, who never ſtirred out of her Cabin ſince ſhe came into it, ſhe began to conjure her with a flood of tears in her eyes, to promiſe not to hate her after ſhe had acquainted her with a buſineſs: Such language unuſual did ſurpriſe the Queen, who knowing no poſſible cauſe why ſhe ſhould hate Ladice, promiſed ſhe would not, in the preſence of Amenophis, and proteſted ſhe would love her as long as ſhe lived, let her ſay what ſhe would. Then this unhappy

Princeſs began to acquaint her in few words, but many perplexities, many ſighs and tears, with her Marriage unto Amaſis, and the condition ſhe was in: And in ſuch moving manner as would have inſpired pity into the moſt barbarous heart. No, no, Madam (ſaid Ladice unto her, after ſhe had made a full relation) you are not obliged to keep promiſe with the Wife of an Uſurper; and I repent that I did ask it of you: Hate me, hate me, as you ought to do the Wife of your Enemy, though truly I am at this preſent a moſt mortal enemy unto him, nor will ever pretend unto any greatneſs which Amaſis hath gotten by unjuſt ways, and do ſo horridly hate his action, that I do not only hate him, but my ſelf alſo. In the mean time, Madam, if your ſorrows can find any ſatisfaction by taking revenge of Amaſis upon my perſon, do it, I conjure you: For ſince he hath ſo much ſlighted my prayers and deſires, I think he cares not for my life, therefore I refer it unto your diſpoſition: I ask no other favour from you, but to think me innocent; and that if I could, I would pull the Scepter out of the hands of Amaſis, and give it unto Seſoſtris, though I were a ſlave all the days of my life. Ladice having told her tale in ſo ſad a manner, the Queen as generous as ſhe, began to anſwer her with a kiſs; for ſhe could not poſſibly expreſs her wonder at the virtue of this Princeſs, who had voluntarily exiled her ſelf, rather than to reign unjuſtly: But after her ſpirits were a little recollected, ſhe began to comfort her, and tell her ſhe would love her as well as before, and much better. Amenophis did ſecond the Queen with all the comforts he could, and gave her as many praiſes as ſhe deſerved; but ſhe did reject all applauds in ſo generous a manner, as did more and more tender the heart of the Queen. After this, the ſorrows of this Princeſs ſwelled her heart ſo full, that ſhe fell ſick, and ſo ſick, as ſhe died the third day: But in loſing her life, ſhe gave it unto a Daughter, which was a moſt perfect Miracle of Beauty. But, Sir, ſince the death of Ladice was no leſs generous than her life, I muſt needs relate in few words the particulars of it. After that ſhe had brought to light this fair Daughter, whoſe life was as extraordinary as her birth, and that ſhe perceived ſhe could not live, to loſe no precious time, ſhe called for Pen, Ink, and Paper, and writ theſe words unto Amaſis.

Dying Ladice unto Ambitious Amaſis.

SInce I have but one quarter of an hour to live, I have not time to ſay much unto you, but know that I leave you a Daughter which perhaps you ſhall never ſee, if you do not reſtore the Crown unto young Seſoſtris: and I think my ſelf happy, that in dying I have left ſome pawn in his hands, I wiſh unto the gods that you could ſee me dye; for perhaps it would cool that Ambitious paſſion which hath cauſed the death of Ladice.

After the Princeſs had read over her Letter, ſhe gave it unto Amenophis, deſiring him to keep it carefully, and to make uſe of it when he ſaw fit: Afterwards turning towards the Queen, ſhe implored her pardon in beſeeching her to preſerve the life of this Daughter unto Amaſis, becauſe as long as ſhe was in her power, ſhe might perhaps give ſome ſtop unto the Ambition of the Father. The truth is, Sir, this unfortunate Princeſs ſpoke unto the Queen, as if ſhe wiſhed life unto her Daughter only for love of her, and as if ſhe had loſt that natural affection which is in all Mothers, which is, to wiſh life unto their children for the loves ſake which they bear unto them. The Queen was extreamly moved to ſee the Princeſs in ſuch a condition, and aſſured her, that ſhe would not look upon this Child as the daughter of Amaſis, but as the daughter of Ladice, and conſequently would have as great care of her as of her own: after this aſſurance, Ladice thanked the Queen, with eyes ſwimming in tears; then neglecting all worldly cares, her thoughts were all addreſſed unto the gods, yet not with one prayer for either Amaſis or her daughter, but only for the Queen and young Seſoſtris, after which ſhe dyed. You may imagine that there was no very great Pomp at her Funeral, which indeed was with no more Ceremony than if ſhe were ſome Shepherd's Daughter of the Iſle, leſt there ſhould ariſe ſome ſuſpicion of them: However, Nicetis was careful in nurſing of Ladice's daughter, who was called Timareta: The firſt days, after the death of this generous Princeſs, were ſpent in lamenting her loſs; but afterwards, the Queen conforming her mind unto an accident, againſt which there was no remedy, adviſed with Amenophis what was beſt to be done with Ladice's Letter: Amenophis conſidering the caſe of things, could not believe that Amaſis would reſtore the Crown unto Seſóſtris, at the requeſt of dying Ladice, for ſince he could not moderate his ambitious paſſion at her conjurations, and at a time when he knew not whether the ſucceſs would be good or bad, certainly he would not hearken to her when he was in full poſſeſſion; nor was it credible, that to get out of the Queens hands a young daughter newly born, he would part with a Scepter; but perhaps when he hears of Ladice's death, he will enter into a new fury, and add revenge unto his ambition, imagining they were the cauſe of Ladice's death; furthermore he thought that it was to be feared when Ladice's Letter was delivered, Amaſis might come to know where Seſoſtris was; therefore his advice was to keep the Letter until ſuch time as they were able to raiſe a party in the State. The Queen then approving of this advice, thought upon nothing but how to conceal her ſelf and her Son; but this care laſted not long; for, Sir, ſince Nilus was faln into his accuſtomed channel, there did ariſe from the ground certain vapours, which that Year cauſed a contagion in the Town of Elephantine, which did depopulate almoſt all the Town, and was brought into this little Iſle, by thoſe two men which went in the Boat to fetch them neceſſaries; but theſe two men were not alone which loſt their lives, for almoſt all the inhabitants of the Iſle did the like, and thoſe who did not fled; Amenophis had fled for company, if the Queen had not faln ſick and dyed, with the two women with her; as ſoon as Amenophis ſaw the Queen ſick, he reſolved to ſtay with her, but ſent away Seſoſtris with the Wife of a Shepherd, and Timareta with her nurſe, into one of thoſe Cabins which were upon the top of the Hill, which not being inhabited, was not infected with ſo bad an air, and by this means he ſaved the life of the young Seſoſtris: This horrible infection could not laſt long in the Iſle, for there was ſo few people in it that it was almoſt quite depopulated, either by death or flight of the inhabitants: But the moſt lamentable paſſage was, that the Queen and her women died in four days, ſo that Amenophis was left alone in the Iſle, with Seſoſtris, Traſeas, Nicetis, Timareta her nurſe, and one ſervant. Seeing then the ſtate of things, Amenophis thought it beſt to keep the Iſle ſtill, it being more ſafe by this accident than before, and more eaſie to hide the young Seſoſtris in a depopulated deſart, than when it was peopled; and thoſe who fled were ſo affrighted, that they durſt not return, and thoſe who were there, thought Seſoſtris to be the Son of Amenophis, whom they thought a Shepherd, and that Timareta was daughter to Traſeas and Nicetis. In the mean while Amenophis conſidering the ſtate of things, could not hope to attempt any thing openly againſt Amaſis; therefore he reſolved to wait ſome favourable conjuncture, when he might ſafely ſhew the young Seſoſtris unto the people, and that they might know him to be their Prince when occaſion was; he took extraordinary care for his education, as well as that ſolitary place would permit. Seſoſtris being very young, was not ſenſible of the Queen his Mothers death, nor remembring any Father, but Amenophis: but to the end he might divert himſelf, and better learn thoſe things which Amenophis taught him, who was one of the moſt knowing men in all Egypt, he went ſecretly unto Elephantine, where then I was, about eight years of age; and ſince I had no Father, but left to the conduct of a Mother, who was Siſter unto Amenophis; he procured me of her, as a comfort to him in his exile; for ſince ſhe had many children, and Amenophis very rich, ſhe was willing to part with me: ſo I was carried unto this place of ſolitude, which at firſt I was weary of, but cuſtom did better acquaint me with it, and though I was four years elder than Seſoſtris, yet he had ſuch a quick forward Spirit, that I exceedingly loved him: Amenophis had no other buſineſs or delight, but to teach us ſuch things as our ages were capable of; Traſea[illegible]d his wiſe took care of the family, and the Servant went and came continually between Elephantine and the Iſle, to have the news of the world by means of my Mother, who did not directly know where her Brother was: but ſtill he could hear no news that pleaſed him; for be pleaſed to know, Sir, that Amaſis did think himſelf as ſecure and abſolute a Maſter of all Egypt, as if the Throne had hereditarily and juſtly deſcended unto him; yet for all that, the Queen and Seſoſtris not being in his power, they were ſharp thorns in his thoughts, he grieved alſo exceedingly that Ladice followed them; but ſeeing all his diligent ſearches were in vain, and that he could learn no further than that they were embarqued upon the Nile, he thought his beſt expedient to divulge all over Egypt that Seſoſtris and the Queen were drowned, to the end, that the people thinking there was no ſucceſſor of Apriez living, they would more willingly ſubmit unto him: and to confirm them in this belief, he cauſed the obſequies of Ladice to be ſolemnized, knowing certainly (as he ſaid) that ſhe periſhed with them: In the mean time, he cauſed ſecret ſearches to be made with extraordinary care, which perſwaded Amenophis when he knew it, that Amaſis had ſome ill deſign in it, ſo that ſeeing all Egypt was in a huſh'd tranquility, he thought upon nothing but the education of Seſoſtris: And ſince Aſtrology is the original Science of all Egypt, wherein all perſons of any curioſity have ſome knowledge; Amenophis was expert in it, and found by it, that Seſoſtris ſhould hereafter ſee happy days: Yet maugre his Aſtrology, he was once in a mind to quit his deſart, and to go and let the people know that their Legitimate Prince lived; for he underſtood that Amaſis beginning to chear himſelf up, after his loſs of Ladice, and altogether giving himſelf up unto pleaſures, the people began to murmur, and conſidering that he was not of the Royal Race, they began to deſpiſe him, not rendering him ſo much honour as they did before, but ſaid openly, that they remembred him in another picture than now he was, and that though they did not give him honour enough as their King, yet they rendered him too much as he was Amaſis; and that ſince their King and

Amaſis were not all one, he ought not to complain againſt them. This Prince hearing how the people began to mutter, did reſolve upon an odd courſe to ſtop their mouths, yet ſuch a one as produced effect, and forced Amenophis back unto his Deſart. There was in that ſtately Palace which the late King built, great veſſels of Gold which were uſed in publick Feaſts, Amaſis took all thoſe Veſſels and cauſed them to be melted into a Statue of Oſiris, and to be ſet before the Palace Gates: As ſoon as it was placed there, all the people flocked about it, looked upon it with profound reſpect, rendering as much honour as if Oſiris had been there: For amongſt us the repreſentations of ſuch things as we adore are ſacred unto us, even the very Images of Animals are held in veneration. Amaſis ſeeing out of a Balcony the reverence which the people payed unto this Statue of Oſiris, told them that he wondered they ſhould honour this Statue ſo much, conſidering it was made out of the Golden Veſſels which were uſed in their publick Feaſts, but they returned ſuch an anſwer as he expected, that it was not the mettle they honoured, but the repreſentation of Oſiris: After which he told them, that accordingly they ought not to look upon him as Amaſis only, but as their King, ſince he did repreſent Apriez more lively, than this Statue did Oſiris. The people being moved by ſuch an example as ſilenced them, began to reverence Amaſis, and the more, becauſe he proclaimed ſome laws which ſeemed full of Juſtice, and gave great hopes of his wiſdom; for he enacted that all his ſubjects throughout his Dominions, ſhould give an account to the Governour of the place where he lived, how he had lived the year before, to the end he might baniſh idleneſs and injuſtice both at once: So that Amenophis no ſooner heard how the people began to grumble, but he heard immediately after, that he ſtood upon faſter grounds than ever, as if the gods had neglected the conduct of the Univerſe, ſince they ſuffered an Uſurper to ſit upon the Throne, and the legitimate King to be in exile, brought up in a Deſart amongſt a company of Shepherds. But, Sir, I muſt not inſiſt longer upon this, ſince I have many things of great importance to tell you: In the mean time therefore, ſince Amenophis thought to draw ſome advantage by the young Timareta, he thought fit to educate her ſo, as ſhe might hereafter be known unto Amaſis without diſlike, which he did excellently well by means of my Mother, and the great recompences which he promiſed, ſo that ſhe ſent him a woman to be tutor to this young Princeſs: This woman was a Theban, moſt admirably qualified for the education of ſuch a perſon as this: divers croſs adventures had ruined her family, and ſhe forced to ſeek a livelyhood by ſuch a happy ſervitude as this: her name was Ediſea. Thus, Sir, Timareta came under her tuition, as ſoon as ſhe was fit to be taken from her Nurſe, who had eſcaped the contagion as well as ſhe: and be pleaſed to know, Sir, that as Seſoſtris was a miracle, ſo Timareta was another, for beauty and ſpirit, all the parts of her face were ſo many wonders; her complexion though a little brown yet moſt lovely; her hair the pureſt black that ever was; her aſpect was ſo high and charming, as it did invite both admiration and love: So that I may truly ſay, never were two children together ſo amiable as the young Seſoſtris, and the young Timareta, eſpecially when the luſtre of their ſpirits began to joyn and ſhine with their beauties, which was, when Timareta was eight, and Seſoſtris twelve years of age: For, Sir, I aſſure you, all their actions and their words were infinitely taking, and tranſcended their Ages. Since naturally I was reaſonably active, and had ſome education before I came into this Iſle, I practiſed all exerciſes of body with Seſoſtris, which he performed admirably well, as running, leaping, ſhooting, the Lute, and ſuch things: As for the Liberal Sciences, Amenophis taught him as well as any Prince in the World ſtood in need of: He could ſpeak divers Languages, eſpecially the Greek very well: For ſince Amenophis had the diſpoſition of all the Queen's and Ladice's Jewels, we wanted neither Books, nor any thing elſe which was requiſite: Yet our habits were courſe like Shepherds, and ſometimes we went unto the Flocks when Amenophis gave us leave. Again Ediſea educated Timareta as if ſhe were in the Court; though ſhe permitted her to uſe ſome ſuch common things as Shepherds uſe, as the making of fine

Baskets of Ruſhes, weaving ſtrings in ſeveral colours, and ſuch like: But Ediſea did not only teach her theſe trivials, but alſo the Greek Language; yet the wonder of all was, to ſee what a wonderful inclination Seſoſtris had unto Timareta: He could not endure to be out of her ſight; he never contended with her for any thing, but in all things ſubmitted unto her, that at that age complacency was a novelty: If he obſerved ſhe wanted any Ruſhes to make her pretty Baskets, wherein ſhe put her fruits and flowers, he went in all haſte to get her them: If at any time ſhe deſired any Flowers, he was never at reſt until he brought her a Basket full: he thought ſo much of pleaſing her, that he thought upon nothing elſe. On the other ſide, the young Timareta, though very ſweet unto all, yet did put ſuch a notable difference between Seſoſtris and all others, as it was very obſervable: She approved of all he ſaid; and if two preſented unto her any thing at one time, ſhe would accept that which Seſoſtris offered before the preſent of any other. Thus, Sir, we lived until Seſoſtris was ſixteen, and Timareta twelve years of age: But, Sir, as they were amiable in their infancy, ſo they were amiable in their riper age, when their ſpirits did put ſouls into their beauty, and when they were grown capable of loving: For truly, though Timareta had a deſign to pleaſe a whole Court, ſhe could not take more care of her ſelf than ſhe did: And if Seſoſtris had a deſign to publiſh his ſpirit unto all the world, he could not have been more exactly careful to pleaſe, than he was when he ſpoke before Timareta. In the mean time, ſince Amenophis conceived that if Seſoſtris and Timareta were hereafter to appear in the world as known who they were, it would be advantagious that Timareta ſhould love Seſoſtris, he did not check this growing affection, no more than Ediſea, who always followed the mind of Amenophis, without ſeeking for other reaſon, and ſo much the rather in this, becauſe ſhe perceived all the inclinations of Timareta to be virtuous. In the mean time, ſince we read all ſorts of Books, eſpecially the Hiſtory of Egypt, ſometimes when Seſoſtris, and I were together, we talked of many things, eſpecially of Amenophis phis, and what deſigns he ſhould have: For, ſaid Seſoſtris to me, I find by the Hiſtory of Egypt, that it is divided into ſix ſeveral profeſſions: That the Prieſts are ordained for ſacred things; the Noblemen for Councellors unto their King, for Commanders in their Armies, and Governours of Provinces; that their Souldiers in general think upon nothing but matters of War; that the Merchants buſie themſelves in nothing but in things belonging to their Traffick; that Labourers follow only their Plough; that Artificers meddle with nothing but what will make them more knowing in their Art; and that Shepherds keep themſelves within compaſs of their Fold, and think upon nothing but their Flocks. Yet though we be only Shepherds, I ſee Amenophis doth inſtruct us in a hundred things which the Law forbids, and I find my heart too big to be contained within the compaſs of this little Iſle, and I have had ſome thoughts of making a propoſition unto you of leaving it, if—— At this word Seſoſtris ſtopped, and though I did extreamly preſs him to go on with his ſentence, yet I could not move him: So that I was forced to ſpeak his thoughts, and agree with him to ſteal out of this Iſle, relating many things concerning Elephantine, which I remembring very well, begot a ſtrong curioſity in him: But for all our plot it was not eaſie to be executed: For Amenophis had a ſtrict obſervant eye upon us; and indeed Seſoſtris did decline it, for he was already deep in love with the young Timareta; being after this very reſerved unto each other, we parted, Seſoſtris ſaying he would walk by himſelf, and I ſaying I would return unto my Cabin: Since we came out with a deſign to Hunt, Seſoſtris brought his Bow, and quiver full of Arrows, with a Staff in his hand like thoſe which the Shepherds about Elephantine uſe to carry, with a ſteel point at either end, and with which one might defend himſelf as well as with any Sword: For ſince in the Province of Elephantine the Crocodiles are not held in veneration as in that of Thebes, where it is not lawful to kill them, but on the contrary they think it a thing well pleaſing unto the Gods to purge Nilus from theſe terrible devourers, and all the Shepherds of this Province carry ſuch Pike-ſtaffs to kill them, and defend themſelves: So Seſeſtris without any other deſign than contemplation, walked a long time by the water ſide, not meeting with any interruption of his ſtudy, but at laſt coming unto a place where a little Iſthmus ſhot it ſelf into the Nile, he eſpyed Timareta, who to take the freſh air, and view of the River, had left Ediſea, and came unto this neck of Land, which, as I ſaid, ſhot it ſelf into the River, and the better to enjoy a proſpect, ſhe had made a gap with her fair hand through that hedg of Oſiers and Roſes which grew along the banks of this Iſle, and which was thinner in that place than any where elſe. Seſoſtris no ſooner ſpied her, but raviſhed with joy, he made towards her, yet he had no ſooner ſtept four paces forward, but he eſpyed upon his right hand, through the thick of Oſiers and Roſes, one of theſe terrible Monſters of Nilus, which cutting the water with incredible ſwiftneſs, was ready to fall upon the fair Timareta, and pull her into the water with his affrighting tallons which thoſe Crocodiles are armed withal: He no ſooner ſaw this fierce Animal, but he cryed out, and ran with all haſte to get between the Crocodile and Timareta; for though he had Bow and Arrows, yet he knew that both the thickneſs of the hedge would hinder their execution, and alſo the ſcales of the Crocodile were ſo hard, that it was impoſſible they ſhould enter: Thus conſidering this in an inſtant, he ran with his Pike-ſtaff in his right hand, and his Bow in his left, to get between the Monſter and Timareta. In the mean time, the cry of Seſoſtris coming to the ears of this young Princeſs, ſhe turning her head to know the reaſon, and alſo ſeeing the Crocodile coming towards her, ſhe was ſo amazed with fear, that ſhe was ſpeechleſs, yet the exceſs of her fears did not produce their ordinary effects, but the contrary, and made her run as faſt as ſhe could towards Seſoſtris, and the nature of a Crocodile being to be more furious upon them which fly, than thoſe which ſtand ſtoutly to them, this fierce Animal fearing to loſe his prey, flounced out of the River, made the air eccho with the rattle of his ſcales, and ſhaking off the fome of water, he followed the fair, and fearful Timareta, who turning her head ſometimes, to ſee whether the Monſter was near her, yet ran with incredible ſwiftneſs towards Seſoſtris, who ran alſo to her relief. Imagine, Sir, I beſeech you, what an object was this unto Ediſea, who a far off ſaw this terrible ſpectacle. In the mean while Seſoſtris turning upon his right hand to let Timareta paſs by, he got betwixt the Crocodile and her, to ſtay his fury at leaſt, though he could not overcome him. This Monſter (which never ſaw Seſoſtris, becauſe he looked only upon his fair prey which he purſued) ſeemed to be ſurprized, and ſtopt upon a ſudden. But though the nature of the Crocodiles (as I ſaid before) was to be leſs furious upon thoſe who ſtoutly ſtood to them, than upon thoſe which fly, yet ſince he ſaw himſelf ſo far from his Sanctuary the River, deſpair did rouze his fury, and he fell upon Seſoſtris, yet recoiled at firſt ſome two or three paces, but it was to return with greater violence; but Seſoſtris being beyond belief ſtout, did not at all loſe his judgment, ſo throwing away his bow, and taking his Pike-ſtaff in both hands, the combat began between this fierce Monſter and him, whereof the fair Timareta, who was faln with fear and wearineſs ſome twenty paces off, was a witneſs as well as Ediſea, whoſe affright would neither permit her to go forward nor backward. In the mean time, ſince Crocodiles can ſee better upon land than water, this did put by the point of the Pike-ſtaff ſo cunningly, that Seſoſtris could not touch him, unleſs in ſuch places where he could not hurt him, for this armed Monſter had only one place where he could receive any mortal wound. Sometimes he would ſeem weary, and make a retreat purpoſely to ſurpriſe Seſoſtris; then upon a ſudden ſtretching out his greedy tallons, and opening his helliſh mouth, wherein all the teeth were poiſoned, he would caſt himſelf upon him with ſuch violence, that Timareta often thought her dear deliverer was devoured: The Scales of this horrid Monſter made a ſhrill noiſe, and would vary into ſeveral colours, their ruſſet would become red, and anon blue, his eyes were full of a gloomy fire, his teeth ſeemed all bloody with the laſt prey he had devoured; a green and yellow foam ſpued out of his throat, and a thick dusky ſmoak which came from his noſe ſo blinded the eyes of Seſoſtris, that he could hardly defend himſelf from his tallons; yet his great heart was not at all aſtoniſhed or weary, but he avoided all the aſſaults of this affrighting Monſter with ſuch incredible agility, as is admirable, he ſhifted ſo nimbly ſometimes to the right hand, ſometimes to the left, that at every turn he gave him a thruſt, but to his great grief all in vain. In the mean time, this gaping Monſter would not ſubmit, but with a reach of his paw, ſcratched all the Arrows out of his Quiver, and with another reach pulled his Quiver quite from him, thinking to pull him alſo, but by good fortune the Quiver looſened, and he eſcaped the fury of this Monſter; yet he began to think, he ſhould periſh at the laſt, and had no hope in any thing, but the glory in reſcuing his dear Timareta, when the Crocodile roſe upright on his hinder feet, intending to throw himſelf upon the head of Seſoſtris, but this Hero took that opportunity, to thruſt his Pike into his belly, and reached his very heart; it was a happy hit to light juſt upon that only place where the ſcales were penetrable; this monſtrous beaſt perceiving himſelf wounded, bellowed out a horrid noiſe, and ſtrove to revenge his death; but Seſoſtris being raviſhed that he had wounded his fierce enemy, and to ſee his blood run upon the graſs, did hold his pike-ſtaff ſo ſtiff and cloſe in the wound, that the Monſter could not diſengage himſelf, but in lieu of falling upon Seſoſtris tumbled on one ſide, moving very weakly; for ſince Seſoſtris would not pull his weapon out of the wound, it was probable he pierced deeper into his heart, or at leaſt kept him that he could not riſe: Seſoſtris now ſeeing his horrible enemy vanquiſhed, and ready to breath his laſt, he pulled his bloudy weapon out of the wound, and let the life of this Monſter run out with his blood; after which, all glorious with Victory, he went to caſt himſelf at the feet of the fair and fearful Timareta, who not being able to paſs ſo ſuddenly from extream ſorrows into extream joys, had ſtill all ſigns of fear in her fair face: I pray you pardon me, ſaid he unto her, for no ſooner killing this Monſter, whoſe cruelty would have devoured the faireſt perſon in the world. Ah, Seſoſtris, ſaid ſhe, riſe up, how is it poſſible you ſhould ſpeak with ſuch calmneſs of ſpirit as you do? For my part (ſaid ſhe and walked towards Ediſea who was coming towards her) I am ſtill afraid the Monſter ſhould revive: Seſoſtris ſmiled at the fears of Timareta, with as much tranquility as if he had been in no danger, and aſſuring her there was no cauſe of fear, he helped her to walk: But as Ediſea met them, ſhe asked Timareta whether ſhe had given thanks unto her deliverer: Alas, ſaid ſhe unto her, I am ſtill ſo fearful that the Monſter is not yet dead, that I ſhall not be able to thank him all the day; all I can ſay for his ſatisfaction is, that whilſt he fought with this terrible Monſter, I was in as much fear of him as of my ſelf. Alas, Timareta, ſaid he unto her, your expreſſion is above my deſert, and higher than I can believe. As Timareta was ready to anſwer Seſoſtris, and to tell him with what ſincerity ſhe ſpoke her thoughts, Amenophis and I came unto them, ſo that Ediſea relating the Combat of Seſoſtris and his Victory, we forced Timareta to return back, and look upon this Monſter which Seſoſtris had killed; I ſay we forced her, for indeed ſhe feared to look upon him after he was dead, yet with much ado ſhe went: but when we came unto the place where he lay wallowing in his own blood, and ſaw there was no cauſe of any fear, ſhe began then to tell Amenophis with an incomparable grace, all the paſſages, and how the fight was; for the natural modeſty of Seſoſtris only told how he had overcome him, and no more of any circumſtances; but the young Timareta helping him out, did aggravate the matter, as if in publiſhing the glory of Seſoſtris, ſhe had augmented her own. Amenophis could not chuſe but wonder at this prodigious encounter, and to conſider how the daughter of an Uſurper ſhould be relieved by him, from whom her Father had taken the Scepter and Crown; and to ſee as much amitie grow betwixt them, as there was hatred betwixt their Fathers. However, after Amenophis had well conſidered all theſe things, whilſt Timareta was relating the adventure with an admirable grace, he highly extolled the courage of Seſoſtris, and told him, that this heroick quality was the duty of all men; that Shepherds as well as Kings ought to be qualified with it; that they were obliged to defend their flocks, as well as Kings their people, and ſo exhorted him to invigorate his valour. Truly, Sir, (ſaid he unto him) ſince there is a marvelous reſemblance 'twixt Kings and Shepherds, you need not think ſtrange if I give you the ſame leſſons as if you were the Son of a King. And indeed, Sir, Amenophis inſtructed Seſoſtris in all the Morals and Politicks, under the ſimilitude of a Shepherd, ruling his flock as well, and with as much art, as might inſtruct a King in ruling his people: and therefore keeping ſtill within his terms, he told Seſoſtris, that ſince he had ſo magnanimouſly defended Timareta from a Monſter, he ſhould alſo defend his flock from Wolves. Oh, Father, (ſaid Seſoſtris haſtily) I do not love your flocks of ſheep ſo well as I do the fair Timareta. Amenophis ſmiled at this anſwer, as well as Ediſea; but Timareta bluſht, and looked downwards, ſaying ſomething in a low voice, which ſome underſtood, yet which they knew was no ill of Seſoſtris. In the mean time, ſince it was late, we returned to our Cabin, continually talking of Timareta's timeroſity, and her diliverer's courage. The next morning, Amenophis, to incite this young Prince unto a love of glory, did make this known unto all the Shepherds in the Iſle, who all admired and applauded his couragious act: Theſe Shepherds, when they ſaw this Monſter, they carried him unto a little Chappel, which ſtood in the further part of their Iſle towards the eaſt, to render thanks unto the gods, for ſaving Timareta and Seſoſtris from the fury of this Crocodile: the ceremony was performed with a little kind of triumph; for all the Shepherds with their Pipes went to and fro playing tunes of rejoycing and Victory: afterwards eight Shepherds carried this Monſter, and immediately after it, went Seſoſtris Crowned with a wreath of Palm and Lawrel, whereof abundance grew in this Iſle: this victorious Prince, having his Pike-ſtaff decked with flowers in his right hand; but the pretieſt ſight was, to ſee young Timareta, who made the Crown for the Temples of Seſoſtris, follow him with all the reſt of the Shepherdeſſes, with ſo much joy in her face, as it may truly be ſaid, ſhe was the greateſt ornament unto this ruſtique triumph, and indeed ſhe was ſo, eſpecially in the eyes of Seſoſtris, and his love did ſo much increaſe, ~~that he~~ could not long hide that harmleſs fire which began to burn his heart; ſo that after thanks given unto the gods, and after all the Shepherds had brought Seſoſtris to our Cabin, he was no ſooner returned, but taking the Crown from his head, he entered into a little Chamber where Timareta lay, and where ſhe then was, and whilſt Amenophis was thanking the Shepherds, and Ediſea the Shepherdeſſes, Seſoſtris taking that opportunity, went to Timareta with the Crown in his hand: It is moſt juſt, ſaid he unto her, that I preſent this unto you, who have much better merited it than I; and I aſſure you, I would not have worn it, but becauſe I could not refuſe ſo great an honour as to be Crowned by the faireſt hand upon earth; but becauſe I will not be unjuſt, I proſtrate at your feet the ſame Crown wherewith you adorned my head; for once more let me tell you, it is your ſelf only which merits all the honour of my Victory. Truly (ſaid the young and fair Timareta, with as much becomingneſs and innocency) I do not underſtand you, but I am very certain it was you who fought with the monſter, and killed him: and if fear as well as valour deſerved triumph, 'tis I then might claim it as my due; but ſince it does not, keep it Seſoſtris, keep this Crown which I have made for you, ſince 'twas your ſelf only who fought and vanquiſhed, and who only deſerves it. 'Tis true indeed, my dear Timareta, 'twas I who vanquiſhed, ſaid he, but it is you who have vanquiſhed me, for had I not had a moſt earneſt deſire to ſave you, I ſhould have been leſs valiant, and ſhould perhaps have been vanquiſhed, and conſequently it is you who has obliged me. You may ſay what you pleaſe Seſoſtris, ſaid ſhe, but I am ſure I owe my life unto you, and you owe me nothing, for indeed I never did you any ſervice, nor gave you any thing, only this poor Crown, which you would reſtore back. Ha Timareta, ſaid he, you are much more liberal than you think of, for you have given me a thing which

I ſhall never reſtore you, and which indeed I cannot if I would: Timareta hearing Seſoſtris ſpeak thus, began innocently to bethink her ſelf what Seſoſtris ever gave her; for my part, ſaid ſhe, you take a delight in puzeling me, for truly I remember that you have given me a thouſand times ſome fruit, and birds, and ruſhes to make my baskets, but I do not remember I was ever liberal unto you: Yet you have given me a thing, replied he, which I ſhall keep as long as I live: Then certainly, ſaid ſhe, I gave it you aſſoon as I came out of my cradle, and at a time beyond my memory: No, replied Seſoſtris, it was when you were more in years than ſo: For Heavens ſake, ſaid Timareta, tell me what it is? Since you would ſo earneſtly know (replied he, half ſmiling and bluſhing) you have given me love: Ah Seſoſtris, (ſaid ſhe all in confuſion, not knowing whether ſhe ſhould be angry or glad) will you recompence me ſo cruelly for making you a Crown, as to mock at my ſimplicity? Ah Timareta (ſaid he) will you ſo cruelly recompence me, for, as you ſay, ſaving your life, as that you will give me a death? for I muſt tell you moſt ſeriouſly, that if you do not think I love you a thouſand times better than I do my ſelf, and think it without anger, I ſhall moſt infallibly dye. Timareta having recollected her ſelf whilſt Seſoſtris was talking: however it be (ſaid ſhe unto him) I declare unto you, that though perhaps I did innocently give you what you ſay, yet I would not have you recompence liberality for liberality, in giving me the like. As Seſoſtris was ready to anſwer, they were called away to dinner; but as long as it laſted, Timareta durſt not ſo much as look upon Seſoſtris; yet there appeared ſuch carnation bluſhes in her cheeks, that ſhe was forced unto a neceſſity of masking them with an excuſe, and ſaid, ſhe was ſo hot with going to the Chappel, that ſhe ſhould not be cool again all that day. But, Sir, without further relation of the firſt conferences between theſe two Illuſtrious Lovers, I ſhall only tell you, that as Seſoſtris loved Timareta, and Timareta knew it, ſo ever ſince they did agree more amiably. Then, Sir, was this Prince pleaſed to make choice of me for his confident, who had no other ſecrets to truſt me withal, but the violence of his paſſion; for certainly Timareta did behave her ſelf with an extream reſervedneſs, ſo that it may be ſaid, ſhe was wiſe before her time: moreover Ediſea obſerved her very cloſe; yet the virtue of Timareta was a ſufficient guard unto her beauty. However, having put Seſoſtris unto a thouſand teſts by as many rigours, ſhe had all imaginable eſteem and tenderneſs of this lovely Shepherd: ſhe gave him a thouſand innocent teſtimonies of it upon a hundred occaſions; either by her favourable looks, or by ſome obliging bluſhes, or by ſome plauſible words, or by a thouſand other little expreſſions, which ſpeak plain enough unto a Lover. It was a great augmentation of affection between theſe two young Lovers, to think they were like to have no obſtacles in their Marriage: The quality of their Parents was equal, their age proportionable; there was not one Shepherdeſs in all the Iſle whom Seſoſtris could endure to talk with one quarter of an hour; nor was there one Shepherd which Timareta could endure to look upon: Reaſon told them both, that Amenophis and Thraſeas would like of the match: ſo that without any reſiſtance they gave themſelves the liberty of that love which their own merits did create. This being the ſtate of things, Amenophis, Ediſea, Timareta, Seſoſtris, and I, we went one evening to walk in that place where they uſe to land in that Iſle; for ſince the adventure of the Crocodile, Timareta would not walk any where near the River but about that Port. As we were ſet upon the Graſs, which was diapered with variety of Flowers, Timareta ſitting next Seſoſtris, asked him, if he did ſee a Boat which was coming towards the Iſle? He anſwered her, that ſhe did him wrong to ask him ſuch a queſtion, for if ſhe were in company he never looked upon any thing but her ſelf; but upon her ſerious demand, he looked, and indeed ſpied a Boat making towards them; ſo that ſhewing unto Amenophis what Timareta ſhewed him, we all looked upon this Boat; but it being late, and beginning to darken, we could not diſcover the perſons in it. The thing which Amenophis moſt wondered at, was, becauſe it was not ordinary for any Strangers to come unto that Iſle; but the Barque drawing nearer, we diſcovered ed in it a man of grave and ſerious phyſiognomy, very comely, who not regarding us, nor any thing the company did, lookt only upon the Moon, which dimly ſhined. The reſt of the men were only Rowers, one of which came on ſhore, and asked Amenophis, whom he thought to be the Maſter of the company, whether a be-nighted ſtranger could poſſibly obtain the favour of a nights lodging in the Iſle, his intentions being for Elephantine, but being ſo late, they conceived it dangerous to land in that Port in the night. Amenophis hearing the man ſpeak, and knowing by his garb, and habit, that the man in the Boat was a ſtranger, he did not only let him have leave to lodge in the Iſle, but let him have his own Cabin. Afterwards enquiring of what Country, he underſtood he was of Samos: after he knew his Country, Amenophis asked his Name? it was anſwered Pythagoras. Then were the ſpirits of Amenophis filled with joy, and he reſolved to make him the beſt entertainment poſſible: For Amenophis being an intimate Friend unto the High Prieſt of Memphis, and by means of my Mother, held a ſecret correſpondency with all his intimate friends, intending to uſe them as occaſions ſerved; he had not long ſince received a Letter from his friend, which intimated, that Pythagoras was arrived at Memphis: You may imagine, Sir, how Amenophis was joyed, being a man of deep knowledge, who ſince his exile had no other company but Seſoſtris, Ediſea, Timareta, and my ſelf. His joys were the more, becauſe he underſtood from the High Prieſt of Memphis, that Pythagoras would not return unto the Court of Amaſis, and therefore there was no danger in receiving him: So going unto the Boat, he offered his hand unto Pythagoras, to help him out, and addreſſing his ſpeech unto him, I render moſt hearty thanks unto the gods (ſaid he in the Grecian language) for bringing a man into this Deſart, whoſe Reputation tranſcends all the reports of thoſe ſeven Sages which Greece at this time boaſts of. This Philoſopher wondering to hear Amenophis ſpeak unto him, and in the Grecian tongue, ſaluted him with a Majeſtick civility, and to ſhew the eſteem he held of our Nation, he would not anſwer him violence

[illegible] Greek, but in the Egyptian Language. Thus did theſe two Renowned men at their firſt meeting greet one another, but not in their natural Languages, both of them retaliating equal Civilities. The Complements of Pythagoras were ſhort, for doubtleſs you know, Sir, how this Philoſopher was ſo great a Lover of ſilence, that he would have his Diſciples ſtudy five years, and not ſpeak: His Maxim being, to ſay little, and hear much; and the only way to ſpeak well, was to hear much. However, that little he ſpoke, was enough to charm Amenophis, who carried him into his Cabin, after he had preſented Seſoſtris unto him as his Son, and all the reſt of his Family as Servants unto Pythagoras. But, Sir, all the diligence of Amenophis to bid him welcome was ill beſtowed: for this Philoſopher never eat any thing which had life in it, but Figs and Fruits were a fine Feaſt unto him. After this ſlight repaſt, Amenophis began to diſcourſe of the moſt ſublime Sciences, and ſo admirably well, that this Philoſopher charmed with his knowledge, told him, that ſince his buſineſs in Egypt was only to learn, and know thoſe great men in it, he muſt needs ſtay a while with him, and not go ſo ſoon to Elephantine, where he could not meet with better company. Amenophis received his diſcourſe with much modeſty, and conjured him to let him become his Scholar, as well as two more, meaning Seſoſtris and my ſelf: In ſhort, Sir, Pythagoras reſolved to ſtay ſome time in the Iſle, ſo that he ſent back the Boat which brought him, and liked his ſolitude ſo well, that he ſtayed there four Months. In which time he inſtructed Seſoſtris with much delight; for this great Philoſopher was ſo raviſhed to find ſo wonderful a diſpoſition in the ſpirit of this young Prince to learn the higheſt things, as he taught him both with wonder and delight. He admired alſo the young Timareta, and ſo much the more, becauſe (ſaid he) I never knew any of her Sex who could ſo handſomely be ſilent, or ſpeak quicker when there was need, or ſuffer others to ſpeak with more patience. The truth is, Sir, he took an extream delight in her. His opinion being, that all ſouls do tranſmigrate from one body into another, either men, beaſts, birds, or any animals (which the Greeks call Metempſuchoſis) he had an univerſal compaſſion of all living things; as oft as he found Fiſhers with their Nets full of Fiſhes, he would buy them all, and ſet them at liberty. And after he had been a while in our Iſle, he took notice that the young Timareta had many little birds in cages which ſung very ſweetly, and that ſhe loved them exceeding well, becauſe Seſoſtris gave them. The Philoſopher according to his Doctrine gave liberty to theſe birds, and thereby did exceedingly grieve Timareta for the loſs of her birds, and Seſoſtris for the ſorrows of Timareta; yet did they murmur at their loſs only in ſecret; for as Seſoſtris received many ſapient Documents from Pythagoras, ſo he practiſed that ſilence which he taught his Scholars. Seſoſtris talking with Timareta after her loſs, told her, as pitiful as Pythagoras was, he was not able to ſet him at liberty as he had done her birds. Truly, replied ſhe, I ſhould think it more juſt to ſet men at liberty rather than birds. But, Timareta, there is a great difference between them and me; for thoſe birds are glad of their freedom, but I ſhould be ſorry any ſhould break my chains: So ſince Pythagoras intends only a good unto thoſe he frees, when he knows I am your captive, he would not releaſe me: But as for my part, fair Timareta, why do not you follow the exemple of this great Philoſopher, and become pitiful? Would you have me ſet you at liberty, (replied ſhe) as he hath done my birds? No, replied he, but I would have you make me happy in my captivity. How ſhall I do that? (replied ſhe.) The way is, anſwered he, by obliging me more unto you, by charming me with a million of harmleſs favours; by being gladder when you ſee my love augments, than all Egypt is when they ſee the Nile to riſe; and (if it would not anger you to ſay it) by participating with me in my Fetters: Ah Seſoſtris, ſaid ſhe, would you have me to be pitiful, and your ſelf ſo cruel as to wiſh my captivity? Fie, fie, it were not juſt; therefore all I can do is to tell you, it ſhall not be long of me, if you be not free. Then you do not love me at all (replied he, and looked ſadly upon her.) I do not ſee, replied ſhe, how you can draw that concluſion from what I ſaid; for what greater good can be done to a priſoner than to ſet him at liberty; yet you never gave thoſe pretty birds which ſung ſo ſweetly and delighted you, their liberty, replied Seſoſtris. I do confeſs it (ſaid ſhe) for their impriſonment pleaſed me better than their liberty. I beſeech you, replied Seſoſtris, why will not my captivity pleaſe you alſo, ſince I am, and ever will be an eternal ſlave unto your beauty? As Timareta was about to anſwer, Amenophis came and interrupted. However, you ſee the Documents of Pythagoras were no hinderances to the love of Seſoſtris, but rather taught him a thouſand innocent ways to become more amiable, and his paſſion did ſtill ſo violently encreaſe, that he asked Timareta leave to move a Marriage unto Amenophis. This motion much ſurpriſed him, for he did not think it within the ſphere of his Authority to marry Seſoſtris unto the Daughter of Amaſis: Yet for all that, he was willing Timareta ſhould love Seſoſtris ſtill; For when things were ripe, and that he had raiſed a party in the Kingdom, this might be a means of peace between the Legitimate King and the Uſurper, at leaſt would be a good Hoſtage: For Amenophis knew, that though Amaſis was married, yet he had no children with his Wife, nor could have, becauſe he had repudiated this ſecond Wife: And though this motion did ſurpriſe him, yet he told Seſoſtris, that his choice was worthy of his ſpirit and judgement; but yet he was not of age fit for Marriage: That his Marriage was a matter of greater importance than he imagined; and that Timareta was ſuch a Jewel as he muſt long hope for before he enjoyed it. This too ſtrict anſwer not ſatisfying Seſoſtris, he ſtill added his prayers unto his reaſons; but all in vain, for he grew ſo extreamly melancholy and ſad that he was hardly knowable. All the Documents and adviſements of Pythagoras which Amenophis employed, were to no purpoſe: For this young man making uſe of his own Doctrines againſt him, told him, that ſince the Deſtinies did govern the Univerſe, and that men were not Maſters of their own actions, he ought not to be condemned for loving Timareta with ſo much violence, ſince he did but what he could not chuſe to do. The truth is, Sir, this Prince was ſo incenſed at the refuſal of Amenophis, that he would not ſtudy, nor walk, nor recreate, nor do any thing, but lament: And that which moſt augmented his ſorrows and melancholy was, that Amenophis thinking the ſight of Timareta was a main cauſe of his diſtempers, he reſolved to ſend her to my Mother at Elephantine for a while: So that unknown to Seſoſtris, Ediſea departed the next morning by break of day, with Timareta, carrying orders with them unto my Mother, that ſhe ſhould paſs under the notion of one of her Couſins, and to put her into ſuch a habit as was ſuitable to that quality. The deſign was ſo cunningly executed, that Seſoſtris knew nothing of it, and that Timareta could not ſpeak to him at parting; But at laſt Seſoſtris ſeeing her gone, he was ſo ſad, that it was impoſſible for any to be more: Yet ſince he thought Amenophis to be his Father, he did not exclaim againſt him, but complained of his misfortunes unto me, and in ſuch a manner, as would have moved a heart of ſtone to pity. Pythagoras being informed by Amenophis of the cauſe of Timareta's exile, and of Seſoſtris his ſorrows, did imploy all his Phyſick of Philoſophy to cure or comfort him, but all in vain; for not knowing where Timareta was, or could be, he continued in a moſt ſad condition. In the mean while, Pythagoras being called away, he prepared for his departure; and ſince he reſolved to be gone very timely in the morning, he took his leave over night of Amenophis, who happened to be ſo ill, that he could not bring him to his Boat. Seſoſtris knowing this, reſolved to quit the Iſle which was intolerable to him, and to go and ſeek Timareta; or at leaſt to let Amenophis know, that he did him wrong, in denying the ſatisfaction of his deſires. He communicated his deſign unto me, which I approved of, upon condition he would let me follow; for I muſt confeſs I was weary of a narrow Iſle, which had not one beauty in it worth my paſſion. But after a departure was agreed upon, the difficulty was how to execute it. As for me, the matter was eaſie, but Seſoſtris had many obſervant eyes upon him; yet he contrived a way to execute his deſign; for ſeeing Amenophis was ſick, and could not conduct Pythagoras to the Boat, he diſſembled himſelf to be lame in a thigh, and not able to ſtand: So Amenophis ſeeing him not able to go abroad, nor out of his bed, he could not imagine of any going out of the Iſle, and therefore gave no ſtrict orders to obſerve him, but truſting much in me, he did recommend unto me the care of Seſoſtris. In the mean time Pythagoras having, as I ſaid before, taken his leave of Amenophis over night, after a promiſe never to reveal he was in the Iſle, he came alſo to bid adieu unto Seſoſtris, and I only had orders to wait upon him the next morning. But, Sir, we knowing that there were two Shepherdeſſes which intended to go the next morning unto Elephantine, I did ſo tamper with them, that I got one of their habits, which I carried ſecretly unto the chamber of Seſoſtris: And the cuſtom of the Egyptian Villages being to wear great white plated Mantles which cover them from head to foot, when they go unto that Town, Seſoſtris took one of them to cover his Shepherds habit, and covered his face with a hood as Shepherdeſſes uſe; ſo getting out of the Cabin unperceived, he came to the River ſide, and ſtayed with her that was to go unto the Town: So that when Pythagoras came to embark, Seſoſtris covered with his Mantle entered in alſo with thoſe two women which were of the confederacy, whom I perſwaded that there was no other myſtery in the deſign, but that Seſoſtris being in love with Timareta, he would go and ſeek her out: And theſe women much murmuring that Amenophis ſhould hinder their Marriage, they conſented unto our deſign; and Pythagoras never heeded theſe women more than he did the Rowers: But then the difficulty was how I ſhould pretend my departure, and at laſt I hit upon it; and told Pythagoras with a confident look, that Amenophis commanded me to wait upon him as far as Elephantine, ſo that this Philoſopher did not long contend with me, but imagined this to be only a complement of civility: So I embarked with them, ſtill looking whether Seſoſtris was well diſguiſed. But, Sir, to trouble you no longer with things of ſuch trivial conſideration, be pleaſed to know we arrived at Elephantine: As ſoon as we landed, I took leave of my Philoſopher, and followed my Shepherdeſſes, who ſtayed for me ſome twenty paces off, then Seſoſtris had nothing to do, but to throw off his Mantle which covered his Shepherds habit. Thus in an Inſtant from a Shepherdeſs he became a Shepherd, and parted from his company, after he had ſent a Letter by them unto Amenophis, which he had written before he came out of his Cabin, and if my memory fail not, it contained theſe words.

Seſoſtris unto Amenophis.

SIR,

I Ask your pardon for being more obedient unto Love than unto you: For I am forced to it. Certainly I deſerve to be excuſed. Do not wonder, Sir, that ſince I cannot live without Timareta, I ſhould go to ſeek her all over the world. I am extream ſorry for taking Miris from you; but obliging terms of friendſhip has forced him to do almoſt as much for me as I do for Timareta, and he will quit you to follow my fortunes, which might have been made happy if you would: But I wiſh yours may be better, and that I may ſee you again after, but not before I have found Timareta, who is all the life of Seſoſtris.

After he had given this Letter to theſe women, I deſired them to tell thoſe that rowed the Boat, I would not return unto the Iſle that day, therefore to let them return and not ſtay for me; and telling the women that Timareta lived beyond Elephantine. But, Sir, we found our ſelves put to a pitiful non plus; for we were given to underſtand that they landed Timareta on the other ſide of the River, and not at Elephantine; yet after we had well looked about us, and could not diſcover any Town where poſſibly ſhe could be, we concluded ſhe muſt be in this. This conceit put us into no leſs puzzle than before, ſince Seſoſtris had never been at Elephantine, and ſince I had been ſo long out of it, that I had forgot all the ſtreets: Nor durſt I on the other ſide go unto my Mother; for I knew, if ſhe found that I came without the order of Amenophis, ſhe would ſtay me: But at laſt remembring that in my Infancy there was a great league of Friendſhip between me and another boy which was the only Son of a very rich man, I enquired of a Merchant which was in the Port, concerning his father; and I underſtood from this Merchant, that both the Father and Mother of my friend were dead; and that he was in poſſeſſion of his Eſtate. Then I enquired where his houſe was, and we went immediately thither; and I deſired to ſpeak in private with him. So that after ſome patience in waiting, I was brought unto him, who at firſt knew me not, both by reaſon of my Shepherds habit, and becauſe I was much altered in my ſtature and face. But after I had talked with him, and revived the memory of our antient acquaintance, he embraced me with much joy, and knew me perfectly. Then I told him, after I had enjoyned eternal and inviolable ſecrecy, how Amenophis ſince the death of Apriez had renounced the world, and took himſelf unto a deſart, where he kept me, and that I being weary of that life, had eſcaped from him: after which, I preſented Seſoſtris to him, under the notion of Son unto Amenophis. In concluſion, Sir, I carried the matter ſo handſomely, and found my friend ſo generous, that he entertained us in his houſe, and accommodated us with all things neceſſary whatſoever: In the meantime, we knew not where Timareta was, nor knew not where to ſeek her in ſo great a Town, though we ſought her in all places, as well in places where ſhe was likely to be, as where not. The ſight of ſo fair a Town did ſpring ſome ambitious thoughts in the heart of Seſoſtris, and the ſooner to cauſe Amenophis to bring Timareta into the Iſle again, he reſolved to go into the wars, where he might ſatisfie his ambition at leaſt, though not his love, and to get glory, though he could not get Timareta: He had no ſooner formed this deſign in his imagination, but he imparted it unto me, and it was no ſooner communicated but conſented unto; and the ſooner, becauſe a report went, there was ſome commotion againſt Amaſis in one of the Provinces of Egypt: ſo that without any longer delay, I communicated our intentions unto my friend, who being of a very generous diſpoſition, did furniſh us with all things requiſite, to put our ſelves in an equipage of war: thus quitting the Shepherds crook for a ſword, we left Elephantine, not hearing any thing of Timareta; and indeed how was it to be hoped ever to hear of a ſimple Shepherdeſs in ſuch a Town as that? However, ſince Seſoſtris deſired his Shepherdeſs ſhould know it was for love of her he left the Iſle, I forgot to tell you, Sir, that he had engraved ſome words upon a Sycomore which grew upon the Hill in the midſt of the Iſle, where Timareta uſed often to ſit and enjoy the pleaſant proſpect, and where they had often held ſuch amiable diſcourſes in that place, as he was confident that if ever ſhe returned, ſhe would come unto that place, and find theſe words, > Seſoſtris not being able to live where the fair Timareta is not, he is gone with a deſign to dye as ſoon as he hath loſt all hopes of finding her.

But, Sir, before I tell you any thing of our martial voyage, give me leave to relate in few words, how Amenophis was aſtoniſhed, when about two hours after the departure of Pythagoras, he underſtood I was gone as far as Elephantine to conduct him; yet ſince he could not imagine Seſoſtris to be in a condition of going, he did not at firſt ſuſpect his departure, but ſending unto his chamber to ask whether he knew of my intentions, he was extreamly amazed when he heard he was not there; he preſently ſent for all thoſe that ſaw Pythagoras embarque, who all ſaid they ſaw none but three Shepherdeſſes, the Stranger, and my ſelf; ſince the number of women in that Iſle is not great, he ſent out Thraſeas, Nicetis, and a Servant, to enquire what women went unto Elephantine: but after an exact ſearch, they found only two wanting; ſo that Amenophis not doubting but Seſoſtris went out of the Iſle in diſguiſe, he was extreamly troubled, but knew no remedy, for there was not one Boat to be had in all the Iſle to ſend after them, all being gone out to fiſh: but towards night, to put him out of all doubt of our flight, the two women returned, and gave him the Letter, ſaying, they were much amazed when they found her whom they thought to be a Shepherdeſs, to prove Seſoſtris: yet Amenophis did hardly believe them, and was as angry with them, as any ſo wiſe a man as he could be with them which had failed rather out of ſimplicity than malice: However, without more delay, he ſent Thraſeas, Nicetis, and a ſervant, with orders to ſtay two or three days in Elephantine, and walk up and down the ſtreets, Temples, and publick places, to ſee if they could meet with them, not dareing to go himſelf for fear of diſcovery; but do what they could, no tidings was to be heard of us, ſo that Amenophis was the ſaddeſt man alive: But ſince he ſaw that the violence of his paſſion had driven him away, he thought that perhaps the ſame paſſion might bring him back unto this Iſle; yet he durſt not call back Timareta ſo ſoon, leſt Seſoſtris ſhould have ſome deſign to take her away in her return, and ſo he might perhaps loſe him for ever, not having her in his power which might invite his return; nor durſt he quit the Iſle, leſt Seſoſtris ſhould retutn when he ſhould not be there, ſo that he was forced to ſtay by himſelf to lament his miſeries; yet was he never out of hope, for his knowledge in Aſtrology ſhewed him ſuch happy preſages for Seſoſtris, that maugre all malice of his fortune, he truſted more to the ſigns of the heavens, than to his ſufferings upon earth; yet was he extreamly ſorry for the abſence of Seſoſtris, for he underſtood that his ſtratagems to raiſe a party againſt the Uſurper, proved not ineffectual, and that his private friends in Thebes, and Heliopolis, had ſo well tranſacted; that the people did not only begin to riſe, but men alſo of great quality began to declare themſelves, eſpecially in Thebes, where the ſpirit of revolt was riſe amongſt the people, becauſe Amaſis when he came firſt to the Crown, to oblige the people unto a Declaration for him, did tell the Inhabitans, that he would reſtore their Town unto its ancient luſtre: For, Sir, you know that heretofore it was the prime town of all Egypt, before the ever renowned Menez cauſed Memphis to be built, which ſince that, hath been the uſual abode of all their Kings, by reaſon of the Situation which is moſt Majeſtick, moſt pleaſant and lovely in the world: ſo that as Memphis increaſed in wealth Thebes decayed; and the inhabitants of Thebes knowing ing that Riches, greatneſs, and magnificence of towns, ariſeth from the preſence of Kings, they petitioned Amaſis, that according to his promiſe, he would inhabit amongſt them: nor had Thebes been ſo ready to declare for him, but in hopes of this: yea ſeeing him ſo far from keeping promiſe with them, that he cauſed his Tomb to be built at Memphis, as in the place where he would both live and dye: the friends of Amenophis found it an eaſie matter to make this a pretence for a revolt, and to engage Heliopolis in the intereſt of Thebes, becauſe of the great traffick and commerce which was ever between theſe two Towns: This Amenophis ſaw, that if he had Seſoſtris in his power, he had a fair opportunity to make him known unto the people, and perhaps to cauſe an univerſal revolution in all Egypt; for it was eaſie to make this Prince known, having Ladice's Letter in his hands; and alſo having Thraſeas and Nicetis with him, knowing that Seſoſtris was the ſame child he brought into the Iſle, about four or five years of age; alſo he had one of the Prince's Servants with him. In the mean time, ſince Amenophis could never effect his deſigns, unleſs he truſted and imparted them unto ſome: there was a man of good quality in Thebes, who knew that the Son of Apriez was living, though he knew not where he was; for Amenophis would never impart the place of his retreat unto any, leſt he ſhould run ſome hazard; yet he could do no leſs than to ſend unto him, who ſaid it was now a time to bring the Son of Apriez, and to excuſe the matter by ſaying that this Prince was ſick, and that as ſoon as he was in a condition to come unto Thebes, he would bring him. On the other ſide Timareta, though well pleaſed with ſo pleaſant a Town as Elephantine was, and to be out of the Courſe habit of a Shepherdeſs, yet ſhe did moſt ſenſibly lament the want of Seſoſtris; but ſhe lamented in ſecret, not daring to complain unto any: and whilſt Amenophis and Timareta were thus full of ſorrows, Seſoſtris was fuller than they, and truly all the way we travelled towards ſome rendezvous of War, he talked of nothing but Timareta, and he grew ſo dull and melancholy, that there was a little quarrel almoſt riſen between us: Then, Sir, be pleaſed to know, that when we underſtood there was a Province which revolted againſt Amaſis, the queſtion was, whether we ſhould take the part of Amaſis the Uſurper, or the ſide of the people which revolted from him? I being ſomething elder than Seſoſtris, and remembered all the imprecations and curſes againſt Amaſis when he came to the Crown, my inclination and judgment was to fight againſt him: But Seſoſtris was of the contrary opinion, and would fight in the Army of Amaſis againſt the revolters: my arguments were, that Amaſis was an Uſurper; that all reſpects were due unto the legitimate King; that they of Thebes were no rebels, but juſt enemies unto a Tyrant, and conſequently I thought it moſt juſt to take their part: On the contrary Seſoſtris he argued, that though Amaſis was an Uſurper, yet they of Thebes were unworthy of aſſiſtance: for, (ſaid he) if they were faithful unto their Prince, why did they acknowledge Amaſis? and ſince they did acknowledge him, why do they now forſake him? were there a Prince deſcended from the royal race of our Kings unto whom the Crown ſhould deſcend, then ſhould I certainly fight on their ſide; or if they had only a deſign to revenge the death of Apriez, I would be on their ſide alſo, but ſince I hear their aims are only at their private intereſts, and grandure of their Town, and for that, they trouble all the Kingdom, it is but juſt if they periſh: Alſo, I have heard Amenophis ſay, that it is better to obey one Maſter than many, and that a good Tyrant in peace, is better for the people than a juſt war: Moreover, without any further reaſons, I find my heart ſo inclinable to take the part of Amaſis, that it is ſufficient I tell you, that I can take no other. After this, Sir, I ſubmitted unto Seſoſtris, but it was with much ado; then we went unto the Army of Amaſis, who then was under the command of Heracleon, who at preſent is your priſoner, and who was then the Kings favourite, not only becauſe he was the man who had the greateſt hand in ſetting him upon the Throne, but becauſe his perſon pleaſed him; and though this war was of that importance as might very well oblige Amaſis to go into it himſelf; but the reaſon why he did not, was, becauſe he was very ſickly. At laſt, Sir, we came to the Camp, and ſeemed as men who would ſerve as Voluntiers: but, Sir, as Seſoſtris had an excellent faculty in uſing a Pike-ſtaff under the notion of a Shepherd, he had a better in uſing a Sword under the notion of a Souldier, for never was ſeen in Egypt a man of ſo fine a garb in arms as he; he attracted the eyes of all, both Officers and Souldiers, but as his admirable behaviour did invite their looks in the Camp, ſo it did much more when he fought: for Seſoſtris did things which certainly did ſurpaſs all that they could imagin of his valour: yet Heracleon was not a witneſs of it, for at the very firſt charge he was wounded, and ſo exceedingly, that he was carried out of the Camp, and could not return all that Battel, which was commanded by his Lieutenant General, whoſe name was Simandius; ſo the valour of Seſoſtris was not known unto Heracleon, but only by report: But, Sir, be pleaſed to know, that though we came into this Camp only as ſimple Voluntiers, unknown unto any, yet the valour of Seſoſtris made us quickly known unto all the Army, for he did ſo highly and happily ſave the life of Simandius in a battel, that his fame flew as far as Heracleon and Amaſis alſo: But, Sir, the admiration was, that Seſoſtris who would not be known for no more than a Shepherd, would have us change our names, though the names of Seſoſtris and Miris were ſo general and common in Egypt, that it was not likely we ſhould be known: But the truth is, he was ſo afraid of being known to be a Shepherd, that he did as much as he could have done to hinder his being known to be the Son of a King, if he had known his royal birth: ſo that taking upon him the name of Pſammetites, as long as he was in the Army; it was under that name, and not Seſoſtris, that his reputation was divulged, both in the Army of Amaſis, and in that of the enemy, and a hundred heroick acts made him lookt upon as a man extraordinary. Simandius, in recompence that Seſoſtris had ſaved his life, would have given him a good command, but ſince he was reſolved to return ſhortly unto Elephantine, to ſee whether his adored Timareta was returned to the Iſle, he would not accept of it: However, Sir, though Seſoſtris did miracles under the notion of Pſammetites, and that in ſaving the life of Simandius, he only prevented the defeat of his Army, yet the enemies ſide was very ſtrong, and ſeemed to maintain their revolt very ſtrongly: The Army wherein we were, ſcoffed at a report in Thebes, that a Son of Apriez would e're long be in the head of their Forces; Seſoſtris was the firſt who affirmed that the enemy gave that out only to make their revolt ſeem more juſt, and that if it were true there were a Son of Apriez, he would ere now have appeared in thoſe skirmiſhes already fought: But after all this, Sir, the time of year for field being ſpent, and Simandius being forced to retreat with his Forces into Winter quarters, becauſe the Nile began to ſwell, he would needs carry him who was ſo famous under the name of Pſammetites, unto the Court, that he might receive from the King a recompence due unto his courage; but Seſoſtris, to excuſe himſelf with more civility from going, told him, that he would come to the Court as ſoon as he was in a condition to appear in it, without ſhame unto him, and therefore deſired permiſſion firſt to go home: Then Simandius asked where his home was, and Seſoſtris (as it was agreed between us) anſwered, it was at a Town called Canopea, which gives the name unto one of the ſeven mouths of Nilus: ſo Simandius being glad to know the place where he who ſaved his life lived, did preſs no further, contenting himſelf with his promiſe of returning to Court: yet he forced Seſoſtris to receive a very rich preſent of Jewels, and amongſt the reſt, a great medal of Gold, of which Amaſis gave him many to beſtow upon the like occaſions, on the one ſide of which was the Kings picture, and on the other, that of Ladice, whoſe memory was ſtill very dear unto him, not only becauſe he ever loved her, but alſo becauſe by her means he came to be King, though far contrary to her intentions. But, Sir, the admiration is, that as Timareta had a great reſemblance of the Princeſs Ladice her Mother, ſo this medal had a great reſemblance of Timareta, ſo that after we had taken leave of Simandius, and had looked upon this medal with more leaſure, Seſoſtris rejoyced more at this adventure than is expreſſible; yet could not ſuſpect any thing of the truth; for ſince this reſemblance was not exactly perfect, and ſince he verily believed Timareta was really the Daughter of a Shepherd, he conceived it to be only an act of chance, for which he ought to render thanks unto the gods: The very ſight of this medal made us to return to Elephantine, with more haſte, and more joy than we came from it, for after this happy adventure, he made no doubt but to find Timareta in the Iſle: At laſt, Sir, we arrived at Elephantine, and went to him with whom we were before entertained, who was much aſtoniſhed to ſee us return in a better equipage than we were in at our departure. In the mean time, ſince Seſoſtris returned only for Timareta's ſake, we were no ſooner come to Elephantine, but he endeavoured to know whether ſhe were returned to the Iſle, and remembring very well that it was the day on which Boats did commonly come to the Town, he walked towards the Port, and ſo happily, that he ſaw coming a Boat full of Shepherds, and Shepherdeſſes, yet would he not ſhew himſelf, but ſent a Servant which he had entertained during his voyage, to ask whether a maid called Timareta was at that preſent in the Iſle? and being anſwered that ſhe returned a few days ſince, Seſoſtris without one minute of more delay, reſolved upon a return alſo: but ſince he conceived that all the Shepherds would wonder to ſee him in that habit, and perhaps mock at him, he put on again his old habit of a Shepherd, which he left off when he went unto the Army; for my part I perſwaded him to appear before Timareta in the ſame habit wherein he was, but he would not, and I am confident that if he had been really a Shepherd, he could not have done what he did, but being the Son of a great King, though ignorant of it, his ſoul was above that kind of vanity, and thought it enough to let her ſee his martial voyage had been happy, by giving her thoſe Jewels which Simandius gave him, except that medal which had that fair reſemblance: ſo Seſoſtris following his deſign, and I following him, we left our men and equipage of war at my friends houſe, and waited for the people who were to return into the Iſle, and who were extreamly joyed when they ſaw Seſoſtris; he found alſo amongſt them one of thoſe women which helped him out of the Iſle, after which Seſoſtris enquired for Timareta, Amenophis, and Ediſea, but eſpecially of Timarena, he underſtood that this fair Maid was returned into the Iſle with Ediſea, but a thouſand times fairer than ever he ſaw her; and that two days after ſhe came Amenophis departed with a Servant which he had along with him. Though Seſoſtris loved Amenophis very well, maugre his rigour, yet at this time he was very glad of his abſence, and ſince he could talk of nothing but Timareta, as long as that little navigation laſted, ſhe was all his diſcourſe both with me and the Shepherds, who all knew he was in love: When we drew near our deſart, he thought he ſaw one upon the Hill in the midſt of the Iſle, where he had engraved ſome words upon the Sicomores; but it being too far off to diſcern whether it was a Shepherd or a Shepherdeſs, he asked me whether I ſaw one at the root of that tree which grew juſt upon the knab of the Hill; he had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but that Shepherdeſs who lent him her mantle at departure, began to ſpeak: I'le lay my life, ſaid ſhe to him, that it is Timareta, for ſince ſhe returned, ſhe is almoſt always there. Seſoſtris hearing this, did not doubt but it was ſhe, ſo that his imagination ſupplying the defects of his eyes, he thought he diſcerned her ſtature and her habit, and thinking that ſhe was only there to think upon him, he was extreamly joyed; and his deſire to ſee Timareta was ſo great, that he leapt the firſt out of the Boat, almoſt before it touched land. In the mean time, Sir, to let you know how unſearchable are the ſecrets of the gods, and how vain all humane providence is, give me leave to tell you both how and why Amenophis departed: Be pleaſed to know then, Sir, that thoſe who began the commotion of Thebes, and Heliopolis, ſeeing no Seſoſtris appear, began to murmur againſt Amenophis, who had ſo long held them in hopes of ſeeing him, ſo that writing unto him to teſtifie their fears, that after they had aſſured the people and publiſhed throughout all Egypt that there was a Son of Apriez living, after all this they ſhould be forced to ſay, they were deceived, and that there is no ſuch thing: Amenophis was forced to go himſelf (not daring to truſt it in a Letter) and ſatisfie them of all the paſſages: In the mean time, he cauſed Ediſea and Timareta to return into the Iſle, to the end, that if Seſoſtris returned, ſhe might ſtay him, appointing Thraſeas and Ediſea to tell him, that he had altered his opinion ſince his departure, and at his return would give him all poſſible ſatisfaction: alſo, conjuring Ediſea to order it ſo, that the fair Shepherdeſs might ſtay Seſoſtris if he returned: after which, Amenophis departed in a diſguiſe and carried the Prince's Servant with him: And theſe were the motives, Sir, which attracted Amenophis out of the Iſle, and Seſoſtris in, and Timareta alſo: But to return unto Seſoſtris, whom I left leaping haſtily out of the Boat, the ſooner to ſee his fair Shepherdeſs; give me leave to tell you, Sir, that he found her upon the top of the hill, and bottom of the Sicomore where Seſoſtris had imprinted his mind, and ſhe every day ſince her return was reading it: this beauty he found in a muſing poſture, her eyes down, and walking ſoftly, when he was coming haſtily to her, to teſtifie his deſires of ſeeing her, who being upon a ſudden ſweetly ſurpriſed with the ſight of her dear Seſoſtris, and to ſee his face ſo full of joy, had good cauſe to think his heart was as full of love; both their joys were ſo high, that they were not able to expreſs them by their words, yet at laſt they ſpoke, but it was both at once, but yet they underſtood each other, for upon ſuch occaſions, regulate ſet civilities are not the moſt obliging, but there is a certain diſorder of ſpirit, and confuſion of words, which pleaſeth much better, than any ſtudyed complements of quaint language, which perhaps ſignifie nothing, at moſt, nothing to the purpoſe: but after they had vented what their firſt raptures permitted them, Timareta ſaluted me, and Seſoſtris ſaluted Ediſea, who followed Timareta ſome twenty paces from her: theſe two lovers were both ſo equally diſordered with a pleaſing ſurpriſe, that Timareta in ſpeaking to me called me Seſoſtris, and Seſoſtris called Ediſea Timareta: this little reciprocal error had different effects, for Seſoſtris was very glad to hear Timareta uſe his name in lieu of mine, nor was he ſorry for calling Timareta, in lieu of Ediſea, thinking ſhe would thereby know, that his thoughts did run on her: but as for Timareta, ſhe was vexed at her ſelf for being ſo ſurpriſed, that ſhe bluſht for ſhame: This pretty error was not only the joy of Seſoſtris at the firſt meeting, but it was highly augmented to ſee Timareta a thouſand times more fair and charming than ſhe was at his departure: ſhe was grown taller, her neck was in another, but better model, ſhe was grown plump, her complexion was poliſhed, her eyes more luſtrous, her behavour more graceful and free; all which made her infinitely more amiable. Moreover, the beauty of her mind was as much bettered, as that of her body, and her being at Elephantine, had ſo taught her the air and garb of the world, that ſhe ſeemed to be, as indeed ſhe was, a great Princeſs, diſguiſed in the habit of a Shepherdeſs: Seſoſtris for his part, was grown infinitely more amiable alſo, his behaviour was more high, and his ſpirit more bold and refined: Thus theſe two young perſons, finding each other worthy of freſh admiration, it is no wonder if their affections were greater than before, yet for all this, there was ſome ſuch alterations in the way of Timareta, as made Seſoſtris have many an angry hour; for as this young beauty did certainly love more than before, ſo ſhe did expreſs it leſs; ſo, that at the firſt private conference which they had together, after the return of Seſoſtris, he complained of her cruel change in her behaviour, who being now more circumſpect than when ſhe was young, would not let all her heart be ſeen in her tongue: I beſeech you fair Timareta, ſaid he unto her, from whence proceeds this alteration which I perceive in you? And why do you treat me more ſeriouſly and more coldly than before you uſed? You may (replied ſhe and ſmiled) leave out one of your laſt words, which you uſed, ſince I have done nothing which can make you think I treat you more coldly; I confeſs I have left off a little of my childiſh ſimplicity, and merriments of my infancy. Ah Timareta, replied he, do not, under the colour of that cruel expreſſion, deprive me of that ſweetneſs which heretofore you bleſſed me withal; but let me at the leaſt take ſome conſolation in things that are paſt, though I cannot in the things preſent.

To ſhew you that I am not rigorous (ſaid Timareta to him) I promiſe you never to forget how I owe my life unto you, but at the ſame time I conjure you to forget all the innocent paſſages of my infancy, not to regulate in meaſure the reſt of my life by what is paſt; for truly Seſoſtris, I have ſpoke a hundred thouſand things, which makes me bluſh to think of them, and which I ſhall never ſpeak again: Why? (ſaid Seſoſtris) do you think it juſt, you ſhould treat me worſe than you did, becauſe you have more ſpirit and wit than you had? and becauſe you are more fair, and conſequently I more your captive, therefore you ſhould be more rigorous to me? I conceive, ſaid ſhe and ſmiled, that now there is more decorum to be obſerved; and though I ſhould love you, yet I ſhould not tell you ſo, but it is your part only to gueſs at it; It muſt needs be confeſſed, ſaid Seſoſtris, that this faſhion is a little too Tyrannical and unjuſt, for am I not the very ſame I was when you lived in more freedom with me? No, ſaid ſhe unto him, you are now a much more refined man: But admit I be, replied he, muſt you therefore uſe me worſe? No, replied ſhe, but I do it to get more of your eſteem: Ah, Timareta, anſwered Seſoſtris, rigour is an ill expedient, whereby to get the eſteem of a Lover: I aſſure you, ſaid ſhe, I think it is a better than indulgence: For all your rigour (ſaid he, and ſhewed her the medal which Simandius gave him) you cannot hinder me from having your Picture; 'tis true, ſaid he, it does not fully reſemble you, but however it is not more unlike you, than your ſelf is, to what you were unto me in that age when you ſuffered me to look on your eyes without turning them away. Timareta taking this medal, and looking upon it, was extreamly ſurpriſed, to find the figure of a woman on the one ſide of it, whoſe air did much reſemble hers; ſo that having a longing deſire to know how he came unto it, and how it came to reſemble her, ſhe began to be importunate with him to tell her: Then would he, according to his intentions, have given her all that Simandius gave him, yet by no means would ſhe receive them, but preſſed him ſtill to tell her, how he got ſo much riches, and asking him further, how after this he could return to be a

Shepherd: Give me leave (ſaid he unto her) to begin my anſwer, where you ended, and to tell you, that I am a Shepherd becauſe you are a Shepherdeſs, and when you leave being ſo, I will then caſt away my Crook; and for all the reſt (ſaid he, ſeeing me coming towards them) you may know them from the mouth of Miris. As I heard theſe laſt words, I asked Timareta, after I had ſaluted her, what it was I ſhould tell her, and ſhe telling me, I made a relation of our voyage; but ſince I was to acquaint Timareta with the valour of Seſoſtris, he would needs impoſe ſilence upon me; but ſeeing he could not, he roſe up and went to Ediſea who was coming towards us; ſo I made an exact relation of all his acts, how great a reputation he had gotten under the name of Pſammetites, and which way he came by the medal; but whilſt I related all theſe things, I perceived ſuch joy in the eyes of Timareta, as plainly appeared Seſoſtris was not a little in her favour. In the mean time, Sir, what aſſurances ſoever Ediſea gave this amorous Shepherd, that Amenophis had changed his mind, and promiſed at parting, that at his return he would give him full ſatisfaction; yet he had a miſtruſt in all theſe fair words, and if Timareta had not been as wiſe as fair, Seſoſtris had certainly carried her away out of the Iſle, before the return of Amenophis: but ſhe was ſo angry at the very firſt motion of it, that he never durſt think of it afterwards, for ſhe continued three whole days, and would not ſpeak unto him, though he courted her with all imaginable plauſibility: yet after a thouſand petitions for a pardon, and as many promiſes to ſubmit totally unto her will, Seſoſtris made his peace, and reſolved according to the orders of this fair Shepherdeſs, to reſt quiet until the return of Amenophis; ſo that after this reconcilement, wherein I was a mediator, they lived together without the leaſt jar, unleſs only ſuch as are eſſential redintegrations of love, as are every day both in and out a hundred times; yet was their tranquility much moleſted by the death of Ediſea, who being gone, Timareta had no reaſonable converſation but in the company of Seſoſtris. Thraſeas doubtleſs was a man of much ſpirit, and was much civilized by the long communication of Amenophis; Nicetis his wife was alſo a little more ſociable, by the company of Ediſea: but for all that, they were nothing ſutable to the youth and air of Timareta; and therefore having no other agreeable company, ſhe was the more joyed in that of Seſoſtris, yet ever with much reſervedneſs, making it appear, that ſhe would give her ſelf no more liberty, than Ediſea her governeſs would were ſhe living: yet this reſervedneſs had nothing in it but modeſty, without any rigour or ſeverity; ſo that after all tears were dried up for the death of Ediſea, Seſoſtris was without any inquietudes, but to ſee Amenophis returned not; and becauſe he thought the longer his abſence was, the more was his happineſs deferred: But, Sir, his longing expectations of Amenophis were all in vain, for he was faln into a deſperate Adventure. For be pleaſed to know, Sir, that as he was going to the places where all the Officers of that faction which he had raiſed, were covered, he was ſo unfortunate, as in going through the Town of Nea, which is in the Province of Thebes, and where there was a ſedition raiſed, that Amenophis and his ſervant, chanced to be in the midſt of this Tumult, againſt their wills: In the mean time, as ill luck was, one of the principal men of the Town was hurt, and was ſo near Amenophis and his ſervant, that they with many others were taken as authors of this ſedition, the party of the hurt man prevailing againſt the other. Thus was Amenophis and his ſervant a long while priſoners; for being ſtrangers, they had no ſupport, Amenophis not daring to make uſe of any his friends in Thebes, ſince thoſe who were Maſters of this Town were for Amaſis: So that he was forced to truſt only unto his innocency: But thoſe who were real Criminals, and were taken with him, having kindred and friends in the Town, they were releaſed, and the innocent more cloſely kept in their Priſon. Yet could they not proceed unto judgment againſt them, becauſe they would firſt ſee what became of him who proſecuted againſt them, being in his bed; it was long before they could be certain whether he would mend or end, live or dye; ſo that the puniſhment being to be more or leſs rigorous according to the event, Amenophis and his ſervant were kept Priſoners, not being able, or daring if they could, to apply themſelves unto any. Amenophis was extream grieved at one thing, for he found that he had loſt Ladice's Letter to Amaſis in the Tumult, by means of which he hoped hereafter to make Seſoſtris and Timareta known, and which he would needs carry with him, both becauſe he would by it juſtifie himſelf unto his friends, and becauſe he would not truſt it any where but where he was himſelf. But whilſt he was in this pitiful Condition, the Nile did ſwell, and afterwards returned again within its ordinary banks, as always it uſed towards Winter. Heracleon drawing his Forces out of the winter Garriſons, did ſuppreſs thoſe which revolted, and almoſt quite defeated them, ſo that they were forced all to retreat into Thebes. Yet Heracleon could not beſiege them, but contented himſelf with being Maſter of the field, and have, by this action, obtained greater favour with the King. This happy ſucceſs perſwading Amaſis, that his beſt courſe to keep the People in their obedience, was to ſhew himſelf in all his Provinces, and to Perambulate all his Kingdom; he began to go from Town to Town, to win their ſpirits, and to imprint a new Reſpect. And that his voyage might ſeem only a Progreſs of Peace; the King would have all his Court with him: at laſt, Sir, he came to Elephantine: and he was no ſooner there, but the imperfection and weakneſs of his eyes did ſo augment, that he thought he ſhould have quite loſt his ſight: but that which did moſt affright him, was a terrible apparition which he then ſaw: I am confident it was rather one of thoſe myſterious dreams, which ſometimes foretels men of future accidents, than a real apparition: however it was, Amaſis ſaid, that when he awaked one night, an hour before day, he ſaw, or at leaſt thought he ſaw a gloomy light, by the help of which, he perceived the Ghoſt of Apriez, and diſtinctly ſaw the wounds he received when he was moſt barbarouſly maſſacred; The body was all bloody and disfigured: but the great amazement of all, was to ſee following the dead King, the Princeſs Ladice, in a great ſad mourning Mantle, who looking upon him with a menacing kind of action, and angry eyes, began to ſpeak theſe words, in ſuch a lamentable, penetrating and terrible a tone, that Amaſis was almoſt out of his wits. Know (ſaid ſhe, and ſhewed him this unfortunate King) that this unhappy Prince whom thou didſt deſtroy, hath left a Son: and if thou doſt not reſtore unto him that Crown which thou diſt pull from the head of his Father: thou ſhalt never ſee any other more pleaſing object than this thou now ſeeſt, but ſhall ſee it, or worſe continually. Yes, too ambitious Amaſis, (purſued the Ghoſt) thou ſhalt neither ſee thy Subjects, nor the Scepter which thou moſt injuriouſly holdſt: nor the infant which I left thee, nor the common light: but thou ſhalt eternally ſee me upbraiding thee with thy Crime, until thou entereſt into thy holy Tomb: After this a thouſand flaſhes of Red, Blue, and Black Flame appeared, wherein the bodies of Apriez and Ladice vaniſhed: Theſe Flames were accompanied with ſo great a noiſe, as he thought the Chamber ſhaked: ſo that paſſing out of theſe affrighting flames into a diſmal obſcurity, and out of a horrid noiſe into a deep ſilence, Amaſis was ſo troubled that he knew not what to think or reſolve upon: his wonder was doubled, when he was told in the morning, that it rained a whole hour together in the night: For, Sir, ſince Rain was never ſeen in that part of Egypt, the Prodigie did the more affright him. But he had another cauſe of fear: For news was brought, that Apis, whoſe Birth had rejoyced all Egypt a little before, was dead with the flaſh of Lightning and Thunder; I will not explain what this Apis was amongſt us, for I know, Sir, you cannot be ignorant of it: By theſe you may know that Amaſis had ſome cauſes of fear, and the more, becauſe the Statue of Oſiris which he erected before his Palace, fell down in the night; yet would this Prince conceal his aſtoniſhment, and ſent to conſult with the Oracle of Latona at the Town of Bulte, which is the moſt renowned of all in Egypt: But this Oracle did not give him any ſatisfaction, for it anſwered him in obſcure terms. That if he would have his Poſterity Reign after him, he muſt reſtore that Scepter which he had uſurped, unto him who had right unto it: or otherwiſe he ſhould not only loſe his ſight, but his eyes and life. Amaſis then ſeeing himſelf ſo cruelly threatned, and finding that really his ſight did weaken, began to ſtrive againſt his ambition, and would have overcome it, yet he could not bring it about: ſo that endeavouring all manner of ways to ſecure himſelf, he began to tranſact as if he apprehended nothing, tho in his heart he was full of continual apprehenſions: This being the ſtate of things, they brought Ladice's Letter unto Amaſis, which Amenophis loſt in the Tumult, and which was found by an Officer of Amaſis in that Town, who ſent it unto the King, not knowing who loſt it: It coming unto the hands of the King, he no ſooner ſaw it, but notwithſtanding the weakneſs of his eyes, he perfectly knew the Character: you may eaſily imagine that he read it with wonder, and application: and the more becauſe he was extreamly joyed to underſtand that Ladice had left him a child: But, Sir, one thing chanced which is worthy of obſervation: For Ladice's Letter was ſo tumbled in the tumult, that it could not be diſcerned whether it mentioned a Son or a Daughter, but it was more like to be a Son than a Daughter: He ſaw in the place where ſhe ſpoke of a child which ſhe left; It was this

Know then that I have left you a ——————— which you ſhall never ſee unleſs you render the Scepter unto the young Seſoſtris.

In the mean time, ſince he underſtood by this letter, that when Ladice writ it the young Seſoſtris was alive, yet he never thought of reſtoring the Scepter unto him. But intended onely to leave it unto the Child which Ladice left, whether it was Son or Daughter. He had alſo a conceit that perhaps Ladice was not dead: and he was ſo blinded with ambition, that he began already to diſpoſe of this Child, though it was not in his power, nor knew where to look it, no, nor was certain of its life: Then he told Heracleon, that ſince his late Father helped him unto the Crown, it were juſt he ſhould transfer it into his houſe: and therefore he promiſed him, that if he could find the Child which the gods had given him, he would then pay thoſe debts which he owed unto his houſe in general, and unto his valour in particular: paſſing his word, that if it proved a Daughter, he would marry her unto him: and if a Son, he ſhould marry the Princeſs his Siſter, whoſe name was Liſerina: who knowing that her brother was at Elephantine, came thither to ſee him; this Princeſs being then not above three furlongs from that Town. In the mean while, this Letter being found in a publick place, none knew who loſt it: So that Amaſis was much perplexed; and the more, becauſe it appeared by this Letter, that the Son of Apriez lived when it was writen; yet he was perſwaded that now he was dead, becauſe he appeared not at Thebes, and in the head of the revolted Army: However to be the better ſatisfied, he remembred that Amenophis departed from Says with the Queen, and knew that he was of the Town of Elephantine; alſo he imagined, that he could perhaps reſolve him of what he ſo much deſired to know, and therefore he would cauſe a ſtrict ſearch to be made in all that great Town and places about it, he would alſo ask all his kindred that he found: But my Mother hearing of theſe intentions, ſhe went preſently out of Elephantine: So that ſhe only being able to give them any intelligence of him, their ſearch came to nothing. But at laſt the Governour of that Town, underſtanding that no ſearch had been made in our Iſle; and the King hearing of it, as if he were prompted by a powerful inſtinct, commanded a ſearch to be made there, and an account of what was found to be given unto him. The Kings Command being the ſame hour executed, we were much aſtoniſhed to ſee the officers of Elephantine come betime in the morning into our Iſle; who went from Cabin to Cabin, asking who dwelt there; ſo that ours being the greateſt in all the Iſle, they were ſure not to baulk it. Thraſeas anſwered for all his Family, whom they deſired to ſee, ſo that Timareta, Seſoſtris and I appeared before the men, who no ſooner ſaw us, but they began to examine very cloſely who we were. But, Sir, before I preciſely acquaint you with the anſwers of Thraſeas: give me leave to tell you, that ſome days before Amenophis departed from the Iſle, the Prince's ſervant who knew he was to depart, and who exceedingly loved Seſoſtris, deſired Thraſeas extream earneſtly, to have an eſpecial care of him if ever he returned into the Iſle, and not to let him go out again. Thraſeas being a man of good wit, could not chuſe but be full of curioſity, and imagine that Seſoſtris and Timareta both were of ſome Noble births: for Amenophis had confeſſed that the Queen and Ladice were women of great quality, who fled from the perſecution of the new King; alſo he had ſome glances of the abundance of Jewels belonging unto theſe two Princeſſes, which Amenophis cauſed his ſervant to hide, before he departed the Iſle: Thraſeas tried all manner of ways a hundred times over, to know who Seſoſtris and Timareta were, but all in vain; but at laſt he thought he had found a way to oblige this ſervant unto a confeſſion: he told him therefore, when the Servant deſired him to have ſuch a care of Seſoſtris if he returned, that he would have no care of him, unleſs he would tell him who he was: At firſt, the ſervant refuſed, as he had many a time before; but at laſt upon a thouſand promiſes of inviolable fidelity, and the ſervant finding Thraſeas ever both faithful and affectionate: alſo thinking it would be advantagious, if he knew that Seſoſtris was the ſon of Apriez, and legitimate King of Egypt; and after he had ſworn unto him by Oſiris and Iſis, that he ſhould never betray him: Know Thraſeas (ſaid he unto him) that thou art in a poſſibility ere long to be above thy quality; for this Princeſs who was buried here was the wife of Apriez, and the Mother of Seſoſtris, and ſhe who dyed in giving life unto Timareta, was the wife of Amaſis: ſo Thraſeas thou mayeſt have in thy power, the ſon of the legitimate King, and the Daughter of the Uſurper: Judge after this, whether thou beeſt not the happieſt of men, ſince on which ſide ſoever fortune turn, thou wilt have in thy power that perſon who ought to wear the Crown of all Egypt. After the ſervant had told all he knew, Thraſeas was extreamly joyed, and promiſed inviolable fidelity and ſecrecy. After this, Sir, you may well imagine, that when Thraſeas ſaw theſe men in his Cabin, who asked ſo preciſely who Seſoſtris was, who Timareta was, and who I was, he had good reaſon to be aſtoniſhed; but to prevent all croſs interrogatories, and leſs in danger to contradict himſelf, he ſaid we were his children, and that Nicetis was our Mother, never naming Amenophis at all: At firſt the anſwer of Thraſeas did ſurpriſe both Seſoſtris and me, yet imagining there was ſome ſecret reaſon which we were ignorant of, we did not contradict him. In the mean time, thoſe who made ſuch ſtrict inquiſition, looked upon Seſoſtris with admiration, and upon Timareta with as much, and put many queſtions unto Thraſeas, unto which he anſwered very directly; but but ſo did not Nicetis, for though ſhe heard her husband ſay, we were their children, yet when they began to examine her, and ask, how their family did ſubſiſt, in lieu of a direct anſwer, ſhe ſaid, that having but one daughter, they might eaſily ſubſiſt: ſo that the men finding a contradiction between her and her husband, preſently ſuppoſed ſome hidden matter in the wind, and the more, becauſe Thraſeas endeavouring to mend what his wife had ſaid, replied, that Nicetis did not call Seſoſtris and me her children, becauſe he had us by another wife, but for all this we were her children: However, Nicetis not liking what her husband ſaid, ſhe began to grumble, that when Amenophis returned he would not think well that any ſhould take his Son from him. The name of Amenophis was no ſooner pronounced, but one of the officers belonging to Amaſis, being amongſt them who made the ſearch, made no doubt but they had found what the King deſired to know, for he knew that the King had clapt up all the kindred of Amenophis, and he knew further, that he fled away with the Queen and Ladice: ſo that drawing his company aſide, he left them in the Iſle, and went immediately to acquaint the King with his diſcovery: Amaſis no ſooner heard all theſe circumſtances, but he thought them probable conjectures to find in that Iſle what he ſought for, and would go himſelf to be better informed in a buſineſs of ſo great importance: and being then in the Princeſs Liſerina's chamber, where Heracleon alſo was, he would have them go with him; for ſaid he unto them both, you have as much intereſt as I have in the buſineſs I am about, ſince I have already told you, if I have a Son, he ſhall marry the Princeſs Liſerina; and if a daughter ſhe ſhall marry Heracleon: ſo, Sir, the officer of Amaſis confirming his report, with many probable conjectures, Amaſis made no queſtion but to find ſatisfaction: He embarqued then with the Princeſs Licerina, Heracleon, and five or ſix perſons of quality, and no more, for upon this accaſion he would have no greater attendants; ſo they came unto the Iſle, and in landing, you may imagine, Sir, what prayers unto the gods the ambitious Heracleon made, that Amaſis might find a daughter, and you may alſo imagine how Liſerina wiſht him to prove a Son. In the mean time, Thraſeas obſerved, that this officer returned unto Elephantine, and he no ſooner had a hint that Amaſis would come into the Iſle, but he imagined that he came to enquire, what was become of the Queen, of Seſoſtris, and Ladice; ſo that Thraſeas reaſoning after this manner, and having no time to inſtruct Seſoſtris, becauſe there were many obſervant eyes upon them, he walked only towards him, and in paſſing, told him, it concerned his whole fortune not to contradict him: aſſoon as he had ſaid ſo, without any wonder or diſorder in himſelf, he ſat down before his Cabin, Seſoſtris ſtanding by, and leaning upon his Shepherds hook. But, Sir, as thoſe who have any deſigns to pleaſe are no ways negligent in their cloaths, wherein the handſomeſt perſons, may loſe ſomething of their complacency, Timareta and Seſoſtris were ſo handſome that day, and ſo gallant in their habits (though only in the homely ſimplicity of a Shepherd and a Shepherdeſs) that none could look upon them without admiration. In the mean time, the King drawing near the Cabin, Thraſeas roſe up, and went to look upon him, ſeeming as if he could not believe that the King could have any thing to ſay unto him: Seſoſtris, Timareta, and I followed him; on the other ſide, the King coming ſtraight towards us, that officer who before had ſeen us, pointed to us with his hand as he ſpoke unto the King; a man of quality led the Princeſs Liſerina. But, Sir, Heracleon no ſooner caſt his eyes upon Timareta, but he made a million of ſecret prayers unto the gods, that ſhe might prove the daughter of Amaſis: and Liſerena no ſooner ſaw Seſoſtris, but ſhe moſt earneſtly deſired he might prove the King's Son: as for Amaſis, he paſſionately deſired a ſucceſſor, and not a daughter: After he had looked upon Seſoſtris and Timareta, he took Thraſeas aſide, and without any witneſs but Heracleon, he charged him to tell the truth, after which he asked him where Amenophis was? and what was become of the Queen, the young Seſoſtris, and the Princeſs Ladice? For I am ſure (ſaid the King, though he knew not but by conjectures) that they were in this Iſle. Thraſeas finding by the manner of the King's ſpeaking, that he was not ſo well informed as de ſaid he was, reſolved to proſecute his former deſign, which was, Sir, not to confeſs that Seſoſtris was the Son of Apriez, leſt then he ſhould periſh in the hands of his enemy; but to tell him on the contrary, that he was the Son of Ladice and himſelf: For, argued he unto himſelf, ſo Seſoſtris do reign, what matters it whether it be as the Son of Apriez, or as the Son of Amaſis? Thraſeas being thus reſolved, did not deny, but that the Queen was in this Iſle; but for the furtherance of his project, he ſeemed as if he were ignorant that ſhe who came with the Queen was his wife: he confeſſed that the Queen and Seſoſtris came into this Iſle, with another Princeſs who died three days after her arrival, and her death gave life unto a Son: adding, that four days after, a contagious diſeaſe happening in the Iſle, the Queen and the young Seſoſtris died alſo, and ſince that, Amenophis gave the name of Seſoſtris unto the Son of this Princeſs who died in child-bed of him. Where is the Child? (ſaid the King) Sir, (replied Thraſeas) this is he I ſpeak of, who thinks Amenophis to be his Father, and whom of late, I have ſaid to be my Son, becauſe Amenophis was wondrous careful to conceal him, though I knew not his reaſon for it, but was ſo bold as to ſay he was mine. But where is Amenophis, ſaid the King? Sir, replied Thraſeas, I do not know, only I am ſure he recommended Seſoſtris unto me. Oh Heracleon, ſaid the King, queſtionleſs this Traytor who carried away the Queen and Ladice from Sais, had a deſign to arm my own Son againſt me, by perſwading the people that he was the Son of Apriez: yes, yes, Heracleon, 'twas he that made the people of Thebes believe that he was alive, and doubtleſs his deſign was, to have my Son to be taken for that Prince. But Thraſeas (ſaid the King who knew his name) may I give credit unto your words? muſt he whom you ſhew unto me wear the Crown after me? Yes, Sir, replied Thraſeas, if the Princeſs Ladice were your Wife: Moreover, Sir, do not think that I conceal the Son of Apriez, command me to priſon, and if any other Seſoſtris but this be found, then put me to death. But, (ſaid Heracleon, who was nothing pleaſed that Amaſis ſhould have a Son after ſuch fair promiſes) the danger is not in your concealing Seſoſtris, but the point is, to know certainly that this is not Seſoſtris the Son of Apriez, and that he who came from Sais died, and not the Child of the Princeſs Ladice. Thraſeas hearing Heracleon urge this, began to confirm his words with a thouſand deep Oaths: But whilſt Heracleon and Thraſeas were in conteſt about it, the King remembring the Apparition of Ladice, and all the reſt of the prodigies, his heart began to tremble, the guilt of his crimes ſo gnawed upon his conſcience, that he could have wiſhed for a Son of Apriez, unto whom he might have rendered the Scepter, ſo that not inſiſting upon ſuch niceties as Heracleon did, he did believe that Seſoſtris was either his own Son, or the Son of Apriez, ſo that which ſoever he was, he deſerved to reign, he reſolved to acknowledge him after he had well examined others in the Iſle, who ſpoke nothing in contradiction of what Thraſeas ſaid. In the mean while, all the younkers of the Iſle were aſſembled to ſee the King, and not daring to approach too near, they gotten or twelve of them upon a thatcht Sheep-fold, the better to look upon him, but the timber being rotten, both Sheep-fold and Shepherds tumbled down together, and it fell ſo near the Princeſs Liſerina (who being much taken with the beauty of Timareta, had called her unto her) that ſhe could eaſily ſee the wonderful accident which this little diſorder cauſed: For, Sir, be pleaſed to know it happened to be in the very ſame place where Amenophis before his departure had cauſed all the Queens and Ladice's Jewels to be hid, ſo that two Boxes in which they were, being broke open with the fall, one might perceive a thouſand rich Diamonds gliſtering amongſt the rubbiſh of this old Sheep-fold: The Princeſs Liſerina no ſooner eſpied them, but ſhe cried out, not being leſs amazed at the ſight, than thoſe Shepherds with their falls: The ſcreek ſhe made, cauſed the King to turn towards her, and ſhe telling him what ſhe ſpied, he came to her, and himſelf ſaw the cauſe of her wonder: ſo that commanding all the Jewels to be gathered up, and brought unto him, he preſently knew the Caſe of a Picture which Ladice was wont to wear, and which was very remarkable, and likewiſe many other Jewels which he had ſeen both the Queen and Ladice wear. After this, making no queſtion but they had been in the Iſle, he gave more credit unto the report of Thraſeas, and queſtioned not but that Seſoſtris was his Son. But Heracleon, having yet a mind to hinder that belief, obſerved unto Amaſis, that Seſoſtris was too big and tall for that age which his Son could be of, and therefore could not be his Son. Thraſeas anſwered unto this objection, that it was every days experience to find ſome of fourteen or ſixteen years of age as well grown as others of twenty, and the King adhered unto that argument. In concluſion, Sir, Amaſis believing in his very heart he was either his Son or the Son of Apriez, he would examine the matter no further, knowing that it would be a ſtronger ſupport unto him to have a Succeſſor, than not. He ſince confeſſed, that if at this time it had appeared clearly in the eyes of the World, that Seſoſtris was the Son of Apriez, he would not have treated him as he did. But ſeeing it appeared he was not his Son, he could not make him paſs ſo, and reſtore the Scepter unto him, unleſs it did appear to be a Reſtitution, therefore he would not make the buſineſs ſo intricate as perhaps he ſhould if he had not had that thought. But he enquired as much as he could to know whether Seſoſtris was his or the Son of Apriez. Whilſt he was thus buſied, Simandius, who came with the King, and had ſtay'd behind ſpeaking with ſome of his friends, and being now come up, he began to look upon Timareta, whoſe wonderful beauty attracted the eyes of all the world, but afterwards turning towards Seſoſtris, who yet ſaw not him, he preſently knew him to be the valiant Pſammetites unto whom he was debtor for his life; ſo that coming to him, whilſt the King was in talk with Thraſeas, Heracleon, and Liſerina: Is it poſſible, (ſaid he unto him) that the valiant Pſammetites who knows how to uſe a Sword ſo gloriouſly, had rather take a ſheephook in an Iſland, than come to the Court, where preparation of great recompence was made for his virtues? Seſoſtris knowing Simandius, was extreamly aſhamed to be ſeen in ſo mean a habit, and he bluſht; but endeavouring to recollect himſelf, Sir, ſaid he unto him, and ſmiled, methinks it would be as much for your honour as mine, if you ſeemed at this time not to know me. No, no, ſaid Simandius, I cannot endure any falſe Glory, and therefore though you be but a ſimple Shepherd, yet you merit to be a King, and I muſt publiſh to the world, that I am a debtor unto you for my life, and the King for a Victory. Amaſis then turning himſelf with an intention to call Seſoſtris, and acknowledge him for his Son, Simandius taking Seſoſtris by the Arm, preſented him unto Amaſis, behold, Sir, (ſaid he unto him) look upon the Perſon of this lovely Shepherd: this is the Valiant Pſammetites which I told you of, who only won the Battel. The King was ſurpriſed at the words of Simandius, that he told him he was groſly miſtaken, for you call this Shepherd Pſammetites, ſaid he, and every one aſſures me his name is Seſoſtris: I cannot tell, Sir, replied Simandius, how they call my preſerver in this Iſle, but I am ſure he called himſelf Pſammetites in the Army. Seſoſtris perceiving that the changing his name, did extreamly puzzle the King, Simandius, and Thraſeas, who knew not any thing of his martial voyage, began to ſpeak and ſatisfie their wonders; ſince Simandius will needs have it ſo (ſaid he with an excellent grace,) and that I muſt have the honour to be known unto your Majeſty, I muſt needs confeſs that in changing my profeſſion, I changed my name alſo: And that whilſt I was a Souldier, I aſſumed the name of Pſammetites: But why did you return to this Iſle and take a Shepherds hook, (ſaid the King even raviſhed with joy, that he whom he ſhould acknowledge for his Son, was worthy to be ſo,) rather than to come unto the Court? Seſoſtris then being put to a Non-plus, would not ſay that it was for the Love of Timareta, but to colour his return, he ſaid, that ſince he went out of the Iſle without his fathers conſent, he repented, and would return to ask Pardon. However it be, Sir, ſaid Simandius to the King, this Shepherd is the moſt valiant man in your Majeſties Kingdom: and I am confident that the Great Seſoſtris, and the renowned Pſammetites, both which names he bears, were neither of them more valiant than he? At leaſt not more great than he is like to be (replied Amaſis) for I do declare unto you all and all the World, that this Seſoſtris whom you ſee here is my Son. In ſaying ſo, Amaſis would have embraced him: But Seſoſtris, throwing himſelf at his feet, told him with much humility and wonder, that he was unworthy of this honour: Yet riſe he muſt, for the King did ſo command him, appointing all thoſe about him to regard him as ſucceſſor. It is imaginable, Sir, that this declaration was nothing pleaſing unto Heracleon: but on the contrary, that it was all joy unto the Princeſs of Liſerina. On the other ſide, the fair Timareta ſeeing her dear Seſoſtris, ready to change his Sheephook for a Scepter, was infinitely raviſhed. But this her joy had no ſooner filled her eye, than her heart began to ſigh in ſecret, when ſhe conſidered that now ſhe was like to loſe Soſoſtris, and perhaps for ever; Seſoſtris whoſe great Soul was moſt ſenſible of glory, could not chuſe but be glad to ſee he was now no Shepherd: But when in the height of all his joys he looked upon his fair Timareta, and conſidered that now he muſt leave her, his ſorrows did ſo mix and moderate his joys, that the King could not enough admire the greatneſs of his Soul, which was ſo little moved at ſuch ſurpriſing and advantageous news. In the mean time, Heracleon (whoſe fate was to have a Soul which was tyrannized over by the moſt violent paſſions) in the midſt of all his ſorrows to ſee the Princeſs Liſerina more happy than himſelf, could not chuſe but look upon the fair Timareta with much admiration. He checkt himſelf a hundred times for looking upon her, yet looked upon her a hundred times whether he would or no: In the mean time, the King finding more cauſe to think Seſoſtris his Son, ſince he had taken his part againſt the rebels of Thebes, did not pauſe upon what he had to do, or what he had done: but after he had given the Princeſs Liſerina all thoſe Jewels which were found in that Iſle, which he ſaid belonged unto him, either as ſucceſſor unto Apriez, or as Husband unto Ladice; and after he had told the Shepherds he would give them as much as they were worth, and told Thraſeas he would make him a happy man, he turned to Seſoſtris, and asked him whether he would go with him unto Elephantine? Seſoſtris hearing the King ask that queſtion, beſeeched him not to ſhame him ſo much as to carry him thither in that habit, but that he would be pleaſed to let him ſtay in the Iſle until ſuch time he was in a better equipage: Alſo, Sir, ſaid he unto him, it is but fit you give me one day or two to prepare my ſelf for Grandure, leſt the luſtre of it upon a ſudden ſhould dazzle my eyes. No, no, my Son, replied Amaſis, there is no fear but he who can ſurpaſs the braveſt men of all Egypt in valour, is ſufficiently prepared for the quality unto which he was born. For all this, Seſoſtris would not conſent, but uſed ſuch handſome arguments as moved the King unto ſo much complacency, as to ſatisfie his deſire, thinking indeed, that the people, who are always moſt taken with outward appearances, would not be ſo well pleaſed to ſee him in a Shepherds habit. So it was reſolved to leave him all the day following in the Iſle, for an equipage proportionable to his quality could not be prepared in leſs time. Yet the King would not leave him without ſome of his Servants; therefore he commanded the Captain of his Guard to ſtay in the Iſle with twelve of his Companions. Amaſis, by reaſon of the horrid apparition, and other things which took upon his thoughts, never minded what a reſemblance there was between Timareta and Ladice. As for Heracleon and Liſerina, they had never ſeen Ladice. However, Amaſis retired, after he had beſtowed a complement upon the Princeſs

Liſerina, which Seſoſtris underſtood not, but ſhe well enough : So that ſhe looking upon this lovely Shepherd and as a great Prince, who hereafter ſhould be King, and who ſhould make her a Queen, ſhe was as complacential as civil, and as loving to him as poſſibly ſhe could be. Since ſhe was very fair, ſhe did not doubt but the heart of Seſoſtris would become her Conqueſt ; nor did ſhe imagine he was in love with Timareta, or ever would be, for ſhe being of an ambitious diſpoſition, ſhe meaſured the mind of Seſoſtris by her own : And made no queſtion, but if he had any paſſion towards her, he would leave it with his Sheephook : Thus Liſerina left him, with as much joy in her heart as in the Kings, who was beyond all expreſſions raviſhed that he had a ſucceſſor. But quite contrary with Heracleon, who after his hopes in ſeeing Timareta, thought to enjoy the greateſt beauty in the World, and the prime Crown of all the Univerſe ; yet now ſaw all the ſatisfaction of his ambition choaked. But after the King was gone out of the Iſle, Seſoſtris muſt needs receive all the complements which the Shepherds would preſent him withal:For ſince naturally he had a Soul full of all ſweetneſs and civility, he would not ſo ſoon take upon him that ſtate, which his quality conferred upon him, ſo that it was impoſſible for him to ſpeak in private that day with his dear Timareta ; and the more difficult, becauſe the Captain of the Guard deſiring to be the firſt in favour with the new Prince, did not leave him at all. I alſo had much ado to teſtifie my joys at his happineſs : Yet as well as I could I confeſſed my great deſires of telling him I knew Amenophis was not a Shepherd, and begg'd his pardon for not telling him, excuſing my ſelf with the menaces of Amenophis if I did: Alſo, Sir, always thinking that Seſoſtris was his Son, I could imagine no end he had in it, but to conceal himſelf. But to return, Sir, where I left, be pleaſed to know, Sir, that Seſoſtris, and Timareta, did not ſpeak unto each other but in the language of their eyes, and that neither ſo much as uſual : for the reſpects which Timareta began to have of him, infuſed ſuch a conſtraint into her looks, as eclipſed all the ſweetneſs of them ; and which made Seſoſtris, who was accuſtomed to know the moſt ſecret thoughts of her heart by them, not to underſtand their Language: But the next morning being come; and knowing that the day following, they would carry him unto Elephantine, he reſolved to talk with Timareta: in order to which, love moved him unto the firſt Command upon thoſe about him, though he was reſolved not to take upon him as a Prince, until he had left off the habit of a Shepherd: But ſeeing that if he did not, he could not talk with Timareta, and knowing that ſhe was gone to the top of the Hill without any company, but one Shepherdeſs, he followed her, and commanded the Captain of the Guard not to follow him: This Prince then being rid of all interrupters of his talk with Timareta, went up the Hill, and when he came to the top, he found his fair Timareta ſitting at the root of a Tree, wiping her eyes as if ſhe had been crying: Seſoſtris ſeeing his Shepherdeſs in this ſad condition, ſighed, and with ſuch real ſorrow, as I am confident, if fate had been in his own choice, he would have preferred a Shepherds hook before a Scepter, and the gathering of Sheep before people: After then he had a while contemplated upon the Cruelty of his good fortune, he advanced towards Timareta, with intentions to throw himſelf at her feet, and with the ſame reſpects he uſed: but the fair Timareta, turning her head at the noiſe of his walking, and ſpying Seſoſtris, ſhe more and more wiped off her tears, after which, ſtriving to bring joy in her eyes, ſhe roſe up, and ſaluted Seſoſtris with a more reverent civility than ordinary: What do you think of me, Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him) for not finding ſome opportunity to expreſs my joys at your good fortune, and grandure unto which you are raiſed? But, Sir, ſince my deſtiny is to live with Shepherds, not Princes, I durſt not be ſo bold as to tell you my thoughts. Ah, cruel Timareta, (ſaid he unto her) why ſpeak you thus unto me? can you think the alteration of my quality or Fortunes, can alter my heart? No, no, Timareta, deceive not your ſelf, and wrong not me, I am the very ſame unto you now, that I was yeſterday, and you ſhall find me the very ſame upon a Throne, that I am and have been in this Iſle: call me no Sirs, I conjure you, for I declare that you, and only you ſhall reign eternally in my Soul: Moreover my dear and lovely Timareta, do not force your ſelf to rejoyce at the good fortune which is fallen upon me, but on the contrary know, that you cannot more injuriouſly affront my affection, than to rejoyce at any thing that may ſet me fartheſt from you: do not therefore intereſt your ſelf in the fortune more than I my ſelf do; but if you will oblige me, confeſs that I had ſome ſhare in thoſe tears, which I ſaw drop from thoſe fair eyes, when I came firſt unto you. Since you have been a witneſs of my weakneſs (replied Timareta and bluſht) I will confeſs you were the cauſe of my ſorrows, but I muſt confeſs withal, that I did not grieve at your good fortune, though 'tis moſt true that the loſs of you can only grieve me, and the more, becauſe I ſee it is moſt juſt I love you; for really it were a miracle, if you ſhould think upon an unfortunate Shepherdeſs, amidſt all the grandures of a glorious Court; and indeed you are obliged in point of honour, to hide the memory you have had of me, and never to give me any more teſtimonies of your affection: You ſee then, Sir, that it is the loſs of my own good fortune which I lament, and not at your happineſs; for I do proteſt unto you, Sir, that as oft as I look upon you, and conſider, that now your quality is moſt ſuitable to your virtue, I am more joyed at your good fortune, than I am able to expreſs; and when I think how in leaving your Sheephook, you get a Crown in exchange, I am extreamly ſatisfied: For all this, I cannot chuſe but remember, how I have loſt Seſoſtris, and ſhall ſtay in this Iſle without a deliverer; yet I beſeech you, Sir, remember that my ſorrows neither are, nor never ſhall be injurious to you. All the while Timareta was talking thus, Seſoſtris gazed upon her, with ſuch adundance both of love and ſorrow, that he thought he ſhould either have loſt his life, or his wits; and after a moſt attentive and ſighing audience, he began to grieve at his good fortune in good earneſt: Alas Timareta (ſaid he with a face full of ſorrow) am I any thing more than I was? and will they pull me from you to morrow? Yes, ſaid ſhe, and you ought to pull me out of your heart alſo, and perhaps will. Ah, Timareta, cried he, do not add unto my ſorrows, for they are ſo great, that they need no augmentation. No, no, Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him) my language is more reaſonable than yours, and to ſhew you, that my affection and reaſon is not blind, or that I prefer my own ſatisfaction before your glory, I do declare, that there is no reaſon in the world but you ſhould forget Timareta, and that it is not fitting a great Prince ſhould love a ſimple Shepherdeſs. Ah, Timareta, ſaid Seſoſtris, this ſimple Shepherdeſs you ſpeak of, is in my Soul above all the Queens upon earth: However, to morrow about this time you will be in a great and ſtately Court, and I ſhall be in a poor Cabin, rejoycing at your happineſs, and grieving at my own misfortune: thus living in a continual miſcellany of tears for joy, and tears for ſorrow, the unhappy Timareta muſt drone away her days in a deſart, till the day without any hopes of ever ſeeing you again. Oh Heavens (ſaid Seſoſtris tranſported with love and ſorrow) I beſeech you let me ſee you every day: yes Timareta (ſaid he, and kneeled to her) I am ready to forſake the Crown which hangs over my head, if you will for the love of me quit this Iſle: come, let us go, my deareſt Timareta, and ſeek out ſome other deſart, where without any ambition or Crowns, I may only reign in your ſoul, as you reign in mine; let us try if we can eſcape this night following, perhaps I ſhall find a way to ſuborn my guard: for I profeſs to do nothing but what ſhall pleaſe you, and I will marry you at the firſt place we come at, if you pleaſe; I promiſe you alſo never to remember I am the Son of Amaſis, nor pretend to any greater Glory than your love. Your promiſſes, replied Timareta, are infinitely obliging; but for all that, Sir, your honour will not permit me to accept of your propoſitions; you muſt give me leave only to hear them, and you, but never to wrong you: Alas, added ſhe, ſince my deſires aim only that your glory may flouriſh over the whole earth, that you may be the admiration of the people over whom you are to reign, and that you may be happy both in peace and war; I cannot deſire ſo much happineſs to my ſelf, upon any condition of being an hinderance to your felicity. I know, Sir, it is unjuſt to deſire otherwiſe, but I cannot do otherwiſe. I know moreover, that ambition is a paſſion ſo much ſtronger than love, that there is no likelyhood, but the firſt ſtep up unto that Throne, which you ſhall one day mount, will make me loſe the ſight of you. For Heavens ſake (ſaid Seſoſtris) tell me of no ſuch contrarieties, but make ſure of my affection by the ways which I propound. I cannot (replied ſhe) for I would not have it coſt you a Crown; nor can I ever hope, that the Prince Seſoſtris, can be as faithful as the Shepherd Seſoſtris; or though he ſhould, I can never be happy by it, ſince it cannot be, but by his being unhappy. However it be, replied Seſoſtris, I am moſt certain, that I ſhall never love any but Timareta: I cannot aſſure her (added he and ſighed) to put the Crown of Egypt upon her head, for perhaps it will never be in my power: I will ſwear unto her three moſt certain truths, firſt, that I can never be happy without her; ſecondly, if I can I will Crown her a Queen; and laſtly, ſhe ſhall ever reign in my heart. I would I could believe you, replied Timareta, but I muſt confeſs, I cannot; for what teſtimonies of affection ſoever you give me, I can find no ſecurity in them, ſince the Prince Seſoſtris is not obliged to keep any promiſes made by the Shepherd Seſoſtris. But my dear Timareta (ſaid he) now I am no Shepherd, though in the habit of one, I ſwear unto you by all that's ſacred, that I will adore you eternally, and never any but you; for it is not the Shepherd Seſoſtris who hath engaged his word unto you, but it is the Son of Amaſis, who as near as he is to paſs from a Cottage to a Court, and from extream baſeneſs, unto the height of Grandure, doth proteſt unto you, that he had rather die at your feet, than live upon a Throne without you. I beſeech you, Sir, ſaid Timareta, do not ſo much augment my ſorrows, by expreſſing your ſelf ſo infinitely obliging, which will but make me more ſadly lament my loſs. But my deareſt Timareta, ſaid he, you ſhall never loſe my heart: I will wiſh I may not, Sir, replyed ſhe, but I can never hope for it: Ah me, ah, ſaid he, what ſhall I do, that I may perſwade you of that real thirſt in my intentions? Truly, Sir, ſaid Timareta, and ſighed, I ſhould be much puzled to tell you what, for I am extreamly glad you muſt be a King, I am very angry you are not ſtill a Shepherd, and I have thoughts ſo contrary unto each other, that I am aſhamed of my own weakneſs, and the more, becauſe I am not able to hide it from you. Do not call that weakneſs, my deareſt Timareta, ſaid he unto her, which is ſo ſweet a tiſtimony of your conſtant affection; but ſince I do you juſtice in being juſt unto my ſelf, I conjure you to believe, that neither time, abſence, ambition, nor any thing elſe in the earth, can make my mind alter from what I now profeſs; and believe me, there is nothing which I would not do to ſerve you, nor is there any thing I ever will willingly do which ſhall offend you, or interrupt your affection. After this, Sir, Seſoſtris was ſilent, ſorrow would not permit him to ſpeak one word more: Timareta for her part had not power to anſwer one word: 'tis true, they looked upon one another, and ſaw each others heart through their eyes, ſo that they had ſufficient cauſe of ſatisfaction; yet part they muſt, for night did call them; and ſince they thought the next morning would not afford them the liberty of talking together, without too many witneſſes, after all ſerious looks with a ſad ſilence they bad each other adieu, and Seſoſtris being forced to part, he went down the Hill on the one ſide, Timareta went down the other ſide to the Shepherdeſs, who ſtayed for her ſome twenty paces from thence: the next morning, thoſe who were appointed to provide rich cloaths, brought them, and Heracleon with abundance of the Court came to wait upon Seſoſtris, whoſe garb in thoſe rich habits appeared ſo high, that Timareta was the more ſad: gladly would ſhe, if ſhe could have ſtayed in her Cabin, yet ſhe could not; needs muſt ſhe look at Seſoſtris as long as ſhe could, but that ſhe might be leſs obſerved, ſhe got amongſt other Shepherdeſſes about the Port, to ſee him embarque. In the mean time, Heracleon coming into the Iſle, met Timareta as ſhe was going to the Port, and as ſad as ſhe was, he ſaw her ſo very fair, that he was more charmed with her beauty this ſecond time, than the firſt, he had abundance of ſadneſs in his countenance, and ſtill looked upon her as long as he could, and at parting, was as ſorry for her, as Timareta was to part with Seſoſtris: I muſt tell you, Sir, that Seſoſtris and I agreed, that I ſhould ſtay in the Iſle to ſee whether Amenophis would return, to know from him what I ſhould do, this Prince aſſuring me, that as ſoon as he was ſetled in the Court, he would then make his affection to me appear. That which moſt perplexed me, was, that I could not comprehend why Amenophis ſhould have ſuch a care of Amaſis his Son; but not being able to reach the reaſon, I reſted my mind in quiet; yet Seſoſtris conjured me with all the moſt obliging language poſſible to ſpeak of him every day unto his ſhepherdeſs: and indeed ſo I did, for as ſoon as he was imbarqued, I followed Timareta to her Chamber: but alas, Sir, how ſad was our diſcourſe? for ſhe imagining, that ſhe ſhould never ſee, or at leaſt ſpeak to Seſoſtris again as long as ſhe lived, did ſo extreamly grieve, as truly I never ſaw the like. In the mean time, Seſoſtris arriving at the Port of Elephantine, found there one of the fineſt horſes in the World on which he mounted: there being alſo Horſes enough for all that followed him: All the people of that great Town were in the ſtreets to ſee him paſs: A million of high Applauds made the Air Eccho: all the Ladies in the windows ſtood to ſee him paſs, and the Princeſs Liſerina amongſt the reſt, who pretended to have no ſmall intereſt in the Glory of this Prince: you may well imagine, Sir, how Amaſis entertained him, whom he acknowledged for his Son, he expreſſed all poſſible ſigns of tenderneſs, and the more, becauſe Seſoſtris filled all the Court with admiration: for all imaginations being filled with this conceit, that ſince he was found amongſt a company of ſilly Shepherds, his education would appear but mean: yet when they ſaw and heard him ſpeak, they could do nothing elſe but admire: The common People talked of nothing elſe but his handſom Garb; The Ladies of his ſpirit and civility; and Simandius of his Courage: ſo that within the compaſs of eight days, he had got as much eſteem, as if he had been in the Court all his life: Amaſis overjoyed with having a ſucceſſor, forgot not his promiſes to the ſhepherds of the Iſle, for he ſent them much riches, quitted them of tribute, and gave them high priviledges and immunities. But as for Thraſeas in particular, and his family, he thought not this enough: Therefore for a teſtimony of his acknowledgement, he would have him dwell in a Caſtle which was ſome fifty furlongs from Elephantine, ſcituated between a great Lake, and a great Wood: And ſince Thraſeas, had no diſpoſition to alter his profeſſion, he made him the richeſt Shepherd in all Egypt: Alſo he would have Timareta leave the Iſle, and me alſo. But in leaving it, we left orders with the ſhepherds there to acquaint Amenophis if he returned where we were: In the mean while, Seſoſtris, to teſtifie unto Timareta that he forgot her not, and that the beauties of the Court did not dazle his eyes, he ſent a ſervant ſecretly the third day, with a Letter to Timareta, which contained theſe words.

Seſoſtris unto Timareta.

I Have now ſeen all that can be called fair in the Court, but I find not one comparable to your ſelf: Fear not then that I ſhall ever alter my mind: but be aſſured that I am the very ſame in Elephantine, that I was in our deſart, and ſo ſhall continue until the death of Seſoſtris.

You may imagine, Sir, how joyfully Timareta received this teſtimony of fidelity from Seſoſtris: But perhaps you cannot comprehend that exceſſive ſorrow which followed her Raptures of joy. For, ſaid ſhe unto me, what will it avail me to have Seſoſtris continue faithful, ſince, conſidering the unſutableneſs of our qualities, he cannot continue his affection, unleſs he do that which in the common opinion of the world, is unworthy of himſelf? Is not this the very height of infortunacy, that the love Seſoſtris bears unto me ſhould be a ſhame unto him? Conſtancy, which in it ſelf is a virtue, would be now a weakneſs in Seſoſtris, if he ſhould continue loving me: yet I muſt needs confeſs, I wiſh he would not change, ſince we are never like to ſee each other: And ſince ſo, we run no hazards, neither in my Reputation, nor he in his Glory; But, alas, it ſhall never be ſaid, Seſoſtris has the heart of a Shepherd in the habit of a Prince; therefore, my dear Miris (ſaid this ſad Shepherdeſs) It is moſt fit that Seſoſtris ſhould forget me, and I him: But alas, to me it is impoſſible, and therefore ſhe diſſembled her thoughts in anſwering the Prince in theſe words.

Timareta unto the Prince Seſoſtris.

SIR,

I Cannot better acknowledge the honour which you are pleaſed to do me, than by conjuring you to forget me: and for ever to deprive me of the only thing in the World which can delight me: The ſacrifice which I offer is great: But how infinite is the debt owing unto the Prince Seſoſtris from the Shepherdeſs

Timareta.

This Letter did not ſo well pleaſe the Prince, as his Letter did Timareta, nor was it long before he anſwered it, and before he moved her to write more ſincerely and more obligingly. Yet Timareta did always write with ſo much reſervedneſs, that though Seſoſtris complained, yet he eſteemed her the more. In the mean while, ſome days being ſpent in publick Feaſts, Amaſis ſent for Seſoſtris, and told him, that ſince he intended the Princeſs of Liſerina for his wife, he would acquaint him with it, to the end he might apply himſelf to win her heart as he had already her eſteem. Seſoſtris hearkned unto this motion with much reſpect, but more ſorrow, inſomuch as he had much ado to hide it: For his violent love of Timareta told him, he muſt never marry any other. Yet did he not contradict the motion which Amaſis made, but told him, that it were fit to give the Princeſs Liſerina ſo much time as to forget ſhe had ſeen him a ſhepherd: and he ſpoke ſo handſomly, and with ſo much judgement, that Amaſis thought that Seſoſtris only deſired to have ſome aſſurance of the Princeſs Liſerina's affection before he married her, though it be not the cuſtome of Kings and Princes to marry with that conſideration. But the King thinking this ſmelt too much of a Shepherd told him, that Princes did not marry as other men, but married more for their people than themſelves, and therefore they had not always the freedom of their choice: In ſhort, Amaſis ſpoke with ſo much ſoveraignty, that Seſoſtris would not gainſay his will: but ſince the King thought he had conſented, he told him that he would give him ſome days reſpite, before he made a publication of it: When Seſoſtris parted from the King, he retired to his Chamber full of extream ſorrow: Till now he looked upon Liſerina with much indifferency: but ſince this, he looked upon her with unalterable averſion: and as oft as he conſidered that Amaſis would marry him unto her, he was ready to run out of his wits: for love does often drive one to hope for not only things difficult, but even things impoſſible. Seſoſtris, ſometimes hoped that happily Amaſis would not force him to marry her, but that when it ſhould pleaſe the gods to afford him a fit opportunity of retiring himſelf from the World, he would then marry his fair Shepherdeſs, as well as many Kings of Egypt had married with Grecian ſlaves. In concluſion, Sir, Seſoſtris reſolved to imploy all his poſſible endeavours, to defer the marriage, leaving the reſt to the Conduct of the gods. In the mean time, Heracleon was as full of reſtleſs thoughts as he, though in a different way, for certainly ambition was the torture of his mind. But ſince he could not alter the order of things as he pleaſed, how envious ſoever he was to ſee Seſoſtris ſo near the Crown; he complied with him as with a Prince, whoſe friendſhip he would gain, though himſelf could not Raign: and endeavoured to divert him with all poſſible complacency: yet Seſoſtris could not affect the converſation of Heracleon: for beſides his imperious diſpoſition, he conſidered him as the brother of Liſerina, who he thought did eagerly put on his marriage with this Princeſs; inſomuch as he could not poſſibly affect him. In the mean time, ſince Civility would not permit him to fall out with him, they were continually together. And Heracleon conceiving he could not poſſibly deviſe any diverſion more ſutable to his age than hunting: He invited him very often to that ſport, wherein Seſoſtris ſeemed to take great delight; more affecting to be in the fields and woods, where he might ſometimes entertain his own thoughts, than to be in Elephantine, where he was very often conſtrained to entertain Liſerina. But, Sir, be pleaſed to know, that Heracleon and he being one day hunting together, the beaſt which they purſued, did lead them near the Caſtle where Thraſeas dwelt, ſo that riding along the Lake they ſaw the fair Timareta walking by the water ſide, and in ſuch a profound ſtudy, that the merry cry of the dogs, and the ſhrill muſique of the Horns could hardly make her look up, and ſee who paſſed by her. But at laſt the noiſe being ſo loud and near, ſhe turned aſide with a languiſhing look, as if ſhe had been married unto a crabbed Husband, who interrupted her ſtudy: And ſhe no ſooner lifted up her eyes, but Seſoſtris and Heracleon knew her, and ſtopt; letting the Chaſe run on. Timareta no ſooner ſaw them ſtop, but ſhe knew them alſo; and bluſhing, ſhe ſeemed more fair than ever, and ſo charmed the eyes of Heracleon, that in talking to Seſoſtris he could not chuſe but extol her. Seſoſtris was grieved to the very ſoul, that he durſt not throw himſelf at the feet of his fair Shepherdeſs, whom he ſo much reſpected all the while he was a Shepherd. But at laſt, his love ſurmounting all other conſiderations: Though I ſhall appear a ſhepherd in the habit of a Prince (ſaid he, and laughed) as Achilles did a boy in the habit of a woman when he could not chuſe but wear a ſword, I muſt ſtay one minute, and ſpeak unto this fair Shepherdeſs; were it for nothing but to ask how he doth with whom I lived. For my part, ſaid Heracleon, I am much joyed at the motion, only out of a deſire to pleaſe my ſelf in looking upon her. After this theſe two Princes alighted from their horſes, and went to Timareta, who continuing on her walk, went towards Nicetis, who was not far off, but ſhe was prevented by theſe two Princes, who ſuiting their civilities according to her beauty, not her quality, did accoſt her as if ſhe had been of their own. Their diſcourſe with her was long, though nothing of privacy, or any thing of concernment; yet ſhe ſpoke with ſo much ſpirit and grace, as when they parted Heracleon was no leſs in love than Seſoſtris: So that coming out of Elephantine with two, but love and ambition, he returned with three, ſince certainly he grew jealous as ſoon as in love; for though Seſoſtris in ſpeaking to Timareta did keep a careful diſtance, and though Timareta on her ſide did examine every word, and did regulate their very looks, yet maugre all their precaution, Heracleon ſaw in their eyes ſome ſparks of that fire which burned in their hearts, ſo that both his Love and his Jealouſie begun both at once: But for his better ſatisfaction, in their way to Elephantine, he asked the Prince Seſoſtris, whether it was poſſible he could ſo long live with Timareta, and not be in love? Seſoſtris, who for ſeveral reaſons would not have it thought he was in love with this Shepherdeſs, told him handſomely, that it was with beauty as with the Sun, continual looking upon it, makes it never admired; and he being brought up with Timareta from the cradle, he ever thought her fair, but never found matter of adoration in her. But ſince Seſoſtris could not ſay this without his face betrayed his tongue, as his tongue belyed his heart, Heracleon was confirmed in his opinion; he being a man violent in all things, and poſſeſſed with the three moſt violent paſſions that the heart of man is capable of, he preſently began to endeavour ways for the ſatisfaction of them all: But ſince Love was the paſſion moſt predominate, he did oftentimes uſe to come and look for Timareta, not only by that water ſide, but in the houſe where they dwelt, though ſhe entreated him with as much wiſdome as modeſty not to put himſelf unto the trouble; and in every viſit he grew ſo deep in love, that it almoſt ſtifled his ambition, and the more, becauſe he found in her as much virtue as beauty, and an invincible reſiſtance. As for Seſoſtris, ſince more eyes were upon him than Heracleon, he could not ſo eaſily ſee her, and it was only once that he found an opportunity to ſteal ſo much time as to talk with her, and then he was ſo unhappy as it was known unto Heracleon, who was almoſt choaked with deſpair. In the mean time, Amaſis thinking he had given long enough time for conſideration unto Seſoſtris, began to publiſh unto all the world, that he would marry him with the Princeſs Liſerina. The firſt Ceremonies were performed:

ed: So that ſince all Marriages of perſons of this quality are quickly divulged, it was not only known at Elephantine, but the news was carryed as far as Timareta: But when the wiſe and prudent Timareta did plainly foreſee, that as ſoon as Seſoſtris ceaſed from being a Shepherd, the King would infallibly oblige him to marry, ſhe grieved exceedingly, yet endeavoured all ſhe could to hide her ſorrows, but could not; for I have heard her expreſs her ſelf concerning Seſoſtris ſo generouſly, ſo wiſely, and yet ſo paſſionately, and obligingly, that I diſcovered more grandure of ſpirit and ſoul in her than ever before. In the mean while, Seſoſtris was not leſs ſad than ſhe: Liſerina only, who courted the Crown more than the affection of Seſoſtris, ſhe had all the joy poſſible; yet ſhe thought it ſomewhat ſtrange that the Prince, ſo full of ſpirit as he was, ſhould look upon her only with eyes of civility: But the predominate paſſion of her heart being ſatisfied, ſhe cheared up her ſelf, eſpecially ſeeing that in all appearance, nothing could hinder her marriage: the reports whereof were ſo generally divulged, that none made any queſtion of it: It ſeemed as if the ceremonies were to be performed at Elephantine, at which the King was well pleaſed; and ſhe hoped her happineſs was now ſo nigh, that nothing could prevent it: But what ſhe called happineſs Seſoſtris called miſery: and indeed his ſoul was ſo wholly devoted unto Timareta, that the luſter of her fair eyes dimmed all the other beauties of the Court: ſince he ſaw the noiſe of his marriage was ſo loud as it might reach her ear; he could not reſt until he found an opportunity to ſteal away and viſit her; and to that end, he went unto his Chamber one evening very timely, and took horſe immediately at the Palace Garden door, and went unto Timareta: he knew Thraſeas went not to bed ſo ſoon as others, becauſe his flocks of ſheep were late in the field: But we were much aſtoniſhed to ſee this Prince arrive ſo late with one ſervant, which uſed to bring his Letters unto Timareta: who then was in the walk towards the Lake, where the Trees not being very thick, the light of the Moon was light enough. A young Shepherdeſs, who ſerved Nicetis, was in the ſame walk where the Prince came to ſeek Timareta, after he had given me order to keep Thraſeas from interrupting them: Seſoſtris was full of moſt tender expreſſions to her: he offered her a hundred times the very ſame he did in the Iſle, where their love had original. He proffered to renounce all Grandure, Court and Crown, ſo ſhe would but follow his fortune: And this Generous Shepherdeſs did a hundred times conjure him, to do nothing unworthy of that Grandure unto which he was raiſed, and to propoſe nothing unto her unworthy of his virtue: But ſay what ſhe could, he was ſtill in the ſame tune, and ſaid he would never marry Liſerina, conjuring her not to let any reports or appearances delude her, but conſtantly to believe, that he would never be anies but hers. Timareta contradicted this laſt expreſſion of Seſoſtris, but it was very faintly, for ſhe had not ſo much power over her ſelf as to adviſe him unto a marriage with Liſerina: but ſhe told him reſolutely, ſhe would not have him quit the Court, nor carry her away: but when he talked of his marriage with Liſerina, her tongue could not betray her heart, all her expreſſions were blaſted: Little and weak perſwaſion was in her Eloquence. Moreover, Timareta being very prudent, ſhe thought not fit to acquaint Seſoſtris with all the viſits of Heracleon. For ſince ſhe knew him to be in favour with Amaſis, ſhe thought it not wiſdom to ſow any ſeeds of diviſion between them. But on the other ſide, ſhe thought it not diſcretion to ſay nothing to him: therefore ſhe told him, that ſometimes as his hunting chaſe drew him that way he would call: But ſince Seſoſtris had obſerved that Heracleon's heart was wounded with the beauty of Timareta, though ſhe ſpoke nothing of it, yet he believed him to be deeply in love: But yet he feared not to drive him far enough from the heart of this lovely Shepherdeſs, ſo that he parted very well ſatisfied from her, and likewiſe ſhe from him, conſidering the ſtate preſent of their fortunes. In the mean while, Heracleon's heart being torn in pieces by three unruly paſſions, he could not chuſe but open himſelf unto a friend of his named Taniſis, whoſe ſpirit was not only ſubtle, but capable of all villanies and cheats in the World, reſpecting neither Divine nor Humane Laws, and followed no other rule of life, but what would pleaſe or profit him: yet did he appear in the eyes of all the World in another vizard; and having ſpirit and wit enough, he palliated all his villanies with vertuous ſemblances, the better to compaſs his ends: yet had he no intimate friend but Heracleon only, but the League between them two was ſo great and cloſe, that none could be greater. In the mean time, as I told you, Heracleon acquainted Taniſis with the preſent poſture of his ſoul, ſo aggravating the Grandure of his love, of his jealouſly and of his Ambition, that he perceived the miſeries which he endured, required extream remedies. And that let them be what they would, he was able to ſerve him. Firſt Taniſis, who thought it more expedient to ſatisfie the Ambition of his friend, than his love, becauſe himſelf had more intereſt in that paſſion than the other, told him, that at what rate ſoever it was, he muſt hinder the marriage between Seſoſtris and the Princeſs Liſerina: In order to which, he muſt ſo protract it, that Amaſis who was not well, might firſt die, before it was accompliſhed, ſince it was likely he would not live long: It was thought that he adviſed to poyſon him, to the end he might hinder Seſoſtris from being acknowledged his ſucceſſor, and that he might be ſucceſſor himſelf: As for the ſatisfaction of his love, Taniſis could not imagine, that the heart of a ſimple Shepherdeſs could hold out againſt a man of Heracleon's quality: he adviſed him firſt to have recourſe unto preſents, and afterwards to carry her away: As they were thus buſied, and Heracleon ſaw nothing to do but to put the adviſe of Taniſis in execution, one of his ſervants came to tell him, that the Kings Officer, who had been unjuſtly accuſed for raiſing that tumult which was in a Town within the Province of Thebes, deſired to ſpeak with him. But, Sir, before I acquaint you with what this Officer told Heracleon, give me leave to put you in memory, that it was the very ſame man who found dying Ladice's Letter where Amenophis loſt it, and who afterwards let it fall in Elephantine, where he was forced to retire until his friends had procured his

Juſtification. After this, Sir, be pleaſed to know, that when he came within two days journey of Elephantine, unto one of his friends, he fell ſick with ſorrow, and to that height, as a Feaver ſeiſed upon him, which for ſome days bereft him of his reaſon, but after he was recovered, and enquired of the paſſages in the world, he was much ſurpriſed to underſtand that the King had that Letter which he loſt, and the more to hear that Seſoſtris was acknowledged for his Son: For Ladice's Letter not being ſealed, when this Officer found it, he read it, and remembred very well that Ladice told the King ſhe had left him a Daughter, and not a Son: So that not knowing what to think, he wondered that Amaſis, knowing the Princeſs his Wife's hand, ſhould not give credit unto her words; for thoſe with whom he was, were ignorant that the Letter was a little torn or defaced; ſo that to be better ſatisfied, he writ unto one of his friends in Elephantine: but before he began to write, he looked in this Table book, in which he had put dying Ladice's Letter before he was ſick, and there miraculouſly found a little bit of the Letter which made it apparent, that Ladice left a Daughter, and not a Son: So that then apprehending the miſtake of Amaſis, and knowing how he had formerly expreſſed himſelf, that if it were a Daughter, Heracleon ſhould marry her, he thought that he had found out a way to undeceive the King of his errour, to make Heracleon happy, and to raiſe himſelf a fortune: And therefore he carefully ſealed up this little bit of the Letter, and as weak as he was he came to Elephantine in the night, going ſtreight unto Heracleon's houſe, and found him in the company of Taniſis, as I told you. At firſt he deſired to ſpeak with him in private, but Heracleon telling him, that nothing was ſo ſecret which Taniſis ſhould not know, he began to tell him, how he had found Ladice's Letter, and how he had loſt it, and how he had found that which would convince Amaſis of his errour in thinking Ladice left him a Son; for it would be eaſie to prove it unto the King by that little bit of the Letter which mentioned a Daughter, and which was torn out of the Letter; ſo that comparing this bit with the Letter it ſelf, he might find them ſo evenly jump, that the King might be put out of all errour. Heracleon was beyond all expreſſion glad, that he could render the birth of Seſoſtris doubtful; but to go ſurely to work, he would have this Officer concealed in his houſe, and examine all things at more leaſure, conjuring him to have a ſpecial care of that which muſt take the Crown from his Siſter and Seſoſtris, and put it upon his own head; for he made no queſtion but Timareta was Daughter unto Amaſis: Yet could he not deviſe why Thraſeas ſhould diſguiſe the truth. But ſince it appeared that Ladice had a Daughter, it muſt neceſſarily follow that there was ſome impoſture in the relation of Thraſeas: So that to ſift the matter before it came to the King, Heracleon and Amaſis reſolved to tamper with Thraſeas, and either by promiſes or menaces to ſcrew the matter out of him: This courſe being reſolved upon, Heracleon and Taniſis went to the houſe of Thraſeas, and came thither before the Sun was up, or Timareta awake. But the more to oblige unto a true relation, Heracleon would tell him at firſt what he knew: I come hither (ſaid he unto him) to make you confeſs the truth of the buſineſs which I know as well as your ſelf, but to know what reaſon you had to tell the King a lye, and to make him moſt unjuſtly to acknowledge Seſoſtris for his Son, and to obſcure that Daughter which the Princeſs Ladice left him? Speak, Thraſeas (ſaid he) tell me your reaſon for it, but never go about to maintain Seſoſtris to be his and Ladice's Son; for know, that the King within theſe two days muſt ſee all that wants in Ladice's Letter, which will apparently prove the King is gulled, and that Seſoſtris is not his Son, and that all tortures that can be deviſed will be inflicted upon you to make you ſpeak the truth: yet if you will truſt me, and tell me truly why you put this impoſture upon him, and where the Daughter of Amaſis is, I will promiſe not only to protect you, but to keep you in the King's favour: And if you will confeſs unto me that Timareta is his Daughter, and do as I would have you, I will promiſe you a recompence much above that which Amaſis gave you. Whilſt Heracleon was ſpeaking thus, Thraſeas was extreamly perplexed; for he perceived by his manner of ſpeaking, that he knew all the truth: ſo that fear damping his ſpirits, he could not reaſon upon the matter; yet he perceived that though Heracleon knew Seſoſtris was not the Son of Amaſis, yet he did not know him to be the Son of Apriez; therefore he conceived him to be ignorant of it, otherwiſe he would moſt certainly have intimated it unto him: So that after he had ſeriouſly conſidered with himſelf, he reſolved to confeſs unto Heracleon, that Timareta was the daughter of Amaſis, conceiving it was that which he principally deſired: for Thraſeas being a man of a quick wit, and ſpirit enough, and knowing that the King when he was in the Iſle, ſaid, if he had a Daughter he would marry her unto Heracleon: he doubted not but it was his own intereſt which he ſought after: But as he reſolved to confeſs the truth, as relating unto Timareta, and to ſay ſhe was the Daughter of Amaſis: So he reſolved alſo not to diſcover that Seſoſtris was the ſon of Apriez: for it was a horror unto his conſcience to deliver the Son of his Legitimate King into the hands of an uſurper, who perhaps would put him to death: ſo after he had well conſulted with himſelf, and ſeeing Heracleon multiply both promiſes and threatnings. Sir, (ſaid he unto him) if you will ſolemnly ſwear that you will ſave my life: I ſhall confeſs all I know, and as much perhaps as you deſire to know: Heracleon then ſwearing unto him, Thraſeas confeſſed that Timareta, was the Kings Daughter: Adding, that Seſoſtris was his own Son: and that Fatherly indulgence prompted him to make him King in prejudice of Timareta: and then King alſo to get a better recompence, for finding the King a Son, than a Daughter: But, (ſaid Heracleon unto him) it appears Seſoſtris paſſed for the Son of Amenophis, and not as yours, and you confeſſed as much to the King: 'Tis very true, Sir, (replied Thraſeas boldly, the better to colour his lie) but the reaſon was, becauſe when the contagion did almoſt depopulate our Iſle, and when the Queen and the Prince Seſoſtris her Son dyed, and ſpared this Seſoſtris whom now you know, Amenophis with a thouſand promiſes of recompence, deſired me to let my ſon paſs for his, never telling me his reaſon for it: and indeed I conſented, knowing my Son would be more rich by paſſing for his Son than mine: ſo that all the Shepherds in the Iſle never thought Seſoſtris to be my Son: After this Heracleon and Taniſis began to whiſper low one to another, and to examine what Thraſeas had ſaid concerning Seſoſtris: For they ſaw Amenophis had a deſign to make Seſoſtris paſs for the Son of Apriez: and they began to ſuſpect that Thraſeas had not told the truth, but that Seſoſtris was really the Son of Apriez. Yet they did not conceive it expedient to dive too deep into the matter, for knowing that Amaſis of late was much ſtung with remorſe of conſcience for all that was paſſed, they feared that if he ſhould come to know that Seſoſtris was the Son of Apriez, and afterwards ſhould hear of the affection between Seſoſtris and Timareta, he would marry them together to quiet his conſcience, and to take away all colour of War: Therefore, though Heracleon did ſuſpect Seſoſtris was not the real Seſoſtris, yet he did not make his ſuſpicions known unto Thraſeas; but reſolved by the advice of Taniſis, firſt to let him become a Shepherd again, and afterwards abſolutely to ruine him. But, Sir, after an exact conſideration of all the conſequences in this affair, they inſtructed Thraſeas, in all they would have him do, Heracleon beginning to let him have a taſte of his liberality. And to the end Thraſeas ſhould not have time to repent or fly, or adventure Seſoſtris or Timareta, they obliged him to go preſently with them unto Elephantine: Leaving two ſervants which came with them, to conduct him, appointing them to follow Thraſeas ſome twenty paces from him, and no nearer, leſt too much notice ſhould be taken: But, Sir, Heracleon, as it was plotted betwixt him and Thraſeas, went to the King as he returned from the Temple, and as he was entering into his Palace, Thraſeas fell down upon his knees moſt humbly beſeeching the King to give him audience: Amaſis turning about, and knowing him, thought that ſome had done him wrong, and he demanded juſtice, or that he had not received what he commanded ſhould be given him: So that turning towards him, It is juſt, ſaid he, that the man who found me a ſucceſſor ſhould obtain what audience he deſires. Oh, Sir, (ſaid Thraſeas with tears in his eyes) I come not to demand any juſtice, but a pardon, ſince I am the moſt guilty man alive. Amaſis being aſtoniſhed at the Language of Thraſeas, in whoſe countenance, he ſaw fea imprinted, commanded him to follow, becauſe he wou not have all the people to hear: and being entered into his Chamber, where he would have none to follow, but Heracleon and Thraſeas. This ſhepherd fell down upon his knees again, Sir, ſaid he to Amaſis, you ſee proſtrate at your feet, that miſerable ſhepherd, whoſe ambition to make his ſon King, has made himſelf the moſt culpable of men: For truly, Sir, Seſoſtris is my Son and not yours; and Timareta whoſe beauty attracts the eyes o all that behold her, is really your Daughter. Amaſis infinitely perplexed at this, began to look upon Thraſeas with much anger: How doſt thou think I can believe thee (ſaid he unto him) after ſuch a fair tale when I wa in the Iſle? How can I believe this which now thou telleſt me is true? or what way now will you give me good ſecurity of it? for ſince thou art capable of ſuch an impoſture, may I not as well think thou wouldſt make thy Daughter to Raign in prejudice of my Son, as thy Son in prejudice of my Daughter. From whence proceeds this remorſe of conſcience which thus expoſeth thee to my fury? Hath Oſiris appeared unto thee? Or what hath cauſed thy repentance? Sir, replied Thraſeas (following the inſtructions of Heracleon) as ſoon as I heard of your Majeſties intentions of marrying Seſoſtris unto the Princeſs Liſerina, my conſcience did ſo extreamly torture me, that I had rather ſuffer the puniſhment which I deſerve, than to let a miſerable ſhepherd run any longer into ſuch a fortune as he was unworthy of. Moreover, Sir, if the weakneſs of your eye-ſight had not hindred you from ſeeing that extream reſemblance which Timareta hath of the Princeſs her Mother, you would a firſt have known her for your Daughter; and this di induce me principally to deceive your Majeſty. Heracleon would then have ſpoke ſomething in favour o Thraſeas, but Amaſis not hearing him, asked this ſhepherd a hundred queſtions, unto all which he gave ſuc

ſatisfactory quick anſwers, that Amaſis was at a dilemma. However, he loved Seſoſtris ſo well, that his natural inclination prompted him to maintain him in the rank wherein he was, and to puniſh Thraſeas as an Impoſter. But as he was in this mind, the Officer which was concealed at Heracleon's houſe, and was inſtructed by him, ſent unto the King by the Captain of his Guard, that he had ſome buſineſs with him, whereupon depended the tranquility of all his life, and that it concerned him to know it as ſoon as poſſibly he could. Amaſis with a diſordered mind, commanded him to enter, and the ſooner, becauſe he underſtood this man had cleared himſelf of that raiſing of Sedition, whereof he was accuſed. I ſhall not tell you, Sir, in what language this man acquainted the King, how it was he who found the Letter in Nea, how he read it as ſoon as he found it, and ſaw that it mentioned the leaving him a Daughter; how afterwards he loſt it at Elephantine, and how miraculouſly he found that which would convince him of his error; for if I ſhould make a full relation, it would be too tedious, Sir, unto you. However Amaſis no ſooner heard what he ſaid, but being very impatient to ſee what he had brought him, he took the little bit of paper which the man had preſerved; and the King joyning it unto the Letter of Ladice which was torn, it filled up ſo even and juſtly, and anſwered unto every corner, like wax unto a Seal, that there could not be the leaſt ſuſpition of any couſenage; for it joyned ſo cloſe, that it was hard to be ſeen where it was torn: But as the King was much ſurpriſed to ſee this little bit of the Letter fit his place ſo juſtly; ſo was he much more, to find, that then it was as plain as the Sun, that Ladice left him a Daughter; for the word Daughter was in that little bit which was added: nor could he ſuſpect any forgery, but that it was writ with the hand of Ladice as well as the reſt of the Letter. Amaſis then being ſatisfied that Seſoſtris was not his Son, asked Thraſeas who he was? and he anſwered him as he anſwered Heracleon, to wit, that himſelf was the Father of Seſoſtris; and anſwered ſo fully unto all objections which Amaſis could put unto him, that he could find no cauſe whoſe aſtoniſhment was ſo high, that ſhe was not capable either of joy or ſorrow; yet ſhe enclined more unto the latter of theſe than the firſt. In the mean time, ſhe arrived at the Court: Heracleon acquaints the King; and he bids her to enter. But ſhe was not ſooner two paces within the Chamber, and the King upon a ſudden ſeeing as well as ever he did: he found in Timareta's face ſuch a prodigious reſemblance of the Princeſs Ladice his wife, that he made no doubt but Timareta was his Daughter: ſo that embracing her with abundance of tenderneſs, he acknowledged her for his own, and acknowledged her with as much joy, as he was at the miraculous change in his ſight, which made him able to behold Timareta, and confirmed him in his opinion that the gods would protect him. Timareta ſeeing the honours which the King did her, knew not how to receive them: yet ſhe told him with as great grace as modeſty, that ſhe was only a ſimple Shepherdeſs, and far unworthy ſuch favours from ſo great a King: for ſince ſhe thought it impoſſible that ſhe ſhould be acknowledged for a Princeſs, and that Seſoſtris ſhould become a ſhepherd again, ſhe would not anſwer the King as his Daughter. In the mean time, ſince the King made no queſtion of what Thraſeas told him concerning Timareta, he alſo believed all he ſaid concerning Seſoſtris: ſo that thinking his repentance had expiated his crime, he commanded him to be ſet at liberty, and to come before him. Thraſeas no ſooner ſaw Timareta, but he asked her pardon, for offering to take the Crown from her, and giving it unto Seſoſtris. Timareta hearing Thraſeas ſay ſo, bluſht, and looked down with her eyes: yet was it not for any anger at the injury he had done her; but for ſorrow that ſhe ſhould be a cauſe of Seſoſtris his returning unto a Shepherd again. In the mean time, the King cauſed all the Ladies to enter, and told them who Timareta was: ſo that this fair ſhepherdeſs, becoming a Princeſs in an inſtant, you may well imagine, ſhe ſtood in need of as great a ſpirit as ſhe had. And ſince Amaſis had commanded the matter ſhould be cloſely carried, leſt Seſoſtris ſhould know the alteration in his Fortune: he cauſed Timareta and all the Ladies to go into another room, and commanded to fetch Seſoſtris unto him. But as Timareta was ready to go out of the Kings Chamber, being prompted by a thought which ſhe could not keep in, Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, I beſeech you give me leave, before I go, to ask you whether Thraſeas, who I ever thought to be my father, ever told you how I owe my life unto Seſoſtris: and that if I have the honour to be your Daughter, you are obliged to recompence him for my ſake: As Timareta could not ſpeak this, without ſome diſorder which appeared in her face, Heracleon had much more diſorder in his heart: and the more, becauſe the king deſiring to know how Seſoſtris ſaved Timareta's life; This fair Princeſs related it unto him, with all poſſible aggravations, as if ſhe had a deſire, in taking the Crown from Seſoſtris, at leaſt to procure him the King's favour: 'Tis true, he had a ſtrong inclination, to lend a favourable ear unto any thing that was in advantage of Seſoſtris. Therefore when Timareta had ended her relation, the King aſſured her, that he would eſteem Seſoſtris as her deliverer: Then he parted from her, as ſoon as he had commanded the Ladies, to ſee her in an Equipage ſutable to her preſent quality: ſo Heracleon conducted her unto her Chamber. As for Nicetis ſhe met her husband in the outer Chamber. In the mean while, Amaſis having ſent for Seſoſtris, he perceived in his going to the King, that there was ſome extraordinary matter in the wind: for notwithſtanding all their cares to conceal it, the noiſe of it was ſpread abroad. But though he ſaw wonder in all the faces he met, yet he could not gueſs what the matter was: but he was not long in ignorance, for as ſoon as he came unto the King, who prepared him as well as he could to make the news as little ſad unto him as he could: he told how he had been deceived, how that he was not his Son, and how Timareta was his Daughter, demonſtrating unto him all his proofs: Moreover (ſaid he, and gave him not time to ſpeak) do not think that the man whom I eſteemed worthy to be my ſon, and really was ſo, ſhall ever become a Shepherd again: No, no, Seſoſtris, I do not intend it: but on the contrary, I will make a publick declaration that you ſhall have a Rank above all my Nobility, and continue ſo near the Throne, as it ſhall be hardly perceived you have had a fall. Sir, (replied Seſoſtris, who had time to recollect himſelf whilſt the King was ſpeaking) ſince I received the honour of being taken for your Son, without any pride or oſtentation: So I receive the news of my change, without a grudge, or deſpair, or ſorrow: yet I muſt needs confeſs, that if I had quitted this honour unto any other but Timareta, I ſhould have been moſt extreamly ſad: but I know her virtue ſo worthy of her quality, that I ſtand in need of no comforts in my loſs, ſince ſhe is the gainer: Moreover, Sir, I confeſs my ſelf infinitely obliged unto you for your Princely expreſſions, but yet I cannot accept of your offers: for truly, Sir, if ever I come into the rank of your Nobility, I will be ſomething beholding unto my Sword, and not altogether unto your goodneſs for the honour: And truly conſidering the preſent condition of my Soul, I am not yet reſolved whether I ſhould make uſe of my Sheephook or my Sword: for I had need of a little time to examine whether I have found more or leſs misfortune in the one than in the other: Yet I moſt humbly beſeech you to believe, that I never contributed any thing unto your Majeſties error, ſince I never thought my ſelf to be the Son of Thraſeas, but of Amenophis. But whatſoever I be, Sir, I ſhall be always affectionately devoted unto your ſervice: But before I leave the Court, I beſeech you give me leave to bid adieu unto the Princeſs Timareta. I conſent unto it moſt willingly (ſaid the King) but not that you ſhall bid her adieu; Seſoſtris anſwered unto theſe obliging expreſſions, with much reſpect: and though Amaſis would not have him go from the Palace; yet he would not lye there, but went unto my friend whom I brought him acquainted with, and where we left all our martial Equipage. He was no ſooner there, but he ſent for me to acquaint me with the revolution in his fortune; yet I knew it before, by Thraſeas and Nicetis, who were returned home. But when I came unto his Chamber. Well my dear Miris, ſaid he unto me, is not my fortune very fickle? and muſt not he be either inſenſible or mortal that dies not for ſorrow at ſuch an alteration? not that I do at all regret the Grandure ſo much as perhaps you imagine, for thanks be to the heavens, I have a ſoul which ſores above all ſorts of ambition: but that which grieves my ſoul is, that I am ſtill at an unſutable diſtance from Timareta, either as a Prince or a Shepherd; and I conceive, that though ſhe poſſeſs that honour which I had yeſterday, and I that which ſhe hath quitted; yet I am ſtill further of in equality than before. For had I been a King, I might have created her a Queen: but Timareta being a Princeſs, muſt never make me a King; and therefore my dear Miris, if I do lament the loſs of a Scepter, it is not out of ambition, but only out of love. Moreover I cannot look upon Thraſeas as my father, until Amenophis return, and aſſures me I am his Son: And ſince now there is no neceſſity of concealing our ſelves, I would adviſe you (ſaid he unto me) to appear in the world for what you are, to the end you may acquaint me with the paſſages in it: for when I have once ſeen Timareta, I am reſolved to forſake it: not that I can ſo ſoon depart from Elephantine, ſince Heracleon is in love with Timareta: for though I am a Shepherd, Egypt ſhall never have a King that is my Rival. There I endeavoured to perſwade Seſoſtris, that he muſt not run any hazards of ruining himſelf; but ſtay in expectation of ſome change, which might happily be advantageous for him; that the return of Amenophis would perhaps better inſtruct us; and truly after all this, I was confidently perſwaded that neither Thraſeas or Amenophis ever gave him life. In thinking to comfort me, replied he, you drive me unto new ſorrows; for admit I were that which you think I am, yet am I the moſt miſerable man in the World: and if I be not what you ſuppoſe me, ſtill I am all unfortunate. In the mean while, Seſoſtris was not the only one who complained: The Princeſs Liſerina had her full ſhare of ſorrow; ambition did no leſs torment her, than love did Seſoſtris: ſhe told every one, that this was but a ſuſpicion of her brother's, who had a deſire to be King himſelf; adding, that certainly Seſoſtris was the Son of Amaſis: and that Timareta was no more than a Shepherdeſs: and ſhe ſpoke it ſo loud and confidently, that Heracleon moved the King to ſend for her, to command her ſilence; for in the humour Heracleon was, there was nothing

nothing which he would not ſacrifice unto his ambition; In the mean time, how great ſoever the deſires of Seſoſtris were to ſee Timareta; yet his ſorrows were ſo great that day, as he was forced to ſtay until the morning, paſſing away the night in ſuch reſtleſs thoughts, that he never ſhut his eyes: Timareta for her part, ſhe enjoyed no delight in all her Grandure; but ſlighted all manner of diverſions, or care in dreſſing her ſelf: For all the magnificence of her Lodging, ſhe took more delight in the remembrance of her Cabin where ſhe could talk with Seſoſtris: and when ſhe conſidered that ſhe was like to loſe him for ever, ſhe was in a mind to part with all her Grandure which cauſed the misfortune: ſometime ſhe was more grieved to ſee her ſelf a Pinceſs, and Seſoſtris a ſhepherd, than ſhe was when ſhe believed her ſelf a ſhepherdeſs, and him the Son of a King. There was none therefore whoſe joyes were full, but only Heracleon and Taniſis. As for Amaſis, for all the ſatisfaction which he had to ſee the living Image of his dead but dear Ladice, he had ſuch a reſtleſſneſs in his heart, as quite diſtempered him, ſo that he found no delight in any thing. But, Sir, the next morning being come, Seſoſtris according unto the Kings permiſſion, went to ſee Timareta, and entred into her Chamber, as ſhe was dreſſed the firſt time, as a perſon of her quality: As for Seſoſtris, he was in a plain handſom ſute without any trimming, ſuch as men of quality commonly uſe to wear when they would not be ſeen. But there was ſuch a maſs of melancholy in his heart, that he could hardly keep it out of his face: 'Tis true, he had ſome cauſe of conſolation, for when he entered into Timareta's Chamber, he found her face ſo full of ſerious ſorrow, amidſt all her magnificence, that he might eaſily divine the cauſe: This viſion was ſo pleaſing, that it made him able to hide ſome parts of his ſorrows. But on the contrary, Timareta ſeeing ſo much conſtancy in the ſoul of Seſoſtris, did the more tender his heart by the tears which fell from her fair eyes: So that deſiring to hide this diſorder from her women, after Seſoſtris had ſaluted her with a profound reverence, ſhe went into a corner between her bed and fire, where he followed her, and began to ſpeak; Madam, (ſaid he unto her) I beſeech you take it not ill that the ſhepherd Seſoſtris ſhould aſſume ſo much liberty as to entreat you would be pleaſed to give him that ſheephook your fair hand was uſed to carry, aſſuring you he ſhall receive it with more conſolation than he did the news and hopes of his being King of all Egypt. Ah Seſoſtris, (ſaid ſhe and interrupted him) I do not take it well, that your ſpirit ſhould be ſo free after your change, as to talk of any ſuch thing. I remember, that the firſt time you ſaw me after the King had acknowledged you for his ſon, you looked upon me with eyes full of tears: 'Tis true, Madam, (ſaid he) but I am now ſo affraid my ſorrows ſhould be ill interpreted, and that you ſhould think I grieved at the parting from that Grandure which now is yours, that I maſtered my ſelf, and hid ſome part of my ſorrows; yet if you will be pleaſed to aſſure me, you will not think ambition to be the cauſe of my ſorrows, I ſhall ſhew you all my ſad reſentments: But that I may with more freedom do it, I beſeech you be this day only the ſhepherdeſs Timareta; you will be a Princeſs all the reſt of your life, and it is but one hour which I ſhall deſire to deprive you of that honour: I aſſure you, replied Timareta and ſighed, that I ſhall be unto you, ever the ſame I was. True it is, I will not engage my ſelf to live with you as I have done, for you know decency does not allow it; but I promiſe you, that the change in my fortune is not able to change the leaſt thought of my heart: And I ſhall ever think my ſelf moſt unhappy in my condition, becauſe it is different from yours. I do not think that after this you will complain of me; Nor do I complain of you, Madam, (replied he) but I do extreamly complain of my unhappy fate, which raiſed me up to throw me down again, and which only raiſed you to make me more miſerable. But, Madam, however I beſeech you do not deny me that which has abſolute dependency upon your ſelf, and which neither contradicts vertue nor decency: Methinks (replied Timareta) after what I have already ſaid, I need not tell you, that I will not deny you any thing you ſhall ask, ſo it bring juſt conditions with it. Since ſo, Madam, (replied Seſoſtris) let it not offend you if I conjure you to believe that your quality hath nothing augmented thoſe reſpects I had of you, and that quality which within theſe two days I had, did nothing leſſen the paſſion of my Soul to you. Moreover, Madam, that you may not take it ill if I preſerve the ſame paſſion ſtill in my heart; remember, I beſeech you, that ſince I was not capable of change in becoming the Son of a King, ſo I am not capable of any alteration in returning to the quality of a Shepherd: So that adoring you out of a compulſive neceſſity, againſt which there is no reſiſtance, you would be unjuſt if you were offended at it. Moreover, Madam, ſince in loſing my chief happineſs I have not loſt all my reaſon, I know very well that I can hope for nothing from you; that it is my duty to adore you, and never ſee you; and that it is only death that muſt terminate my ſorrows: All that I can in reaſon ask, is, that you will be a little angry at fate for putting a greater inequality in our qualities than in our inclinations. However, ſince you give me leave to ſpeak unto you now as unto the Shepherdeſs Timareta, I muſt tell you that there is one thing that you can do for me which will keep me from dying with grief. If it be in my power (replied ſhe) and that it be not againſt the rules of virtue and decency, certainly I ſhall do it. I have ſo deep a reſpect of you, replied Seſoſtris, that I dare hardly ſpeak it; but ſince I am confident in your goodneſs, I muſt tell you, Madam, that all the favour which I beg is, that you will not marry Heracleon, when I was in the ſame quality you now are, I was firmly reſolved never to marry any but you. But, Madam, ſince the laws are not equal betwixt us, I ſhall not ask ſo much, but only except Heracleon from all the Princes in the world. Not but that I am moſt confident the day of your marriage with any Prince will be the day of my death, but my death will be leſs ſharp, if it add not felicity unto Heracleon. If you had not given me leave to expreſs my ſelf, Madam, I ſhould not have ſpoke ſo boldly as I do. But ſince if you pleaſe to remember, that the Prince Seſoſtris offered to throw away his Crown if you pleaſed, and ſeek out ſome deſart Iſle, where he might live with you, I hope you will not think the Shepherd Seſoſtris too inſolent. I think him ſo unfortunate (replied ſhe) that though he were too bold, yet I ſhould not be offended at him: but to anſwer directly unto what you ask me (added ſhe) I promiſe you to uſe all the endeavours that in all handſomneſs I can, never to marry Heracleon. And I promiſe you more than that; for if I cannot oppoſe the King's will, I will have recourſe unto death. Yet I do not by this exact any great obligation from you, for I have ſuch a ſtrong natural averſion againſt him, that I will thwart his intenſions, as well out of love to my ſelf, as out of love to you. But the thing which I would have you take for a favour is, that if the gods would leave me to my own choice, I had rather be a Shepherdeſs with you, than Queen of twenty Egypts without you. Oh, Madam, ſaid Seſoſtris, how much am I obliged to you for theſe expreſſions which will infallibly haſten my death, and hinder me from droning out a longer unhappy life? For after this I muſt dye with grief to ſee my ſelf driven to ſuch a ſad neceſſity of loſing one ſo infinitely generous. No, no, Seſoſtris (ſaid ſhe unto him) I would not have that which I ſpeak to comfort you be an augmentation of your ſorrows; but on the contrary, if I have any power of you, I would have you live and love me, and that I may ſtill have ſo much conſolation as to think, that in what place ſoever you are, you keep your affection for me. That which may be an aſſurance unto you of mine, is, that when you were the Prince Seſoſtris, and I Shepherdeſs Timareta, what inequality ſoever there was between us, yet I ſhould not have taken it well you ſhould forget me, though I had deſired you to do it: So that you are no farther off my quality than I was off yours, you need not fear I ſhould forget you, though I ſee you not. After this, ask me no more: Doubtleſs I do too little for the Shepherdeſs Timareta, but perhaps a little too much for the Princeſs of Egypt. As they were thus in talk, one came to tell Timareta in all haſte, that the King would ſpeak with her, ſo that ſhe muſt part abruptly from Seſoſtris: Yet ſhe bade him adieu as the Shepherdeſs Timareta, and though in a tumult, yet tenderly, and in ſuch an obliging manner, that though the paſſion of Seſoſtris was very violent, yet had he no cauſe to complain. He retired then unto the lodging which he made choice of for his retreat, where he related unto me this ſad diſcourſe, as he uſed to do all others. In the mean time Timareta in going to the Kings chamber, underſtood that he ſent for her to tell her, that having engaged himſelf unto Heracleon, that if he had a Daughter to marry her unto him, therefore he would acquaint her with it, to the end that ſhe ſhould begin to look upon him as upon one that was to be her Husband. It is ſo ſhort a while, replied Timareta, ſince I had the honour to know I was your daughter, that methinks it is injurious to make me ſo ſoon acknowledge any other Authority than yours; therefore, Sir, I beſeech you, let me a while enjoy the honour which I have. As the King was ready to anſwer Timareta, and tell her that he would be obeyed, he fell into a ſwoon which laſted near an hour; and when he recovered out of it, he found that he had quite loſt his ſight; and whilſt he was in his ſwoon, his imagination was filled with the ſame apparition which formerly he had ſeen, but with this difference, that the menaces of Ladice were more terrible; ſo that he was not in a condition to talk any longer unto Timareta concerning her marriage with Heracleon, for he was ſo troubled that he knew not what to reſolve upon, not daring to tell all his grief; For ſince he was not ignorant of Heracleon's ambition, and knew what that paſſion could offer, he durſt not expreſs how much he was troubled at the menaces of the gods, if he did not reſtore that Crown which he had uſurped: So that keeping all his ſorrows to himſelf: Oh ye juſt gods, ſaid he, which puniſh me with ſuch ſeverity, though deſervedly, How ſhould I reſtore the Sceptre which I have uſurped? The Son of Apriez is dead as well as himſelf, and there remains none living of his line; yet you let me underſtand by theſe horrid viſions, that the Child of this unhappy King is not dead, but you do not let me know where he is: I had ſome ſuſpicions indeed that Seſoſtris is the true Seſoſtris, and you who know the ſecrets of hearts, do alſo know that when I declared him my ſucceſſor, I thought him to be as much the Son of Apriez as mine own: yet I muſt confeſs that had I then known him for the Son of that unhappy King, I ſhould not have reſtored him the Sceptre, becauſe I was unwilling to part with Soveraign Authority, and to make a reſtitution in that manner before all the world: But now I have changed my mind, I cannot believe that Seſoſtris is the Son of Apriez: for why ſhould Thraſeas cauſe the Son of his legitimate King whom he had brought up, to deſcend from the Throne? What likelyhood is there that he ſhould make one of the greateſt Princes in the World to become a Shepherd? There is more reaſon to think that Amenophis ſhould take away the Son of this Shepherd with a deſign to make him paſs for the Son of Apriez, and to ſend him to Thebes when he ſaw opportunity: Yet for all this the gods do tell me by the Oracles, that I muſt reſtore the Sceptre which I have uſurped: and by moſt affrighting viſions aſſure me that Seſoſtris is living: what ſhould I do then? what can I reſolve upon? As Amaſis was in this reſtleſs mind, Heracleon came unto him: Timareta being returned unto her Chamber: And ſince Heracleon was a man who mocked at all theſe prodigies and adviſements of the gods, he looked upon this accident which happen'd unto the King, as a thing which would be advantageous unto himſelf, which would the ſooner haſte on his marriage with Timareta, and more aſſure him of the Crown: Yet he durſt not that day ſpeak unto the King, who on the other ſide durſt not tell Heracleon all the inquietudes of his Soul. In the mean time, Sir, be pleaſed to know that Amenophis and the Servant were ſo happy, that he whom they feign'd Amenophis had mortally wounded, did not dye of his wounds: and ſo it chanced that while he was ſick, the affairs of the Town changed faces, and the weaker party becoming the ſtronger, he left that ſide he was of to take the other. Thus in this General Revolution, Amenophis found his ſafety, for the Proſecutor changing ſides, would proſecute no farther, but ſuffered him to take his liberty. In the mean while, Amenophis after he had conferred with the revolters, who had raiſed freſh Forces, and had aſſured them there was a Son of Apriez living, and that he would infallibly bring him unto them, he returned unto our Iſle in hopes to find Seſoſtris: But, Sir, you may imagine his wonder, when he heard in all places where he paſſed, that Amaſis knew by Ladice's Letter that he had a Son; that he had found this Son in an Iſle near Elephantine, and that his name was Seſoſtris. Amenophis at firſt, thought all theſe reports to be but Fables; but finding the nearer he came to Elephantine, the more they were confirmed, he knew not what to think. Yet his aſtoniſhment was nothing in compariſon of that amazement he was in, when he came within a days journey of this great Town, and heard that he whom Amaſis had acknowledged for his Son proved to be no more than a ſimple Shepherd, and was returned to his former condition; and that Amaſis acknowledged a Shepherdeſs, whoſe name was Timareta, for his Daughter: I ſay you may eaſily imagine how all theſe things ſurpriſed Amenophis: However he conceived it expedient before he attempted to go into the Iſle, to know more certainly of the truth; ſo that he reſolved to go unto Elephantine in the night, and lodge with his Siſter: But he was much perplexed to underſtand when he came there, that ſhe was not in Town: ſo that Amenophis not daring to truſt himſelf with the Domeſtiques of the houſe, and the Father of him with whom Seſoſtris and I lodged being his intimate friend, he reſolved to make the Sons houſe his Retreat, whilſt he enquired of the poſture wherein things are: So that we were not a little aſtoniſhed, when my friend, who knew how dear Amenophis was unto us, brought him into the Chamber where we were. I cannot eaſily expreſs unto you, Sir, both our joys and his. He asked us a hundred things, and we in lieu of anſwers, asked him other queſtions. In the mean time, the Maſter of the houſe leaving us to the freedom of talk: I beſeech you (ſaid Seſoſtris, who had an extream deſire to know who himſelf was) Tell me who I am? Am I the ſon of Amaſis, or the Son of Thraſeas, or your ſon? you are none of all theſe (replied Amenophis.) Whoſe am I then? (replied Seſoſtris.) You are, Sir (replied Amenophis) ſince it is now time to tell you, the Son of Apriez, and the legitimate King of Egypt, and I come to fetch you, that you may accompliſh a deſign which hath been a long time in plotting. Seſoſtris was ſo ſurpriſed to hear this, that he doubted whether he had well underſtood him, ſo that he deſired Amenophis to repeat what he had ſaid. Then Amenophis gave him an account of his deſign in concealing his birth, and told him it was he who raiſed all the revolts in Thebes, Heliopolis, and other places. Then Seſoſtris and I told him all the adventures both of Timareta and himſelf, which did no leſs ſurpriſe Amenophis, than his relation did us: The actions of Thraſeas did moſt puzzle him; for he did not believe that the Prince's ſervant had revealed his ſecret. However it be, ſaid Amenophis, I had a deſign to carry both Timareta and you unto Thebes, and then acquainted Amaſis, that Apriez had left a Son, and Ladice a Daughter, ſo that when he knew, we had a perſon ſo dear unto him in our power, we might have brought him unto ſome reaſonable terms. But ſince that the poſture of things are otherwiſe, Come, Sir, let us go to Thebes, whither I will conduct you, and let the unjuſt Amaſis, ſee you are not his Son but enemy, if he will not reſtore the Crown which is your due: I know very will, Sir, that when you parted from our Iſle, you had a great affection unto Timareta; and though abſence cannot cure you, and though ſhe be Daughter unto the Uſurper of your Dominions, you may yet love her, and you muſt make a juſt War to conquer her, and ſo enjoy at once both your Kingdom and your Miſtreſs. Remember that your very name obliges you unto high things; and the gods have given you ſpirit and heart enough to equal, and perhaps to tranſcend the moſt illuſtrious of your Anceſtors. You know that when I taught you to be a faithful and courageous Shepherd, I taught you by it to be a great and generous King. Begin then the conduct of your people whom the gods have lawfully ſubjected unto you, and know that the War you ſhall attempt is moſt juſt, and cannot chuſe but prove propitious. It is to expel an Uſurper; it is to revenge your father, moſt barbarouſly maſſacred: it is to revenge the death of your Mother, whoſe ſorrows only put to death: it is to crown your ſelf with Glory in the eyes of all Nations; it is to ge your own Kingdom, and your Miſtreſs. Oh Father (ſaid Seſoſtris) for I cannot call you otherwiſe, I muſt tell you, and tell you without baſeneſs, that I cannot, nor will not leave loving Timareta, though ſhe be the Daughter of an Uſurper. I do affect glory, and fear no dangers, but I love Timareta, and fear to offend her. Timareta (replied Amenophis) is queſtionleſs worthy of your eſteem, not only for her beauty and excellency of ſpirit and virtue, but alſo for the generoſity of her Mother, who was as faithful a Subject as Amaſis was perfidious: And for theſe reaſons I am not againſt your loving her, but agree, if Amaſis conſent, that you may marry her: But to effect that, and to oblige Amaſis to give her unto you, you muſt be in the head of an Army; you muſt ask her as the Son of Apriez, and let him know that Seſoſtris the Shepherd, and Seſoſtris the Prince are not the ſame. Oh Father (replied he) this Prince, and this Shepherd you ſpeak of are but one perſon, yet have different deſires, and I doubt whether one can yield unto the other. The Shepherd ought to yield unto th Prince (replied Amenophis.) Reaſon would have it ſ (replied Seſoſtris) but Love will not conſent unto it. If you do but conſider the preſent poſture of your Fortune (anſwered Amenophis) you will find, that Lo as well as Reaſon requires you ſhould follow my a vice: For the Shepherd Seſoſtris cannot pretend an thing unto the Princeſs Timareta. 'Tis true, replied h but Seſoſtris the Prince ought not to pretend any thi unto the Daughter of his Enemy: That you may cea being his Enemy, anſwered Amenophis, you muſt be come his Maſter, you muſt fight with him and conque him, and then give back Timareta that Crown whi you have with juſtice taken from him. Theſe, S were the arguments which Amenophis uſed unto Seſoſtri to convince him in point of love, and to invite hi unto Thebes; but the paſſion which had taken up ſtrong reſidence in the Soul of this Prince, would n permit him ſo ſuddenly to reſolve upon ſo difficult a ma ter: He deſired of Amenophis two days of conſideratio but indeed it was to find out an expedient how acquaint the Princeſs Timareta with his true birth, and to hinder Heracleon from marrying her, yet he could not poſſibly compaſs either: for it being the cuſtom of all mercenary minded vaſſals to follow fortune at the heels, and change as it doth, when Seſoſtris would have entered to have ſeen Timareta, thoſe who were at the Palace Gate, and kept it for Heracleon, did treat him like a Shepherd, and would not ſuffer him to enter. This courſe entertainment did ſo incenſe him, that he doubled his fury againſt Heracleon, though he did not know that this trivial diſgrace was cauſed directly by him: His grief was, he knew not how to ruin Heracleon, for he was too generous to attempt any unworthy way, nor was it an eaſie matter to invite him to fight with a Shepherd, neither could he force him, becauſe he went always well attended, nor did he ever ſtir out of the Palace ſince Timareta was acknowledged Princeſs. However, Seſoſtris could not reſolve upon departure from Elephantine until he had made ſure of Heracleon for ever marrying Timareta: nor would he go unto Thebes until he had firſt asked advice of his dear Princeſs: So that when thoſe two days given by Amenophis were expired, he muſt allow him more: for ſince the noiſe of Heracleon's marriage with Timareta grew louder every day, the jealouſie of Seſoſtris augmented accordingly, and the more, becauſe he ſaw leſs hopes of revenge upon his Rival. In the mean while Amenophis was vexed to the heart, that he could not get Seſoſtris out of Elephantine. But to make ſome uſe of his vexatious abode in the Town, he went privately in the night to viſit divers perſons of his acquaintance whom he knew would not diſcover him, to the end he might diſpoſe them unto any great deſign, if occaſion were. But whilſt Timareta grieved for Seſoſtris in the midſt of all her grandure, the Princeſs Liſerina grieved for the loſs of a Crown, and Heracleon thought of nothing but how to become King, to murther Seſoſtris, and to marry Timareta; and whilſt Seſoſtris had a mind full of vexatious thoughts, and had a hundred plots in his brain, all oppoſite to one another, Amaſis was moſt cruelly tormented, not only with ſorrow for the loſs of his eyes, but alſo with anguiſh of ſpirit, and ſting of conſcience for his wickedneſs; he thought always he heard the voice of Ladice threatning him, and the more was his miſery, he obſerved that Heracleon began to take much authority upon him, and began to tranſact like a man who pretended to have all the power ſhortly in his own hands: But one extraordinary accident chanced, which did infinitely trouble him. Be pleaſed to know, that there is a general Feaſt obſerved throughout all Egypt, called the Feaſt of Lamps, which is celebrated unto the glory of Iſis, and which is the only Feaſt amongſt us, whoſe ceremony is alike obſerved in all Villages, Towns, and Cities; and the day being come, they adorn their Temples with Garlands, and ſtrow all the ſtreets with flowers, and ſet before their doors all that they have moſt rare. And when the Sun is ſet, and night begins, they light not only an infinite number of magnificent Lamps in every Church, but alſo in all the ſtreets and publick places, in all their doors, windows, and towers; about all the walls of the Town, upon the Maſts and Prows of every Ship in the Port; and this they do to the very leaſt village or cabin of a Shepherd: ſo that at this time all Egypt is as light as day in the darkeſt night. And ſince amongſt us it is believed, nothing is more acceptable to the gods than Perfumes, nor any thing more wholſome, or better to purifie the Air, every one adds unto his Lamp a Bonefire of Aromatick wood before his door; ſo that in an inſtant there is ſuch a pleaſant vapour in the air, as perfumes all the fields about the Town: They uſe to ſing alſo quantity of Songs in honour of Iſis, both in their Churches and ſtreets, but a large relation of this is not neceſſary unto my diſcourſe: But this Feaſt being kept whilſt we were there, every one hoped, that the preſence of the King would make it more glorious, though the accident which happened did trouble all thoſe who were Lovers of quietneſs and peace. But, Sir, the hour being come when the Ceremony began, there was ſo much light, that all the Town ſeemed on fire: Amaſis according to the cuſtom went to the Temple in a Coach, and Timareta with him; Heracleon went on Horſeback next after the King's

Coach, and all the Court followed. But, Sir, the wonder was, that in all the ſtreets where the King paſſed, all the Lamps ſeemed to extinguiſh, their light became dim, their fires went out, and their perfumes changed their pleaſant ſmell: The ſhrill ſcreeks and crys of fatal Birds were heard, and the accident did ſo amaze all the inhabitants of Elephantine, that they were full of fearful ejaculations and cryes, which moving the King to ask the reaſon, and they were conſtrained to tell him; yet to ſweeten the King's apprehenſion, Heracleon uſed all poſſible skill to find out the natural cauſe of this Prodigie; but Timareta was ſo affrighted, that ſhe communicated her fears unto the King her Father; yet would he needs go on unto the Temple, but the ſame diſmal ſight and noiſe was ſtill heard there as well as in the ſtreets: So that this Prince not ſeeing as others did, heard nothing about him but murmuring of voices, which let him know that the people were affrighted; and he beſeeched the gods to let him know what it was they would have him do which might appeaſe them. After which he returned unto his Palace, yet more perplexed than before. As for Seſoſtris, he had the happineſs of ſeeing Timareta in the Temple, but yet he was not ſo happy as to be ſeen, though notwithſtanding all her fears, he obſerved ſhe looked all about for him. This being the poſture of affairs, it chanced that an old ſervant belonging to Amaſis knew that ſervant which was with Amenophis as he was ſtanding in the ſtreets to ſee the King paſs; ſo that ſince they were well acquainted heretofore, he wondred that he ſhould ſhun him, and ſeem not to know him: at firſt, he thought that perhaps he was deceived; but the care which the other took to avoid him, was it which confirmed him in his opinion, alſo he had a private mark in his face which made him very knowable: yet he could not ſpeak unto him, for the preſs of people did part them: The ſervant belonging to Amenophis being at laſt come unto the door of his houſe where he lodged, he entered, and got out of ſight from the Kings ſervant, who then returned unto the Palace, for this ſervant being one of thoſe who waited about the Bath, he was to prepare one for the King his Maſter. However he was certain that the man whom he had ſeen was the ſame which departed from Says, with the Queen, the young Seſoſtris, Ladice and Amenophis: ſo that conſidering well with himſelf, he thought it fit to acquaint the King, and did ſo as ſoon as he had opportunity: And ſince he named the houſe where he ſaw the man enter, the King was much amazed at it, for he knew it to be the houſe where Seſoſtris lodged: ſo that apprehending a ſervant unto the late Queen of Egypt was with Seſoſtris, who he ſuſpected to be the Son of Apriez, he began to think he was not miſtaken when he thought ſo: but as he was ready to command him who gave him the intelligence, to enquire better concerning the truth, he had further intelligence from one of his ſervants that Amenophis was in Elephantine, plotting ſome great deſign: Amaſis no ſooner heard this,but he ſent the Lieutenant of the Guard, to bring him by main force unto him; appointing alſo Seſoſtris to come, and expreſly charging that Heracleon ſhould not know any thing: Theſe orders were ſecretly given, and as punctually executed, for he knew nothing of any paſſages ſince he was buſie in Council with Taniſis and others all that day, conſulting concerning his marriage with Timareta: But whilſt he was deliberating upon a thing which he thought certain, and never looked at ways how to bring it to paſs, Amenophis, Seſoſtris, his ſervant, and I were brought unto the Palace. You may very well imagine, Sir, how this touched Amenophis to the quick, for ſince he was ignorant of the King's repentance, he was in extream fear leſt Seſoſtris ſhould periſh, or at leaſt be kept a priſoner, if he were known to be the Son of Apriez: He began to prepare himſelf for a denial, and to give Seſoſtris ſuch inſtructions at he thought moſt expedient, to perſwade Amaſis that he was not Son unto Apriez, in caſe he had any ſuſpicions of it: But Seſoſtris told him that he would not paſs for what he was any longer, for, ſaid he, I would have Heracleon know who I am: and I had much rather Amaſis ſhould know I am the ſon of his enemy, than that Timareta ſhould look upon me as a Shepherd, and Heracleon as a man unworthy to meaſure a ſword with him: he would have ſaid more, but he was prevented by the Lieutenant of the Guard, who broke off our diſcourſe and conducted us: But, Sir, when we came to the Palace, Amaſis would ſpeak with Amenophis in private: ſo that carrying him into his Cloſet, we ſtayed in his Chamber: But Amenophis was wonder-ſtruck when he heard Amaſis ſpeak: Well Amenophis, ſaid he unto him, I pray acquaint me with ſuch things as I deſire to know: I do not ask you what is become of Apriez his Son, with any intentions of harm unto him, for know, that I am not the ſame I was, I have loſt my ambition in loſing my ſight, and the juſtice of the gods lies ſo heavy upon me, as teacheth me to be juſt alſo: And therefore I deſire to know certainly of you whether the Son of Apriez be living, and where he is? Amenophis hearing the King ſpeak thus, knew not whether or no he ſhould truſt him: But Amaſis perceiving by his pumping for an anſwer, that he had no confidence in him, aſſured him with an oath, that if the Son of Apriez were living, he would reſtore the Crown unto him, by giving him his Daughter. Amenophis was now perſwaded, and after high applauds of the King's moſt generous reſolution, he began to tell him the whole truth, making an exact relation of all paſſages which happened unto Seſoſtris, unto the Queen, unto Ladice, unto Timareta, and unto himſelf, ſince he went from Says; handſomely aggravating the valour of Seſoſtris in the Combat with the Crocodile to ſave the life of the Princeſs, and giving him ſuch hints as he might thereby gueſs at the affection which Seſoſtris had unto his daughter the Princeſs Timareta: After which, he added a moſt excellent rhetorical diſcourſe, perſwading him to ſtand firm in thoſe reſolutions which he had taken, and ſhewing him that he can no way Reign ſo ſafe and ſecurely, both with external and internal ſerenity of ſoul, but by cauſing Seſoſtris to reign: nor never ſo ſecurely ſettle the Crown upon his Poſterity, as by a marriage between Timareta and him: for, ſaid he, which other way is it poſſible you ſhould reſtore the Crown, and ſettle a ſatisfactory peace throughout all Egypt? But, Sir, ſaid he, that your Majeſty may not ſuſpect me of any forged ſuppoſitions, it were requiſite you ſent for Thraſeas, Nicetis, the Nurſe of Timareta who yet lives; and ſome ſhepherds which are in the Iſle, and were then ſo when I arrived there, and by all theſe your Majeſty may know that Thraſeas had never a Son, and that Seſoſtris is the Son of Apriez, and the very ſame I brought with me when I came into that Iſle; for though his age hath much altered his reſemblance, yet there is reſemblance enough to know him to be the ſame. Amaſis was ſo well perſwaded by the arguments of Amenophis, that he ſcarce needed any further ſatisfaction; and the gods had infuſed ſuch a ſtrong belief into his heart, that he was perſwaded fully all was true which Amenophis had ſaid: Yet not to be deluded in a matter of ſo great importance, he ſent for all thoſe Amenophis named, who confirmed all he had told the King: For Thraſeas no ſooner came face to face before Amenophis, who bad him ſpeak the whole truth ingenuouſly, without any diſguiſement, but he very ſincerely did ſo. Thus there needed no more for the knowing of Seſoſtris, than the teſtimonies of Thraſeas, Nicetis, Timareta's Nurſe, the ſervant of Seſoſtris, and all the Shepherds, who all concurred in the very ſame relation. Then Seſoſtris entered, and Amaſis ſpoke unto him in ſuch a generous manner, that the hearts of all the hearers were mollified. Seſoſtris ſeeing this happy turn in fortune, did anſwer Amaſis with wonderful wiſdom and generoſity, which appeared to be in a higher degree than the generoſity of the King: For ſince his love to Timareta was all his thoughts, he behaved himſelf towards Amaſis with the ſame reſpect, he did when he was thought to be his Father. In the mean time, ſince this Prince knew that Heracleon would moſt ſadly reſent this news, he would not have it publiſhed until better opportunities for it: So we returned that night unto the places where we were before. But, Sir, that which confirmed the King moſt in theſe reſolutions which he had fixed upon, was, that after he had ſent for Heracleon, and with all poſſible prudence acquainted him with the reaſons which moved him to break his word, and that he received his reaſons in ſuch a manner, as let him know he had no mind to part with Timareta: In lieu of fearing any revolutions in the State, or apprehending the reſentments of Heracleon, he found ſuch quiet, reſt, and ſatisfaction in his heart, as he had not enjoyed a long time before. So that diſmiſſing Heracleon, he told him for his laſt reaſon, that he could not diſpoſe of that which was not his own; and that he never made any promiſe of Sceptre, or Timareta unto him, but in caſe Seſoſtris died; but ſince he was alive, all promiſes are null. Heracleon, with as much injuſtice as inſolency, called that weakneſs which he ſhould have phraſed virtue; and told Amaſis with inſufferable boldneſs, that he deſerved more ſhame in reſtoring a Crown, than he did glory in getting it. But in concluſion, Sir, Amaſis impoſing ſilence upon him, he was forced to retire. Amaſis remaining in as much tranquility of mind, as the other went away diſordered. Yet he gave ſpecial order that obſervant eyes ſhould be had over Heracleon; for ſince he loved him, he would not willingly loſe him, nor be forced to drive him away from him. After this, he went to bed and ſlept, and in lieu of ghaſtly apparitions, and terrible dreams, as he uſed to have, his imagination was full of ſweet and pleaſing things, Ladice apperaed unto him, but it was in full luſtre of that beauty which formerly he adored; in commending him as much as before ſhe menaced him, and exhorted him to go on with what he had ſo well begun; and to augment the wonder, whether the joy and agitation of his ſpirits had diſperſed ſome melancholy vapours, which cauſed his blindneſs, or whether the gods would either puniſh or recompence him according to the various thoughts of his ſoul, when he awaked, he found his ſight reſtored; ſo that being tranſported with joy and delight, he ſent for Seſoſtris and Timareta, and went with them unto the Temple, to render thanks unto the gods, himſelf declaring unto all the people that Seſoſtris was the Son of Apriez, and telling Timareta that ſhe was much obliged unto a Prince, who though ſhe was the daughter of an Uſurper, yet would give her the Crown of Egypt; yet Seſoſtris did publickly declare, that he would not wear the Crown until after the death of Amaſis, but would be only regarded as the firſt of his Subjects. You may well imagine, Sir, how great was the joy of Seſoſtris and

Timareta, when being returned to the Palace, and this Prince had the liberty to wait upon her to herChamber, and to talk with her freely before he returned unto the King, as he was deſired, that he might be adviſed with concerning the beſt expedients of publiſhing the matter throughout all the Kingdom, and principally at Thebes and Heliopolis, to the end all Wars might ceaſe. I hope you will pardon me, Sir, if I do not relate any joys and delights of this juncture; Seſoſtris and Timareta continued ſo ſhort a time happy, that I cannot do it; nor will I relate all the reſolutions the King took with Seſoſtris, and Amenophis; nor how great was the peoples joy when they knew there was a Prince deſcended from their Antient Kings who ſhould ſucceed Amaſis. But give me leave to tell you, that in conſideration of the happy event of this adventure, the King pardoned Thraſeas the untruths which he had told: Seſoſtris did the ſame, and Amenophis followed their example. As for the Princeſs Liſerina, ſhe had ſome comfort, to ſee her brother put by the Kingdom: for ſhe conceived him only to be the cauſe why ſhe was not Queen. But as for Heracleon, the motions of his heart were moſt violent: and Taniſis incenſing him by his wicked Counſels, there was no abominable propoſition which they made unto each other, which they did not harken unto without any horror or repugnancy: But at laſt, after they had propounded Crime after Crime, they reſolved, that conſidering the juncture of affairs, there was no way but to kill Seſoſtris, and the King alſo. And in the mean time to publiſh that Amenophis was an impoſtor, who foiſted in a pretended Son of Apriez: And to farther that deſign, they reſolved, that the King ſhould firſt be killed, to the end it might be publiſhed that Seſoſtris killed him: and for a pretence, to raiſe a tumult, during which, Taniſis ſhould kill Seſoſtris, having men for that purpoſe with him. This horrid deſign being reſolved upon, all their endeavours were to put it in execution with all ſpeed. Taniſis, accuſtomed unto all villanies, had always ſuch men at his beck, who never look after any thing but recompence, but never enquire whether a thing be juſt or unjuſt: But the difficulty was, how to get him unto the King's Palace, at that time when the act was to be executed: Yet ſince Heracleon had many Creatures in the houſe, he found out one that was neither rich nor virtuous: moreover he had been once turned out of office by Amaſis, and at the requeſt of Heracleon reſtored: This man at the ſolicitaion of Taniſis, did ordinarily keep the Guard upon a little back ſtairs which went between the lodging of Seſoſtris and the King's Chamber: So that thinking this man moſt fit to give entrance unto thoſe whom they would employ to murder the King, and the ſooner, becauſe it might eaſily be imagined that Seſoſtris was the Aſſaſſinate, conſidering the place which he Guarded, therefore Heracleon put on Taniſis to ſuborn this man: But, Sir, I will not make any longer relation of an act ſo horrid: but in ſhort, let me tell you, Taniſis ſuborned this Officer, who promiſed to let in whom he would: and the buſineſs was brought unto ſo near a point of execution, that men were ready to cry out the King was killed, and that it was Seſoſtris killed him; and leſt there ſhould be any failing in the enterpriſe, Heracleon had provided a boat upon the Nile, which ran on the back-ſide of the Garden, that he might thereby ſave himſelf if need were, and alſo laid horſes ſome thirty furlongs from Elephantine. In concluſion, Sir, this being the juncture of things, the King had intelligence by one of thoſe whom he had ſet to eye Heracleon, that certainly he had ſome plot in hand, though he knew not what it was. Amaſis hearing this, feared that Heracleon had ſome ill deſigns upon Seſoſtris, not thinking of any thing againſt his perſon: So that to prevent any danger, he doubled the Guards towards the lodging of Seſoſtris, and by conſequence weakned his own, which was favourable unto the deſign of Heracleon. But the Gods being juſt, they did not favour him but unto his own ruin. For Seſoſtris knowing that the Guards were doubled at his door, would know the reaſon, and called him in who commanded the Guard, who at firſt ſaid he knew nothing, but that accidentally the Guards were ſtronger on the one ſide than the other. But Seſoſtris, finding that this Souldie knew more than he would tell, he was very urgent with him, and ſo far, that at laſt he told him, it was ſuppoſed Heracleon had ſome ill deſign, becauſe he was ſeen that night go out of the Palace, and ſpeak unto an Officer which had the Guard upon the back ſtairs, and was heard to promiſe him great recompences. This Officer ſaying, to excuſe his ſilence, that he durſt not tell it, leſt he ſhould not be credited, and become expoſed unto the hatred of Heracleon: Seſoſtris no ſooner heard this, but after promiſe of recompence for his fidelity, he went to acquaint the King, though it was late, and he knew that he was retired to his reſt: and certainly it was by the inſpiration of the gods. However it was, Sir, Seſoſtris went: and went not that way of the back ſtairs, but by the great common way, leſt he whom the ſouldier ſuſpected and commanded that ſide, ſhould think he was diſcovered, if he ſhould ſee him go ſo late unto the King, who was faſt aſleep, when Seſoſtris came unto the chamber with two of the guard and my ſelf. But the ſtrangeneſs of this accident is, Sir, that juſt as they opened the Kings Chamber door to go and wake him, and tell him Seſoſtris deſired to ſpeak with him, we ſaw the wardrobe door open at the ſame time, and many men with drawn ſwords enter into the Chamber, which had a Lamp burning in it. Seſoſtris no ſooner ſaw this, but drawing his ſword, he ran with a moſt magnanimous generoſity between the King's bed, and theſe Aſſaſſinates, not conſidering him as the Uſurper of his Kingdom, but as the Father of Timareta. So that the King being wakened with the noiſe of them that would have killed him, and them that defended him (for the two Guards and I followed Seſoſtris with our ſwords drawn) the firſt object that he ſaw, was, that Seſoſtris killed one of the Aſſaſſinates, and wounded another, he alſo obſerved that he ſtill ſtood betwixt him and them as much as he could. I cannot eaſily tell you, Sir, what an affrighting object this was unto Amaſis, but it laſted not long, for the incomparable valour of Seſoſtris repulſed all the wicked Aſſaſſinates. Taniſis who led them up, felt the weight of Seſoſtris his arm, being wounded in two places: So that after this fear ſeiſing upon all the Conſpirators, they went out of the chamber and Wardrobe: Seſoſtris would have purſued them further, ther, but Amaſis riſing up haſtily, would not let him: So that making the doors faſt on that ſide, and guarding them until all were awake in the Palace, the King ſent two of the Guard down the back ſtairs to know the number of the Conſpirators, and to report all they ſaw unto him: Alſo he ſent other two to cauſe all his Officers to come unto him, and amongſt the reſt, Simandius: In the mean time thoſe who failed in the execution of that deſign, rallied about Heracleon; for he ſtayed in the Court with thoſe whom he had appointed to murder Seſoſtris: but ſince he ſaw his deſigns did not hit, and that he could neither kill the King, nor Seſoſtris, he pitched upon another plot, which was to carry away the Princeſs of Egypt: He knew ſhe had but few men with her, and that ſhe lodged far off the King's Lodging: For Elephantine not being the ordinary reſidence of our Kings, the Palace where he lodged wes very irregularly built: So that Heracleon finding more facility in this deſign than the other, he did eaſily execute it. Cauſing then her door to be opened in the name of the King, he entered, and took away Timareta, maugre all her tears, cries, and entreaties, and this great Princeſs had ſcarce time enough to dreſs her ſelf. Yet ſhe had this advantage in her miſery, that her women went with her. In the mean time, thoſe men whom the King ſent to diſcover the Conſpirators, hearing ſome women cry, returned in all haſte, and told the King that they were in the Princeſs Timareta's chamber: So that Seſoſtris hearing this, ran like a man in fury to defend his Princeſs, but he came too late; for Heracleon and Taniſis were both already embarqued. You may eaſily imagine, Sir, how this Prince was grieved, eſpecially when he ſaw all his purſuits of Heracleon were in vain. That which favoured his flight, was, that none imagined he was embarqued in the Nile, but that he was ſtill hid in Elephantine. The next morning it was known that Heracleon landed at the place where he had laid his Horſes, and that Taniſis ſtayed by the River ſide, and dyed in the arms of ſome Shepherds who found him in that place, though no news could be heard of Heracleon, or which way he took;

and though Seſoſtris uſed all poſſible endeavours to find it out; for he wandred two whole months, hardly knowing whither he went: Amaſis for his part cauſed a ſtrict ſearch to be made all over the Kingdom, and all in vain: So that at laſt Seſoſtris was conſtrained to ſtay with the King until he had further light where Heracleon was. In the mean time, all thoſe who took up Arms for the Son of Apriez, laid them down again. And the King went to Thebes, carrying Seſoſtris with him, whoſe ſorrows were beyond expreſſion. From Thebes they went to Memphis, where the King met with an Ambaſſador from Crœſſus, who demanded aid according to the alliance which was between them: So that Amaſis ſent thoſe men who ſerved in the War of Thebes, who had been witneſſes of the valour of Seſoſtris, under the name of Pſammetites: Amaſis willing Simandius to command them; but a while after theſe Forces were departed, a Letter which Heracleon writ unto one of his friends in Egypt, did happily fall into the hands of Seſoſtris, which let him know that he was in Lydia: So that Seſoſtris not communicating his deſign unto any but me, reſolved to ſteal away from Amaſis, and Amenophis, to ſerve in the War under Crœſſus: And this he did with abundance of reluctancy, for he was infinitely charmed with the fame of your valour and virtue, and loth he was to take any ſide but yours. Yet Love being the predominate paſſion of his Soul, he reſolved to ſerve Crœſſus, thereby to obtain Timareta: So that Seſoſtris ſtole away from the Court, and I followed him: At parting he writ unto the King, acquainting him with the cauſe of his voyage: alſo unto Amenophis, deſiring him to appeaſe the King, aſſuring him he would never return unleſs he brought back Timareta, alſo deſiring him to move Amaſis to write unto Crœſſus, that he would make a ſtrict ſearch for Timareta, and return her to him. At laſt, Sir, we arrived at Sardis, where Simandius was before us with the Forces he commanded, who were as full of joy as wonder to ſee my Maſter. I need not tell you, Sir, how Crœſſus, the King of Pontus, and the Prince Myrſyles received Seſoſtris very well: But aſſure you, he was infinitely grieved that he coud hear no news either of Heracleon or Timareta, after all this care and ſearch which Crœſſus made upon the Letter of Amaſis. In the mean while as things ſtood, honour would not permit Seſoſtris to go out of Sardis to ſeek his Princeſs from Town to Town throughout Lydia; alſo the approach of the Army preſently made it a thing impoſſible for him: So Seſoſtris in lieu of looking for Timareta, was engaged to fight, and he did ſo courageouſly, that he deſerved immortal glory; and, Sir, you know that your Battalion was the only one that day which was not broken. But, Sir, be pleaſed to know, that the Prince Seſoſtris was not wounded by any of your men, but by the baſe Heracleon. I cannot tell you, Sir, how he came mingled amongſt us, or how he came to know my Maſter; but when we were fighting with the valiant Abradates, and when Seſoſtris did things worthy of your eſteem, had you been a witneſs, this Traytor Heracleon came behind him, who thought he had no Enemies to fight with but what were before him, and wounded him in ſuch ſort, that he fell down dead amongſt our Heroes. As I was the only man who obſerved whoſe arm it was who gave the wound, ſo I was the only man who revenged the death, as I thought, of the Prince Seſoſtris, and as I was redoubling my fury, when I perceived it to be Heracleon, I was hindred from killing him outright, by a ſquadron of your men, Sir, who purſuing their victory, came betwixt Heracleon and me; ſo that I was forced to get into a Body of our men, where I ſtayed until after you had gained the Battel, and until our ſhewing our firm reſolutions, obliged your great heart to put a difference between us, and them that fled, and to treat us with ſo much generoſity, as moved us to think, that after you had ſaved the life of the Prince Seſoſtris, you would alſo out of your goodneſs make the wicked Heracleon confeſs in what place the Princeſs Timareta is: For truly, Sir, we have ſaved the life of the Prince Seſoſtris in vain, if he do not find the Princeſs whom he adores.

My own misfortunes have ſo taught me how to have pity upon the miſeries of others (anſwered Cyrus) that I muſt needs have much compaſſion upon the Prince Seſoſtris; and I aſſure you I will zealouſly intereſt my ſelf in any thing that relates unto him; and to teſtifie as much, I will go my ſelf to make Heracleon confeſs where the Princeſs Timareta is; and I beſeech the gods that I may reſtore her unto the Prince Seſoſtris in releaſing Mandana. After this Miris retired; for it was very late, and Cyrus had but liittle time to reſt; yet he did not ſleep until he had beſtowed one quarter of an hour in remembrance of his dear Princeſs; though it was with much ſorrow at her unjuſt Jealouſie, whereof ſhe had given him ſuch a cruel Teſtimony.

PART VI. BOOK III.

WHilſt the moſt Illuſtrious Cyrus was lending an ear unto the adventures of Seſoſtris, and the crimes of Heracleon, the laſt of theſe hearing what care Cyrus had of Seſoſtris, he was in ſuch a fury, as all his wounds opened, and ſuch a violent Fever ſeiſed upon him, that intelligence was given unto Cyrus, that he could not outlive the night following: Cyrus then hearing in what condition he was, in remembrance of his promiſe, went to ſee him, and to win him either by fair means or foul to confeſs where Timareta was, but he found him not in a condition to be talked withall, for he raved, and was out of his wits; yet Cyrus had as good intelligence concerning this Princeſs in his raving idle talk, as if he had his reaſon free: For as ſoon as he ſaw the Prince at the ſide of his bed, and his imagination being filled with thoughts of Timareta, he thought Cyrus to be the King of Pontus, and began to thank him for giving Sanctuary unto the Princeſs Timareta in the Citadel of Sardis. Afterwards changing his diſcourſe, he ſpoke ſometimes of Seſoſtris as if he were dead, and ſometimes again as if he would kill him: ſo that his mind not ſetling upon any one object, it was not poſſible to draw any certain intelligence concerning Timareta out of him: Yet ſince a Priſoner confeſſed unto Cyrus, that there entered a Lady of great quality into the Cittadel of Sardis, he thought there was ſome ground to be taken of what Heracleon had ſaid, yet he would not give this hope unto Seſoſtris, until he had more: but Heracleon having loſt his ſpeech, and a little while after his life, then he ſent Miris unto him to acquaint him with the death of his Rival, and what great probability there was, that the Princeſs Timareta was in the Cittadel of Sardis. After which, according to the cuſtom, he went to give all neceſſary orders, and to viſit his Troops, leaving the care of Heracleon's Funeral unto thoſe about him. He went alſo unto the Tent of Araſpes, whoſe wounds were not ſo vexatious unto him as the ſorrows of his ſoul: From thence Cyrus went to hold a Council of War, wherein it was reſolved, that within two days they ſhould give a ſecond aſſault: So that this Prince employed all his time in ſeeing the Engines, in inſtructing thoſe who were to make them, in giving good counſel unto all the Officers, and in encouraging the Souldiers. The King of Aſſyria, and Mazares did the like, and all the reſt of the Kings and Princes in the Army were exceedingly zealous to promote the deſigns of Cyrus. Anaxaris in particular was not the leaſt forward in the ſervice of this Prince: And the Prince Seſoſtris being almoſt perfectly recovered of his wounds, was ſo very much joyed that there was ſome likelyhood of Timareta's being in Sardis, that he would needs go unto the Camp, eſpecially when he heard that an aſſault was to be given unto the Town: for though the forces of Amaſis came with intentions to defend it, and the Egyptians unto whom Cyrus ſhewed favour, had not ſubmitted but upon condition not to be forced to fight againſt Crœſſus, yet now things looked with another face: and Seſoſtris heard that Crœſſus ſpoke unworthily of the Egyptians, who only reſiſted the Enemy in the day of Battel: This did ſo incenſe all them of that Nation, that they were reſolved to fight for Cyrus: But ſince the reſolution was taken whilſt Seſoſtris was not in a condition to command them; this Prince, whoſe generoſity was more ſcrupulous than theirs, would not ſuffer them, before he entreated Cyrus to let him ſend a herald unto the King of Lydia, to ask whether the Princeſs Timareta was in Sardis or no, and whether he would reſtore her? this he did, that he might find a way to do it without a wound unto his honour. He departed then from the Caſtle where he was, but firſt he took leave of the Princeſs Araminta, unto whom he had already made many viſits, to thank her for the care ſhe had of him, during the violence of his ſickneſs. He bad adieu alſo unto the fair Cleonice, unto Doraliſa, and all the reſt of the Priſoners. Seſoſtris then after he had received a thouſand civilities from all theſe fair Priſoners, went unto the Camp, where he was entertained by Cyrus with all the honours due unto his birth, virtue, and merit: And after Cyrus had offered him all aſſiſtance in his power, Seſoſtris deſired he might ſend a Herald, to enquire and demand Timareta, which according to his deſires was done. But this meſſage was in vain, either unto Crœſſus or the King of Pontus: for the more perſons of quality they had in their power, the more ſecure they thought themſelves, and therefore would not reſtore Timareta. Crœſſus therefore anſwered, that it was true he had her in his hands: But he would not reſtore her, unleſs Amaſis would ſend ſtrong relief as might raiſe the ſiege of Sardis. So that Seſoſtris receiving this anſwer in the preſence of Cyrus, turned ſmilingly toward him, and told him, that in his apprehenſion, ſince it was more eaſie to take the Town of Sardis, than to relieve it, it were better for him to receive Timareta from his hand than from Crœſſus: therefore in lieu of relieving the Town, he would help to take it; and was very glad that he was certain ſhe was in the Town, which could not chuſe but be taken, ſince the invincible Cyrus would aſſault it: My hope is, replied Cyrus, that ſince the valiant Seſoſtris will fight for Timareta, he will teach me by his example, how to fight for Mandana. In the mean time, Cyrus treated Seſoſtris with all civility, and would have all the Grandees of his Army viſit him, and do him all honour, ſo that Seſoſtris that day ſaw all the Princes which were in the Army, who were all ſo well ſatisfied with him, and ſo taken with his ſpirit and civility, that he was infinitely eſteemed. And to do him the more honour, Cyſus would have him command one Brigade of the Aſſaulters, ſo that the morning being come, all orders being given, all the Engines being fit, all the Ladders ready, and every one prepared to fight, they began an hour before day, to fill the ditch about the Town in divers places with faggots: which was ſo readily done, that the Aſſault was given almoſt in an inſtant: and this great Town, was ſet round with Ladders except that ſide which looks toward the Mountain Tmolus, which ſeemed inacceſſible: Cyrus was in that quarter next the Cittadel which was the moſt dangerous: The King of Phrygia aſſaulted that ſide towards Pactolus. The King of Aſſyria that which was oppoſite to it: And Mazares commanded that which was between Cyrus and the King of Aſſyria: Seſoſtris that ſide which looked towards the Plain: Tigranes and Phraartes another towards the Principal Port: and Anaxares another quarter: Hidaſpes, Chriſantes, Andramites, Aglatides, Perſodes, Hermogenes, Leontidas, and all the brave men of the Army commanded under theſe Princes. The King of Hircania, Gobrias, and Gadates remained at the Camp, and commanded the reſerves, to execute all the commands of Cyrus, and to ſend relief where there was need: The orders of this Aſſault were not only judiciouſly given, but moſt couragiouſly executed: and the more, becauſe the Lydian reſiſtance found matter enough for the valour of theſe great Princes and Souldiers: Both beſiegers and beſieged were all fury, both in aſſaulting and defending: There was ſuch a vaſt number of Ladders, and men to carry them, that if the Lydians had not been incouraged by a man whom love made think nothing difficult, certainly they never would have oppoſed ſo great a ſtorm, and ſo general an aſſault, but he infuſed ſuch ſpirit into them, and they fought ſo couragiouſly, that they made their enemies admire them: for though they were aſſaulted by the moſt valiant Princes of the World, and by ſtout Souldiers uſed to gain battels, conquer Kingdoms, and take Towns; yet they reſiſted them ſo ſturdily, that they ſeemed invincible: they did not only ſend clouds of arrows, ſhowers of ſtones, and throw down Ladders, but fought hand to hand with heroique fury, againſt thoſe that came upon the top of the walls: But, Sir, though Cyrus did things prodigious, and all the reſt of the Princes wonders, eſpecially Seſoſtris; and though every one fought with all their force, yet they were not able to carry the Town that day: Yet it was very remarkable, that except Tigranes, who was ſlightly hurt in the hand by the fall of a ladder, there was not one of thoſe Princes either killed or wounded. 'Tis true Cyrus was oft in extream danger, for he expoſed himſelf ſo oft, that he was oft ready to be thrown down from the top of the ladder, or elſe to be knockt on the head with ſtones which the Lydians threw: Yet he came off ſafe, but ſo ſadly, that never any was more, for he found it a matter of great difficulty to force this Town: ſo that calling a Council of War, whilſt a ceſſation of hoſtility was made for four hours, to draw off their dead, it was reſolved, to force it no more, becauſe it could not be taken by ſtorm, by reaſon of the high walls, multitude of Inhabitants, and abundance of Souldiers which defended it: but they began to draw a line about it with forts, hoping to take thoſe by famine who could not be taken by force: And the next morning without more delay, Cyrus went with the Engineers of his Army to view the ground, and to conſider at what diſtance they ſhould make it, and how they were to raiſe forts to defend it: It was no ſooner reſolved upon, but Priſoners and others began to caſt up earth: Cyrus himſelf, being a while an example to encourage the labourers: ſo that the Inhabitants of Sardis, ſeeing their Town ready to be incloſed, and that the beſiegers went not about to raiſe their ſiege as they hoped, their joys for the laſt repulſe of the enemies was quite quaſhed, and they began to murmur: ſome ſaid one thing, ſome another; ſometimes they would make them believe, that Cyrus cared not for Mandana, then they would perſwade them that he would diſcamp if they did couragiouſly ſuſtain this aſſault; yet it ſeemed they were like to be expoſed unto all the hardſhips of a long ſiege: So that they fell unto a freſh mutiny, for nothing is more terrible to the people than fear of famine: The thing which much augmented their diſorder, was, that when the ſiege began, there were many ſtrangers in the Town who were forced to ſtay againſt their wills, and who now would have gone out, if it had been in their power: amongſt this multitude of ſtrangers, there was one Lician Lady of quality, who coming unto Sardis to ſee a Siſter which was married unto Doraliſa's Unkle, was there ſhut up, having with her one daughter, one Neece, and one of her friends, all three very fair and amiable: Every one was ſorry that theſe three beauties and ſtrangers ſhould be ſhut up in a beſieged Town. They did earneſtly ſolicite Crœſſus for leave to write unto Doraliſa, who they knew was with the Princeſs of Pontus, ſince the death of Panthea, that ſhe would obtain leave of Cyrus for three Ladies who were not of Sardis, to come out of the Town, and go unto their own homes. And ſince they knew Andramites was in love with Doraliſa, alſo in favour with Cyrus, they hoped he would mediate for them: Therefore having obtained a Herald from the King of Lydia, they writ unto Doraliſa and Andramites, giving their Letters unſealed unto this Herald, who, according to his Commiſſion, went out of the Town unto the head of the Trenches where he ſtayed, and where an Officer and four Souldiers came to conduct him unto Cyrus. This Prince no ſooner knew the cauſe of his coming, but he ſent him immediately unto Doraliſa; and ſending her word by him who conducted the Herald, that he conſented unto what was deſired: ſo Doraliſa and Andramites in lieu of coming to ask a favour, were obliged to come and thank Cyrus: Then the Herald returned with much ſatisfaction, the time being ſet when Cyrus would ſend a convoy to guard theſe Ladies at their coming out of the Town: Then the Herald rendering an account of the happy ſucceſs of his voyage; that Lician Lady, named Lycaſte, accompanied with a Neece named Parmenides, her daughter called Cydipe, a ſiſter of Parmenides called Arpalice, and one of her friends named Candiope, went to thank Crœſſus and take their leaves of him: The Prince Myrſiles accompanied them to the Gates of the Town, in conſideration only that they were couſins of Doraliſa, whom he ever highly eſteemed: and certainly they ſtood in need of a perſon of ſome authority to conduct them thither:

For though the Inhabitants might have been glad of theſe Ladies going out of the Town, yet they murmured: yet the preſence of the Prince Myrſiles reſtraining them, they let them go out in a Coach, Parmenides riding on horſeback, and followed by all the Train of Lycaſte. and her own: A Herald of Crœſſus, riding before, to conduct them unto the place, where Andramites in the head of fifty horſe waited for them. But as if fortune did ſtrive how to make the moſt innocent actions of Cyrus ſeem culpable, it chanced that the Princeſs Mandana, and the Princeſs Palmis having got a day of leave to take freſh air upon the Tarraſs, from which all the Plain is diſcovered, they were there juſt as theſe Ladies went out at the Gate next the Cittadel; ſo that wondering to ſee a Coach-full of Ladies go out of a beſieged Town, they began to obſerve them, and follow them cloſe with their eyes, ſo that they ſaw when the Herald conducted them to the place where Andramites ſtood, and obſerved how Andramites received them, Mandana perceived, or at leaſt imagined, that he received them with much reſpect, and afterwards that he led them towards the Camp: Since all he did, muſt needs be by the orders of Cyrus, his actions could not be indifferent unto her; and ſhe conceived that theſe Ladies could not come out of Sardis but by the permiſſion of Cyrus, therefore ſhe had ſo violent a curioſity to know who they were, and why Cyrus ſhould ſhew them ſuch favour, that ſhe could not chuſe but ask the King of Pontus, the next time ſhe ſaw him, which was every day at ſuch hours as his buſineſs of War could beſt ſpare him, and when the melancholy of Mandana permitted him; therefore ſhe no ſooner ſaw him, but addreſſing her ſpeech unto him: I would gladly know, Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, who thoſe Ladies were which yeſterday went out of Sardis, and who had obtained more favour than I can? The King of Pontus, not being ignorant of her thoughts, anſwered her craftily, that thoſe Ladies obtained a Paſſport from Cyrus, becauſe they were Couſins unto a Lady whoſe name was Doraliſa, who the Queen of Suſiana loved very well, and who at this preſent is with the Princeſs Araminta. Thus this Prince, though he ſpoke nothing but truth, yet ſpoke very much againſt his Rival. Mandana not doubting but that Cyrus permitted theſe Ladies to come out of Sardis only in conſideration of the Princeſs Araminta, and not at all of Doraliſa; yet ſince ſhe would hide the agitation of her ſpirit as much as ſhe could. I wonder, ſaid ſhe, ſince the Princeſs Araminta has ſuch a power over the ſpirits of Cyrus, that there are not more Ladies which make uſe of her credit with him to get out from hence; for I believe he can deny her nothing. I believe (replied the King of Pontus) that my Siſter makes better uſe of that power which ſhe hath over the Soul of Cyrus, than you do of that which you have over me: You, I ſay, who every day ask things impoſſible, or at leaſt things which, if not denied, will give a death to him you ask them of. I know not what ſhe asks (replied ſhe) yet I am ſure, I ask nothing of you but what is juſt, and which you ought not to deny me. Though I agree, replied he, that what you ask is juſt, yet I cannot agree, Madam, that I ought not to deny it: For Love is a paſſion which cannot acknowledge any empire but his own. Therefore never wonder, Madam, if I do not harken unto what you ſay, ſince you never ſpeak any thing but in oppoſition to my paſſion. Though I ſhould confeſs, Sir, (replied Mandana) that Love does not admit of Reaſon, yet it muſt admit, and ſubmit unto neceſſity: Therefore to what purpoſe is all your obſtinate endeavours to defend Sardis, and to win my heart, ſince the firſt of theſe is very difficult, and the other abſolutely impoſſible? It were better policy for the King of Lydia to think of preſerving his Crown, and for you to think of procuring your liberty by giving me mine. I will conſent (added ſhe, in a mind extreamly incenſed againſt Cyrus) that you ſhall not deliver me into the hands of any Prince who is your Rival, ſince I would have you deliver me unto none but the King my Father. Ah, Madam, (replied he, the better to know her thoughts) can I believe you had rather be carried unto Ecbatan, than to remain in the Camp of Cyrus? Doubt it not, replied ſhe, but believe, that my ſoul is in ſuch a condition, as I will neither be favourable unto you, or him. How, Madam, replied he, can you ceaſe from loving Cyrus as well as my ſelf? I aſſure you, ſaid ſhe, I begin to love none in that way you would be loved. I have told you, Sir, a hundred times, that you have an infallible way to get my eſteem and friendſhip, which is, to keep me no longer a Captive: For though in reaſon, when any one ceaſeth from perſecuting, it is enough the perſecuted party ceaſe from hating, without ſo much generoſity as to forget all paſt injuries, which the common people of the world are not uſed to do: But I will now repeat the ſame I have ſaid a hundred times before, do but releaſe me, Sir, and I will ever both eſteem you, and become your friend. I wiſh to the gods, replied he, that I were able to be contented with your offer, or that I could perſwade you to a little more. As for my ſelf (replied ſhe) it is abſolutely impoſſible, therefore it muſt be you that muſt change, ſince I cannot, that the Wars may ceaſe, which cauſeth ſo many miſeries, and which in all likelyhood will laſt a long time: at leaſt, I am perſwaded Cyrus has no deſign to end it quickly, ſince he lets ſo many out of Sardis. The King of Pontus hearing Mandana ſpeak in this manner, was as joyful as his bad condition could permit, for he perceived her mind was much incenſed againſt Cyrus; and truly he was not miſtaken: He was no ſooner gone out of her Chamber, but Mandana called for Marteſia: What do you conceive (ſaid ſhe unto her) of the paſſages we have ſeen this day? Could you ever believe that the civilities of Cyrus ſhould tranſcend his love? However you ſee how he carries himſelf, and can you yet maintain that he is ſtill the ſame he was unto me? Was ever the like ſeen? Would Cyrus famiſh a Town, and yet ſuffer many people to go out of it? For I do imagine (ſaid this incenſed Princeſs) this is not the firſt time he hath given Paſports, at the requeſt of Araminta. But, Madam, (replied Marteſia) thoſe you ſaw go out this day, will not at all alter the Siege of Sardis, nor retard the taking of it. Ah, Marteſia, replied Mandana, do not defend the unfaithful Cyrus, ſince I am confident, he would never have let them come out, but that he had a mind thereby to oblige the Princeſs Araminta. I confeſs the coming out of theſe Ladies do not much impede the taking of this Town by Famine, but I know that it is not the cuſtom of love, to do things by the rule of reaſon; and I aſſure you, I ſhould have liked it better that Cyrus had uncivilly refuſed theſe favours for his love of me, than to have juſtly granted them unto the Princeſs Araminta. But whilſt this great and unhappy Princeſs took the bare civilities of Cyrus for a crime, he would have given her greater ſubjects of complaint, had ſhe known how he entertained theſe ſtranger Ladies who came out of Sardis, though in truth ſhe had no reaſon to accuſe him, ſince what he did was out of his civil and obliging nature, which thought it a piece of injuſtice to deny a perſon of Doraliſa's merit ſuch a favour as could not prejudice Mandana: Nor did he more than what Mandana her ſelf would have adviſed him unto, if ſhe had not been prejudicated with an unjuſt jealouſie, which diſordered both her ſpirits and heart. This Prince, who never did any thing but in a gallant manner, appointed Andramites to conduct them into his own Tent before he carried them unto Doraliſa, and received them with all imaginable reſpects; and certainly it was hard for any to do otherwiſe, for they were very handſome, and would have invited civilities from thoſe that had no particular relation to them. Lycaſte, though well in years, yet had a remnant of beauty; and though one could not ſay ſhe was very fair, yet it muſt needs be confeſſed ſhe was very handſom: Cydipe her Daughter, though no perfect Beauty, yet ſhe had a great repute of it; and though ſhe had not all thoſe regular lineaments of exact ſymetry, yet ſhe paſſed for a great Beauty. Her air was exceedingly attractive and free; but though ſhe did attract eyes, yet Arpalice did charm them; ſince certainly never was a more lovely woman looked upon: She was fair and lively; every part of her face was admirable: There was ſomething in her eyes both ſo glorious and ſweet, as had all the charms both in grey and black colours: So that joyning an excellent ſpirit unto a fair body, it might be rightly ſaid, ſhe was one of the moſt lovely perſons in the world. Candiope was not ſo fair as her two friends, yet very amiable, not only in her great and noble air, but in her quick and inſinuating wit, able to make others reveal their ſecrets, without imparting her own. Parmenides who was with theſe Ladies was handſom, and of a comly preſence, though ſhe had a kind of ſurlineſs in her phyſiognomie. The reſt of the people with them, were only the women of Lycaſte, Cydipe, Arpalice, Candiope, and Parmenides, with ſome men-ſervants. In the mean time Andramites conducting them unto Cyrus, who then had with him Anaxaris, Aglatidas, Ligdamis Hidaſpes, and Feraulas, this Prince entertained them with much civility, asking pardon for ſhutting them up in a Town, and putting them unto the inconveniencies which they had received: But truly, ſaid he, you may accuſe the King of Pontus, and the King of Lydia rather than me, ſince if they would, they might have prevented all by releaſing the Princeſs Mandana. We have ſo much cauſe to applaud you, Sir, replied Licaſte, that we cannot accuſe. I have more reaſon to thank your honoured Couſin, Madam, (replied he) who gave me this opportunity of doing any ſervice unto perſons of your quality and merit. And indeed, Madam, I think my ſelf more obliged to you than you think I am: For I am confident that the Lydians ſeeing theſe three fair ones which accompany you, would have fought more ſtoutly in their defence than they will now they are out, at leaſt their Lovers will fight with leſs fury. I aſſure you, Sir, replied Arpalice, for my part, all my Conqueſts ſhall never hinder your I had thought, (ſaid Cydipe, and looked upon her Couſin) that you would have anſwered for Candiope and my ſelf: but ſince you have not, I aſſure you, Sir, (ſaid ſhe, and turned towards Cyrus) that you have loſt more than g by the coming out of Arpalice, and (if I durſt ſay it) b Candiope's and mine; for we did nothing elſe every day but accuſe the two Kings of Lydia and Pontus of Injuſtice for not releaſing the Princeſs Mandana. Doubtleſs, replied Cyrus, the Lydians are very faithful to that Princ even in unjuſt things; for if they were not, three ſuc beauties as you, maintaining ſo juſt a cauſe as min would certainly have moved a Sedition in my favou As Arpalice was ready to anſwer, Chriſantes brought i a priſoner, whoſe handſome garb attracted the eyes o

all beholders, by the air wherewith he entered into the Tent of this Prince, but as ſoon as he was entered, it ſeemed he was not unknown unto theſe Ladies. Lycaſte expreſſed much wonder at the ſight of him; Cydipe ſeemed much ſurpriſed, Parmenides very melancholy, Candiope very glad, and the fair Arpalice bluſhed deeply, and ſhewed ſuch a ſweet diſorder in her eyes, that it was eaſie to ſee that ſhe had more intereſt in this Priſoner than the reſt, who for his part was not a little ſurpriſed to find thoſe perſons in the Tent of Cyrus, whom he thought to be in Sardis: His reſpects unto Cyrus kept him from teſtifying either his wonder or his joy; and let Arpalice know only by ſome ſtoln looks, that he was more a priſoner unto her than unto Cyrus. In the mean time this Prince obſerving the ſeveral motions in the countenances of theſe Ladies, made no queſtion but this man, who Chriſantes brought in, was of their acquaintance, therefore beginning to ſpeak; Since I ſee, Madam, (ſaid he unto Lycaſte) that this priſoner is not unknown unto you, and ſince it ſeems by his air, that it is juſt he ſhould not be long in fetters, will you be pleaſed to give me leave to enquire before you, where he was taken. Sir, (ſaid Chriſantes unto him) I aſſure you that you never took a Priſoner ſince the war began, who better deſerves his freedom, nor who better deſerves to be carefully kept, than this who I bring unto you, ſince certainly the Lydians cannot have a greater aid, than the Perſon of ſuch a man as he. The commendations you give, replied he modeſtly, is more glorious to them that overcame me than to my ſelf: Victory, ſaid Cyrus, is not always an infallible argument of Valour: ſometime the vanquiſhed are more gallant men than the vanquiſhers: But I pray Chriſantes where met you with this Courageous Enemy? For I find his modeſty ſo great, that there is no asking him: Sir, replied Chriſantes, I cannot tell you what were the motives which moved this valiant man to go into Sardis: but this is truth, that a little before day, he leaped into the ditch, at a place where we had raiſed the laſt aſſault, and he hid himſelf behind a heap of faggots which the enemies had not yet burned: by chance a Centinel ſtanding at that ſconce which you raiſed laſt, perceived him, and obſerved that he looked towards the walls of the Town, and made a ſign unto thoſe upon it, that they ſhould open a little Poſtern door near that place: ſo that the Lydians believing that certainly he had ſome intelligence of importance to bring them; and that perhaps he brought ſome news of that relief which thegreat king of Pontus made them long for: they intended to open it unto him, and for his more ſafe entry, they would make a ſally: But the Centinel who ſpied him, told me what he ſpied, before they opened the little door: and I thought it more expedient to take him than to ſhoot him: Then I cauſed a hundred men to make ready, and get betwixt him that would enter into Sardis, and the little door which they opened for him; ſending at the ſame time, ſix of the moſt reſolute ſouldiers to bring him unto me: but ſince they could not go unto him without diſcovery, thoſe upon the walls killed one, and wounded two of them with arrows, ſo that there was but three who came up to him: and then the Lydians durſt not ſhoot, leſt they ſhould as ſoon hit him that would come into the Town, as thoſe who would take him: and thus this valiant priſoner was in the midſt of three ſtout ſouldiers, without any other aid but his own valour: all this is nothing, ſaid the Priſoner, ſince I was taken: But ſince that would not have been, replied Chriſantes, unleſs I had ſent ſix more after you had killed two of the firſt, I think I cannot ſufficiently extol you. Whilſt Chriſantes was ſpeaking thus, one might perceive by the eyes of Arpalice, that the applauds which were given this Priſoner did not diſpleaſe her, and that ſhe gave a moſt attentive ear unto it: and much more, when Cyrus asked this generous Priſoner what his name was? whether he was the King of Lydia's ſubject? whether he had imployed him upon ſome negotiation with ſome neighbour Prince? or whether he brought any news of a pretended relief, wherewith Crœſſus did flatter the people of Sardis? Sir, replied he, my name is Thraſimedes, and the place of my birth is Halicarnaſſus, ſo that I am neither the King of Lydia's Subject, nor engaged in his intereſts: why then (ſaid Cyrus)

Cyrus) would you chuſe the more unjuſt ſide? and why, ſince your valour cannot be idle, would you not rather ſtay in our Army than attempt to get into a beſieged Town? Thraſimedes was then at a nonplus, for he had no mind to tell the true cauſe of his deſign to get into Sardis. Then he began to make many imperfect anſwers: but ſince he ſaw Cyrus was nothing ſatisfied with them, he feared that if he did not tell the truth, he ſhould ſtill remain a priſoner of war, and by conſequence be ſeparated from that perſon he loved. Therefore reſolving ſuddenly with himſelf, Sir, replied he, as I have been a long admirer of your glory, ſo I would not have you ſuſpect me to have any diſpoſition of becoming your enemy; Therefore I muſt confeſs the truth, though perhaps the fair Arpalice, before whom I ſpeak, will be angry with me; be pleaſed to know therefore that my affection unto her, invited me into Sardis, where I know, ſhe was engaged: And therefore, Sir, ſince love only made me ſo bold, all the applauds which Chriſantes gave unto me, are due unto the fair Arpalice: And to teſtifie that I ſpeak the truth, I am ſo far from deſiring to go into Sardis, ſince Arpalice is not there, that I beg ſo much favour from you, as to let me fight againſt the Lydians upon the firſt occaſion which preſents it ſelf. Since you are more a Priſoner unto the fair Arpalice (replied Cyrus) than unto me; It is ſhe that muſt appoint you what is her pleaſure. Truly, Sir, (replied ſhe in a great confuſion at what Thraſimedes had ſaid) I do not think I have any right to diſpute with you for this illuſtrious Priſoner: but though I had, yet I am ſo much obliged unto you, and I know he ſo much admires you, that to pay a debt which I owe you, and to pleaſe him with command, I enjoyn him to ſerve you, as long as he lives. Truly, added Lycaſte, Arpalice has good reaſon for all ſhe ſays: and truly, replied Cyrus, if ſhe be rigorous unto the valiant Thraſimedes, ſhe is the moſt unjuſt perſon in the World. Whilſt Cyrus was ſpeaking thus, Parmenides ſeemed much diſcontented, yet he durſt not openly expreſs it, only the fair Arpalice his Siſter knew his thoughts by his ſilence. But as Cyrus was ready to tell Thraſimedes, that ſince he was only a Priſoner of love, he was no

Priſoner of War, Hermogenes brought another Priſoner, whom he ſaid came from the walls of Sardis into the ditch by the help of a long cord, by that way which looks towards the river, and being ſeen by ſome ſouldiers, they took him without any reſiſtance, telling them he had no other deſign but to change ſides; and that being ſpied by thoſe who kept Guard upon the walls, when he came down, he was in a thouſand dangers of being killed by ſhots of arrows againſt him. But the admiration was, that when this priſoner, who ſeemed to be a man of quality, entered into the Tent, Cyrus obſerved, that he was not unknown neither unto Thraſimedes, nor Lycaſte, nor Parmenides, nor Cydipe, nor Candiope, nor Arpalice: His preſence, though handſom, was not equally joyful unto them all: for all, except Parmenides who was glad to ſee him, were either angry or melancholy. So that Cyrus having a freſh curioſity to know who he was, and what deſigns he had, began to ask very preſſingly: Inſomuch as this priſoner named Menecrates, who was a Lover of Arpalice, and by conſequence the Rival of Thraſimedes, and who knew well that Parmenides was a favourer of his deſign, began to tell Cyrus ingenuouſly, that he had no other deſign in coming out of Sardis, but to follow Arpalice whom he loved; but ſince this beauty had not the like thoughts of him which ſhe had of Thraſimedes, ſhe began to oppoſe what he ſaid: methinks (ſaid ſhe unto him very ſharply) if the illuſtrious Cyrus be juſt, he ſhould not give much credit unto what you ſay, for truly (ſaid ſhe with a diſdaining ſmile, to come out of a beſieged Town where they are ready to die for hunger, is not an argument of any great matter of love: and therefore I do not conceive that your fair tale of love ought to excuſe you from being a Priſoner of War: ſince he declares himſelf to be yours (replied Cyrus and ſmiled) it is not juſt he ſhould have two maſters; and therefore I will not diſpute with ſo fair a one as you: Lycaſte hearing Cyrus ſay ſo, and ſeeing that out of his generoſity he would releaſe both Thraſimedes and Menecrates, whom ſhe knew would quarrel, Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him to prevent it) your actions ſpeak your great ſoul: but if I may be ſuffer'd to make a requeſt unto you, it ſhould be, that you would be pleaſed either to keep theſe two captives ſtill in your priſon, or elſe abſolutely command them to live friendly together. Since they are none of my Subjects (replied he) I will only entreat them to let me judge of their difference. Sir, (ſaid Parmenides then) ſince the difference which is betwixt Menecrates and Thraſimedes, is of ſuch a nature as it can never be known, unleſs you know the whole ſtory of their lives: and ſince their adventures are not heroique enough for your ear, it will ſuffice, if you will be pleaſed out of your goodneſs to keep Thraſimedes with you until Menecrates hath manifeſted his innocency unto Arpalice, who is the cauſe of their difference. Since Cyrus obſerved that Arpalice did favour Thraſimedes more than Menecrates, he told Parmenides that he would keep them both until he had time to hear the cauſe of their quarrel: That in the mean time; Andramites ſhould conduct Lycaſte, Cydipe, Arpalice, and Candiope, unto the Caſtle where the Princeſs Araminta was, and where they might conveniently remain, until ſuch time as he could determine the difference that was between two men, whoſe Eminent qualities obliged him rather to make them friends than Enemies. Thraſimedes having a good opinion of the juſtneſs in his cauſe, did thank Cyrus for the honour he would do him in being his judge: but as for Menecrates, he was not ſo well ſatisfied, no more than Parmenides. Yet their reſpects of Cyrus ſtopped their mouths, eſpecially when they perceived Lycaſte render a million of thanks unto Cyrus for preventing a misfortune, by his prudence, which might happen either unto Thraſimedes or Menecrates, or both. After which, the Ladies took their leaves of Cyrus, ſo ſatisfied with his civilities, that they could talk of nothing elſe. Thraſimedes and Menecrates, remained rather as men that were guarded than as priſoners of War: The firſt of them was commited unto the care of Chriſantes; and the other unto Feraulas. As for Parmenides he waited upon Lycaſte unto the Caſtle. Ligdamis, had alſo orders from Cyrus, to guard the Ladies, ſince it would be a great joy unto him to ſee his deareſt Cleonice. Cyrus at going out of his Tent, preſented his hand unto Lycaſte, to conduct her unto her coach,though ſhe did earneſtly refuſe it. Andramites preſented his hand unto Cydipe; Ligdamis to Arpalice, and Parmenides unto Candiope. Arpalice in paſſing by theſe two Lovers and Priſoners, ſhewed a different reſpect unto them: For ſhe ſaluted Thraſimedes with a very obliging civility, and Menecrates with ſuch cold looks; as were enough to freeze him into deſpair, eſpecially ſince the affront was in the preſence of Cyrus and his Rival: After Cyrus had put theſe Ladies into their Coach, he beſtowed ſome complements upon the two Rivals, and then he called a Council of War. In the mean time, as gallant as Andramites and Ligdamis were, they left the Camp with joy: the firſt of theſe, becauſe he was performing an acceptable piece of ſervice unto Doraliſa, and the other, becauſe love was predominate in his heart, above all deſires of glory: alſo the Ladies whom they were to guard were ſo amiable,that the ſervice was very pleaſant. All the way, they talked of nothing but Cyrus: At laſt being come unto the Caſtle, Andramites carried them ſtreight unto the Princeſs Doraliſa's Chamber, to the end ſhe might preſent them unto the Princeſs of Pontus; Andramites giving orders they ſhould lie in thoſe lodgings where Seſoſtris did lie. In the mean time, as ſhie as Doraliſa was, and though ſhe was of an humour to do a hundred good offices, rather than to receive one, and never cared for giving over many thanks, yet ſhe could not chuſe but be much joyed at Andramites, for bringing theſe perſons thither, who were ſo near and dear unto her: yet her complement unto him was but ſhort: for though ſhe had an excellent grace of ſpeech, yet ſhe did ſeldom uſe any aggravations: and thoſe who knew her heart, counted one of her words for a thouſand, and would think her very courteous: ſo that though ſhe ſaid little,yet Andramites was well contented: and ſhe was ſo buſie in welcoming Lycaſte, Cydipe, Arpalice, and Candiope, that ſhe had not leiſure to give Andramites many thanks. It being a long time ſince Lycaſte had not ſeen her; and ſince Cydipe, Arpalice, Candiope, and Doraliſa had not ſeen each other ſince they were Children;they were full of complements.It was not long before the wit of Doraliſa began to ſparkle as well as her eyes, for being in one of her pleaſant and charming humours, ſhe did ſo quibble with Lycaſte and all the company, that ſhe was the fulleſt of witty diverſion in the World. But after the Ladies had a little reſted and repoſed themſelves, they made ready to go and ſee Araminta. And Doraliſa knowing that the Princeſs was to be ſeen, conducted them to her chamber: But firſt, ſhe muſt preſent them unto Cleonice and Pherenice, and all the reſt of the Lady Priſoners, who in reſpect of her came to ſee them, and went with them to the Princeſs Araminta: But Cleonice having a deſire to honour theſe Ladies as couſins unto Doraliſa, as new comers and ſtrangers, ſhe would have them go before her: and Ligdamis being obliged to preſent his hand unto Cydipe being next the door as ſhe paſſed, and Parmenides had already given his hand unto Cleonice; Doraliſa perceiving it, told Cydipe in a low voice, how ſhe thought her ſelf obliged to acquaint her, that ſhe did but ill recompence Ligdamis for the pains he had taken in being her guard, ſince by ſeparating him from Cleonice, ſhe ſeparated him from her that was moſt dear unto him. 'Tis true (added ſhe) that I think his deſign was as much to ſee as to guard you, therefore you are the leſs obliged unto him: Doraliſa ſpeaking with a deſign to be heard, Ligdamis complained againſt her inhumanity in inſulting ſo cruelly over a man who had brought her the moſt pleaſant company in the world, and which ſhould be a cauſe of much rejoycing in it: I do not know (ſaid ſhe unto him) how you can phraſe that inhumanity, which proceeds from my pity of you: This is not the firſt time (added he ſtill walking) I have obſerved, that there are ſome miſeries which you have no compaſſion upon in your rallary; and the unfortunate Andramites knows well that I do not lie; ſince both of you ſpeak, replied Cydipe, you will make me underſtand things very well: I aſſure you (replied Ligdamis) I can never make you perfectly underſtand Doraliſa: perhaps you believe (ſaid ſhe and laughed) you have twitted me ſufficiently in telling that I am not eaſie to be underſtood; but ſince I am reſolved to treat you very civilly this day, I profeſs unto you, that I take it for a great commendation: and that I would not be like ſome men I know, who the very firſt day one ſees them, vent all the ſtock of wit they have, and ſhew every cranny of their ſouls. Ligdamis had anſwered Doraliſa, but they were ſo near Araminta's Chamber, that that diſcourſe muſt end to ſalute the Princeſs, who received all theſe Ladies with abundance of ſweetneſs; not only out of her natural civility, but alſo the more to oblige Doraliſa: After the firſt complements were paſt: ſhe asked them concerning the King her Brother, whom they commended very much unto her: afterwards, ſhe asked them, whether they were not extreamly weary of a beſieged Town? and on the contrary, if they were glad to be out of it? ſo paſſing from one queſtion to another, unto which every one in their turns had their vies. Araminta began to extol the beauty of Arpalice, of Cydipe, and of Candiope, and ſaid that it did not ſeem Sardis was yet put unto any great extremities, ſince they brought out ſuch freſh complexions: adding that Crœſſus would never have let them come out, but to drive all the beſiegers into deſpair. Arpalice, Cydipe, and Candiope did all bluſh at the commendations: Afterwards Andramites began to tell Araminta the admirable effects of Arpalice's beauty: relating, how one ventured his life to go into Sardis, becauſe he thought her there; and another ventured his life in coming out, becauſe ſhe was not there: I do not know, ſaid Araminta, which of theſe two men is moſt lovely, or moſt loved, but I wiſh it were rather he that would have gone into Sardis, rather than he who came out: I conceive, Madam, (replied Parmenides who favoured Menecrates) that it is not always juſt to judge of things, by ſome happy events, which are only effects of chance: For truly he who was in the town had no way left to teſtifie his love, but to come out of it. 'Tis very true, ſaid Araminta; but ſince he who goes into a half ſtarved Town, ready to be taken, is in greater danger, than he who comes out of it, I muſt needs wiſh him better fortune than I do to the other: I aſſure you, Madam, (replied Arpalice, and bluſhed) to ſpeak in reaſon, I can neither commend the act of him that would go in, nor of him that came out, ſince according to my apprehenſion, the one would have headlong run into the danger, and the other would have ſhunned it. Whilſt Araminta was talking with theſe Ladies, Ligdamis talked low with Cleonice: and Andramites did the like with Doraliſa: but ſince he had to do with one whoſe wit was above the ſphear of moſt others, when he ſpoke low unto her, either ſhe anſwered him not at all, or elſe very little, or very ſharply; therefore he never durſt ſpeak above three or four words at once unto her, eſteeming himſelf very happy if ſhe did not anſwer him in ſuch a ſharp Tone as was able to turn the ſweeteſt words in the world into wormwood. After the viſit of theſe Ladies had laſted a reaſonable time, they went unto their chambers. Andramites and Ligdamis ſtayed in the Caſtle until they were ready to go to bed, and then they would return to the Camp in the night, leſt they ſhould loſe any opportunity of honour, yet they would not depart before they had received the commands of the Princeſs Araminta, who charged them with a complement unto Cyrus. After which they bad adieu unto all the Ladies; but whilſt they were performing their ſeveral complements, Arpalice took Doraliſa aſide, and after ſhe had pulled down her hood to hide her bluſh, ſhe deſired her to conjure Andramites in private, that he ſhould have a ſpecial care that no new diſpute ſhould ariſe between Thraſimedes and Menecrates, telling him, that perhaps when Cyrus was buſie about great affairs, they would not be ſo ſtrictly guarded but ſome misfortune might fall out between them. Adding, that it would be an unſpeakable grief unto her, if either of them ſhould dye in any conſideration of her. Since it is not ſo eaſie a matter as perhaps you think for me to make any requeſt unto Andramites, ſaid Doraliſa, do not think I will undertake it, unleſs you will promiſe to tell me, what intereſt you have in theſe two priſoners: For though curioſity be not my cuſtom, and though I am ignorant of many things, becauſe I will not ask them, yet I muſt needs confeſs, I have ſuch a deſire to know the cauſe of ſuch extraordinary events, that I will conſent unto what you ask me, if you will promiſe what I ask you. I have ſo much intereſt in them (replied Arpalice) that I cannot deny you. Since it is ſo (ſaid Doraliſa) I will do as you deſire me. And indeed, Doraliſa taking Andramites aſide, as if ſhe had ſome buſineſs which concerned him to communicate unto him; and though ſhe was of ſuch an humour as did not love to ask any one to do a good office, yet ſhe put a notable difference between making a requeſt for another and one for her ſelf: And therefore, though with much ado, ſhe entreated Andramites to have a care of Thraſimedes and Menecrates until the King had reconciled them, aſſuring him ſhe would take it for a great obligation; and adding, that he might take her making any requeſt unto him as a mark of that eſteem which ſhe had of him; for, ſaid ſhe, there are but four perſons in the whole world unto whom I would be obliged, though there be an infinite number that I would oblige; yet if I could preſerve my ſelf from being obliged unto any, I ſhould be very glad; but ſince this is not in my power, and that I muſt be obliged unto one, I had rather it ſhould be unto you than any other. Though your language, Madam, (replied he) cannot be catalogued in the number of favours, which one might hope for from her he adores, yet I will take it to be ſuch a one, ſince it is the greateſt I ever had from you. But as you have done me the honour to aſſure me, that I am in the number of thoſe three or four perſons unto whom you would ſuffer your ſelf to be obliged: I beſeech you tell me whether I be the firſt, ſecond, or perhaps the laſt of that infinite number which you would oblige? I aſſure you, ſaid ſhe, and laughed, I cannot anſwer you directly if I would; for I have aſſigned no places in my heart, all thoſe who are there are in a confuſion without any order or rank, ſo that I cannot tell which is firſt, or ſecond, &c. But Andramites (added ſhe) this is not the buſineſs which I deſire of you, and therefore unleſs you would have me repent of my requeſt, and be ſorry for giving you an occaſion of obliging me; ſpeak not a word more, unleſs it be to bid me adieu. Give me leave, Madam, ſaid he, only to tell you, that I depart the moſt —— For Heavens ſake Andramites (ſaid ſhe, and interrupted him with a laugh) laugh) ſpeak not a word more, unleſs you be well aſſured that what you ſay will not anger me; for ſince the requeſt I made unto you concerns one of my friends, I ſhould be glad you would not put me to recall that requeſt which I have made unto you, and therefore it is better that I interrupt your ſpeech, and leave you; and indeed Doraliſa, making him a ſerious reverence, as if ſhe had done her buſineſs, left him, and went unto Arpalice to tell her that Andramites would do as ſhe deſired. All this while Ligdamis was bidding adieu unto his dear Cleonice, with whom he was always upon conſtant terms of amity. Thus Andramites and he returned to the Camp, and left all theſe beauties together, who did not part until Lycaſte was forced to tell them, it was full time to retire unto their reſt. In the mean time, ſince it did nearly concern Arpalice, that Cyrus in reconciling Thraſimedes and Menecrates ſhould know that he could not protect the laſt of theſe in prejudice of the other, unleſs he made her moſt miſerable, ſhe conſulted with Candiope (who was her deareſt friend, and cloſe confident in all her ſecrets) upon the beſt expedients. For my part (ſaid Candiope unto her) if the caſe were mine, conſidering the credit which Doraliſa hath with Cyrus, both by her ſelf, by Araminta, and by Andramites, I would open my heart unto her, and tell her the whole truth. She hath already deſired (replied Arpalice) that I ſhould do as you adviſe me, and I have promiſed her. Why then do you ask my advice upon a thing (replied Candiope) which is already reſolved? Becauſe I have promiſed more than I can perform (ſaid Arpalice) for though it be a great weakneſs to be timerous in relation of any thing which is not a crime, yet I muſt confeſs I cannot my ſelf tell Doraliſa what is requiſite ſhe ſhould know, thereby to engage her in my buſineſs. Then I muſt ſay (replied Candiope, and ſmiled) that you are very rigorous unto Thraſimedes, if you dare not tell Doraliſa that which a whole Province knows: for is there one in Licia which knows not that Thraſimedes is in love with you? No, ſaid Arpalice, but there is none except you, and Thraſimedes, who knows that I love him; and it is but a while ſince he could gueſs at it, nor yet knows ſo well as you do: Therefore you would infinitely oblige me, if you would ſpare me many a bluſh, and would take the pains to relate all my imperfections unto Doraliſa: You are well acquainted with the original of our affections, and I believe your ſelf is the greateſt cauſe. But dare you truſt your ſelf unto my diſcretion? (ſaid Candiope unto her) are you not afraid that my ill memory will make me miſreport your words? and perhaps alter ſome of them, or make you ſpeak too obligingly unto Thraſimedes? As Arpalice was going to anſwer, Doraliſa came into their chamber, who after ſhe had told Arpalice, that ſhe was glad to ſee by her complexion, and quickneſs of her eyes, that ſhe had ſlept well, ſhe asked whether or no ſhe remembred her promiſe? Candiope knowing very well what Doraliſa meant, laughed, and told her, that Arpalice was not very well diſpoſed to perform her promiſe;telling her afterwards all the diſcourſe which was between them: So that there was a very pleaſant conference between theſe three perſons: For my part (ſaid Doraliſa after ſhe had heard the difference between them) I cannot think Arpalice ever did, or ſaid, or thought any thing which ſhe may not tell me, and therefore I am perſwaded, that it is rather out of vanity than modeſty that ſhe will not let me underſtand her adventures from her own mouth rather than from anothers, ſince it is not poſſible any ſhould know anothers ſtory ſo well as themſelves: But the truth is,one ſhall not ſpeak of themſelves ſo well as others will do. Moſt true (ſaid Candiope) Doraliſa hath found out a good reaſon to ſtop your own mouth; for you would rob your ſelf of a thouſand applauds which I ſhall give you, and which really you deſerve:Yet I cannot phraſe your way to be a vanity, but rather a deſire of glory, and you deſire to get Doraliſa's eſteem, therefore deſires that ſhe may know you the better by my reports than your own.I pray you tell her what you pleaſe,replied Arpalice, ſo you do not put me to ſay any thing: And indeed ſo it was concluded, that Candiope ſhould relate all the adventures of Arpalice. Then Doraliſa and Candiope agreed, that as ſoon as dinner was paſt, they ſhould carry Lycaſte, Cydipe, and Arpalice unto the Princeſs Araminta, minta, where they would leave them, and return unto Doraliſa's chamber: And ſo they did; for they were no ſooner entered, but ſhutting the door, and Candiope leaning upon a table of Ivory inlaid with Ebony, ſhe began her diſcourſe with a complement, thus.

The Hiſtory of Arpalice and Thraſimedes.

YOur Reputation, amiable Doraliſa, being ſuch as makes it dangerous to ſpeak ill before you, might well ſilence me from making any long diſcourſe in your preſence, if it did not meerly concern a perſon who is moſt dear unto you, and deſerves to be ſo unto all thoſe that are capable of her extraordinary merit: and her intereſt being more conſiderable than my own, I will begin that relation which you expect, as if you had never heard of our Country, of our Town, or of Arpalice her ſelf; for though you be very near in alliance of blood, yet you never were in Licia, but always at Sardis or Suſa, never ſaw each other ſince you were five years of age, when Lycaſte came to Sardis, I conceive it convenient to begin as if you knew her not at all. Be pleaſed to know therefore, that Arpalice was but ſeven years of age when ſhe loſt both her father and her mother, and that Parmenides was not of a fit age to govern himſelf, therefore a Brother of Lycaſte, their Uncle, was their Tutor; who having no Wife, put the young Arpalice unto Licaſte, who hath brought her up with as much care as ſhe did Cydipe. The Father of Arpalice holding an intimate correſpondency with a man of Quality named Amphidamas, who was of the ſame Town, and had but one Son, and one Daughter, he ordained by his laſt Will and Teſtament, that Arpalice ſhould marry his Son when ſhe came at age: That which cauſed the great riches of Arpalice (though ſhe had a Brother) was that they were not both by one Mother: And ſince it is the cuſtom of our Country, that Mothers give ranks unto Families, and not the Fathers; and the Mother of Arpalice being exceeding rich, declared by her teſtament, that ſhe ſhould marry Menecrates: adding, that her intention was, that he ſhould have the greateſt part of her eſtate, if her daughter would not marry him. It may very well be ſaid, that Arpalice was never Miſtreſs of her ſelf, ſince ſhe was engaged before ſhe had either reaſon or diſcretion, Menecrates was then fourteen years of age, and Arpalice ſeven, when every one ſaid unto them, that they were deſtined to live together, and that they were ſo faſt, nothing could ever part them; but before I acquaint you how they lived together, I muſt tell you, what the manner of living is, in our Town. All the world knows, that Licia in general is a mountainous Country, very craggy and uneven; and very barren in many places; therefore you may imagine, perhaps, that thoſe who inhabit there, will ſmell of the rudeneſs of their Country: But there being ſome land in Licia exceedingly fertile, it may be ſaid, there are as gallant-compleat men there as any is in the world: Alſo the Metropolis of our Country which is called Patara is one of the moſt famous Towns in all Aſia, not only for its beauty, but alſo for the magnificent Temple of Apollo, whoſe Oracle is ſo famous, and many Strangers reſort thither to conſult with it: Alſo many come out of curioſity to ſee that famed mountain of Chimera: This Mountain, I ſay, whom the renowned Bellerophon rendered famous, whoſe top is full of Lions, middle of wild Goats, and bottom of Serpents; ſo that many Strangers reſorting unto Patara, it is moſt pleaſant living there. Moreover, though the Government of our Country be in the manner of a Republique, yet a King of a Court may be ſeen there as well as in a Monarchical ſtate: For there is a Preſident of the Council, whoſe authority is ſo great, that he wants only the name of being Soveraign of all Licia: So that all the Offices of State being in his diſpoſe, he is as much courted, and as much honour done him, as if he were ablolute King: So that their way of living is much more pleaſant than in our Republiques, where every one is divided into ſeveral Factions; and the contrary, the authority of one man attracting together all the compleat Gallants of a State into one Town, and after into one houſe; this queſtionleſs makes ſociety moſt agreeable, and ſpirits more polite, it being the ſource of all delights, and gallantry. And I can aſſure ſure you, we had the advantage to live in a time when there were more compleat men in Licia, than of three ages before. This is the place, fair Doraliſa, where Arpalice was educated, and lived all her time; I ſhall not need to tell you what ſhe now is; for it is apparent ſhe is one of the greateſt beauties in the world: you may ſee ſhe has been ever fair, not like one of thoſe beauties, who make people believe they uſe enchantments, and who after they have been ugly in their infancy, become fair in ſix months; yet Arpalice did not only promiſe beauty in her moſt tender years, but abundance of ſpirit; a ſpirit ſo gallant, ſo high, ſo noble, ſo paſſionate for liberty, and ſuch an enemy to all ſubjection and conſtraint, that I have heard her ſay a hundred times, a pleaſure commanded did loſe the pleaſure of it: You may imagine therefore, that nothing could fall out more oppoſite to her humour, than to be engaged at ſeven years of age, to marry Menecrates: not but that he was exceedingly handſome, but though he had been the handſomeſt man upon earth, yet he would never have got the heart of Arpalice, out of this reaſon alſo, that ſhe did not chuſe him; and truly, I think another thing did much diſunion the ſpirits of theſe two perſons, which was, that Menecrates was of an imperious nature, and an enemy to any thing that croſſed his inclination; ſo that it may be ſaid, that Arpalice loved liberty, and Menecrates loved licentiouſneſs. But to return unto the beginning of their lives: be pleaſed to know, that Lycaſte and her Brother, who were the Tutors of Arpalice and Parmenides, did think themſelves obliged to ſee the laſt Will of Arpalice's Father and Mother executed: ſo that they uſed all their endeavours to incline the heart of this young Lady to love Menecrates: on the other ſide, the friends of this pretended Lover did ſo expreſly command him to court his young Miſtreſs, that being not at an age to diſobey them, he was continually with her: at leaſt, at ſuch times when he was not buſied with his Tutors, who taught him ſuch things as one of his quality ought to learn: and they ſaw one another ſo oft, that it may be ſaid they ſaw one another too often to love. The three firſt years both of them being very young, it was not obſerved, that there was any ſtrong averſion in the heart of Arpalice towards Menecrates: nor any great affection in the heart of Menecrates towards Arpalice: But always doing as their Parents bad them, Menecrates ſent a thouſand pretty knacks for tokens unto Arpalice, which ſhe received very civilly, more for the love of the things, than the ſender: if they danced or walked, it was always together; and they never enjoyed any pleaſures aſunder: yet this laſted not long: for Menecrates being ſeven years older than Arpalice, when he was eighteen, and ſhe but eleven: ſo that having loſt his Father, he began to live after ſome mode, and to uſe her like a child, and entered into the world with all the liberty of a young man of an impetuous ſpirit: yet his deſign was to marry Arpalice, and to keep her in hand with ſome trivial tokens, but in ſuch a negligent manner, that as young as ſhe was, ſhe took notice of it, and ſlighted him. However be pleaſed to know, that Menecrates having no mind to loſe Arpalice's eſtate, contracted an intimate friendſhip with Parmenides, for he concuring in age, he loved the brother better than the ſiſter: Alſo there was a ſympathy of humours between them: but though he had ſcrewed himſelf into his affection, yet he did not neglect Arpalice. Thus did he ſwim in all delights and pleaſures, and believed himſelf, as ſome ſort of men uſe to do, who though they be married, yet make a profeſſion of Courtſhip and Gallantry. When he was in any of his Gallantries, either he would not come before Arpalice's window; or if he did, it was ſo late, that ſhe ſhould not ſee him: if ſhe were at any meeting, he took her out to dance not above once, or twice at the moſt, and then would leave her to go and talk with ſome other whom his heart more liked: All the advices of his Mother and friends were in vain, when they told him that Arpalice had more wit than years: that he did ill to uſe her ſo; that he would move her unto an averſion; which indeed he did, for all his care was to pleaſe himſelf, telling all thoſe who ſpoke unto him, that he would let Arpalice's beauty grow a little, before he would apply all his Courtſhips and reſpects unto her: Things being upon theſe terms, and Arpalice being ſome twelve or thirteen years of age, he deſigned to travel with Parmenides, and not to return until three years were expired: So that during his abſence, the beauty of Arpalice grew to be (as now you ſee it) a very miracle, and was an admiration to all Licia: Cydipe was alſo very fair; and the Siſter of Menecrates called Cleoxine, who was much about the age of Arpalice, was alſo very lovely; ſo that it might very truly be ſaid, theſe three were the greateſt ornaments of our Town: and ſince I ſaw them every day, it was eaſie for me to get their friendſhip: and truly of all the three, Arpalice did moſt take my heart: and ſuch a knot of friendſhip was tied between us, as nothing can diſſolve: In the mean time; though Arpalice was a wonder of beauty, yet none durſt engage themſelves to ſerve her: ſhe charmed the eyes of all that looked upon her, and every one defended themſelves againſt the inchantment of her beauty: the commendations which every one gave her, was to ſhun her with all care, leſt ſhe ſhould exact more love and adoration than hopes: every one lamented that it was not permittable to ſerve her openly; and vented a hundred things which confirmed her, in her love of liberty. Yet cuſtom, reaſon, and modeſty willing her to follow her own humour, ſhe concealed her reſentments as much as ſhe could: Yet in the ſecret of her heart ſhe had an extream unwillingneſs to be forced unto the moſt important action of her life which ought to be moſt free: ſhe knew very well, that ſhe made all thoſe deſpair that thought upon her in love: and ſhe knew alſo, that the reaſon why ſhe denied all, was becauſe ſhe was promiſed unto Menecrates: Moreover, ſhe perceived that all the friends of Menecrates kept obſervant eyes upon her. So that ſhe lived in ſuch a conſtraint, as a Lady of quality, called Zenocrite, who had a pleaſant wit in Rallary, termed her the fair ſlave; and this name was ſo much uſed amongſt us, as we called her by it as much as by her own name: for ſhe being of a ſweet pleaſing ſpirit, ſhe would not be angry at any Rallary, and the truth was Zenocrite was ſuch a perſon as might ſay what ſhe would without any exception: and truly there was more gallants frequented this Ladies houſe whom I laſt named, than any other in the Town. Zenocrite is fair, of a good perſon, her Phyſiognomy ſubtile, though ſhe had a kind of languiſhing air: ſhe ſpoke things as if ſhe never thought them: yet ſpoke them more ſprightly than thoſe that did think them: ſhe had an admirable fancy, and would turn things moſt pleaſantly: ſhe would ſometimes tell a ſtory in moſt elegant terms;and would ſometimes be ſatyrical in four words: yet was ſhe of a good and generous nature: and if ſhe ſpake in the diſadvantage of any one, it was more out of an exceſs of reaſon and ſincerity, and out of an impetuoſity of wit and fancy (which ſhe could not hold in) than out of malice. The rareſt of her qualities was, that the ſadneſs of her ſpirit did often times cauſe joy in others: For where ſhe lamented the miſeries of the time, or of ill government, ſhe did it in ſuch a pleaſant manner, that ſhe did more delight company by her complaints and murmurs, than others could do in their moſt frolick humours: ſhe had all the news, which ſhe did always poliſh in the relation, not that ſhe changed it, but, that in her Comment upon it, ſhe was moſt agreeable company. Moreover, there being always abundance of company at her houſe: Liberty was always free, thoſe that would be ſad might be ſo, thoſe that would be frolick might be ſo, thoſe that had no mind to ſpeak might be ſilent, ſo that every one might find there a ſatisfaction for his humour: to conclude my deſcription of her, Zenocrite was a perſon every way extraordinary; you may conceive then, that Arpalice having ſo fine a ſpirit, and living in the Neighbourhood, did ſee her very oft, and this priviledge ſhe had, that Zenocrite ſpoke of her, as a perſon whom ſhe eſteemed very much; and I think that I may truly ſay the converſation which Arpalice had with her,did not a little confirm her love of liberty: and when ſhe did aggravate the injuſtice of thoſe who do abſolutely diſpoſe of the wills of others, not knowing whether it be ſuitable to their minds or no,it muſt be confeſſed ſhe ſpoke reaſon; and truly it is very ſtrange, to ſee fathers oblige the children to marry, not knowing whether they love or hate; whether their humours be ſuitable or oppoſite: and if they can but paſs away an afternoon without wearineſs, no matter for all their lives after. Since all that Zenocrite ſaid ſeriouſly,obſerved and exactly related, the friends of Menecrates did all they could to hinder Arpalice from ſeeing her ſo often; but Arpalice had always been well uſed there, ſay what they would, ſhe would not be kept from thence: telling them, that ſince Zenocrite was a woman of no leſs virtue than wit, ſhe knew not why ſhe ſhould not ſee her: the thing which moſt nettled them was, that in ſeeing Zenocrite, Arpalice ſaw all the Gallants in Lycia: yet ſince they were forced to be patient, and to ſet ſome ſpies to obſerve whether any one Courted Arpalice, maugre her engagement: but all their obſervant pains were in vain, for ſince, Menecrates was a man of high quality, and ſince it was known that Permenides deſired this marriage ſhould go forward, notwithſtanding all Arpalice's charms, and what inclinations ſoever they had to her, all thoſe who fell in love with her, did ſtifle their paſſions, and would not regularly apply themſelves to ſerve her: Thus every one did commend her and eſteem her, but none durſt love her: I leave it unto your imagination, how perplexed ſhe was to ſee, that if ſhe were free, ſhe might chuſe as ſhe would, and yet ſhe ſaw ſhe was forced to marry Menecrates whom ſhe could not endure: how oft has ſhe made her complaints unto me? and how oft has ſhe wiſhed that ſhe were poor, ſo ſhe were free? This being the poſture of things, the friends of Menecrates receiving continual Letters from him, intended to ſend him Arpalice's Picture, that he might ſee how ſhe was improved, hoping to make him the ſooner return: They addreſſed themſelves unto him who had the diſpoſition of her, to get her Picture taken, and commanded it with ſuch peremptory authority, that obey ſhe muſt. Yet ſhe deferred it as long as poſſible, and there was no pretence which ſhe did not make uſe of, to excuſe her ſelf: one day ſhe had an ill dreſs on, another day ſhe had not ſlept well in the night, and therefore did not look pleaſant enough to have her Picture taken: another time, ſhe had promiſed a viſit, but at laſt, after all theſe delays and excuſes, ſhe muſt obey. For my part, I have wondered a hundred times how they could take her Picture with any reſemblance, conſidering the fretting melancholy that was in her aſpect, and the impatience ſhe did ſit in;

for ſhe changed her countenance continually, according to the variety of thoughts in her mind: ſhe did almoſt never ſit ſtill, but was always reſtleſs and ready to riſe; and truly if the Artificer had not been a man of an admirable fancy, and the moſt excellent man in his art that was in the world, he could never have done what he did; for notwithſtanding all the reſtleſs impatience of Arpalice he took her Picture marvellous like her. As much incenſed as ſhe was againſt Menecrates, and for all her ſpite againſt the Picture-drawer, yet ſhe was very glad to ſee it, when it was finiſhed; for in what humour ſoever one is in, you know, one would not wiſh long to appear ill favoured. So that Arpalice cheering up her ſelf by little and little, conſented that they ſhould ſend her Picture unto Menecrates: and ſince it was in a very little model, it was put into a very fine Caſe, and ſent unto him, yet Arpalice would not have it ſent as from her, nor that they ſhould ſend him word, ſhe conſented unto it. But I beſeech you admire a little at the wonderful juncture of things; when Menecrates received this Picture, he was at Apamea, where was alſo a Halicarnaſian man of quality, named Thraſimedes, who had no other deſigns in his being there but as a Traveller. And as you know, the Phrygian Muſick is moſt admirable, there was a place in that Town where at certain days was kept a conſort of voices and Inſtruments, unto which all the Gallants reſorted, when they had leiſure: ſome only, becauſe they loved Muſick, and others out of love to company, which was infallibly to be found there. So that Menecrates, Parmenides, and Thraſimedes, all three men of much ſpirit, and curioſity, failed not to be there: And as we commonly ſee, thoſe who are ſtrangers in any Town, though they be not of the ſame Country, yet have a diſpoſition to converſe together with thoſe of the ſame province they are of; So it chanced that Thraſimedes ſought occaſions of talking with Parmenides, and with Menecrates, and finding them both to be men of much ſpirit, he accuſtomed himſelf to talk ofter with them than any others; and ſince in ſuch places as that, 'tis not uſual to talk of very ſerious or important matters, they began to diſcourſe of the difference which is in the beauty of women, according to the ſeveral places where they are born: So that paſſing inſenſibly from one thing unto another, they asked each other reciprocally, if there were any excellent beauties in the places where they were born? And ſince Menecrates was the firſt which asked the queſtion, Thraſimedes anſwered him, that there were many very lovely ones in his Country; but, ſaid he, for all that, I am moſt unhappy, for the truth is, that at this preſent, there is hardly an excellent beauty in all Hallicarnaſſus, though ſome ten or twelve years ſince, there were a thouſand moſt rare ones: and it may be ſaid, that the Stars in our Court are ſet, and ſhine not: It is not ſo in our Town, replied Parmenides, for there are an infinite number of riſing ſtars and growing beauties. And to let you ſee one of them, ſaid Menecrates, look upon the Picture of one of our fair ones. In ſaying ſo, he ſhewed him Arpalice's, which he received that morning. Thraſimedes, no ſooner ſaw it, but he confeſſed, he never ſaw any ſo fair, asking often, whether it was not one of thoſe Pictures which more ſhew the excellency of the Artiſt than the real reſemblance of any one: whilſt Thraſimedes ſaid ſo, Parmenides was called away, by ſome that would ſpeak with him; ſo that ſtaying ſtill with Menecrates, he began more and more to admire the beauty of this Picture, and asked him, whether it was the Picture of any with whom he was in love, or of ſome of his kindred? for I ſuppoſe, ſaid he, it muſt be one of thoſe two; It is neither of the one nor the other, replied Menecrates, for I aſſure you, that Arpalice, whoſe Picture you ſee, is not my Couſin, nor am I in love with her: Is it poſſible (ſaid Thraſimedes) you ſhould know this perſon and not love her? Doubtleſs I can, replied he, and very eaſily. 'Tis true, when I came from the place where ſhe is, ſhe was not ſo fair then, as now, and they write unto me, that ſhe is more charming than her Picture. Whilſt Menecrates was talking thus, Thraſimedes looked ſtill upon the Picture with much admiration; but at laſt, he reſtored it unto him again, and talked of other things. At their going out from thence, they went unto one of thoſe houſes where gaming is uſed, and which is open to all commers, for Phrygia being near neighbour unto Lydia, and as you know the Lydians are the inventers of moſt games of chance, ſo play is uſed as much at Apamea, as at Sardis. Menecrates and Thraſimedes, coming into this houſe, (where Parmenides was not) Menecrates preſently began to play, but with ſuch ill luck, that he loſt all he had about him, except the Picture of Arpalice, whoſe Caſe was of Gold with a circle of Diamonds. So that having no money to play, and being deſperate; he offered thoſe he played againſt, to play the Caſe of the Picture, but Thraſimedes not giving them time to anſwer, told Menecrates, that if he were reſolved to play that Caſe, he deſired it might be with him, and upon condition, that the Picture might be in it, he would ſtake the double value to what it coſt. Menecrates did pauſe upon it a little, but his hot deſire of play, and greedineſs to win back ſome part of what he had loſt, being prevalent with him, he accepted of Thraſimedes his offer, yet deſired no more for a ſtake than the juſt value of the thing; he was the ſooner induced unto this reſolution, becauſe he thought Arpalice could never come to know how he played her Picture, and as for Parmenides, he did not fear that he would be angry, for there was ſuch a ſtrong link of friendſhip between them, that nothing could break it: But to be ſhort, Menecrates loſt the Caſe, Picture and all; and Thraſimedes won it, yet offered afterwards to lend him money to play, but he fretting at the unkindneſs of fortune, he went home as melancholy at his loſs as Thraſimedes was merry at the winning it; yet Menecrates did fret more at his ill fortune in general, than at the loſs of Arpalice's Picture in particular: for having a greater love to play, than to her, he was more ſenſible of the one than the other. Alſo knowing, that in all likelyhood the ſubſtance of that Picture which he had loſt, would infallibly be his, he did not reſent the loſs: As for Thraſimedes, he was not of that mind, for he was better pleaſed in winning this Caſe and Picture, than if he had won a much more conſiderable value in money: So that fearing Menecrates would engage him to play it again if he ſaw him, he ſhunned meeting with him, which he might eaſily do; for having but two days to ſtay in Apamea, he would not appear in his ſight, yet he went to bid him adieu, and Parmenides alſo, but as chance was he met with neither of them, and ſo he took his journey without ſeeing them. I ſhall not be ſo tedious as to tell you unto what Town he went; ſince it is not pertinent to my ſtory; but give me leave to tell you, that in all places he came at, he carefully obſerved whether he could ſee any woman ſo fair as that Picture: But whether really he met with none who had ſo much beauty, or whether he found none that pleaſed him ſo well as that of Arpalice, certainly he gave her the preheminence in his heart. After then he had wandered through divers places in Lower Aſia, as he was ready to return unto Halicarnaſſus, he began to chide himſelf for being of that humour, who had rather ſee things which are leſs rare, becauſe they are farther off, than things of more worthy obſervation, becauſe they are at home: And that Caria, and Lycia do joyn, yet he never had been at Patara, though men from all corners of Aſia come thither to conſult with the Oracle of Apollo; and many alſo come into Lycia to ſee the Mountain of Chimera: Thraſimedes therefore reſolved to ſee our Country; and he added unto his general curioſity of ſeeing all the Rarities of our Town, his particular deſire of ſeeing Arpalice. Then took he his way unto Patara, where he arrived in the moſt pleaſant ſeaſon of all the year: But before I relate how he lived, it is convenient I tell you his admirable adventure which happened unto him, the firſt day he came unto the Town. Know then, that Thraſimedes remembring he knew a man whom he had ſeen in Halicarnaſſus, ſent to enquire whether he was in the Town before he entered himſelf, to know whether he might lodge at his houſe according to the Laws of Hoſpitality, which all Nations do reverence. He ſent therefore a ſervant unto his acquaintance, with a Letter importing this requeſt: He was ſome fifteen furlongs from the place when he ſent this ſervant; and it was in ſuch a very delightful place, that he reſolved to ſtay there with another ſervant who walked his horſe, until the other returned; for it is not the cuſtom of Travellers for to go with any great Train: Since it was not late, he thought he had time enough to ſtay for a return of him he ſent unto the Town, ard ſince it was in a wondrous pleaſant place, he was the more invited to ſtay: For imagine a little Valley, ſurrounded with Hills, intermingled with Rocks, at the bottom of which ran a little Brook that croſſed the valley, on the banks of which grew abundance of wild Willows, which made a moſt pleaſant ſhade. As an addition of delight unto the proſpect of this place, there was a neat houſe, built upon one of thoſe Hills, and as one walked unto unto it by the ſide of the River, one might ſee between the point of two Rocks (which ſeemed purpoſely for that to ſeparate) the Town of Patara a-far off: This was the place, amiable Doraliſa, where Thraſimedes ſtayed waiting for his ſervant: At firſt when he lighted from his horſe, which he gave unto his other ſervant to hold, he began to walk along the River ſide in this pleaſant ſhaddow of willows, and walked ſo long forward, that his Servant loſt the ſight of him; yet ſince he commanded him to ſtay in that place, and knew he would return, becauſe the way which Thraſimedes walked was quite contrary to the way towards the Town, his being out of ſight never troubled him. In the mean time, after Thraſimedes had walked himſelf weary, he ſat down at the root of a Tree, where he fell into a deep contemplation, and muſing upon paſt adventures; but his muſing being none of thoſe kinds that are cauſed by the running of Rivers, or the ruffling of leaves, when the wind blows them, or which comes upon one without any cauſe, it is requiſite you know, that he had been in love in his own Country, and travelled only to cure himſelf of that paſſion which he had unto one who betrayed him, and who indeed had more lightneſs than beauty. In the mean time anger and abſence had cooled his paſſion, which to ſay truly he could never call love; yet in all his Travels he could not meet with one Beauty which he preferred before this of his perfidious Miſtreſs, execept this of Arpalice: So that conceiving the ſight of this Picture was a remedy wherewith to drive out of his imagination the Idea of that perſon whom he would forget, he continually carryed it about him ever ſince he won it; and being in this pleaſant ſolitary place, he drew this Picture out of his pocket, and began ſeriouſly to contemplate upon it. He lay almoſt all along, his head leaning upon a little tuft of graſs which grew at the foot of a Willow, holding in his hand the Picture of Arpalice; but after he was well compoſed in his own thoughts, and agreed that the perſon whom he would not love was not ſo fair as that Picture, his muſing did grow more confuſed, and he thought upon juſt nothing no not ſo much as upon the Picture which he held in his hand: So that it being very hot, and he being up betimes, the murmuring of the brook, the ruſfling of the leaves, the ſinging of the Birds, being all inviters unto ſleep, eſpecially a man who had neither any great joy or ſorrow in his ſoul, Thraſimedes fell aſleep: The Caſe which he held in his hand falling out of it: Whilſt Thraſimedes ſlept thus, you muſt know, that Lycaſte, Cydipe, Arpalice, and my ſelf, with many others were come out to walk unto this pretty neat houſe, which I told you was built upon one of thoſe hills which compaſſed about the valley where Thraſimedes ſlept: For ſince it belonged unto Zenocrite, we frequented it as if it were our own. In the mean time be pleaſed to know, that there was a great League between Arpalice and my ſelf, and therefore we never took delight in our walks, unleſs we talked together in private, ſo that we always took ſome occaſion or other to ſeparate from the reſt of the company, and impart our thoughts freely unto each other. It chanced that day, that having ſomething or other to tell Arpalice, I entreated her that we might talk together; ſo upon the firſt opportunity we parted from the company, and went out at the back Garden door, where there was a good path unto the Rivers ſide: And after we had walked a little way, Arpalice ſtopping ſuddenly, beckned unto me to hold my peace, and ſhewed unto me amongſt the Trees, Thraſimedes aſleep, as I told you before: At firſt Arpalice ſeeing by his habit, that he was a man of ſome quality, her deſign was for us to turn back, being unwilling to be ſeen in ſuch a ſolitary place with ſo little company: But ſince I ſaw we were not far from our retreat, I was bolder than Arpalice, for I would needs look upon Thraſimedes a little nearer, wondering to ſee ſuch a man ſleeping in ſuch a place, not ſeeing any horſe or ſervant which he had. I went then ſome ſteps nearer him, whether Arpalice would or no, and taking her by the gown forced her to follow: But ſhe and I had no ſooner paſſed by two ranks of trees, than we eſpied the Caſe of the Picture which fell out of Thraſimedes his hand, as I told you before: We no ſooner ſaw it, but a freſh curioſity raiſed our ſpirits, though we did not yet know it to be the ſame which was ſent unto Menecrates, for the graſs did half hide it. But the wonder was, that Arpalice, who till then was the moſt timerous, did now grow the bolder of the two, and being prompted by a ſtrong curioſity, after ſhe had looked about whether or no any came, and after ſhe had obſerved the Stranger ſlept ſoundly, ſhe went to take up the Caſe; ſhe was ſo taken with obſerving the face of him which ſlept, as ſhe took up the Caſe, hardly ſo much as looking upon it; but retiring back with the ſame warineſs wherewith ſhe approached, we went to look upon the Picture which we ſuſpected to be in the Caſe, yet with intentions to put it into the ſame place where Arpalice found it; for you may imagine that we had no deſign of playing the Thieves: And indeed I had taken out of my pocket a little Inkhorn and paper, intending to write ſome conceit within it, to the end that this ſleeping man, whom we thought to be a Lover, might ſee the Picture of his Miſtriſs was taken from him, and that he might read a reprehenſion for his negligence. You know, ſweet Doraliſa, how pleaſant ſuch adventures as theſe are to people of our age, and therefore Arpalice and my ſelf were exceedingly delighted with this conceit: But when Arpalice and I were behind the Willows, and looked upon this Caſe, we were extreamly ſurpriſed to ſee it was the ſame which was ſent unto Menecrates, or at leaſt extraordinary like it; yet it was ſuch a far fetcht conceit to think it was the ſame, that we did give our own eyes the lye, and did not open it with any thought to find Arpalice's Picture. You may well imagine how we were aſtoniſhed, when we ſaw it to be the very ſame which was ſent unto Menecrates. However ſince we were over near the Stranger to reaſon upon this adventure without danger of waking him, we went farther off, ſtill looking behind us to ſee whether the man did not riſe up and follow us. But at laſt, being got unto the foot of the Hill, we asked each other how it was poſſible the Picture ſhould come into his hands? For my part (ſaid I unto Arpalice, and ſmiled when ſhe asked me the queſtion) If I credit my own eyes, I cannot doubt but that it is the ſame which was ſent Menecrates, and in reaſon I have ſome cauſe of ſuſpition, that there is ſome ſecret piece of gallantry betwixt you and this Stranger, which you conceal from me. This thought is ſo injurious (replied ſhe) that I cannot believe you ſpeak it ſeriouſly. Truly (ſaid I, and laughed) I cannot tell whether I ſhould be in jeaſt or earneſt; for how do you think I ſhould give a juſt judgment upon a thing ſo full of admiration? the thing which moſt perplexes me, replied ſhe, is, that I know not how to be ſatisfied of this adventure: there is no way, replied I, but to waken him; oh Candiope, anſwered Arpalice, I am far from your opinion: for I am juſt now in ſuch a fear that he ſhould wake, that for all my great deſire to ſee what he will do when he finds that he hath loſt my Picture, as I am reſolved to retain it: And ſince I believe he will grieve more for the loſs of the Caſe, than the Picture, I will ſend the Caſe unto him by a ſervant, after I have taken out the Picture: therefore I intreat your aſſiſtance in finding out ſuch a one, as I may truſt with it. For my part, I do confeſs, I had a good mind to have ſome diſcourſe with him. But as we were in conteſt about it, one of our women, who had been looking us all about, came to tell us, that the Coaches were ready, that Lycaſte ſtayed for us: ſo that all our buſineſs was, to find out ſome fit officer, to watch this ſtranger, and to follow him unto his lodging. Yet we could meet with none but a Gardiner, whom we inſtructed as well as we could; and obliged him by promiſes to do as we deſired. The truth is, he ſeemed ſo dull, that we had little hopes in his negotiation, nor durſt we truſt him wi the Caſe to give unto this ſtranger: Yet he promiſed u to come the next morning, and give us intelligence and truly we had not much time to inſtruct him, for n leſs than four meſſengers came for us, in leſs than quarter of an hour; when we came unto the reſt of th company, they chid us for leaving them ſo long: Lycaſ told us in half earneſt half jeaſt, that perſons of our ag could not have any ſuch long ſecret conferences, but they muſt ſtand in need of ſome favourable conſtruction: fo my part, ſaid Arpalice (who could not endure conſtraint) if any ſhould offer to take from me the liberty of my ſilence, I think I ſhould talk continually: And on the other ſide, if I ſhould be commanded to talk always, I would be dumb as long as I lived; And truly (ſaid ſhe and ſmiled to colour her deſign of talking with me) I have ſuch a longing deſire to talk unto Candiope in a low voice, that I do not think I can forbear: after this, ſhe came and whiſpered ſomething in my ear. At firſt, they thought much we ſhould whiſper thus, and were continually interrupting us; but at laſt, they let us alone: and we talked as much as we would, not only in the Coach, but alſo in that Garden which we went to ſee: Then did we rack our imaginations to gueſs, which way poſſibly this ſtranger could come by this Picture; but all our thoughts could not hit upon the truth. We could not ſuſpect that Menecrates gave it unto him: nor could we think the man ſtole it, conſidering his habit and handſomneſs, to imagine that Menecrates had loſt it at play, was a far fetched thought: The beſt that we could imagine was, that he had loſt it, and they found it. But at laſt, we returned home to the Town, where we were no ſooner come, but we were informed that the husband of Lycaſte named Menophiles, was returned from his journey of eight days, which he had taken, and that he had brought home with him a ſtranger, who ſeemed to be a man of quality, but ſo much wounded, that the Chirurgeons came to dreſs him. Lycaſte no ſooner heard this, but out of a curioſity and compaſſion together, ſhe went immediately unto the chamber where her husband was with this ſtranger: Arpalice and I, moved with the ſame curioſity, followed her; but Cydipe would not, becauſe ſhe was apt to ſwoon if ſhe were in the room with a wounded man. As ſoon as we ſtept into the Chamber, Menophiles beckned that we ſhould make no noiſe; and to prevent it he came unto us into the outer room, where he no ſooner was, but Lycaſte asked him very earneſtly who this was of whom he had ſuch care? It is, ſaid he unto her, the moſt valiant man in the world, and the handſomeſt. It is a man whoſe life I would ſave, and who hath ſaved my life. But after this, ask me no further, for I neither know his name nor his Country; but where did you meet with him? ſaid Lycaſte. I met with him, ſaid he, by the Brook ſide which runs under the Hill upon which Zenocrites houſe is built, where I met a ſervant holding his horſe, and paſſing on, I came unto that place in the valley, where there is a little path which leads unto Zenocrites Garden. You may well imagine, dear Doraliſa, that Arpalice and I were very attentive unto this relation of Menophiles: which he continued, being come unto the place, ſaid he, I ſaw him whom I ſpeak of with his ſword in his hand, againſt four ſouldiers, defending himſelf, and fighting like a lyon. And though I had ſent all my men another way, but only one Lacquey, yet I would needs relieve him: when they who were upon him ſaw me with a ſword in my hand, they divided themſelves, two to undertake him, and two upon me: they no ſooner turned towards me but my Lacquey ran away; ſo that I was engaged with theſe two, who at firſt killed my horſe: after this, they wiſhed me not to meddle in a quarel which did not concern me; and ſeemed to have no other deſign upon me, but to keep me from ſtopping their intentions of killing this man; but one of them turning about, and ſeeing one of their fellows which was upon this ſtranger fall, fell upon me with all fury: I defended my ſelf as well as I could, but certainly I had been killed, if this ſtranger had not come into my relief as ſoon as he had killed the other who fought with him. So that the two who were upon me, ſeeing their fellows both dead, and obſerving that Zenocrites Garden door opened, they had recourſe unto their heels: This ſtranger and I purſued them, but in vain. In the mean time, this valiant man was much wounded in the Combate againſt two, and loſt blood by following them who fled: then turning back to thank me for what I had done, he fell dead at my feet: in the mean time, Zenocrites Garden door opening, as I ſaid, and the Gardiner ſeeing the paſſage, called all that were in the houſe to aſſiſt, and ſo I got this illuſtrious wounded man unto the place where now he is, intending to proportion my care of him according to his merit. After Menophiles had ended his relation of the paſſage, Lycaſte asked him a hundred queſtions, which Arpalice and I never minded: for we made no queſtion but this man whom Menophiles ſpoke of, was the ſame we ſaw ſleeping: So that we were both of us full of wonder, but not long, for underſtanding that this ſtranger enquired whether any one found a Picture about the two ſouldiers which he had killed, Lycaſte went into the Chamber, and we followed, perceiving him plainly to be the ſame we ſaw ſleeping; yet he did not know Arpalice: for his weakneſs would hardly give him leave to open the curtain, and Arpalice did more than half hide her ſelf, behind Lycaſte and me; ſo that ſhe knew him, but he could not know her to be the ſame perſon, whoſe Picture he had loſt. Yet as weak as he was, he returned a very ſprightly complement unto Lycaſte, when ſhe told him, he was in a place where he might freely command any thing in it: but ſince the Chirurgeons would not have any to talk unto him, this conference laſted not long: but Arpalice and I did not ſo ſoon give over our diſcourſe upon this ſurprizing adventure, but we reſolved not to ſpeak a word concerning this Picture, until we were further informed of all circumſtances; but ſince I know you deſire to know the cauſe of this combat, I will tell you what we heard the next morning. Chance would have it, that four Souldiers paſſing by Thraſimedes as he was aſleep, he waked juſt as they were within four or five paces of him: and juſt as two of them looked upon him and laughed: whether it was at ſomething which concerned not him, or whether it was at his ſo ſtarting out of ſleep, it is not known. But Thraſimedes waking, ſeeking for his Picture, and not finding it, did think theſe ſouldiers who looked upon him and laughed, had taken it: but to move them unto a reſtitution, he ſhewed no ſigns of anger, and calling to them, Friends, ſaid he unto them, it ſeems you deſerve to be liſted amongſt the Lacedemonian Souldiers, therefore I deſire you to reſtore what you have taken from me, and in recompence I ſhall with much willingneſs give you the full worth of it: The Souldiers wondering to hear Thraſimedes ſay ſo, thought that he was not well waked, began uncivilly to laugh aloud, and to tell him in an inſolent jeer, that they were very ſorry he had not a better dream. In ſhort, Thraſimedes being fully perſwaded that theſe Souldiers had the Picture which he had loſt, ſaid ſomthing which let them know his thoughts, unto which they retorted ſo extravagantly, as Thraſimedes in his anger could not forbear Menaces: Inſomuch as all four at once aſſaulted him, either with intentions to make him fly or to kill him. But the oddneſs of the buſineſs, was to ſee how he ſtill affirmed that theſe Souldiers had the Picture; when he related his adventure unto Menophiles and Lycaſte, aggravating the misfortune that he ſhould kill two of them and yet not find it: but knowing that thoſe two which fled had it between them. In the mean time, the Servant of Thraſimedes being returned unto the place where he left his Maſter, to tell him that his friend was raviſhed with joy that he would lodge with him, he found the Servant which walked his horſe, who told him that Thraſimedes commanded him to ſtay there, and that he was gone to walk along the Brook-ſide. Then both the Servants followed the Brook; but they found only the bodies of theſe two Souldiers which were dead, and not yet taken away: Then were they much troubled; In the mean time, ſince it was very late, and they hearing no tidings of their Maſter, one Servant went unto Zenocrite's houſe, where the Gardiner telling them what he knew, told them alſo that it was in vain for them to think of getting into the Town that day, becauſe the Gates would certainly be ſhut before they could get thither. The next morning the Gardiner, according to his word, came unto us, and brought with him the two ſervants of Thraſimedes, to let us underſtand the name and quality of their Maſter, which being known, all cares to affi him were doubled. However, this being not enough t ſatisfie the curioſity of Arpalice, ſhe cauſed one of he women who had wit enough to ask the Servant whethe the Picture which his Maſter had loſt, was the Pictur of any of his own Country with whom he was in love thinking thereby to pump the truth out of him: an indeed the Servant without any ſubtilty, told her how his Maſter had won it at play in Apamea, but told he not who loſt it, or whoſe it was, ſince he never ſaw the caſe opened in which it was. I leave you to think amiable Doraliſa, how vexed Arpalice was when ſh heard Menecrates ſet ſuch a ſmall eſteem upon her Picture. I aſſure you (ſaid ſhe unto me the firſt tim ſhe heard it) Menecrates in loſing my Picture, hath loſ more than he is aware of; for after this affront, tha poor pittance of complacency which I obſerved toward him, ſhall leſſen. I pray conſider a little, how do yo think he would uſe me if I were married, ſince he is careleſs before he is my husband? As violent as Arpalice wa and angry, truly I could not condemn her; yet ſhe w much perplexed, and would not have it known how ſh had been the innocent cauſe of this misfortune; yet ſh had an earneſt deſire that all the world might kno what new cauſe of hatred ſhe had of Menecrates. However, we did not think it fit to make it known, that we took this Picture which had cauſed ſo ſad an acciden only to give it out that we knew that Menecrates had lo it at play, and however to have patience for a while In the mean while Thraſimedes recovered, and the Phyſitians and Chyrurgeons all reported him to be paſt a danger, ſo that he began to enquire who it was un whom he was ſo much obliged; but ſince the names o Menophiles and Lycaſte did not acquaint him that Arpali was in the ſame houſe, he could not know ſhe wa there: But be pleaſed to know, that Arpalice being a lone with her Aunt, ſhe was obliged to follow her in the chamber of Thraſimedes, and it chanced alſo th Menophiles who went in the firſt, having ſomething t tell Lycaſte in private, he took her towards the wi dow, and left Arpalice alone by the bed-ſide of th

illuſtrious wounded man. Imagine, I beſeech you, how infinitely was he ſurpriſed, when the perſon whom he ſaw was the ſubſtance of that Picture which he had both won and loſt; yet was he a while in doubt, becauſe he found her fairer than her Picture; but being confirmed in his opinion by the extreamly reſemblance which he found in every part of Arpalice's face, unto her Picture, he was even raviſhed with joy at the encounter: Arpalice carefully obſerving him, did eaſily perceive the ſurpriſe, and joy of Thraſimedes, but ſince he was not yet in a fit condition for any long converſation, their viſit continued not above a quarter of an hour: But whilſt it laſted, he deſired Lycaſte, as he had Menophiles before, that he might be carried unto a friends houſe which he had in Patara; but ſince ſhe knew Menophiles would not ſuffer him to go out of his houſe until he was perfectly well, ſhe ſpoke unto him with all poſſible civility, and ſo retired. She was no ſooner gone, but he who Thraſimedes knew in the Town came to ſee him: So that he being extreamly deſirous to be better informed concerning Arpalice, whoſe beauty ſtruck him with ſo much admiration, he underſtood her to be the Niece of Menophiles and Lycaſte; that ſhe was promiſed unto Menecrates, and that ſhe was Siſter unto Parmenides: So that by this he came to know that Arpalice was to marry a man whom ſhe affected not, and one who did not much care for her; for ſince he had got her Picture ſo eaſily from her, and heard it from his own mouth, that he was not in love, he could not doubt it. But how is it poſſible (ſaid he unto himſelf) that one ſo fair as ſhe ſhould marry, and not be loved? For without all doubt ſhe is able to create love in all that have ſouls. Really (ſaid he unto his friend) the fate of Arpalice ſeems to be worthy of much compaſſion: For though Menecrates be handſom, and hath ſpirit enough, yet ſince he cannot love her, he cannot be worthy of her. However, replied his friend, it is not an eaſie matter to alter her fate; for if ſhe refuſe to marry Menecrates ſhe will loſe the greateſt part of her eſtate. She had better loſe it all, replied Thraſimedes, than loſe her liberty. But if Arpalice be wiſe (ſaid his friend) ſhe will not refuſe him; for as fair as ſhe is, ſhe will find but few Lovers when her eſtate is gone. All men, replied Thraſimedes, are not ſo covetouſly minded as you think them; and if I ſhould fall in love with Arpalice, I ſhould make you alter your opinion. In the mean time, we had no ſooner acquainted Zenocrite how Menecrates had loſt Arpalice's Picture, but ſhe ſet it all over the Town in ſuch a pleaſant manner, ſo full of anger and wit, that nothing elſe was talked on for eight days together. Alſo ſhe would receive it from Thraſimedes's own mouth, and in order to that ſhe would viſit him as ſoon as he was in a condition to be ſeen; and coming to viſit Lycaſte, as ſhe was in the Chamber of Thraſimedes, ſhe would let none go in to acquaint her, but went ſtreight her ſelf: As ſoon as ſhe was entered, ſhe ſent to deſire Cydipe, Arpalice, and me, who were in another Chamber, to come unto her in the Chamber of Thraſimedes: and I think it was the very day that he fell in love with Arpalice: For her joy to hear Zenocrite ſo bitter and witty againſt Menecrates, made her ſeem ſo fair, that he was not able to defend himſelf againſt her charms. After the firſt complements were paſſed, Zenocrite was wondrous well acquainted with the whole Family of Thraſimedes, for it was one of her qualities that ſhe knew almoſt all Aſia: So that paſſing inſenſibly from a converſation of civility, into a jollity of mirth, ſhe asked him ſharply before Lycaſte, how much he ſtaked againſt Arpalice's Picture, when he played with Menecrates: For I imagine (ſaid ſhe) that ſince he has no judgment either in Pictures or Diamonds, he would venture it for a little. It is not long of me, replied Thraſimedes, that much was not ſtaked againſt it, ſince I offered him to ſtake the double whatſoever it coſt, only for the Caſe; as for the Picture (ſaid he, and looked upou Arpalice) all my eſtate is not equal to the price of it. But, Madam, (added he) how came you to know that Menecrates loſt the Picture of the fair Arpalice? It ſeems, ſaid Lycaſte, that you are a ſtranger in this Country, elſe you would not wonder that Zenocrite ſhould know it. The paſſage is ſo remarkable (ſaid Zenocrite) to ſee a Lover play away the Picture of his

Miſtreſs, that it muſt needs be known all over the world. But I wonder why the friends of Menecrates ſhould be ſo ill adviſed as to ſend Arpalice's Picture to him: For in my apprehenſion there is nothing more ridiculous than theſe Family gallantries, which in the ſight of all the world are done by the conſent, if not the force of friends. If I had known this (ſaid Arpalice) Thraſimedes ſhould have been better than he is; For Menecrates ſhould never have had my Picture, and by conſequence this misfortune which hath happened unto him ſhould never have been. Do not call that a misfortune, Madam, replied he, which brings me the honour to be known unto ſo many noble perſons. You may ſay what you pleaſe (ſaid I unto him) but I think three dangerous wounds which you have received may very well be called a misfortune. There are ſome misfortunes (replied he) which produce great happineſs; and I may very well rank this to be in the number of them. For my part (ſaid Zenocrite) ſince you do not dye of them, I am glad it happened ſo; for I muſt confeſs, I have ſuch a ſtrange averſion unto all ſuch Lovers as are by the laſt Will and Teſtament of Parents, and who are certain to marry their Miſtreſs the firſt day they ſee them, that I am glad they meet with ſome rubs in their Progreſs: For take away fears, hopes, and miſeries from love, and a Lover is quite unſpirited: And to prove what I ſay, do but imagine the moſt compleat Gallant in the world, and conceive him to be with her whom he is to marry, the three or four preceding days before the marriage, and imagine all his Brothers, Siſters, Nephews, Nieces, Uncles, Aunts, Fathers, Mothers, Grandfathers, and Grandmothers came to rejoyce with him, I am moſt confident you will confeſs with me, that nothing will put him more out of countenance, be he never ſo profeſſed and declared a Lover: For my part, it does ſo wound my eyes and imagination, that I cannot endure it. This is the caſe of Arpalice, who ever ſince ſhe was born had her Lover before her eyes without love, whom ſhe always looked upon as one that muſt be infallibly her husband whether ſhe can fancy him or no. Whilſt Zenocrite was talking thus, Thraſimedes looked upon Arpalice moſt attentively, and obſerved that his friend was pleaſed with what ſhe ſaid; but ſo was not Lycaſte, who was angry at it; but Zenocrite being not accuſtomed to conſult with the thoughts of others to expreſs her own, continued talking, as ſhe begun, all the reſt of the day, knowing very well that Arpalice was not angry at her. Sometimes ſhe would deſcribe theſe kind of Lovers, afterwards repreſent the mean ſpirits of their Miſtreſſes; then ſhe would compare them with real Gallants, and obſerve ſuch notable differences between them, that it was not poſſible but to concur with her in her opinions. But (ſaid I once unto her, and interrupted her) then it is requiſite to baniſh quite all manner of courtſhip and gallantry: For ſince a legitimate and ordained Gallant is not a Gallant, and that virtue will not admit of it otherwiſe, it muſt be concluded that it muſt not be admitted of at all. When I ſaid ſo (replied Zenocrite) I did not directly mean as you underſtand it; for thoſe Lovers which I condemn, are either thoſe who are not really ſo, or who are long before-hand declared to be ſo: For indeed to cauſe Gallantry to produce handſome effects, he who acts it, muſt love, and never conſider whether he ſhall, or not marry; for when thoughts of marriage do ariſe in the heart of a Lover at the ſame time his paſſion doth, I will maintain he is not ſo Gallant as he is, who not knowing why he loves, nor which way to obtain love, yet does continue to love: Reſtleſneſs is one of the ſweets of love; and I do not think there is any converſation more weariſome, than that of a Lover who hath nothing to deſire, nor nothing to fear, or hope for. For my part (replied Thraſimedes) I do believe a Lover who hath nothing to complain of, is not in love: For let him be in as great favour as poſſibly he can, yet he ought to think that he is not enough in favour. Certainly, replied Zenocrite, it is moſt dangerous to ſit down and ſay, I am ſatisfied and contented; nor is it very obliging: But as for Menecrates (ſaid ſhe, and roſe up) I aſſure you, I would not for any thing but he had loſt Arpalice's Picture, becauſe the accident hath ſo diverted me, and will ſtill divert me. After this, Zenocrite retired, and alſo all the reſt of the company leaving Thraſimedes to entertain his own thoughts; and truly he was very indifferent; for the beauty of Arpalice did ſo pleaſingly take up his mind, that he thought upon no other thing. In ſhort, amiable Doraliſa, not to trouble you with a relation of all the firſt thoughts of Thraſimedes, let me only tell you, that his weakneſs was ſo great, as it was a long while before he was ſound, and ſo he ſaw Arpalice almoſt every day; and as his wounds which he received from her did heal, ſo her beauty made them deeper in his heart. He hath told me ſince, that at the firſt he did ſtrive againſt his paſſion, but not being able to vanquiſh it, he ſubmitted, and entirely abandoned his heart unto it. Since Thraſimedes had abundance of ſpirit, and witty gallantry, he ſoon got the eſteem of Arpalice; he had alſo the good luck to pleaſe Zenocrite. For my part, I muſt confeſs, I had an eaſie inclination to become the friend of Thraſimedes; nor did I hinder thoſe advantageous thoughts which Arpalice had of him. In the mean time, asmuch in love with her as he was, he durſt not ſhew it unto her: For as the poſture of things was, it was as offenſive to talk of any ſuch matters, as unto a married woman. However, ſince he knew, ſhe had an averſion unto Menecrates, he did not deſpair: But ſince he knew that the grand ſecret of love was to pleaſe and divert, he courted Arpalice and all her friends with all manner of delights: The firſt diverting entertainment which he gave her, was ſo extraordinary, that I muſt needs relate it. Imagine then, that we were in a great chamber, with Lycaſte, Zenocrite, Cydipe, Arpalice, and many others, and my ſelf: Firſt, we heard an admirable harmony of Muſick in the ſtreet, Zenocrite looked upon us, and asked for whom this was intended? adding, that ſhe believed ſome declared Lover who never does things handſomly, was at the charge of it. For my part, ſaid Cydipe, I am ſure it concerns not me; and me leſs than you (added Arpalice.) Perhaps it is intended to the company in general (ſaid I.) It is not the cuſtom (ſaid Thraſimedes) to give publick entertainments; for though every one who hears it, have equally their ſhares in it; yet I do believe there is a particular intendment of it unto to ſome one. Afterwards we began to deſcant who it ſhould be, and we named all the men of our acquaintance, but could not agree amongſt our ſelves which of them it ſhould be; for if I named one, Cydipe would tell me that could not be, becauſe ſhe knew he was engaged in other company; if I named another, Zenocrite would aſſure me, that ſhe knew he was not in a condition for entertainments, but was that night in a melancholy mood; if Lycaſte thought ſhe had gueſſed him, we all let her ſee that ſhe was deceived; and as for Zenocrite, ſhe her ſelf confeſſed, that ſhe could not imagine from whom this gallantry ſhould proceed: But whilſt we were giving our verdicts, Arpalice ſpoke not a word, and ſeemed as if ſhe would not take ſo much pains as to find it out. Would not any one ſay (ſaid Zenocrite) that Arpalice is a ſtranger as well as Thraſimedes, and that ſhe knows no body here? My ſilence (replied ſhe, and ſmiled) argues that I am not guilty of that fault whereof all women are accuſed, who (they ſay) love to be talking when there is ſomething that ſhould be liſtened unto with attention, and who ask queſtions when they ſhould be ſilent; and for my part, I conceive they are to be blamed who do ſo: For how can we take any delight in the Muſick (ſaid ſhe) if we do not ſilently hearken unto it? Yet Arpalice could not impoſe ſilence upon them; for their curioſity to know who it was that gave them this entertainment, did tranſport them above all other conſiderations. We ſent a ſubtle and witty boy out of a back door, who knew all the men of quality in the Town, with orders to obſerve and enquire who was the director, and at the charges of the Muſick: But we were all exceedingly ſurpriſed, when at his return he told us, that except the Muſick there was not one perſon in all the ſtreet. This boy had no ſooner reported this, but Zenocrite, more ſubtle than the reſt, told us that ſhe would trouble her ſelf no farther to know who gave it, but only to know to whom it was intended. Methinks it is as difficult to find out that as the other (ſaid I.) It is becauſe I am ignorant that I knew it (anſwered ſhe.) This Riddle is ſo obſcure (replied I) that I confeſs I cannot underſtand it, and I believe it will puzzle Thra- ſimedes to unty the knot. Yet I am confident (ſaid ſhe) that he will confeſs I am not miſtaken: Then whiſpering with him, ſhe asked him whether it was unto Arpalice, or Cydipe, or my ſelf that he intended this Muſick? Thraſimedes was extreamly ſurpriſed ſhe ſhould gueſs him, and did earneſtly deny it, but the more he ſaid ſhe was miſtaken, the more he did confirm her in her opinion. So that Zenocrite being raviſhed, that ſhe had hit the mark which we had miſſed, her thoughts did paſs from one to another, amongſt us all but Lycaſte, unto whom ſhe would not impart any thing: For my part, ſhe had no ſooner hinted her thought unto me, but I concluded it certain, and Cydipe did the ſame, and indeed ſo did all the reſt of the Ladies. As for Arpalice, whether ſhe did diſſemble her thoughts, and ſuſpected that Thraſimedes was in love with her, or that ſhe really did not credit our thoughts, ſhe always ſaid that we were all miſtaken; but ſhe continued not long in that Tone, for the next morning, I ſent for one of thoſe that was of the Muſick, who had formerly taught me in that quality, to come unto me, and conjured him to tell me who employed him the night before: He being one who ever would truſt his greateſt ſecrets of his heart unto me, did ingenuouſly confeſs it that they were before no other houſe, but before Lycaſte's, that he who employed them was a very Gentile ſervant, who very liberally rewarded them, and enjoyned ſecreſie; that he had the tone of a ſtranger, and did every way ſo fully deſcribe the man, that I knew well enough that it was the ſervant of Thraſimedes, who employed them, and I imparted the ſecret unto Arpalice. There chanced alſo a more ſurpriſing accident than this; for be pleaſed to know, that the ſame night we had this Muſick, we all agreed to walk two days after to a ſtately and magnificent houſe ſome forty furlongs from Patara, which belonged unto a man, who was never better pleaſed and joyed than when himſelf was not the Maſter of it, and when his Porter told him there was much company in it, and when he heard they were delighted with it, and thought it to be a moſt admirable piece of Architecture: and indeed he was ſo taken with the beauty of it, and expreſſed his joy that others ſhould be of the ſame mind; as one Lady did abſolutely make it her own. The pleaſure which others took in it was his; but at this time he was in the Town upon ſome occaſions. This, amiable Doraliſa, was the houſe which we intended to go unto, in the preſence of Thraſimedes, all of us expreſſing our ſorrows that he was not in a condition to go with us, and every one deſcribing unto him the beauty, conveniency, and excellencies of this houſe. Lycaſte commended the Architecture, and the Situation of it; Zenocrite a vaſt Arch ſtanding upon thirty and two Columns, and a ſtately ſtaircaſe: Cydipe extolled the Hall, which might well become the magnificence of the Egyptian Kings; for my part, I commended the pleaſant Proſpect, the Gardens, Fountains, Grots, and Statues: But as for Arpalice, who was all that day in an humour to be oppoſite unto others, ſhe told us of a certain little ſolitary Cloſet which ſhe preferred before all that we extolled in this ſtately Fabrick. Not but that I know, ſaid ſhe, all theſe things which you commend are eſſentially more beautiful, yet this beſt pleaſeth me, and I intend that day when you walk, I will walk only with my eyes, and ſtay in that Cloſet which I ſpeak of. Imagine (ſaid ſhe unto Thraſimedes, to juſtifie her choice) that this Cloſet which ſuits ſo well with my inclination is ſo ſeated, that though it be open on two ſides, ſo that one may ſee two ways as far as ſight can reach, yet one cannot meet with any but ſolitary objects. The Gardens which one ſhall ſee on one ſide are all Graſs and Gravel walks, ſet with green trees. The Fountains all of Ruſtick work; the River, though natural, ſeems to be artificial. Beyond the Gardens one ſhall diſcover a great Forreſt, and beyond it Meadows, Paſtures, Rivers, but not a Town, Houſe, Hill, or Wood, to hinder Proſpect: So that if one were the only one in all the Univerſe, yet one ſhould hardly be more ſolitary than in that place. I beſeech you then imagine what delight may be taken in ſuch a Cloſet: I can find magnificent Architecture, and handſom Chambers in many places of our Town, but I cannot any where find the pleaſing ſolitude of this Cloſet. As you are pleaſed to deſcribe it, Madam, ſaid

Thraſimedes, in a low voice, it is not poſſible but to be of your opinion, and to think that which you commend, deſerves to be preferred before any thing which any other commends: After this, we had much other diſcourſe which is not pertinent to my ſtory; but the day of our journey being come, we went unto this houſe according to our appointment, and we were as frolick as our hopes: Firſt, at the corner of the Forreſt we were ſaluted with a conſort of Hoboys, admirably delighting: When we were in the Hall, we heard another Conſort of Voices at the higher end; and when we were in the Chamber, a moſt rare Voice and Theorboe: Admiration made us all ſilent to hearken unto this Harmony: After this we had a moſt admirable fine Banquet, inſomuch as Zenocrite ſaid, that moſt certainly it was given by ſome man who had ſome amorous deſigns. However, ſince the man appeared not, none knew what to think; but as at the firſt Muſick, ſo at this, I doubted not but it was the Gallantry of Thraſimedes: Yet ſince he had been wonderous civilly treated by Lycaſte, I did not know whether this was only an acknowledgment of the favours he received, or a teſtimony of love, but I was not long in this ignorance, for be pleaſed to know, that the Servant of Thraſimedes, who of his condition, was the wittieſt man alive, did take ſuch order with the Porter, that he might carry a Letter, and lay it on the Table in the Cloſet which ſo much pleaſed Arpalice, obliging him to open the Cloſet unto none unleſs her ſelf; giving him ſuch inſtructions, as he did according to his mind: And indeed, when Lycaſte and Zenocrite deſired to enter, he told them he could not open it, becauſe his Wife who was in the Garden had the Keys: So, making that his excuſe, he reſerved it whilſt Arpalice came: But ſtaying until he had an opportunity to let her enter alone; and ſhe returning back to ask him why they could not enter into it, he told her, that ſince ſhe was alone he would let her enter, and the reaſon why he denied it before, was becauſe his Maſter had charged him not to let many enter. Arpalice taking him at his word, deſired to enter, conſenting that he ſhould lock her in if he would, ſo he came to open it within an hour:

So the Porter did open it, and locked it again as ſoon as ſhe was entered, making as if this were a great favour which he did her. At firſt when ſhe entered, ſhe told me that ſhe went unto the Windows to enjoy the Proſpect; but turning aſide, ſhe ſaw lying upon a Marble Table, a Letter, which had this Superſcription.

To the Fair, and ſolitary Arpalice.

You may eaſily conceive, amiable Doraliſa, how this adventure ſurpriſed your Couſin; and if the Letter had been ſealed, certainly ſhe had not opened it; but when ſhe read, it ſhe found theſe words.

MADAM,

Your Beauty hath driven me to ſuch a fatal neceſſity, as that I cannot hide the miſery which you have cauſed, and I conceived that I could not more handſomly acquaint you with it, than in ſuch a ſolitary place as pleaſeth you. Had I ſeen that your eyes had obſerved mine, and underſtood them, I would not now have written, that I do infinitely love you, but ſince I ſaw you did not underſtand that language, I thought it more reſpect to write than to ſpeak unto you: Yet if I be deceived in that, I am ready to repair my fault, and will tell you on my knees, upon the firſt handſom opportunity, that the Grandure of my paſſion cannot be equalled by any thing but your Beauty.

Thraſimedes.

After Arpalice had read this Letter, ſhe was exceedingly unreſolved what to do: She thought that to take it was too obliging unto him that writ it; and to leave it was to ſhew unto any that entered what Thraſimedes had written: But at laſt ſhe thought of a way which was ſafe both ways, which was to blot out what Thraſimedes had written: yet firſt ſhe would take a copy, though it were but to ſhew it unto me; and ſo ſhe did; and ſo ſhe thought Thraſimedes could not accuſe her of too much indulgency: and ſhe had no ſooner blotted out what was written in the Letter, but the Porter came and opened the door, telling her that the company wanted her: Then ſhe went out, but covered her face with her hood to hide her bluſhes, and could not ſpeak one word unto the man: She was no ſooner out, but ſpying me in a window towards the Garden, ſhe came unto me, and acquainted me with the buſineſs, ſhewing me a copy of the Letter: For my part, I muſt confeſs, I told her, that I thought the proceeding of Thraſimedes to be very gallant. So do I, ſaid ſhe, but let me tell you, I think it a little too bold, and very offenſive to me; for he cannot chuſe but know the bad condition of my fortune, and how I am engaged unto Menecrates, and conſequently I neither can, nor ought to ſuffer him, as I might if my fortune were otherwiſe. If love, ſaid I unto her, were not a violent domineering paſſion, I ſhould think Thraſimedes were obliged to hearken unto reaſon, and follow it: But, Arpalice, if he be in love, as very likely he is, it were unjuſt if you ſhould think he acts by the rules of Reaſon: and to ſpeak with reaſon, I cannot ſee why Thraſimedes ſhould not think he may become a Rival unto him that did careleſly play away the Picture of his Miſtreſs: We had talked much more, but time called us homeward; where when we were arrived, Lycaſte, and Cydipe went unto the Chamber of Thraſimedes, but Arpalice would not go, feigning to be a little ill: He being a man of a quick ſpirit, eaſily apprehended the reaſon why Arpalice came not, and therefore feared extreamly that ſhe was incenſed, yet very glad he was ſhe had received his Letter: As for Lycaſte, though ſhe did believe Thraſimedes had given the Muſick, and Banquet, yet ſhe never dreamed of any particular deſign in it: ſo that ſhe did highly commend the magnificent liberality of this unknown man, who had ſo ſumptuouſly treated them. But after ſhe was gone, and the ſervant of Thraſimedes coming in, he acquainted his Maſter how Arpalice had read his Letter, and blotted it out. At the firſt his fears were predominate, but afterwards hope tempering his fears, he waited with much impatiency to ſee Arpalice, that he might gueſs by her eyes whether he had any hopes to have any ſhare in her heart:

but his longing deſires were not ſo ſoon ſatisfied: for Arpalice continued ſtill her feigned ſickneſs, purpoſely becauſe ſhe would not be obliged to go with Lycaſte into his Chamber; and her reaſon was, becauſe ſhe knew that Thraſimedes intended ere long to remove from the houſe; yet he had not left his Chamber: but ſince he could not ſee Arpalice, and not being able to live long in that anxiety, he began to ſtir abroad as a man in health: Gladly would he have ſtayed a little longer, if he could have ſeen Arpalice, but ſince he could not enjoy that happineſs, he told Menophiles in the morning, that he intended to treſpaſs upon his generoſity no longer, but would lodge with an acquaintance he had in the Town: Menophiles was very unwilling to part with him, but at laſt, Thraſimedes prevailed, and though he was yet ſomething weak, yet changed his lodging. 'Tis true, the houſe unto which he was to go, was not far diſtant, yet he dreſſed himſelf that day, in his richeſt habit, and as a man who was to ſee the only perſon whom he preferred before all the World. At firſt, he went unto the Chamber of Lycaſte, where Cydipe was, and where he thanked her with as much ſpirit as civility, for all the courteſies he had received. But ſince he feared that when he would go unto Arpalice, who kept her Chamber, Lycaſte would go with him, he made his viſit very long; in hopes ſome would come in, and ſo he might more eaſily ſee Arpalice alone; and indeed it happened according to his wiſhed hopes; for there came in much company, and whilſt ſhe entertained them, he went into the Chamber of Arpalice with more haſt, than his weakneſs would well allow him. Since ſhe foreſaw, that ſince he had been at Lycaſtes Chamber, he would come unto hers alſo, ſhe ſent for me, leſt he ſhould find her alone, but as I was ready to go unto her, ſome company came in which ſtayed me, ſo that Thraſimedes was more happy than ſhe intended he ſhould be, for he found an opportunity to talk in private with her: there being none but one ſervant in the room; as earneſt as the deſire of Thraſimedes was to ſee Arpalice, as ſoon as ever he ſaw her, he was fuller of fears than joys, becauſe he found her ſo ſerious, that he apprehended the enterpriſe in which he was ingaged more difficult than he imagined: Yet ſhe received him with civility enough, but it was mixed with ſuch a cold ſtrangeneſs, as had no obliging ſweetneſs in it. However, Thraſimedes being reſolved to lay hold upon ſuch a favourable opportunity, after the firſt complements were paſt, and Arpalice deſired him to ſit down, I thought, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) to have found you ſo ſick as would hove moved compaſſion in all thoſe that ſaw you, but for ought I ſee, you are in ſuch a condition, as make all thoſe who ſee you to need pity themſelves; and I believe you affect ſolitude only to prevent the making men miſerable: I aſſure you, though it be good to do ſo, (replied ſhe) yet one knows not how to avoid it: for there is no place ſo ſolitary where a misfortune may not happen. I underſtand you very well, Madam, ſaid he unto her, and I can ſee how you reckon the boldneſs which I preſumed to take in diſturbing your ſolitude in the Cloſet in the number of your misfortunes. But I beſeech you, Madam, is it ſuch a grand misfortune to be told, that I adore you? and is it a crime, that I am not able to live unleſs you know I am totally devoted yours? I neither begged your eſteem nor your affection; but only preſented mine; I beſeech you, why then do you receive me with ſuch a hollow hearted entertainment? I have long ſince heard ſay, replied ſhe, that it is the cuſtome of thoſe who are in fault, to complain firſt, before they be accuſed. I beſeech you, Madam, replied he, what crime have I committed? Am I the cauſe that you are the faireſt perſon in the world? Can I chuſe but admire you, have I not a heart that is ſenſible? or if it were a crime, have you not ſufficiently puniſhed me for it? have you not moſt cruelly blotted out what I had writ? and deprived me of your ſight three days together? ſurely that is puniſhment enough to expiate all the crimes which a violent paſſion forced me to commit. Had you told me, replied Arpalice, that your deſign was only to make me hate my ſolitude in writing ſo craftily that Letter which I found in the Cloſet, doubtleſs I ſhould then have pardoned you: but ſince you perſevere in your crime and continue talking as you do, I muſt needs expreſs my diſlike of it, and that I am highly offended: it ſeems then, that you are as rigorous as fair, replied he, but though you be, yet I beſeech you, Madam, do me the favour to tell me what puniſhment you have reſerved for Menecrates? for I ſee no reaſon or juſtice, that you ſhould puniſh me for adoring you; and recompence him for ſlighting you: I conceive it no good plea, replied ſhe, to juſtifie ones ſelf, by the crimes of others; and though Menecrates be culpable, yet that does not at all excuſe Thraſimedes from being culpable alſo: Pray, Madam, replied he, do me ſo much honour as to tell me what my crime is? you have writ unto me, replied ſhe, and that's enough: are you offended becauſe I tell you truth (replied Thraſimedes) It is no matter, ſaid ſhe, whether what you ſay be true or falſe, your crime is in telling it: Do you think me as culpable, replied he, in ſpeaking ſincerely, as in telling you a lie? However it be, ſaid ſhe, you have offended me, and I am the more apprehenſive of your fault, becauſe I had the greateſt inclination in the world to be your friend: Oh, Madam, ſaid Thraſimedes, if ſo, It is impoſſible you ſhould hate me, becauſe I love you: or if it be, not becauſe I have told you, but becauſe I have told you in an ill manner; your diſtinctions are very nice, (replied Arpalice and ſmiled) But never to trouble your ſelf further with a ſearch whether I am offended becauſe you love me; or becauſe you have writ unto me, or becauſe you have writ to me in an ill manner, be aſſured, I am offended: I beſeech you, Madam, replied he, ſince I have offended againſt my will, tell me which way I ſhould appeaſe you? In doing that, ſaid ſhe, which is contrary unto the thing which offended me: Then replied he, I muſt moſt horridly hate you; but ſince that is not in my power, I muſt endeavour to appeaſe you ſome other way, which, Madam, ſhall be, by a moſt humble reſpect and profound ſilence: yes, Madam, ſince what I ſay offends you, I will not any more ſpeak of my paſſion, until I can obtain my pardon, and that your eyes aſſure me of it. I aſſure you, ſaid ſhe, if you underſtand their Language very well, they will never tell you any thing, which may perſwade you, I can forget the offence which you have given me. Alas, Madam, replied he, I do not deſire you ſhould forget it as long as you live; but that you may remember as long as life laſts, that I am the moſt zealous and reſpective Lover that lives upon the Earth: As Arpalice was ready to anſwer, and perhaps ſharply, I came in; making a thouſand excuſes, that I came no ſooner, I perceived that the minds both of Arpalice and Thraſimedes were ſo diſtracted, that they knew not what I ſaid, and I began ſo to talk unto them, as I moved Arpalice to bluſh and Thraſimedes to ſmile, who told me he would come and thank me for the favour I had done him: but to tell you truly, I thought my ſelf little beholding to him for the favour, becauſe he did viſit me rather as the friend of her he loved, than for any other reaſon. After he was gone out of Arpalice's Chamber, ſhe related all their converſation unto me; but for all her anger againſt Thraſimedes for ſpeaking ſo openly of his love: yet I knew ſhe did not hate him, but that there was a ſtrong inclination in her heart to eſteem him. I pray Arpalice, ſaid I unto her, tell me wherein you think liberty conſiſts? you, I ſay, who declares your ſelf to be an enemy unto all manner of force and conſtraint; who would enjoy it in the moſt trivial things: who never thinks any recreation pleaſant, unleſs you might chuſe it? who thinks that which others call decency, to be an inſupportable ſeverity: who was always uſed to ſay, that the only advantage which men have above women is liberty; and that the greateſt pleaſure of Travellers is, that they are not ſubject unto the Laws of the places where they paſs: and who conceives the chief felicity of friendſhip to conſiſt in venting unto each other all that is in their hearts freely without compulſion: and yet I ſee this great Lover of liberty, does ſuffer her ſelf to be a ſlave: I pray, ſaid ſhe unto me, what moves you to ſpeak thus? Reaſon, replied I, for do I not know that you hate Menecrates extreamly? I do confeſs it, replied ſhe: and do not I know, ſaid I, that you do love Thraſimedes? Did he behave himſelf towards me as I would have him, replied ſhe, I do confeſs indeed, that I think I ſhould not hate him: for his perſon does pleaſe me; and his ſpirit is infinitely agreeable unto mine, and he does almoſt perſwade me that he eſteems me. I pray tell me, ſaid I unto her, how would you have him behave himſelf towards you? and what would you have him ſay? but withal, Madam, I would have you ſpeak ſincerely: would you have him (ſaid I unto her, ſeeing ſhe anſwered not) not reſpect you more than any other? that he ſhould not prefer to talk with you before me; that he ſhould look upon you like a man who thinks upon nothing? that he ſhould never talk unto you but upon things indifferent, as having no particular deſign to pleaſe you, that he ſhould never commend you; nor do any thing which might perſwade you that he loves you? ſpeak I conjure you, and ingenuouſly confeſs, that if he ſhould do thus, he would not be ſo much in your opinion as he is, though he hath a little over freely told you, that he loves you. You are ſo free this day (replied Arpalice and laughed) that I think you will make me a hater of liberty, ſince it moves you to utter ſo many things which diſpleaſe me, though they do not anger me ſo much as I would. I beſeech you, ſaid I, conſider ſeriouſly, and reſolve with your ſelf what you will do with the poor Thraſimedes, for I perceive he is ſo deeply in love with you, that I am confident he will never return into his own Country: For my part, ſaid Arpalice very ſadly, I do not think you would have me ſo miſerable, as to marry a man whom I cannot love, nor do I think you would have me love Thraſimedes, whom I can never pretend unto: but I think Candiope, that you are either out of your wits, or elſe will drive me out of mine; otherwiſe why do you not expreſs your ſelf quite contrary to what you do? It is becauſe I cannot betray my own thoughts (replied I and laughed at her anger) and becauſe I have no mind to contradict yours. Then did Arpalice by degrees confeſs unto me, that ſhe never ſaw a man in all the world whom ſhe could affect, except Thraſimedes. But not to trouble you with a tedious relation of all we ſaid at this time; let me only tell you, that it appeared Thraſimedes had no intention of going ſo ſoon from Lycia: For he put himſelf into a magnificent equipage, and courted the acquaintance of all the Gallants in our Town: But as for the Ladies, he never viſited any, unleſs the friends of Arpalice, and amongſt them, I was one whom he often viſited, and with whom he held a great intimacy of friendſhip. He was ſo amiable and handſome, that he was the object of an univerſal eſteem, and it had been ſtrange if Arpalice had ſlighted him. He was none of thoſe lighty vapouring Lovers, who care not what they talk before their Miſtreſſes, or who exceſſively commend a black Beauty before one that is fair; but on the contrary he is ſo judicious, ſo exact, and diſcreet in his paſſion, and without any affectation or conſtraint in his actions, that if at any time he commended any in the preſence of Arpalice, it was ſo as it might appear he thought Arpalice the moſt fair, and moſt worthy of commendations: And I believe never any had a finer art to keep himſelf within his own rank than he had. As oft as I have ſeen him with Arpalice, in the Temples, at Viſits, in Walks, and Aſſemblies, I never ſaw him intruſive, nor ever put any out of their places, yet was he perpetually with her, and therefore you may imagine, that if ſhe had a heart abſolutely inſenſible, ſhe could not chuſe but be much taken with ſuch a perfectly acompliſhed man as Thraſimedes, and with one who was ſo knowing in the art of procuring love. I will omit all the relation of all thoſe rigours which ſhe ſhewed unto him at the firſt, and how ſhe ſlighted the merits of ſuch a man: For perhaps you will hardly think it poſſible ſhe ſhould treat a man ſo roughly, whom ſhe eſteemed ſo highly: But let me tell you, that the paſſion of Thraſimedes did manifeſtly appear, that the friends of Menecrates took it to heart, and though they eſteemed Thraſimedes very well, yet they thought themſelves obliged to tell Arpalice their minds. Until now Arpalice did conſtrain her ſelf, but as ſoon as Menophiles and Lycaſte ſpoke unto her concerning Thraſimedes, and commanded her to let him know, that he muſt not any farther engage himſelf in her ſervice, ſhe ceaſed to reſiſt her inclination, and did ſo peremptorily revolt from thoſe that commanded her to baniſh Thraſimedes, ſo incivilly, that ſhe began to ſlack her rigour to him: Yet would not ſhe permit him to ſpeak openly of his love, but without any anger or ſharpneſs, impoſed ſilence upon him.

This being the ſtate of things, news came that Permenides and Menecrates would return within two days. This report had different operations in the heart of Arpalice; for her love unto her brother made her rejoyce to ſee him ſo ſoon, and her hatred of Menecrates, made her ſtrangely apprehend his return. On the other ſide Thraſimedes had ſo little aſſurance of the heart of Arpalice, that he knew not what to reſolve upon, nor how to behave himſelf towards Menecrates, therefore he determined to find out a way how to ſpeak with Arpalice in private: But ſince it was not her cuſtom to give him any ſuch opportunities: And ſince all he had to ſay required longer time than common Converſations, which laſted not above a quarter of an hour, be bethought himſelf of an invention which did admirably well ſerve his turn. Know then, that to bring about his deſign, he beſtowed a viſit upon me; and after much common diſcourſe, he began to talk of Menecrates, asking me confidently, how I thought Arpalice would receive him; Afterwards falling from one diſcourſe to another, he told me that he had a very great deſire to give an entertainment unto Arpalice, before Menecrates came: For, ſaid he, if one may credit Zenocrite, ſhe dares not ſo much as lift up her eyes after he is arrived. For my part, though I knew Thraſimedes was in love with Arpalice, yet I did not ſuſpect he had any ſecret deſign in his words; and he was ſo accuſtomed to treat us with freſh entertainments, that the propoſition did not at all ſurpriſe me. I asked him then what kind of treatment this ſhould be? Telling him it muſt be quickly if he would have it before the return of Menecrates. Thraſimedes perceiving me ſo eaſily deluded, told me, that Arion, who was ſo famous throughout the world, was arrived at Patara; but ſince he had a deſire to paſs unknown, he would not be got to play upon the Harp, unleſs one had ſome intimate friendſhip with him; but being well acquainted with him at Corinth, he could prevail with him, provided it was not before much company. This may eaſily be, replied I; for it may be at Lycaſte's houſe. The company would be too great there (replied he) for there will not be fewer than Lycaſte, Zenocrite, Cydipe, Arpalice, and your ſelf; and you may well imagine, that it is not poſſible to make Zenocrite keep any long ſilence to oblige Arion to play his beſt; for you muſt know that ſuch a man whoſe voice uſed to charm the very Dolphins, will not take it well that Ladies will not be attentive: Methinks I ſee him already lay his Lute or Harp upon the Table at the firſt word which Zenocrite ſpeaks, and will neither play, nor ſing any longer. What then is the beſt courſe, ſaid I unto him? The beſt way is, replied he, that you invite Arpalice hither to your houſe to morrow after dinner, upon ſome pretence or other, that ſhe come alone, and that you give it out all that day, that you are not within, and admit of none but Arion and my ſelf, who will come together. Thraſimedes had no ſooner made this propoſition, but I accepted of it; for ſince my Father allowed me all the liberty I could deſire, knowing I would not abuſe it, it was an eaſie matter for me to do according unto this propoſition: and ſince I believed Arpalice would not refuſe it, I made a poſitive promiſe unto Thraſimedes, who having a Halicarnaſſus friend, who played paſſing well upon the Harp, and ſung as well, he made uſe of him in lieu of Arion. To ſhorten my diſcourſe as much as I can, I obtained of Arpalice to come and ſee me, and the truth is, I forced her, for ſhe did long deny me, but perceiving me grow angry, ſhe came thither the day following very timely: You may imagine that Thraſimedes failed not to come, nor to bring his pretended Arion with him: but I forgot to tell you, that he deſired me to treat him with much civility, and to commend him highly: He told me alſo, that the beſt way to make him ſing, and play well, was to entertain him well before he began to ſing: for it is the humour of all the Muſitians in the world, to love applauds, and therefore if any would have him do his beſt, they muſt commend him, and allow him patience in relating ſome of his amorous adventures, or his adventure of the Dolphin. If that be all, ſaid I unto him, let me alone to do all the civilities which are fitting: And indeed, the next morning when he came, I was as good as my word: and Thraſimedes had ſo well deſcri ed his Goddeſs unto him, that he did all which wa deſired of him: So that this counterfeit Arion, who wa a man of wit and ſpirit enough, began to addreſs all hi diſcourſe unto me, according to the inſtructions o Thraſimedes, whilſt one of his men was to bring hi harp: At firſt, the diſcourſe was general amongſt u all four; but he fell inſenſibly to talk only unto me thinking thereby to oblige him unto a better humour of ſinging, I willingly hearkened unto him, and deſired him to relate his admirable adventure of the Dolphi which was ſo famed over all the World. And indeed he began ſuch a circumſtantial relation, that I thought he would not have finiſhed before the next morning, and ſo he would not ſing nor play that night. Moreover Thraſimedes had told me that he was phantaſtical, and I was ſo fully perſwaded of it, that I durſt not ſeem ſo weary of him as I was. In the mean while, Thraſimedes deſiring not to loſe ſuch a favourable opportunity as had coſt ſuch pains to compaſs, came nearer Arpalice than before; Madam, (ſaid he unto her, in a low voice) methinks ſince Candiope permits Arion to relate his paſt miſfortunes, you may as well allow me to relate my preſen miſeries: But I beſeech you, Madam, (added he, perceiving by her looks that ſhe prepared to deny him) be not ſo inhumane as to deny me a hearing: the harp of Arion will preſently prevent me without your rigour, therefore I beſeech you let me ſpeak. Arpalice thinking that ere long the Harp of Arion would come, and that then the pretended Arion would begin to ſing and play, did not impoſe ſilence upon Thraſimedes: So that this Lover, not fearing to be interrupted by the Muſick of Arion, began his diſcourſe. Madam, (ſaid he unto her) I cannot think my ſelf ſo unhappy as that you ſhould not know I love, and love you infinitely: all my actions ſpeak as much, my very looks may aſſure you of as much, and certainly it is impoſſible that there ſhould be ſo much love in my heart, and you ignorant of it: So, Madam, I will uſe no perſwaſive arguments to let you know I love you; for I preſuppoſe you know it: but I will only ask you, how it is your pleaſure I ſhould behave my ſelf unto this loveleſs Rival who will ſhortly arrive? For I do profeſs and declare, Madam, that I cannot change my heart. Moreover give me leave to aſſure you, Madam, that if I were ſo happy as to be more in your eſteem than he, the engagement which obligeth you unto him ſhould be no obſtacle unto my happineſs: For though I know that if you refuſe to marry him, the laſt Will and Teſtament of your Parents deprives you of the greateſt part of your eſtate, yet give we leave to tell you, that I have enough to recompence that loſs, ſince certainly my eſtate is as much as both yours and Menecrates, if both put together: Let him enjoy then what the Laws of your Country gives him, and I beſeech you grant me that which both reaſon and love requires, I mean, your affection. Your expreſſions are ſo full of generoſity, replied Arpalice, that I cannot be offended at them: But after my thanks to you, I muſt tell you, that how much ſoever I eſteem you, and what averſion ſoever I have unto Menecrates, and how great a repugnancy I have to be forced, yet I muſt confeſs, I have not power to make any other expreſſions than ſuch as I have all my life: Therefore, generous Thraſimedes, if you do eſteem me, you will pity my misfortune, and make no ill attempts to alter me: And if you will oblige me, live with Menecrates as you did at Apamea, and live with me as with a perſon neutral and indifferent. How, Madam, ſaid he, do you think there is any equity in your language? Can you think it poſſible I can live with you in a neutrality, and indifferency? Would you have me live with Menecrates as I did at Apamea? I beſeech you, Madam, conſider what you ſay; think what a lamentable fate it is to marry one who loves you not; and what injuſtice it is to drive a man into deſpair who infinitely loves you, and who will infallibly die if you have no care of his life: For heavens ſake, Madam, put a difference between Menecrates and me. Conſider, I beſeech you, how he will receive this honour which you do him without any joy, and conclude that he who can ſo eaſily play away your Picture, will perhaps as eaſily part with your perſon as it: For my part, Madam, the affection, which I bear unto you, makes me receive the leaſt of your favours upon a thankful knee; and in teſtimony of it, I pray ſee how great a veneration the heart of Thraſimedes holds of you. In ſaying ſo, he let her ſee how carefully he had kept the Letter which he had writ unto her. Do not think, Madam, (ſaid he) I carry this ſo carefully about me, for any other reaſon, but becauſe it was touched with your fair hands, when you cruelly blotted out the firſt teſtimonial of my love. Imagine, Madam, I beſeech you, with what real reverence I ſhould receive a real favour: Oh, for heavens ſake, put not a vaſt treaſure into the poſſeſſion of a blind man, who knows not the value of it. Let him have the liberty to puniſh himſelf by a new choice; and do you make choice of a heart which knows how to adore you according to your infinite merit: Doubtleſs you will find in mine as much reverence as paſſion, and as much fidelity as love. Adviſe well with your ſelf, Madam, and conſider what is your beſt courſe: The very leaſt ſyllable you can pronounce may regulate all my actions; and truly upon your anſwer depends the fate of all my life. I am not ſo full of vanity (anſwered ſhe) as to believe all you ſay; but I have ſo good an opinion of you, as to hope you will not deny the requeſt which I ſhall make unto you, which is, that you will for the love of me live civilly with Menecrates, leſt if you do not, ſomething might reflect in my diſadvantage, which ſhould infallibly fall upon you: For in the humour I am in, perhaps I am not ſo juſt as to accuſe thoſe of my misfortune who are the real cauſes of it. If you will honour me ſo far as to promiſe me, replied Thraſimedes, that you will never make Menecrates happy, I ſhall promiſe you to live civilly with him: But, Madam, if you make me abſoletuly deſpair, I ſhall hardly anſwer you as I do. I aſſure you (replied Arpalice, and ſighed) I ſhould deſpair my ſelf, if I thought nothing could prevent my marriage with Menecrates; and I am confident if ſuch a miſery do befal me, I ſhall hardly believe it the very preceding minute. Whilſt Thraſimedes was talking with Arpalice, ſhe looked continually whether Arion's Harp was brought; not that ſhe did hate him who was ſpeaking unto her; but becauſe ſhe feared to give him either too obliging or too ſharp anſwers, and therefore ſhe would gladly have their diſcourſe interrupted: For my part, I looked as earneſtly as ſhe for the coming of the Harp: For ſince Thraſimedes told me, that there was a notable difference between the diſcourſe of Arion and his Muſick, I longed to hear it: and indeed he ſpoke very elegantly, ſo that thinking he would ſing a hundred times better than he ſpoke, I had a conceit he would then charm me: But at laſt, after a long ſtay, according to the plot of Thraſimedes, the Harp came: And as ſoon as I ſaw it, I preſented it unto this pretended Arion, thinking I could not oblige him more than by my impatient deſire of hearing him; but he having no ſuch deſire to be heard, took it, and laid it upon the Table again: ſaying, he would firſt finiſh what he had begun, and what I had commanded him to relate: So that fearing to anger him, I ſate down again, and hearkened unto the reſt of his Dolphin adventure, which he did tell even to the leaſt wave of Sea in which the King of Fiſhes did triumph: deſcribing him ſo circumſtantially, as he did not omit ſo much as a Scale or Fin of the Dolphin, nor the curls which he made in the water: yet I was ſo ſimple as to think that all his long winded deſcriptions were only conſequents of his Poetical humour, and that his manner of ſpeaking was only a little too full of Tropes and Figures, though I obſerved all along that he ſpoke very elegantly: But at laſt, after a long relation of this adventure, he took up the Harp and played: Arpalice alſo drew nearer, and impoſed ſilence upon Thraſimedes: but the counterfeit Arion told her that ſhe need not make ſuch haſte, for his inſtrument was not yet in tune, and it would be long before he could bring it into fit order for a Harmony, all the favour he deſired was, that ſhe would be pleaſed to ſpeak low, addreſſing his ſpeech afterwards unto Thraſimedes, conjuring him to give an example unto Arpalice: And indeed this Muſician was very long in tampering, and tuning his Harp: twenty times did he twine up and down the ſtrings; ſometimes it was ſet too high, ſometimes too low, ſometimes in the ſame note it was before: he broke above twenty ſtrings, ſtill ſomething was out of order: then would he lift up his eyes towards heaven, and turning towards the company ſeem to be very angry: Afterwards would he offer at a tune in a kind of confuſed manner, ſo as one could not judge whether he was skilful, or ignorant in Muſick: And indeed this ſubtle friend had all the fretting humours of a peeviſh Muſician, and ſeemed ſo hard to pleaſe in tuning his Inſtrument, that he gave Thraſimedes time enough to talk, he would lengthen out the time by intermixing a diſcourſe of Muſick: and omitted not one term of art: he told me of three ſorts, of the Phrygian, of the Dorian, and of the Lydian: he had up the Diotonick, the Cromatick, the Diapaſon, the Meſe, the Parameſe, and a hundred other conjuring words, which I underſtood not, nor ever ſhall remember; and all this in ſuch a Majeſterial tone, as if Amphion, Linus, or Orpheus had ſpoke. In the mean time, be pleaſed to know, that I thinking I could not do a greater pleaſure unto him that was my Muſick Maſter, than to acquaint him, I ſent for him, appointing him to be brought into my Cloſet by a back pair of ſtairs: And indeed when this pretended Arion had tuned his Harp, this Muſician was in my Cloſet, with all the women of my houſe. You may imagine how impatient he was to hear this man, whoſe fame went over all the world. In the mean time, ſince I knew he was not eſs famous for his Verſes, than for his Muſick and Voice, and thinking thoſe which he ſung when he thought he ſhould have died, would be moſt admirable. I would needs entreat him to ſing them; therefore I explained my meaning, and courted him unto it: you may imagine that he could not ſatisfie my deſire, ſince the true Arion would never impart thoſe admirable Poems unto any; but the friend of Thraſimedss having wit at will, excuſed himſelf very handſomly: He told me, that it was a Song ſo ſad, and ſo full of lamentable expreſſions, that it would move more ſorrow than joy. I, who deſired that he ſhould have a good opinion of my ability in matters of Muſick, inform'd him that Arpalice and my ſelf were not of the humours of moſt women in general, who affect only light pleaſant Airs; but on the contrary, we delighted moſt in melancholy tunes, which ſad and ſoften the hearts of hearers, and move them unto compaſſion.

paſſion. Oh Madam, replyed he, I dare not conſent unto your deſires; for I am confident, that which moved the Dolphins unto compaſſion, will move too much ſadneſs in you. Seeing then that I could not move him to ſatisfie my deſires, I preſſed him no farther, but let him ſing what he pleaſed: All this while Thraſimedes was expreſſing his Love unto Arpalice, who fearing to give too much hope unto her Lover, roſe up, and came nearer the counterfeit Arion, who perceiving his Friend had done his buſineſs, and would talk no longer with Arpalice, and therefore he reſolved to ſing: But though he did it very well for a man of Quality, who made it not his profeſſion; yet my expectatiou being high, I was aſtoniſhed when this friend of Thraſimedes began to ſing ſo meanly. But whatſoever I was, the Muſician in the Cloſet was much more. However, Arpalice and I durſt not let our wonder appear; but ſeemed as if we thought he ſung admirably well: yet I could not chuſe but tell Arpalice in a low voice (whilſt he was tuning his Lute for another Air) what I thought: Do you not think (ſaid I in her ear) that Dolphins only can think this harmony admirable? For my part, ſaid ſhe, all I can ſay is, that if Arion ſpeaks no better than he ſings, certainly he has tired you. I aſſure you (ſaid I unto her) he does not ſing ſo well as he ſpeaks; and I am confident, that it was by words,not ſongs,he charmed the Dolphin. Though Arpalice and I reſolved to ſpeak but one word,yet I found my ſelf in ſuch a laughing vein, that I talked a long time purpoſely to keep me from laughing out: But that which gave me the firſt ground of ſuſpicion was, that whilſt I was talking to Arpalice, I obſerved this feigned Arion tuned his Inſtrument, looked upon Thraſimedes, and was ſo tickled with a laughing conceit, that he had as much ado to contain as I: yet did he counterfeit the Muſician ſtill, and did it very well: But finding his friend deſire no longer diſcourſe, and ſeeming to be angry at what Arpalice and I did, he laid his Harp upon the Table haſtily, and would ſing no longer: Arpalice having not obſerved ſo much as I, began to make a thouſand excuſes, and deſired him to continue his ſinging, but he with the pettiſh humour of a Muſician, ſaid, it ſhould be ſome other time. For my part, I ſtood ſilent, and he making uſe of my ſilence to colour his refuſal of Arpalice, told her, that he perceived I was not pleaſed, becauſe he would not ſing the ſame verſes which he ſung when the Dolphin ſaved his life, and therefore he would ſtay until ſuch time as he had a little recollected his memory. Since you owe your life unto them, replied Arpalice, it is not credible you ſhould forget them. Whilſt ſhe was talking thus, Thraſimedes, who was not ſorry his plot was diſcovered, becauſe it would be taken for a mark of love, came unto me, and asked me with a ſmile what I thought of his friend. Methinks (ſaid I unto him in a low voice) that this Arion ſpeaks ſo well, and ſings ſo ill, that I think him more fit to divert company by his diſcourſe, than to charm Dolphins by his voice: For my part if I had been a Dolphin, I ſhould have taken more delight in hearing the waves daſh againſt the Rocks, than in his ſongs. However (ſaid Thraſimedes unto me) his Harp gives not more ſatisfaction than his eloquence. I cannot ſay ſo (replied I) for his diſcourſe pleaſeth me much better than his Muſick. After this Thraſimedes told me, that Arion had a deſire not to be known, and therefore would be called Philiſtion as long as he ſtayed in Town. And the beſt conceit was, that this borrowed name which Thraſimedes mentioned, was the right name of the counterfeit Arion, who after as much diſcourſe as ſpoke him to be a man of much ſpirit, went away with Thraſimedes, who told me ſo much as I did not doubt of this trick which was put upon us: So that fearing leſt it ſhould make ſome noiſe in the Town, I went preſently into my Cloſet to entreat the Muſician not to tell Arion was in Patara: but a woman of Arpalice's, and another of mine, over-hearing that name, it was a hard matter that a ſecret ſhould be kept amongſt three, eſpecially ſince the Muſician was even raviſhed that Arion ſung ſo ill. 'Tis true, he did not report that he heard Arion in my chamber, but he ſaid he heard him: The two women durſt not tell all the truth which they thought they knew, but they told all the women of Zenocrite that Arion was in Town, and that Thraſimedes was acquainted with him; So that the next day the news was publick, and every one asked whether they had ſeen Arion? But the beſt conceit was, that the ſame day Zenocrite came unto Lycaſte, where I was with Cydipe, and Arpalice, Thraſimedes came alſo, and brought Philiſtion with him as Philiſtion, that is, as a man of Quality in Hallicarnaſſis, and not as Arion: For my part, though I did believe he had put a trick upon us, yet I knew not for whom I ſhould take this ſtranger; but I was much perplexed, that every one who came that day to Lycaſte, ſhould all talk of Arion: Some ſaid one thing, others onother, according to the various reports of Relators: For my part, ſaid Zenocrite, I deſpair not of knowing him, for I am told he is a friend of Thraſimedes. I muſt confeſs, when I heard Zenocrite ſay ſo, I thought it ſome affront which ſhe put upon Arpalice, and me; and that ſhe had known ſomething of the precedent days paſſage. On the other ſide, Thraſimedes and Philiſtion knew not what to think: But at laſt Thraſimedes ſaid, that he had not as yet ſeen Arion, and that if he did meet with him, he promiſed Zenocrite to bring him unto her: He had no ſooner paſs'd this promiſe, but all the Company deſired the ſame favour, and Philiſtion was as earneſt of it as any of the reſt; So that Arion deſired to ſee Arion. In the mean time Arpalice and I could hardly hold from laughing; yet ſhe reſtrained her ſelf as well as ſhe could: She had much ado to bring ſome angry Idea into her fancy to prevent it; but at laſt the thought of Menecrates his arrival the next day, gave a ſtop unto all her mirth. In the mean time Thraſimedes came to me, and asked me pardon for the impoſture which he had uſed, making me an exact relation of all, and conjuring me to pity him, and do him all good offices unto Arpalice. I ſhall not relate all that he ſaid unto us, for it would be too long: nor how Thraſimedes was perſecuted by all thoſe who deſired him to make them acquainted with Arion, nor how Zenocrite did play upon the return of Menecrates: But let me tell you, that Arpalice ſeeing Menecrates did return the next day, and apprehending, that perhaps within a few days they would enjoyn her to marry him, ſhe was ſo exceedingly ſad at the thought of it, that ſhe fell ſick, and ſo ſick that ſhe kept her bed. To tell you truly, I am perſwaded, that as things ſtood, her eſteem of Thraſimedes did augment her averſion unto Menecrates: However her diſlike of him made her ſad and ſick: So that partly ſad, partly ſick, ſhe kept her bed all the next day, and I ſtayed with her, becauſe ſhe deſired I ſhould ſee how he would accoſt her; and indeed the meeting was very civil on Menecrates his ſide, though with much indifferency, but with an extream coldneſs from Arpalice: She being in her bed, and, as ſhe ſaid, ſick, no great notice was taken, but he ſeemed more diſpoſed to look upon Cydipe, who was very handſom that day, than to talk with Arpalice; and he did it ſo openly, that one could not do him a greater pleaſure than to withdraw, and leave him alone with her: But the ſtrangeſt thing is, that this Lover, who at his return found his Miſtreſs ſick, was ſo little troubled at it, that he ſtayed very late talking with Cydipe in Lycaſte's Chamber, and was in the merrieſt mood in the world that night: I leave you to judge whether this was not enough to augment Arpalice's averſion, who was indeed ſo really troubled at this proceeding, that ſhe was really ſick for fifteen days; and Menecrates did not viſit her above one quarter of an hour every day, employing all the reſt in pleaſures, and courting Cydipe, who infinitely pleaſed him: Alſo he did viſit Thraſimedes, and ſo did Parmenides: For though they had told him of the paſſage concerning the Picture, and had hinted as much as might perſwade him that Thraſimedes was in love with Arpalice; yet ſince himſelf was not, he cared not, and conſequently did not choak his civilities unto Thraſimedes, who ever ſince the day in which he confeſſed his trick, did continually tell me of his love to Arpalice. In the mean time, ſince ſhe would not do Menecrates ſo much favour as to ſeem angry againſt him for playing away her Picture, but only continued cold towards him, without any mention of the true cauſe, ſhe was very deſirous of ſome time to reſolve upon what courſe to take, and would go into the Country with Zenocrite, who asked leave of Lycaſte, telling her, that freſh air was the beſt thing to recover her health: So that Arpalice went with Zenocrite for fifteen days: Menecrates not knowing whether ſhe was improved or no, ſince he had only ſeen her in the dark: So ſhe went out of her bed into a Coach; and was not very ſick; for ſhe being much more ſick in mind than body, ſtirring made her better. For my part, I ſtayed at Patara, with orders to write news unto Arpalice: and indeed I gave her a full relation, and had matter enough for it: for Menecrates was ſo taken with the beauty of Cydipe, and Parmenides ſo deep in love with Cleoxine, Siſter unto Menecrates, and the counterfeit Arion ſeemed not to hate me, ſo that I had matter of news enough: But when I ſent all this news unto her, I ſent two ſeveral Letters, one to her ſelf, another to ſhew Zenocrite? for though ſhe was a very generous perſon, yet there were ſome ſecrets which one would hardly truſt themſelves with; and though ſhe was her confident in a hundred things, yet they were ſuch as related more unto others than her ſelf: Thus Zenocrite knew all, but knew it by ſuch as had no intereſt in it: And thus I left it unto the diſcretion of Arpalice, what ſhe thought fit to impart unto her: And ſhe told her with joy that Menecrates applied himſelf unto Cydipe, but with ſorrow, that Parmenides loved the Siſter of Menecrates: I writ to her alſo in rallery, how Thraſimedes viſited me ſo oft, that Philiſtion had not opportunity to expreſs half the eſteem he had of me. In the mean time the love of Thraſimedes being violent, the abſence of Arpalice ſeemed long unto him, and needs muſt he write unto her: Since he knew I uſed to ſend unto her, and ſince he had made me tell him the day when I writ unto her, he came unto me as I was ready to make up my Packet; and knowing I ſent her all the witty and pleaſant things I could glean, he gave me ſome verſes which he had two years ſince, but ſince I never ſaw them, I took them for a novelty; So that after he had read them unto me, I ſent them unto Arpalice: But as Thraſimedes gave them unto me, he ſlily ſlipt a note into them which I perceived not: So that when Arpalice opened my Packet ſhe was much ſurpriſed to find a Letter from Thraſimedes, whoſe hand ſhe knew very well, and wondering I ſhould undertake to ſend it without any mentioning it unto her. The Letter was thus written.

To the Faireſt Perſon in the World.

MADAM,

I Do not only beg a pardon for my own preſumption in writing to you, but for Candiope alſo, whom I have deluded: Yet, Madam, how can I chuſe but ask how long this cruel abſence will laſt, which deprives me of the happineſs in ſeeing you? and I muſt needs ask alſo whether you will for ever baniſh that man out of your heart, who infinitely loves you, and cannot poſſibly live without you. I ſhould ſubſcribe his name, but I beſeech you name him your ſelf, to the end I may have the honour of being pronounced by the faireſt perſon that ever was.

As this Letter was as full of reſpect as Gallantry, it did more pleaſe than anger Arpalice; and the deluſion which Thraſimedes put upon me had a happier ſucceſs than he could wiſh: yet ſhe ſeemed to be angry, but it was in ſuch mild terms, as it was evident her anger proceeded rather from decency than any ſharp reſentment: yet Arpalice did not anſwer the Letter of Thraſimedes; but ſent it unto me; and if I could as well remember her Letter unto me, as I do this which I have related, I ſhould make you confeſs ſhe writes as well as ſhe ſpeaks: For truly it was the moſt facetious piece of wit that ever I ſaw: She obſerved the ſeverity of a prudent perſon in anger, and yet had many expreſſions concerning Thraſimedes infinitely obliging. 'Tis true, ſhe charged me not to ſhew her Letter, but to tell you the truth, I ſaw ſhe had been ſo elaborate in writing, that I thought ſhe had no deſire to be obeyed: for when ſhe writ only unto me, her Character was wont to be more careleſs, and worſe legible; ſhe uſed not ſuch exact expreſſions, nor elegant phraſes. So that I ſhewed it unto Thraſimedes, chiding him ſoundly for the trick he had put upon me, but to qualifie my anger, I ſhewed him Arpalice's Letter, wherewith he was extreamly charmed, not only becauſe it was admirably penned, but alſo becauſe it was obliging unto himſelf: He uſed all his Rhetorick to get a copy of that place which concerned himſelf, but I would not ſuffer him. 'Tis true he read it ſo oft, that he could ~~not chuſe~~ but remember it. In the mean time, this days conference did ſo perfectly perſwade me of the real affection Thraſimedes bore unto Arpalice, that for the good fortune of them both, I wiſhed Menecrates ſo far in love with Cydipe, that he would marry her, and think no more upon Arpalice: And I aſſure you, that during this abſence I did what I could to advance it: I never ſaw Cydipe in a negligent dreſs but I chid her, leſt it ſhould be any hinderance; and whatſoever ſhe ſay now, ſhe was then glad Menecrates preferred her before the greateſt beauty in all Licia: And indeed ſhe was as full of complacency to him, as any virtuous perſon could be. 'Tis true, ſhe was univerſally civil unto all; ſo that many were not ſo ſubtle as to perceive: but that never deceived me;for I eaſily perceived ſhe was glad Menecrates loved her. In the mean time, Parmenides,who was deep in love with Cleoxine,durſt not ſhew it unto Menecrates, becauſe he was afraid to incenſe her: And knowing that Arpalice did not love Menecrates, he thought beſt to keep upon good terms with Cleoxine's brother: And for the better underſtanding of this adventure, you muſt know, that Cleoxine had as great a ſpirit as beauty,but it was ſuch a ſubtle ſecret ſpirit,that thoſe who thought they knew her beſt, did ſometimes find they knew her not at all: and indeed, at that time ſhe paſſed for a perſon indifferent, who valued not the love of any,but delighted in all pleaſures in general,and loved nothing elſe: who did not apply her ſelf unto any pleaſure in particular; who kept not ſecret confidence with any, but told all the world, ſhe could not conceive any thing was neceſſary to be kept ſecret: Yet this perſon whom I have deſcribed unto you, held an intimate correſpondency for above a year with a brother of mine, whoſe name was Liſias, and none ever ſuſpected any thing. 'Tis true, Liſias was as diſcreet, as Cleoxine was ſubtle, and I ſhould never have known this correſpondency, if by chance I had not found Cleoxine's Letter, whoſe hand I knew, and which moved my Brother to impart his ſecret unto me for fear I ſhould reveal it. You may imagine (after this which I have told you) that Cleoxine's put my Brother into much perplexity: yet ſince he thought her rigour proceeded from her indifferency, the worſe ſhe treated him, the more he loved her: For as thoſe who are of a proud and lofty ſpirit, as he was, either quickly recoil, or more reſolutely fall on, Parmenides not doing the firſt of theſe, did the ſecond, and did ſo haſtily court Cleoxine, that if Liſias had been capable of Jealouſie, doubtleſs, he would have feared ſuch a Rival: But as Cleoxine carried the matter, he was not at all jealous, and the aſſaults of Parmenides did rather divert them, and augment their affections: For Liſias was more circumſpect, and Cleoxine was more exact, and more obliging. Moreover, they made me promiſe and ſwear ſuch faithful ſecreſie, that I never acquainted Arpalice with this affection, who thought Cleoxine to be as indifferent, as indeed ſhe was amorous: And I have heard her wiſh a hundred times that ſhe were of her temper, and had a ſoul ſo diſengaged as ſhe thought Cleoxine had. As for Philiſtion, he behaved himſelf towards me, as if he were perſwaded, it was not handſom for a man of ſpirit to ſtay ſo long in a Town without ſome piece of gallantry: and I carried my ſelf towards him, as one that was not ſorry he ſhould eſteem me ſo much above others, as to talk of me when he returned into his own Country. Thus Philiſtion having a heart not over deeply engaged, was very pleaſant and obliging company: Menecrates thinking upon nothing but how to pleaſe Cydipe: Parmenides of nothing but how to move the heart of Cleoxine; Cleoxine ſporting at his paſſion with Liſias; and Philiſtion and I having no further deſigns, but to eſteem one another, Arpalice returned with Zenocrite, but ſo admirably fair, and ſo perfectly recovered of her ſickneſs, that ſhe was cried up as a freſh new-come beauty: and I believe ſhe returned with full intentions to treat Menecrates courſly. Know then, that Zenocrite brought her into her Aunts Chamber, where ſhe found abundance of company, amongſt the reſt, Menecrates, who was talking unto Cydipe when ſhe entered: Zenocrite addreſſing her ſelf to Lycaſte, I have brought Arpalice back unto you (ſaid ſhe unto her) becauſe I would not loſe the complement you owe me, for bringing her back ſo fair and ſprightly, after I had her from you ſo melancholy and ſick: for I aſſure you (ſaid ſhe craftily) if every one be of my mind, they will confeſs with me that ſhe was never fairer, no not when her Picture was taken, which was ſent unto Menecrates, and which he loſt unto Thraſimedes. I beſeech you, Madam, (ſaid Menecrates unto Zenocrite, with as much impudence as ſhame) do not ſo ſharply twit me, for loſing a Picture which by your own confeſſion did not perfectly reſemble Arpalice, ſince ſhe is fairer now than ſhe was at that time; and to tell you truly, I did it rather to publiſh her beauty than to wrong it, when I put her Picture into the hands of one who travelled. I aſſure you (ſaid Arpalice, with as much fury as beauty could ſparkle) that though Thraſimedes were not half ſo compleat a man as he is, yet I ſhould think my Picture better in his hand than yours: For I am more obliged unto him who had a deſire to win my Picture, than unto him who will venture to loſe it. I cannot well juſtifie my ſelf in that (replied Menecrates, extreamly aſhamed) I am perſwaded (replied Zenocrite) that you will be more puzled to juſtifie your ſelf in private than in publick, and if your caſe were mine, I would never go about it. If he did (ſaid Arpalice) it would be in vain. I had better then take the Council which is given me (replied he.) You had need of that Council, and more (replied Zenocrite) and went away. I thank you for yours (replied Menecrates, and preſented his hand unto her to conduct her unto her Coach) being glad to be out of that place where he was ſo non plus't: And though he ſtood in much fear of Zenocrite, yet he had rather ſhe ſhould chide him a thouſand times in private, than to be twitted ſo in publick. After he had done his civilities unto Zenocrite, he returned unto the company, which was not now ſo terrible unto him, ſince Zenocrite was out of it: yet he durſt not come near Arpalice, for his behaviour unto Cydipe during her abſence, did extreamly perplex him. But ſince he had eyes ſubtle enough to ſee that Arpalice was a thouſand times fairer than ever he ſaw her; and ſince ſhe perceived he did obſerve it, ſhe was very glad of it, thinking ſhe could not have a more noble way of revenge, than to let him ſee, ſhe was not worthy of ſo much ſcorn he had of her: alſo ſhe received all the applauds and commendations of her beauty with great joy, and I much wondered when I ſaw her admit of all extollings of her beauty with ſo much delight; and ſhe ſet her ſelf out more to ſpite the Lover whom ſhe hated, than to pleaſe the Lover whom ſhe loved. Thraſimedes was no loſer by it, and it may be ſaid, that ſhe recompenſed him, purpoſely to puniſh Menecrates. Thraſimedes was ſo much in favour with her, that he had continual private conference with her. In the mean time, it being late, all the company went from Lycaſte's Chamber, but not all alike ſatisfied: for much difference was between the ſatisfaction of Traſimedes and Menecrates. The laſt of theſe finding Arpalice ſo fair and charming, that he was aſhamed of his behaviour towards her: yet ſince he looked upon her as one whom for all this he ſhould marry, his care was only to know how he ſhould carry himſelf between Cydipe and Arpalice: But the next morning he changed his mind; for a friend of his coming to ſee him, and beginning to diſcourſe upon the preſent condition of his ſoul, he underſtood by him, that Thraſimedes came into my Chamber with Arpalice, without any company but Philiſtion and my ſelf, who had appointed that day, that all my ſervants ſhould ſay I was not within, and he was by ſeveral circumſtances ſo fully ſatisfied, that there was a correſpondency between them, that he began to hate Thraſimedes, and to leſſen his love unto Cydipe, alſo to love Arpalice a little more; and reſolved neither to loſe her eſtate, nor her ſelf, his love of Cydipe was rather a fancy than a real paſſion, what ere ſhe thought; and you muſt know, that Menecrates being fully perſwaded in four or five days that Thraſimedes was in love with Arpalice, that he was not hated, but that himſelf was, he grew extreamly vexed, and ſpoke not unto Cydipe as before: but in the firſt place, in lieu of winning Arpalice by his ſervices, he ſummoned Parmenides to perform his promiſes, in executing the laſt Will and Teſtament of his Father and Mother, who ordained him to marry Arpalice. In the mean time,

Parmenides,

Permenides, who had a particular intereſt, not to ſatisfie Menecrates, told him, that he had conference with all thoſe who had any power over his Siſter; and not to let ſlip ſuch a fit opportunity, he asked his Siſter in marriage. For my part, ſaid Menecrates, I freely give you all the power I have. Permenides anſwered the ſame for as much as concerned Arpalice. Thus they did both of them diſpoſe of that which was not in their power: And I aſſure you, they quickly found it: for as ſoon as Permenides ſpoke unto Arpalice, ſhe told him, that ſhe would not think of any marriage matters ſo ſoon: yet ſhe would not abſolutely tell him, ſhe would never marry Menecrates, becauſe ſhe knew him to be very imperious,and might have occaſion to accuſe her,if ſhe declared ſhe would not fulfil the Will of her Father,therefore ſhe told him only, that ſhe would take ſome time to reſolve upon it, chuſing rather to tell Menecrates his doom than her Brother: But when Parmenides ſaw he could not prevail with her, he told her of his affection unto Cleoxine, conjuring her to take it into her conſideration. Unto this ſhe anſwered, that ſince all her amity could not make her change her thoughts of Menecrates, he might think alſo, that Cleoxine would not be ruled by her Brother, and ſo his happineſs or miſery depended upon Cleoxine, and not upon Menecrates. After this Permenides did ſtill importune her a long time, and Arpalice reſiſted; and ſo not yielding unto each other, each of them were left unto themſelves. On the other ſide, Menecrates ſolicited for Parmenides unto Cleoxine, who continuing in her indifferency, deſired him to believe, that the ſame humour which cauſed his diſingagement, kept her from ingaging her ſelf: ſo that ſhe did not refuſe Permenides in particular, but all men in general, conjuring him to ſollicite her no more concerning Marriage: So that neither Parmenides nor Menecrates could give each other any good account of their Loves: and well may I ſay of their Loves,dear Doraliſa; for I aſſure you, as ſoon as Menecrates imagined that he ſhould not marry Arpalice, he fell deſperately in love with her: So that he ranked himſelf in the Quality of profeſſed, and not declared Lovers, as Zenocrite defined them, and as ſhe ſoon perceived it; and I think ſhe was one of the firſt that publiſhed it to the world. As for Arpalice, ſhe was both ſad and glad: For ſhe was glad Menecrates loved her, to the end ſhe might be revenged of him; but her fears leſt ſome quarrel ſhould ariſe between Thraſimedes and Menecrates made her ſorry: As for Cydipe, I am perſwaded that Menecrates made her always believe, he had no intentions to marry Arpalice, but only to ſhew it was not long of him, to the end he might enjoy her eſtate in caſe ſhe refuſed Marriage. In the mean time Thraſimedes was not without his ſhare of perplexity, to ſee how Menecrates changed his mind concerning Arpalice; ſo that there was none who were happy but Philiſtion and my ſelf: The cauſe of our happineſs was, becauſe we had ſo much eſteem and affection unto each other, as to pleaſe, and ſpeak freely of every thing, and becauſe we were not ſo deeply in love as to diſquiet our ſelves: So that keeping within the juſt limits of amity, we laughed at the miſeries of all others, except thoſe of Arpalice and Thraſimedes, in which we were extreamly concerned: But at laſt Menecrates, not being able to endure the ſeverity of Arpalice, reſolved to force her unto a private audience: In order to that, he addreſſed himſelf unto Permenides to obtain his wiſh, and to carry him in the morning into Arpalice's Chamber, whilſt ſhe was dreſſing her ſelf: As for Parmenides he left him with her: So that ſeeing ſhe could not be rid of Menecrates without hearing him, ſhe gave him audience; but it was with ſuch a ſad countenance, and ſuch anger in her eyes, that he had hardly power to ſpeak: But yet the Beauty of Arpalice did ſo exaſperate his paſſion, that he did at laſt augment his boldneſs: ſo that beginning to ſpeak as ſoon as he ſaw her diſpoſed to hear, Madam, ſaid he unto her, before I complain of your ſeverity unto all the world, I will take the honour to talk with you, and confeſs that I have merited your hatred and ſcorn; alſo profeſs, that I will endeavour for the future to be worthy of your eſteem and affection. It is not my cuſtom (replied ſhe, careleſly) to be capable of any contrarieties; and therefore ſince I do hate you, you can hardly perſwade me to eſteem you. Since there is no impoſſibility in it (replied plied he) I will not deſpair, for I am fully reſolved to give you moſt infallible teſtimonies of my love, ſuch as I hope will work upon your heart: And truly, Madam, I am not the ſame Menecrates I was when you were a child; but I muſt confeſs unto my ſhame, that I did not then love you, and was a long while culpable: But now I have changed my thoughts, and am as much in love with you now, as I was indifferent before, and would it be juſt in you to treat me now, as when I did not love you? It is ſo improbable, replied ſhe, that a man who hath ſcorned me all his life, even ſo far as to loſe my Picture, can change his mind ſo ſoon, and paſs from one extream unto another, that I wonder you will offer to perſwade me unto it. I have already told you, Madam, that I do not intend to juſtifie my ſelf for the time paſt, but I beſeech you put a difference between the time of my guilt, and time of my innocency. When you have lived as long innocently (replied Arpalice ſharply) as you have done culpably, I ſhall then conſider whether I ſhould puniſh or recompence you, and ſo equally forget both your injuries and your ſervices, that I ſhall be all indifferency. Madam, ſaid he unto her, if love were a paſſion which one could command when one will, then I ſhould confeſs you had reaſon to upbraid me for not loving you from your cradle; but ſince it is not, and ſince it was the pleaſure of the gods that I ſhould not love you until you became the moſt lovely beauty in the world, ought you to hate me for that? Thraſimedes (added he) whom perhaps you hate not ſo much as you do me, has not long known you, and could not love you until he did know you; and why I beſeech you may you not look upon me as well as him? There is ſuch a vaſt difference betwixt you and him (replied ſhe very angerly) that I cannot look alike upon you: for without putting my ſelf to the trouble of conſidering whether he love me or not, I am certain he hath not ſcorned me as you have done: But to make uſe of your own arguments, I will not accuſe you for loving me till now, upon condition you will not accuſe me that I can never love you hereafter. Hereafter, replied Menecrates, is not a thing which one can poſitively make anſwer for. I aſſure you (ſaid ſhe) if you can but promiſe me that you will not love me till death, I can promiſe to hate you as long as I live. However (ſaid ſhe) ſince by parting with part of my eſtate, I can be diſengaged from you, I will throw it away upon you with joy: but I beſeech you do not employ Parmenides, nor Menophiles, nor Lycaſte's brother, nor Lycaſte her ſelf to torment me, for all they can do ſhall not alter me: After this, Menecrates would hove proteſted unto her, that he would never take any advantage of her Fathers will, and that all his aims were at her; but ſhe would not hear him any longer, telling him it was Church time, and that ſhe would have him be gone; inſomuch as indeed he was forced to go; but he went in a miſcellany of ſorrow, anger and love, that he could not forbear complaining unto all he met. In the mean time, one of Arpalice's women, and one of mine, hearing Philiſtion called Arion, they thought that Arion was his right name, and that Philiſtion was but borrowed: ſo that they being of ſuch an humour as was incapable of keeping any ſecrets, they told every one that this ſame Philiſtion, who they ſaid was in love with me, was not a man of any faſhion, but that he was the famous Muſitian who was ſo much cried up, and who could not be found all about the Town: ſo that theſe women telling it unto ſuch as acquainted Menecrates with it the ſame day, he was ſo ill ſatisfied with Arpalice, he told it unto all the world, thinking it would anger both Thraſimedes, and me alſo; for he knew me to be one that ſtood upon terms of honour, and that this report would not pleaſe me. Thus in the compaſs of a day all the town told one another, that Philiſtion was Arion, and all believed it, except four or five who knew the truth: yet Arpalice and I were the laſt that knew it: But at laſt Zenocrite told us, conjuring us to tell her the truth: As ſhe was making this requeſt, Philiſtion came in, who knowing what was reported of him, came laughing into Zenocrite's Chamber where we were, and told us all he heard; but ſince Arpalice and I were nothing pleaſed with this report, becauſe we feared ſome ill conſequences, we could not chuſe but bluſh, ſo that Zenocrite believing ſome truth to be in theſe reports, began to preſs us very earneſtly to confeſs the truth unto her. I know very well, ſaid ſhe, that Philiſtion by his admirable air ſhould be a man of quality, and that he hath an excellent ſpirit; but I know alſo Arion is no common Muſitian, he can compoſe verſes rarely, and has ſeen ſo many gallant men, that I am perſwaded he himſelf is one; and therefore if Philiſtion ſhould be Arion, it is no diſhonour unto him to tell it. Whilſt Zenocrite was talking thus, Philiſtion made his heart ake with laughing, Arpalice and I alſo could not hold, maugre our anger: But at laſt Philiſtion, to let Zenocrite ſee he was not Arion, ſent for a Harp which he played on before her, and afterwards ſung; but it was long firſt, for his laughter would not let him. It was good ſport to ſee how he ſtrived that day to ſing ill, that he might make it known he was not Arion; as much as he did to ſing well in my Chamber to make us think that he was he: and indeed he ſung ſo, that he left no ſuſpition that he was Arion: ſince Zenocrite could not poſſibly think he could ſo diſſemble his voice, and therefore we were neceſſitated to confeſs the truth. But whilſt we were talking of this adventure, Menecrates and Thraſimedes quarrelled: the firſt of theſe having told the other ſomething which reliſhed not, concerning the pretended Arion; ſo that going out together, they fought, and perhaps had killed each other, had they not been parted; yet Thraſimedes had the better of it. This accident making a great noiſe, we quickly heard it at Zenocrite's, and you may imagine how much Arpalice and Philiſtion were troubled at it: Philiſtion went out immediately to look his friend, who, they ſaid, were both committed unto cuſtody until they were friends. I ſhall not make any particular relation what talk this produced, let me only tell you, that Thraſimedes being exceedingly beloved, and all the World diſliking that Arpalice ſhould be forced to marry Menecrates, thoſe that ſtirred in this buſineſs, did equally oblige Menecrates and Thraſimedes to live quietly the one with the other, and that the one ſhould not take it ill if the other courted Arpalice, who only was able to make them happy or miſerable; and thus was the reconcilement made up between them: yet Menecrates reſiſted it as well as he could, ſaying it was not juſt they ſhould permit Thraſimedes to pretend unto Arpalice: adding, that they were both engaged unto each other from their infancy. Unto which Thraſimedes anſwered, that having it from his own mouth at Apamea, that he did not love Arpalice, he had good reaſon to think he would no further ſue unto her, and therefore he would not check that paſſion which her Beauty had created in his heart: and the reaſons which Thraſimedes urged being found reaſonable, they were agreed upon the conditions aforeſaid. But Philiſtion being not ſatisfied with what Menecrates ſaid of him, about three days after they fought, and Philiſtion made it appear that he could uſe a ſword better than a Harp, for he got the better, and gave a ſlight wound unto the other in the arm. Theſe two Combats cauſed others alſo, for Parmenides and Lyſias fell out concerning this buſineſs, and fought. Truth is, it was no wonder my Brother ſhould come off with the honour, for in fighting with Parmenides, he knew him to be his Rival, but Parmenides knew not that Lyſias was his indeed. Dear Doraliſa, nothing was talked on for a month together but quarrels, which were cauſed by this imaginary Arion; but at laſt the ſtorm being over, both Thraſimedes and Menecrates began openly to court Arpalice. Parmenides he was ſtill deeply in love with Cleoxine, whilſt Lyſias was her Paramour. In the mean time, ſince Parmenides imagined that the more rigorous Arpalice was unto Menecrates, the leſs favourable would Cleoxine be unto him; he did extreamly perſwade her; Menecrates did no leſs unto Cleoxine, becauſe ſhe treated Parmenides no better: ſo that theſe two Brothers were intolerable torments unto their ſiſters, as if they had been imperious and crabbed Fathers, or capritious and jealous Husbands. Arpalice and Cleoxine took this perſecution not alike, for Cleoxine cared not at all for it: but it was not ſo with Arpalice, for ſhe indured the tyranny of Menecrates with intolerable impatience, ſo as I could not chuſe but pity her: I alſo had my ſhare of perplexities, becauſe Philiſtion continually preſſed me to imploy all the power I had with, Arpalice, in favour of Thraſimedes: I knew very well that her inclination leaned that way; but Parmenides uſed ſuch preſſing ſolicitations againſt it, that ſhe could not reſolve upon it. As ſhe was one day much troubled with the perſecution of Parmenides, and as I much pityed her, I adviſed her to tell her brother that ſhe would willingly ſacrifice her ſelf for his ſake, ſo it might do him ſervice, but that ſhe would not venture her ſelf ſo far upon uncertainties of his good fortune; and that therefore ſhe would engage her ſelf to marry Menecrates, aſſoon as he had married Cleoxine, knowing well by my brothers intelligence, that it would never be. But in what a perplexity were I, (ſaid Arpalice, who was ignorant of the love between Lyſias and Cleoxine) if my brother ſhould marry the ſiſter of Menecrates? I can aſſure you (ſaid I unto her) he will never marry her: and after I had told her all I knew, ſhe took my counſel, and told Permenides accordingly, charging me to tell Thraſimedes, that it ſhould not trouble him, if he heard any reports to his prejudice. In the mean time, Arpalice had no ſooner told Permenides that ſhe would marry Menecrates aſſoon as he had married Cleoxine; but Permenides the more to oblige Menecrates unto a preſſing his Siſter to be favourable unto him, told him what Arpalice ſaid; ſo that Menecrates did double his perſecution of Cleoxine, and importuned his Siſter much more than his Miſtreſs. I forgot to tell you, how I had a deſign to do a good office unto my Brother, for I knew that Cleoxine had promiſed, if Menecrates did much preſs her, and would force her to marry Permenides, ſhe was then reſolved to tell him the reaſon why ſhe could not, and would then make Lyſias happy; ſo that by this means, I ſhould at once be ſerviceable unto Arpalice, Thraſimedes, Lycias, and Cleoxine, and ſhould alſo oblige Philiſtion. On the other ſide, Cydipe, who doubtleſs did think Menecrates loved her, did continually adviſe Arpalice to prefer Thraſimedes before Menecrates. Thus every one having a hidden deſign, we were all put to our wits, eſpecially when we were all together: Mean while, what aſſurance ſoever I gave Philiſtion, to give the ſame unto Thraſimedes, yet he could not move him to reſt ſatisfied:

he told me one day, that if Arpalice did not honour him ſo far as to give him ſome aſſurances of her affection, his friend would fall upon ſome violent reſolution, and that his paſſion was too violent to be ſatisfied with trifles, and therefore ſhe muſt at leaſt give him ſome pleaſing words. After this I preſſed Arpalice (who came one day to ſee me becauſe I was not well) to ſpeak unto Thraſimedes as unto a man whom ſhe loved. I pray you ſaid I unto her, what great difficulty is in the buſineſs? why ſhould you not give him ſuch ſatisfaction, as will coſt you only a few words? A few good words replied ſhe, are of greater conſequence than you imagine, yet I do not ſay that I will never give them: but if I be Miſtreſs of my reaſon, I ſhall not give them till needs I muſt: for theſe few words you ſpeak of as a ſmall matter, are yet the utmoſt limit that modeſty or virtue allowes: till they be ſpoke, the good or bad fortune of a Lover is in the power of his Miſtreſs; then is ſhe his Miſtreſs, he her ſlave; but when theſe few words are paſt through the ear into the heart of a Lover, then doth he expect ſome proofs of this affection, and asks it, not as a ſlave, but as due unto him, and ſo never asks it with ſubmiſſion: and therefore my dear Candiope, let me tell you once for all, that theſe few words which you would have me to ſpeak unto Thraſimedes, ſeem to be ſo full of crime, that I dare not ſpeak them, and therefore I declare unto you, that all I can ſay unto Thraſimedes is, that I deſire he ſhould continue loving me. And alſo at laſt, ſaid I unto her, that you conſent he ſhould hope to be loved again. I aſſure you (ſaid ſhe, and both laughed and bluſht) your capitulations are in vain, for it hath ſo fallen out very often, that I never told Thraſimedes any thing which I reſolved to tell him: and on the contrary I have told him what I reſolved not to tell him; and this is the reaſon why I avoid as much as I can ſpeaking with him in private; for I muſt confeſs, that nothing in the world angers me more, than when I have been either more obliging, or more cruel than I would be. However, ſaid I unto her, though you will not talk with Thraſimedes in private out of affection, yet do it out of prudence: For certainly at this time there is a neceſſity to make uſe of that power which you have over him, leſt he ſhould fall upon ſome violent and deſperate courſe. Arpalice hearing me ſay ſo, though at firſt ſhe was obſtinate, yet at laſt yielded unto my deſire, upon condition I would think ſhe did it out of prudence, not affection; though ſhe confeſſed, if ever ſhe affected any, it ſhould be him: But the difficulty was, to find fit place of ſecreſie for conference; and Arpalice and I were both unaccuſtomed unto ſecret meetings,that we were both puzled to contrive it. I no ſooner propounded one expedient, but Arpalice found a thouſand difficulties in it: at her houſe, Lycaſte and Cidipe were always there: in my chamber the adventure of Arion did thrive but badly: in a Church was all the world: ſo that ſhe ſcrupled at all, though there was no crime in the matter: walk we could not without more company; and after a long reaſoning upon it, we found no ſatisfaction in any place: But at laſt chance did that for us which our inventions could not. As we were thus in conference, one came to tell me that Thraſimedes and Philiſtion asked for me: At firſt Arpalice thought I had put a trick upon her, that I diſſembled ſickneſs purpoſely to make me come and ſee her, and that this was a compact between Thraſimedes and me: ſo that ſhe would needs go away, and I would not let him enter until I had undeceived her. Well (ſaid ſhe to me) I ſhall not ſpeak over obligingly this day unto Thraſimedes; perhaps it were better for him I went away. But for all that, I made her ſit down; ſhe would have ſat upon my bed becauſe leaſt ſeen,and indeed ſhe did ſo hide her ſelf,that none but Thraſimedes could have known her; yet he did, and ſeemed beyond all meaſure joyed at the meeting. At firſt, talk was general, and Arpalice had ſo little ſhare in it, that ſhe hardly knew what we ſaid: But Thraſimedes addreſſing his ſpeech particularly unto her, and Philiſtion beginning to ſpeak low unto me, the talk divided, and we were the beſt part of an hour without any interruption: I cannot give you an exact relation of the conference between Thraſimedes and Arpalice; for both of them told me ſeverally afterwards, that they could not repeat it: All I know is, that Arpalice ſaid ſhe ſpoke over kindly unto Thraſimedes, and that ſhe repented: and Thraſimedes told me that ſhe gave him not one favourable word; yet he was ſatisfied, though he had no great reaſon for it, unleſs he thought he ſaw in the eyes of Arpalice, maugre the darkneſs, a more obliging ſweetneſs than before ſhe uſed. However Arpalice went away the firſt, and would not let Thraſimedes wait upon her: She was no ſooner gone, but Cleoxine came in, who according to her accuſtomed jollity, began to chide me for being in the company of two ſuch Gallants, asking me if I had ſpent all the afternoon with them? whether we had any more to ſay? and whether ſhe interrupted us? Hearing Cleoxine ſpeak in this manner, in lieu of anſwering preciſely, and telling her Arpalice had been there, I told her laughing, that there was no danger in interrupting a diſcourſe of three perſons, ſince it was likely many ſecrets would not be imparted: 'Tis true, ſaid Cleoxine, and if all the world were of my mind, there ſhould be fewer myſterious matters than there are. This is the reaſon I am always ſo indifferent, affecting rather to have no ſecrets in hand, than to run the hazard of hiding them, and cannot. Yet there are many things, replied Thraſimedes, which are very pleaſing, and cannot be hid. Love is a paſſion ſo general, ſaid Philiſtion, as it muſt needs be in the number of thoſe things which cannot be long concealed. If ever I ſhould be culpable of it (replied Cleoxine) I am confident none ſhould perceive it. Then you would not love at all (replied Thraſimedes) On the contrary (replied ſhe) I ſhould love better than another. You would live then in an extream conſtraint (ſaid Philiſtion to her) No, anſwered ſhe, I ſhould be in leſs conſtraint than others who are ſo full of their gallantry. I muſt confeſs (ſaid I) though I have no intentions to make uſe of your ſecret, yet I ſhould be glad to know it. As Cleoxine was ready to anſwer, Lyſias knowing ſhe was in my chamber, came thither: preſently after, Parmenides brought in Lycaſte, and Cydipe: Menecrates alſo came in: But that which moſt amazed us was, that Zenocrite having met with Arpalice, who telling her I was ſick, forced her to come back with her, the ſecond time: So that when ſhe came into my chamber, her, and not knowing I had kept her firſt viſit from Cleoxine, ſhe told me, to colour her ſecond, that I was not obliged unto her for it, for ſhe came more for Zenocrites company than for mine: My hope was at firſt, that Cleoxine would not remember how ſhe asked me, whether I had ſpent all the afternoon with Thraſimedes and Philiſtion, and that I did not tell her Arpalice was there. But theſe hopes laſted not long: for all the company riſing up at Zenocrite and Arpalice's entrance, ſhe came unto me, and asked me, laughing, what pleaſure I took in concealing it from her? I aſſure you (ſaid I unto her in a low voice) my intention was not to hide Arpalice's being here from you, and you ſee ſhe her ſelf does not conceal it. It was becauſe you had not well agreed upon it, replied ſhe, and ſmiled: after which ſhe returned to her place, and all the company being ſet, Philiſtion began the dicſourſe where we left, when it was interrupted by the entrance of Lyſias. Me thinks (ſaid he) and looked upon Cleoxine, that you were about to impart a great ſecret unto Candiope when Lyſias came in. 'Tis true, ſaid he, but it muſt be in private, and not in publick. Zenocrite not being accuſtomed to let things be talked of in her preſence which ſhe underſtood not, did preſs to know it, and ſo urgently, that though it was the greateſt ſecret of Cleoxine's life, yet ſhe reſolved to ſpeak as confidently as if it were a thing only to help out diſcourſe: So that after a relation of what had been ſaid before Lyſias came in, Cleoxine went on, and asked whether ſhe was in the right, when ſhe ſaid, thoſe who meddle with matters of Gallantry, without cunning enough to hide it, have not more pains than pleaſure, and do not deſerve a faithful Lover. For truly, ſaid ſhe, if there be any ſweets in love, I conceive it muſt be when one is loved and loves, and it is not known unto any, becauſe then one is not expoſed to envy, nor detraction, nor to the diſpleaſure of ſeeing jealous Rivals quarrel and fight: But one does quietly enjoy an empire which is not moleſted by any thing; ſuch do know all that others know; but others know not what they know: and I am perſwaded it is with love as with fire, the more it is incloſed, the better it is kept; and indeed, do you not ſee, that thoſe loves which none are ignorant of, do evaporate, and quench in a ſhort time? all the world do ſo talk of it for a while, that the Lovers themſelves do inſenſibly forget to talk of it: Judge then, I pray, whether two who are in love, and keep their affections cloſe from all the world but themſelves, be not more happy than others? Doubtleſs they are, replied Zenocrite: But what would you have this cloſe Lover do? and how can he hide it, if he do all that is requiſite in love? What becomes of that multitude of things which they ſay are inſeparable from that paſſion? For my part I am an enemy unto theſe declared Lovers, and think them ſo ridiculous, that I am perſwaded there is a mean between thoſe you ſpeak of, and them: For if you take away ſighs and ſorrows, vexations, fears, jealouſies, and raptures of joy, cares to pleaſe and divert, alterations in countenance, magnificence and liberality from a Lover, you take away all things that can expreſs his affection, and all that can render him agreeable. No, no, replied Cleoxine, a concealed Lover is not ſuch a one as you deſcribe; he ſighs, but it is in ſecret; he mourns, but it is not becauſe none underſtands it but his Miſtreſs; he has his vexations, but he diſſembles them; he is jealous, but it is only as much as augments love, and not quench it; he has his raptures of joy, but they are in ſecret, he has a moſt diligent care to pleaſe his Miſtreſs, but his diligence appears only unto her, ſince it is her pleaſure he ſhould hide his paſſion: And as for liberality and magnificence, ſince they are virtues which may appear in all brave men, and are not confined only unto Gallantry, he may be liberal and magnificent in a hundred things and occaſions which relate not unto love; and by conſequence this cloſe Lover may uſe them without any diſcovery of his paſſion: In the mean time, he enjoys a treaſure which none does envy, becauſe none thinks he enioys it. Whilſt Cleoxine was talking thus, I durſt not ſo much as look upon my brother or Arpalice, and Lyſias durſt not look upon Cleoxine or me: as for her, ſince ſhe was fully perſwaded, that none knew the correſpondency between Lyſias and her ſelf, ſhe ſpake with as much confidence and boldneſs, as any diſintereſted neutral, or indifferent perſon could: And indeed, Parmenides, who had ſo much intereſt in her as to obſerve her narrowly, did not think her to be capable of any light kind of amity, therefore was far from thinking her poſſeſſed with a violent paſſion: So that eſteeming himſelf more happy in having a luke-warm Miſtreſs, whom he thought loved him as well as any, than to be like Menecrates whom Arpalice loved leſs than ſhe did Thraſimedes, he gave a pleaſant audience unto Cleoxine: As for Menecrates and Thraſimedes, they hardly heard what was ſaid, for their thoughts were all taken up with looking upon Arpalice, who neither looking upon him whom ſhe loved not, leſt ſhe ſhould pleaſe him too much, nor upon him whom ſhe loved, leſt her looks ſhould be cenſured, ſhe gave an attentive audience unto Cleoxine and Zenocrite, who held all the diſcourſe that day; and continued it a long time with variety of pleaſant things: Yet towards the end, every one began to ſpeak of other buſineſs, and talked what they thought good, except Menecrates, who could not ſpeak one word in private with Arpalice. As for Cleoxine, ſhe ſpake low unto Lyſias, and none took notice of it; and ſhe had the pleaſure to ſee her paſſion ſo cloſely carried, that Parmenides himſelf took it no worſe that Lyſias could talk with her, than with any other: And ſince ſhe could not chuſe but laugh when ſhe ſpake to Lyſias, to ſee how handſomly ſhe deceived the world, Parmenides deſired his private Rival to tell him what ſhe laughed at: You may imagine how this pleaſed Cleoxine; but as for Cydipe, I believe ſhe was not ſo well ſatisfied: at laſt the converſation ended, and ſince Cleoxine had not forgotten what ſhe apprehended of Arpalice, and ſince ſhe laboured to perſwade her brother, that he muſt never pretend unto Arpalice, to the end he ſhould not preſs her to marry Parmenides, ſhe told him that Arpalice had made two viſits that day, and that the firſt was to meet Thraſimedes, telling him how ſhe came to know it. I leave you to judge what operation this had upon the heart of Menecrates: Cleoxine did what ſhe could to perſwade him to make good uſe of the knowledge he had that Thraſimedes was preferred before him, thereby to cure him of his affection unto Arpalice: But ſince he knew his Siſter did not love Parmenides, he thought, upon ſerious conſiderations, that no great credit was to be given unto her words: therefore he referred it unto the next day, to know whether it was true that Thraſimedes and Philiſtion were a long time alone with Candiope and her, and when he found I ſpoke truth, he was extreamly angry, and ſo much, that I can expreſs it no better than by telling you, that he was in a mind never to love Arpalice again: ſo that not conſulting any longer whether he ſhould quaſh his paſſion or not, he began to ſpeak unto Zenocrite concerning Arpalice's viſits, as an appointed meeting with Thraſimedes, declaring openly, that he would no longer moleſt the pleaſures of Arpalice, nor ever think of her again. Zenocrite hearing Menecrates ſay ſo, was very much perplexed, for ſhe wondered Arpalice ſhould appoint a meeting with Thraſimedes, and on the other ſide ſhe was glad to ſee, that as long as Menecrates his anger laſted, Arpalice would be freed from him, and at liberty to make Thraſimedes happy; yet ſince ſhe knew Arpalice loved her reputation above her private ſatisfaction, ſhe would juſtifie her, and therefore told Menecrates, that this which he called an appointment, was but a caſual accident; but leſt in juſtifying Arpalice ſhe ſhould revive the love of Menecrates, which ſeemed extinguiſhed, ſhe added, that being his friend, ſhe thought her ſelf obliged to tell him, that it was a groſs inconſideration in him to think of ever marrying a woman whom he had ſo extreamly ſlighted; as for her part ſhe verily believes him to be paſt all hopes of ever obtaining her love, and therefore it were much better both for himſelf and Arpalice to let her alone, and trouble himſelf no further: and indeed Zenocrite being very eloquent, ſhe made ſuch good uſe of Menecrates his anger, that ſhe fully perſwaded him to think no more of Arpalice, ſo that without more delay, ſhe engaged him to give her commiſſion to tell Parmenides of it, Menecrates conjuring her to aſſure him, that this ſhould be no hinderance unto him concerning his Siſter. Menecrates was no ſooner gone, but ſhe ſent for Parmenides, to tell him that Menecrates had no more thoughts of Arpalice, but that he was ready to do him any good office unto Cleoxine. Parmenides hearing this, was in a bitter chafe againſt Arpalice: and his reaſon was, becauſe he thought that now he would be more ſlack in his ſolicitations of Cleoxine: ſo that leaving Zenocrite, he went to Arpalice, and intended to give her a very bitter lecture,afterwards he went unto Menecrates to tell him it was now fulltime to preſs Arpalice unto marriage with him; but ſince he was yet in his violence of anger and jealouſie, he thanked him for his offer, and aſſured him once more, that he would be more cloſe in his buſineſs to Cleoxine, than hitherto he had, though he do not now pretend any thing unto Arpalice. Thus Cleoxine thinking to rid her ſelf from trouble, did augment it. But I beſeech you admire a little at the fantaſtical fate of things: that which could not be obtained neither by Thraſimedes nor Lyſias, did fall upon theſe two Lovers by reaſon of the violence which Arpalice and Cleoxine endured through the tyranny of their Brothers: for Arpalice ſeeing her ſelf ſo unjuſtly tormented, reſolved to confeſs unto Thraſimedes, that ſhe would love him, upon condition he would attempt nothing either againſt Menecrates or Parmenides: and Cleoxine, who had made ſuch a myſterious ſecrecy of her affection to Lyſias, reſolved alſo to confeſs ingenuouſly, that having neither Father nor Mother, ſhe thought her ſelf unblamable, if ſhe followed her own inclination in marrying Lyſias, whom ſhe had long loved; and indeed ſhe told Menecrates as much, who not being able to find any fault with Her choice, either in his condition or perſon, he blamed her only for her ſecrecy; yet adding, that ſince he had paſſed his word unto Parmenides, he could not recall it, and therefore if ſhe married Lyſias, it ſhould be without his conſent. In the mean time, Arpalice, who could not indure the reports of her appointed meeting, ſince it was untrue, reſolved to make it known that their meeting was by accident, not appointed; and indeed made it apparent: ſo that Menecrates finding his anger was unjuſtly grounded,it ceaſed, and he went unto Arpalice that very ſame hour, whom he found alone. You may eaſily imagine ſhe was not a little aſtoniſhed to ſee Menecrates at her feet, whom ſhe thought had for ever deſiſted her company: Indeed ſhe was ſo ſurpriſed, that ſhe had not power to hinder him from ſpeaking and asking pardon: 'tis true, it may be ſaid, that though ſhe was a while ſilent, yet it was to ſpeak unto him with more anger: For he had no ſooner ſpoke what he thought fit to obtain his pardon, but ſhe was as ſharp as poſſible could be, and charged him never to ſee her again: and the truth is, ſhe forced him away. As for Parmenides, it was not with him as with Menecrates; for as ſoon as he knew, that there had been a long concealed affection between Cleoxine and Lyſias, he thought no more upon her; but to retaliate generoſity for generoſity unto Menecrates, he aſſured him, that he would hinder the Marriage of Thraſimedes with Arpalice. Thus in lieu of former promiſes of marrying each others Siſters, they now promiſed only that they ſhould not marry their Rivals. This being the juncture of affairs, Thraſimedes received news, that his father was ſick of a long, but mortal diſeaſe, and commanded him to come immediately unto him. Imagine how great his ſorrow was, not only becauſe his father was in danger of death, but that he ſhould be ſo far off Arpalice, at a time when his preſence was ſo requiſite in Lycia. But to abbreviate my ſtory, be pleaſed to know, that before his departure, Philiſtion and I ſo preſſed Arpalice, that at laſt ſhe promiſed unalterable fidelity unto Thraſimedes, who was extreamly ſorry to part from her: and Philiſtion being alſo to return, he departed with him; expreſſing more affection to me at parting than I thought he had: You may eaſily imagine that the abſence of Thraſimedes was as pleaſing unto Menecrates, as it was ſad unto Arpalice: 'Tis true, ſhe treated him ſo ſharply, that he got no advantage by it, but only a riddance of a Rival. In the mean time, Cleoxine ſeeing ſhe could not obtain the conſent of her Brother, did marry mine, after an aſſembly of many friends, who liked her choice: So that there was an end unto all Parmenides his hopes, and deſires; nor did Menecrates ſee his Siſter ſince: 'Tis true, he was never in the ſame place with her: for you muſt know that Lycaſte having ſome buſineſs unto Sardis, went thither a few days after the departure of Thraſimedes, and the marriage of Cleoxine: So that Parmenides being willing to be far from her, and Lycaſte deſiring him to go this journey with her, he came to Sardis with her, with Cydipe, and Arpalice. For my part, ſince my Fathers Mother was in Sardis, I was glad to find an opportunity of ſuch good company. Thus came we all unto Sardis, leaving Menecrates in Lycia: But at parting, Arpalice and I writ unto Thraſimedes and Philiſtion, to acquaint them where we were, and that we ſhould not hazard any Letters in our abſence, which was like to be long; and we came to Sardis a little before the beginning of the war; yet we could not believe that Cyrus would be ſo forward in the Siege of that Town. Thus for a time were we without any trouble, but Menecrates followed after us: You may well imagine how his journey angred Arpalice; and though ſhe treated him as ſharply as poſſible, yet did he not alter his deſign of being where ſhe was. Moreover, ſince the buſineſs of Lycaſte could not be quickly diſpatched, we muſt have patience. The greateſt of our perplexity was, that every day we heard of the progreſs of Cyrus, and that his Army approached, Lycaſte then thought upon return, but was prevented by a ſickneſs, which cauſed her to keep her bed until Sardis was beſieged. Then you muſt know, that Menecrates thinking the reputation he had got in the War would move Arpalice to treat him better, he did ſo ſignal himſelf, that Crœſſus and the King of Pontus obliged him to take upon him a very conſiderable command: So that when we through your favour came out of Sardis, he durſt not ask leave to follow us; for as things were, he knew Crœſſus would not give it. However, not being able to abide in a beſieged Town, not only becauſe his Miſtreſs was out, but alſo becauſe doubtleſs he apprehended that Thraſimedes was before the Town, he leaped over the ditch to follow her. The adventure was more rare, becauſe Thraſimedes knowing we were in the Town, was taken the ſame day by the men of Cyrus as he attempted to get into the Town. After this, I beſeech you judge, whether it do not nearly concern your fair Couſin, that you ſhould know all I have told you, to the end you may move Cyrus to reconcile theſe two Rivals, to end all their differences, and let Arpalice marry Thraſimedes. One thing hath happened which may facilitate the marriage, which is, that Parmenides to comfort himſelf for the loſs of Cleoxine, doth look upon Cydipe, who perhaps will admit of his affection, ſeeing ſhe cannot obtain the love of Menecrates as ſhe thought: So that I am confident Parmenides will conſent that Thraſimedes marry Arpalice.

Candiope having ended her ſtory, Doraliſa did aſſure her, that ſhe would write a Letter unto Andramites (though ſhe did not uſe to do ſuch favours unto any) which ſhould move him to negotiate ſo with Cyrus, as that this happineſs of Thraſimedes ſhould be ſo eſtabliſhed, as nothing could moleſt it. Then did ſhe craftily ask her, whether Philiſtion was in the Town; for methinks (ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled) that ſince he came out with Thraſimedes, he ſhould be with him. I aſſure you (replied Candiope, and both bluſht, and laughed) I ſhould have thought ſo alſo;but ſince I did only ſee Thraſimedes, I could not enquire of him; and to tell you both truly and ſincerely, the friendſhip that is between Philiſtion and me ſtands upon ſuch terms, that whenſoever I ſee him, I muſt accuſe him of infidelity, for there being no promiſes between us, but to eſteem each other as long as we live; I have reaſon to think that he may do the ſame for me whereſoever he is, that I do now for him. As Doraliſa was ready to reply, ſhe was told that Lycaſte, Arpalice, Cydipe, Cleoxine, and all the other Priſoners were come from the Princeſs Araminta, and were returned every one to their own Chambers by another way than which they intended, and which they yet knew not; ſo that Candiope went to find out Lycaſte, and left Doraliſa at liberty to write unto Andramites; though it was ſomething againſt her mind, yet ſhe uſed ſuch phraſes, as though her Letter was long, he could not find one word which ſpoke any advantage unto him: for Doraliſa hinted at nothing but acording to her friends intentions concerning Thraſimedes and Menecrates; but as good luck for him was, the ſervant who carried the Letter did not find him in a condition

dition to make any long reflection upon the rigour of Doraliſa; for having in hand ſome great important buſineſs concerning Cyrus, he only writ two words unto Doraliſa, that he would moſt punctually obey her; after which, he went unto this Prince, and aſſoon as he was in his Tent, Cyrus asked him, whether the predictions of the Telmiſſians unto the firſt King of Lydia were true? that if he cauſed a Child which the Gods had given him to be carried about the walls of Sardis, the Town ſhould be impregnable in all places where he could paſs? This belief is ſo generally received, replied Andramites, that I cannot chuſe but wonder at the general revolt which is amongſt the inhabitants of Sardis, who ſeem ſo confident in the ſtrength of their Walls, that they never truſt unto the promiſes of their Gods, but when the danger is far off, and not likely to happen: For I remember when news came to Sardis that you had taken Babylon, I heard many men of courage ſay, that their Town was happy in not being expoſed to that danger; and that it was under the protection of the gods as ſoon as it was built: Yet I remember I heard ſay at the ſame time, that the firſt King of Lydia, who received this odd command from the gods, for ſo it ſeemed unto thoſe who conſider not, that it is the way of the gods to bring great things to paſs by ſmall means, and to hide their intentions from the ſons of men, had made the ſcituation of Sardis ſo, that this child could not be carried round the Walls, but the place where he could not be carried, is ſo inacceſſible of it ſelf, that there needed no greater ſecurity than nature it ſelf had given unto it; and it is on that ſide where yet you never made an aſſault, and which ſeems ſo inacceſſible, that thought it ſelf cannot reach it, alſo the Lydians keep ſuch feeble guards there as it ſeems to truſt to the ſtrength of it. 'Tis true, ſaid Cyrus, I think they have reaſon to truſt nature with the ſtrength of that place, and need not fear the taking of Sardis in that place: yet there is a report amongſt the Souldiers, that there is a quarter of this Town where it may be taken, and that it is impregnable every where elſe: therefore it muſt needs be this you ſpeak of (added he, and ſeemed ed not to neglect the advice of the Souldiers) and you know how ſuch things as theſe, whether there be a poſſibility or not in them, yet they make deep impreſſions in the ſpirits of a multitude; and you know how deſpair does faint the hearts of ſouldiers, and what a terrour is ſtruck into a great Army, when once they think the gods are againſt them; therefore though I know the place you ſpeak of be inacceſſible, yet I will view it, and give out as if I approved of the advice which the ſouldiers give me: and accordingly the King of Aſſyria, Mazares, Seſoſtris, Tygranes, and Anaxaris, being come unto him, they all took horſe as well as he, and were guided unto this place by Andramites, which the Souldiers ſaid was the only place which muſt let them into Sardis, ſince the guard was weak on that ſide, Cyrus might view it with leſs danger; and thoſe few Lydians who were upon the walls did mock at thoſe who looked upon that place of their Town; yet they ſhot many arrows, though they imagined they would do no execution, by reaſon of the exceſſive height of the Rock where they ſtood: Alſo Cyrus had erected a little ſconce on that ſide, to umbrage his men when they came to view that place which ſtruck terrour into all beholders: for it was a great ſharp Rock, ſo ſteep that it was terrible to behold, and where it was not imaginable any could go except Goats; upon the top of this Rock were walls ſo low that the ſouldiers might lean over them; and which indeed was rather a bare Parapet than a wall; the paſs over the ditch there was not very difficult, but the rock was ſo ſteep and high, that the Mountain Tmolus which was over againſt it, was not more inacceſſible: Alſo all the Princes which looked upon it, and had ſeen it before, would never have taken ſo much pains as to view it the ſecond time, but only becauſe they would not ſeem to deſpiſe the advice of the ſouldiers; yet Cyrus knew it more prudence to attempt a hundred vain offers, than to neglect one that was neceſſary, and therefore he looked upon this ſteep ſturdy Rock more ſeriouſly than any of the reſt; and as he was in deep contemplation of it, an accident chanced, which perſwaded him Sardis might be taken: It chanced that a Lydian Souldier being upon the wall, and looking over the Parapet, let his helmet fall, which tumbled down the Rock to the bottom of the ditch; the ſouldier was very angry for the loſs of his helmet, eſpecially becauſe his companions jeered him; and therefore he tried if he could get down and fetch it, juſt whilſt Cyrus was in the ſconce looking upon this rock, who ſeeing the Souldier deſcend, ſhewed him with wonder unto the reſt of his company, and obſerved him very attentively, but they ſaw him more like a man who would rather precipitate himſelf, than one that would ever come down; yet they were amazed, when they ſaw by degrees turning and winding, he came down: 'Tis true he made many ſtops to chuſe ſteps, but at laſt he always found them; and Cyrus took notice that the Rock was full of wild graſs-tufts which kept the Souldier from ſlipping: So that deſcending ſloping from tuft to tuft, he came at laſt to his helmet, and took it up with joy, beginning to aſcend the ſame way he deſcended, and to go up more eaſily than he came down, becauſe the precipice did not ſo much affright him. Cyrus admiring this wonderful accident, told the King of Aſſyria, that ſince this Souldier could aſcend this Rock, a hundred thouſand might do the ſame: So that diligently obſerving the way he took, they took ſuch good notice of it by certain yellow Flowers which grew there accidentally, that they were regular marks unto their eyes: Cyrus took a Table-book out of his pocket, and drew this Rock ſo plainly, that the way which this Souldier went was evident to his eye: So that he did not doubt of the taking of Sardis. The King of Aſſyria, and Mazares were as confident as he: Seſoſtris alſo hoped by this way to find his dear Timareta; and Andramites was perſwaded by this deſcending and aſcending of this Souldier, that the predictions of the gods were true: As for Anaxaris, he did not oppoſe the intentions of Cyrus, but he thought it ſo difficult, that he could not hope for any happy ſucceſs in the attempt. After they had deſcanted upon the enterpriſe, they returned to finiſh their reſolves, with the advice of other Princes in the Army of Cyrus; and to attempt this enterpriſe, the great difficulty was, that they know not how to mount this Rock neither by day, nor night that was dark; for by day they would be diſcovered, and eaſily repulſed; and by night it was hard to hit ſo dangerous a way: But ſince Cyrus had a ſoul of a vaſt capacity, and in a moment could ſee all things that made an enterpriſe either feaſible or impoſſible: He conſidered that the Moon was at the full, and not riſing till the Sun was ſet, ſhe would ſhine to help them in climbing the Rock; he knew well, that if ſhe ſhined ſo much as to let them ſee, ſhe would alſo let them be ſeen, but he knew alſo, that in all great enterpiſes of War, ſomething muſt be put to hazard. Alſo Andramites did ſo aſſure him, that ſlight guards were kept on that ſide, as without delay he reſolved to give three Alarm aſſaults the night following, on the ſide furtheſt off the place where he intended the true one, whilſt Cyrus in the head of five hundred men, and all the brave men of his Army, would go and either climb the Rock or dye, not being able to ſuffer, that a common Souldier ſhould do more for his Helmet, than he would do for Mandana. In the mean time, ſince he conceived it impoſſible to bring ſo many men up that way, as were ſufficient to take the Town: His deſign was to carry up ſo many only as might make him Maſter of the next Port, and there to let in the Body of his Men, and in order to that, he appointed a Body of Infantry, and another of Cavalry to be in readineſs near that Port, unperceived by the Lydians, giving a ſign when they ſhould advance and enter: And indeed this Prince gave out all orders, as if he were aſſured his enterpriſe would take effect; and alſo he gave all requiſite orders in caſe it ſhould fail; He made choice of the Souldiers who were to follow him, and appointed them all to carry Pike-ſtaffs in their hands, to lean upon them in climbing the Rock, and to fight with them when they were up, having no other Arms for this expedition, but a light Buckler, a Sword, and a Pike-ſtaff, which was to ſerve for ſeveral uſes. In the mean time, ſince the life of Cyrus was exceedingly pretious, the Kings of Phrygia, and Hircania, who were to give theſe Alarms, did what they could to hinder this Prince from this attempt in his perſon; or at leaſt to diſſwade him from being the firſt in climbing this Rock: But he was ſo perſwaded the enterpriſe would fail, if he did not execute it himſelf; and ſo confident it would proſper if he did, that it was impoſſible to make him change his opinion. Chriſantes made uſe of that freedom which he ever uſed with him, to qualifie that Heroique heat which for the love and glory of Mandana did ſo often precipitate him into danger, he would perſwade him, that the enterpriſe would proſper better, if he would let his Souldiers climb firſt; but he anſwered, that he was perſwaded his Souldiers would climb better if they followed him, than if he followed them; and therefore he was firmly reſolved not to change his opinion. Cyrus paſſed over all that day with abundance of impatience: And the King of Aſſyria with as much, and Seſoſtris no leſs. Mazares, though he was out of all hopes of ever being happy, yet did moſt earneſtly deſire the liberty of Mandana, as if ſhe had loved him. But the hour of acting this enterpriſe being come, and all things in readineſs for the execution, Cyrus cheered up the Souldiers which followed him; and promiſed ſuch large recompences, if the deſign proſpered, that though they had been but half valiant, the very prize before their eyes was enough to ſet an edge upon their courages, and exaſperate their valour. He gave them three things principally in command: Firſt, to follow him, and do as he did: Secondly, not to ſpeak one word as they climbed: and thirdly, never to look behind them, leſt the terrour of the precipice ſhould aſtoniſh them. After this, Cyrus would gladly have moved the King of Aſſyria to march only in the middle of the Souldiers who were to follow him, but do what he could, he would be the ſecond: So that Anaxaris was put in the middle of that File which was to climb; and Tigranes to be laſt, to prevent any from recoiling: Seſoſtris, Phraartes, Perſodes, Andramites, Feraulas, Ligdamis, Leontidas, and all the Heroes diſperſed themſelves amongſt the firſt hundred Souldiers which followed Cyrus, to encourage them by their example. All things being then ready, Cyrus with all his men one by one went down the ditch, by a track which was not very difficult; firſt carefully obſerving the plot which he had drawn of the Rock, that he might the better remember the track he was to hold in climbing: And it ſeemed that he had both well obſerved, and remembered it; and though the Moon did ſhine but dimly, yet it was enough to diſcover the yellow flowers, which were directions unto them; and though he ſaw ſome difference in the colour of them by this gloomy light, yet he began to mount, climbing neither too ſoftly, leſt he ſhould ſlip, nor too faſt, leſt his Souldiers could not follow; ſtill ſtriving to remember the way which the Souldier took who fetched his Helmet: and he hit it ſo well, and led them up ſo happily, that he got to the midſt of the Rock without any noiſe, or any ſtop; ſo that beginning to hap well in the enterpriſe,and being deſirous to judge of that which he had to climb,by that which he had already paſt, he turned his head, and notwithſtanding the obſcurity of the night, did plainly ſee the long File which followed, every Souldier his leader, and which reached to the bottom of the ditch: but as he obſerved them, he heard a great noiſe upon the top of the Rock; indeed it was the Lydians who were walking their round: Cyrus hearing this ſtopped, and lay cloſe to the Rock to prevent diſcovery; and according to his orders of imitation, he who was next him did the ſame, and ſo every one to the end of the File did imitate his leader, and ſtirred not a jot till Cyrus thought fit to march: But, alas, how full of ſad thoughts was this Prince when he imagined his deſign diſcovered, and perhaps all the Defenders of Mandana ready to periſh; yet his conſolation was to ſee, that if he periſhed, the King of Aſſyria who was next him, would periſh alſo; for of all his Rivals he could leaſt endure him, though he eſteemed him very much: But his fears of being diſcovered by thoſe that went the Round, were needleſs: For they thought that place ſo inacceſſible, that they never did uſe to viſit it, only went by it as a paſs from one Port unto another. Cyrus when he heard no more noiſe,but all quiet,he began to climb again with more haſte than before,and alſo with more hopes,thinking to get unto the top of the rock, and to become Maſter of the Work behind the Parapet before their enemies came another Round; and indeed he did ſo: for happily getting up to the top of the Rock, he, and all that followed him, went over the Parapet, drew their ſwords, and made ready to fight: he was alſo ſo happy as not to be diſcovered by any Centry: Alſo to facilitate his deſign, and according to his orders, the King of Phrygia, and the King of Hircania, ſeconded by Gobrias and Gadates, gave falſe Alarms on the other ſide to amuſe the enemy: So that the Lydians being all gone to that ſide, Cyrus had leiſure enough to paſs his men unperceived. After Cyrus had left a hundred of his men to guard the ſame place he came from, that he might make good his retreat in caſe that he could not become Maſter of the Port, he marched on in the head of four hundred of his men, and ſo ſurpriſed the firſt Centinels, that he killed them before that they could give the Alarum; and paſſing on, he came to the Court of Guard which was kept at the Gate which he deſired to become Maſter of: He ſurpriſed them and fell on ſo ſharply, and ſuddenly, that they had not time to draw their ſwords and dye with Arms in their hands: Yet there was a few which fought ſtoutly: but at laſt, the valour of Cyrus, ſeconded by the King of Aſſyria, Mazares, Seſoſtris, and the reſt of the Gallant men, did overcome them, and cut them all in pieces: when Cyrus was become Maſter of the Gate, and the Troops who were commanded to enter, had ſeen the ſign which was made unto them; they haſtily advanced, and entred Sardis, juſt as Crœſſus (who was advertiſed that the Enemy was within the Town) ſent forces to regain what had been loſt, imagining that the Gate was traiterouſly delivered up by ſome of his men, and never ſuſpecting that Cyrus came up by the Rock. In the mean time, the Troops of Cyrus being entred, and horſes being brought for all the Grandees, they mounted them: after which Cyrus being now in the head of the Cavalry, he did vigorouſly repulſe all that oppoſed his paſſage; he endeavoured to get a great place which was between the Palace of Crœſſus and the Cittadel: Commanding the Troops as they entered, to make good the principal ſtreets and publick places, but above all things, to keep the Gate at which they entered. In the mean time, the falſe Alarums continued, which amuſed one part of the Enemies: Never was ſuch a confuſion as amongſt the Lydians. All the Souldiers that were off their Guards, would have gotten whither their duty called them, but could not poſſibly, becauſe the ſtreets were already poſſeſſed by Cyrus. The Inhabitants were ſo frighted, that they never thought of either Barracading their ſtreets, or coming out of their houſes. The women made lamentable ſcreeks: The claſhing noiſe of Arms ecchoed from all ſides; The different noiſe of Conquerors, and conquered, filled the air with variety of ſounds: But Crœſſus having at laſt aſſembled ſome ſouldiers, oppoſed Cyrus, who after that, got not one corner of a ſtreet without fighting for it: The other Troops which had orders to poſſeſs other quarters of Sardis, met with reſiſtance in ſeveral places: In this great confuſion one might ſee in ſeveral places, women croud into the Temples: into other places, ſome that were deſperate, would throw all that they had out of the windows, to qualifie their Enemies: Indeed, the diſorder was ſo great, the Tumult ſo terrible, and terror ſo univerſally ſtruck, both into the hearts of the Lydian ſouldiers, and alſo into the Inhabitants, that they were at their wits end. Crœſſus, in ſo great a diſorder had no way left but to endeavour his retreat into the Cittadel with the Prince Myrſiles; to the end he might make ſuch a Capitulation as at leaſt might ſecure his perſon; and not doubting but ſince he had Mandana in his power, he could at leaſt obtain his liberty: This unfortunate King, did extreamly wonder that the King of Pontus never came at him, all the time of this great diſorder; yet upon conſideration that his love of Mandana cauſed him to keep the Cittadel, he thought it leſs ſtrange. Seeing then that Sardis was loſt: that his enemies were Maſters of all the principal ſtreets: That almoſt all the Ports of the Town were quitted by his men, and were in the power of Cyrus: He did retire, as I told yout into the Cittadel. But ſince the firſt deſign of Cyrus was to get between the Cittadel, and the Palace of Crœſſus, to the end he might take this unfortunate King, he effected it ſo well, that he cut off his way: and there it was that the Combat was hotly diſputed: The approach of the Sun having dimmed the light of the Moon, all manner of objects might viſibly be diſcerned, and one might know another; ſo that the Lydians fighting in the preſence of their King, both for his life and liberty, did things beyond belief. The Prince Myrſiles, though dumb, yet his acts did merit eternal memory, but as valiant as they were, all were not able to reſiſt the invincible Cyrus; who fought under the walls of the Cittadel, with the heart he did at Sinope under that Tower which the flames of fire were ready to conſume, and in which he thought to find his Princeſs, being no leſs valiant under the name of Cyrus, than he was under that of Artamenes. At leaſt I am ſure of this (ſaid he in himſelf in the midſt of the Tumult) I have this advantage, that I am ſure I ſhall releaſe Mandana, if I be victorious: For my rival has no Gally, to carry her away in, as Mazares had, nor can the Sea favour his flight: But whilſt Cyrus did envigorate his valour by his ſweet hopes, Crœſſus intending to charge through the midſt of his Enemies, which oppoſed his paſſage, to the end he might get into the Cittadel, got into the front of his men; repulſing all thoſe that aſſaulted him with incredible valour: Indeed he ruſhed ſo amongſt them, that he was compaſſed about; The Prince Myrſiles ſeeing him ſo engaged, came to relieve him: but before he was able to get to him, he ſaw a Perſian Souldier, whilſt Crœſſus was defending himſelf, ready to kill him behind, having his ſword already lifted up to run him through. The Prince Myrſiles ſeeing the King his father was ready to be killed, and he not able to help it, was ſenſible of ſo ſad an apprehenſion, and ſtraining to cry out with all his force, his tongue unlooſed, and this Prince, who never ſpoke before, did ſpeak to ſave the King his fathers life; he no ſooner ſaw this action of the ſouldier, but ſtriving with extraordinary violence, he cryed out, Souldier ſpare the King: this voice which was as plain as loud, penetrating the ears of that Perſian, did ſtop his lifted up arm, and made him change his intentions of killing this Prince, into a deſign only of taking him a Priſoner: But there was no great difficulty in that; for Cyrus coming up juſt as this prodigie happened, did find all the Lydians who heard the Prince Myrſiles ſpeak, ſo amazed, that there was much leſs difficulty in taking both the King, and the Prince his Son: Alſo Crœſſus ſeeing no hopes, thought it better to render himſelf, than to be taken in a vain reſiſtance. So that this unfortunate King turning towards Cyrus, and commanding the Prince his Son to ceaſe fighting and follow him, there was a Ceſſation of Arms on both ſides: Then Crœſſus turned the point of his ſword towards himſelf, and hilt to Cyrus, he preſented it unto him, telling him, that ſince he was not able any longer to reſiſt againſt the Conqueror of all Aſia, he would ſubmit, both himſelf, his Crown, and the victory unto him. Cyrus hearing the King of Lydia ſay ſo, ſeemed much moved, and anſwered him in terms worthy of his Generoſity. I receive your Sword (ſaid he unto him, and took it) but it is with a promiſe to reſtore it as ſoon as you have reſtored unto me the Princeſs Mandana, and ſurrendred the Cittadels wherein ſhe is: Since I have ſurrendred my ſelf, Sir, ſaid he unto him, you may imagine all in my power is yours. But, Sir, I muſt tell you, that the King of Pontus is not in mine. Then Cyrus told him he would ſend immediately to ſummon him: after which Crœſſus and Myrſiles were committed unto the cuſtody of Hidaſpes, who carried them to their own Palace which was cloſe by: and the ſword of Crœſſus was put into the hands of Feraulas, with orders to reſtore it whenſoever he ſhould ask it: In the mean while, ſince Crœſſus had ſurrendred himſelf, there was no more fighting in any part of the Town, but in houſes which Souldiers would have Plundered: But Cyrus whoſe mind ran all upon the Cittadel, would not let his Souldiers think of Pillaging this goodly Town, he ſent Tigranes, Phraartes and Anaxaris to hinder them, and who accordingly did ſo: In the mean time, he who went unto the Cittadel from Crœſſus, to bid the King of Pontus ſurrender it unto Cyrus, returned, and reported, that the Lieutenant Pallias, who was Governour told him, that provided he could ſee an order ſigned with the hand of Crœſſus, he would without reſiſtance obey him. So that Cyrus procuring this order, he ſent it, and commanded that the Souldiers ſhould come out; and appointed alſo ſuch Troops as ſhould enter at the ſame time: Alſo he drew up a great body of Infantry, in the midſt of the Plain which was between the Fort and the Palace of Crœſſus. As for Cyrus himſelf, he was in the head of a ſquadron of Horſe, to view the Souldiers come out of the Cittadel, and to ſee ſuch as he appointed to enter; watching with great impatiency, until things were in ſuch poſture, as that he could enter himſelf, and have the glory of ſetting the Princeſs Mandana at liberty; alſo to let her know by this act, that her jealouſy was ill grounded. The King of Aſſyria, though he had many raptures of joy at his hopes to ſee Mandana, yet had he perplexities. I believe he did as much fear to ſee the meeting of Mandana and Cyrus, as he deſired to ſee her at liberty; As for Mazares, though he had put on ſtrong reſolutions to hope for nothing, yet had he much ado to make his paſſion ſubmit unto his reaſon: And at this time, he could not chuſe but envy the happineſs, which Cyrus was going to take poſſeſſion of: So that there was none but the unconquerable Cyrus, whoſe joyes were pure, without any mixture of heart burnings: yet was he ſomething aſtoniſhed, that the King of Pontus did not all this while appear, nor look out of the Cittadel, to make ſome terms for himſelf before he did ſurrender it: but he imagined him, bidding his laſt adieu unto Mandana; and that he would not believe Crœſſus to be taken, therefore neither ought nor would ſurrender the Fort: But when he ſaw all the Lydian Souldiers come out, he was full of unexpreſſible joy, and ſuppoſing the King of Pontus was with Mandana, he ſent Hidaſpes to releaſe the Prince Artamas: The King of Aſſyria, Mazares, and Seſoſtris followed him, the laſt of theſe being as impatient to ſee, whether his dear Timareta was in the Cittadel, as all the other Princes were to ſet Mandana at liberty. Chriſantes willing Cyrus not to enter the Fort, until he ſaw the King of Pontus come out, but his caution could not keep Cyrus one minute from the ſight of his Princeſs:

So that being ſpurred on by an impatience, proportionable to the heat of love: and thinking that he had as many men with him as he had in the Cittadel, he entered haſtily into the Cittadel, enquiring the way unto Mandana's Chamber: and having heard that the Princeſs Mandana, and the Princeſs Palmis were together in the Priſon, he asked if ſhe were with her: a Souldier carried him unto a paſſage Chamber, which was common between both theſe Princeſſes, and as he was ſhewing him which was Mandana's Chamber, and which the Princeſſes of Lydia, the Princeſs of Palmis came out of hers: but in lieu of her accuſtomed looks of joy, her eyes were all ſwell'd with tears: But notwithſtanding all her ſorrows, ſhe ſpoke unto Cyrus with as admirable a grace, as Cyrus did with generoſity, as ſoon as he entred into the Fort. Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, the Princeſs Mandana hath ever made me hope to find in you all the favour that can be expected from a generous Conqueror, therefore I ſhall not deſpair to obtain ſo much favour from your goodneſs,as to be put in the ſame Priſon with the King my Father, that I may help him to ſupport his chains. Cyrus, charmed with the virtue of this Lydian Princeſs, aſſured her that ſhe was a Priſoner unto none but her ſelf, and that he was extreamly ſorry that he was forced to make war upon the King her Father:But,Madam,ſaid he unto her,I hope you will pardon me, if I conjure you to help me to break off the chains which fetter the Princeſs Mandana: As Palmis was going to anſwer, Seſoſtris ſaw the Princeſs Timareta enter, who having now no Guards upon her Chamber, came to deſire the protection of Cyrus: The ſurpriſe of this Princeſs was ſo great, when ſhe ſaw Seſoſtris; that ſhe could not chuſe but cry out, ſo that this Prince going towards her, he preſented his hand unto her with unconceivable joy, and then preſented her unto Cyrus, juſt as the Princeſs Palmis was about to anſwer his queſtion concerning Mandana. So that he was forced whether he would or no to receive the complement of the Princeſs of Egypt, whoſe ſuperlative beauty did attract the eyes of all beholders: he anſwered her moſt civilly, and ſhe ſpoke with as much grace and elegancy as wit; but all his anſwers were very ſhort, by reaſon of his impatiency to ſee Mandana, who he imagined would not appear by reaſon of her unjuſt jealouſie. But he had no ſooner anſwered Timareta, and told her ſhe was more a debtor to the valour of Seſoſtris for her liberty than unto him, than the Prince Artamas entered with Soſicles and Tegeus, whom Hidaſpes had releaſed. Artamas not knowing whether he ſhould firſt pay his thanks unto Cyrus, as his deliverer, or ſalute his Princeſs: or whether he ſhould more rejoyce at his liberty, or grieve for the impriſonment of Crœſſus, and being diſtracted between a Deliverer and a Miſtreſs, Cyrus obſerved him; and being deſirous to be rid of all that hindred him from ſeeing Mandana, he went unto Artamas, and preſented him unto the Princeſs Palmis, telling her that he was as worthy of her, as ſhe of him. But whilſt Cyrus was thus engaged to entertain theſe two Princeſſes, before he went unto Mandana's Chamber, the King of Aſſyria had been there before him; and a ſervant opening the door unto him, he asked where Mandana and the King of Pontus were? he no ſooner heard the anſwer, but he cryed out, and ſo loud that Cyrus heard him; and fearing leſt ſome ſad accident had happened unto Mandana, he went towards him, without doing any civilities unto the Princeſs: what new fatality is now befaln us, (ſaid he unto him?) The greateſt that ever could (replied he, with ſuch a fury in his eyes that ſtruck to the heart of Cyrus) For Mandana is not hear, the King of Pontus carried her away more than three hours before day: How, (replied Cyrus in a ſad deſpair) is not Mandana here? Oh, Madam, (added he, and turned to the Princeſs of Lydia) why did you not tell me this ſad news at the firſt? Alas, Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him, in a great amazement) I could not tell you what I knew not: for the Guards would not ſuffer me to go unto Mandana's Chamber to comfort my ſelf, all the while the horrible noiſe laſted which I heard in the Town: So that thinking the ſame ſeverity was uſed unto her as me, I never ſuſpected her flight: Alſo the danger wherein my own eyes ſaw the King my Father, and the Prince my brother, did ſo diſtract my imagination, that I thought upon nothing elſe, and therefore-fore I knew nothing of Mandana's flight: After this, Cyrus, the King of Aſſyria, and Mazares, went into Mandana's Chamber, where they found her not, and where there was none but the ſervant, who ſpoke unto the King of Aſſyria; and him Cyrus did examine concerning Mandana's carrying away: but he could not gather any great ſatisfaction; for the ſervant told him, that he did not ſee either Mandana or the women depart: and that he ſaw none but Pactias who commanded him to ſtay in the Chamber, and not to open it, what noiſe or commands ſoever he heard, until two hours at leaſt after day. The Princeſs Palmis, and the Princeſs Timareta, coming into Mandana's Chamber, as well as Seſoſtris and Artamas, they were exceedingly grieved at the accident, eſpecially the Princeſs Palmis. For ſhe having been longer with Mandana than Timareta, and had contracted an everlaſtnig league of friendſhip with her; ſhe had alſo more need of the protection of Cyrus, than had the Princeſs of Egypt. 'Tis true, her ſorrows were not comparable unto the ſorrows of the three Princes whom love cauſed to reſent the flight of Mandana moſt ſadly: Nor did they know whether they ſhould term it a flight or a carrying away: However, to loſe no time, they ſearched all the corners of the Cittadel for the King of Pontus and Mandana, leſt they ſhould be hid in ſome place; alſo Cyrus cauſed all the King of Pontus his men to be ſecured; and proclamed throughout the Town, great rewards unto any that could tell where Mandana was, or only which way ſhe went. In the mean time, Cyrus carried the Princeſs Palmis unto the King her fathers Palace, and the Princeſs Timareta alſo; conjuring the Princeſs Palmis to get out of Crœſſus what he knew concerning Mandana's departure, and the place of her retreat, aſſuring him of his liberty, if he could truly inform him where ſhe was: but all was to no purpoſe: for neither by the King of Pontus his Domeſticks, nor by the Proclamation about the Town, nor by Crœſſus, could Cyrus meet with any intelligence, nor was man in more deſpair than Cyrus: Nor was man in ſuch a boiſterous fury as the King of Aſſyria; nor was ever any more amuſed than Mazares: One ſaid that certainly the King of Pon- tus was lurking ſomewhere in the Town, and that it was impoſſible they ſhould get out: another ſaid, they went out during the great confuſion that was made, either by the River, or by the ſide of the Town, where the Line of Communication was not finiſh'd: and a third ſaid, that Crœſſus muſt needs know, or at leaſt conjecture where they were. They propounded expedient upon expedient, to find out the truth, but all in vain: and Cyrus had ſo many orders to give out, either for the ſecurity of the new taken Town, or for the Guard of Crœſſus, or for the ſearch of Mandana, that he had no ſooner given one command, but it was neceſſary to give another. He had no time to contemplate his misfortune; but yet he apprehended it in groſs to be ſo great, and his ſoul was ſo full of confuſion, that he thought himſelf the moſt miſerable man alive. But after he had ſent to advertiſe the King of Phrygia, and the King of Hircania how affairs ſtood, and appointing them to ſend out ſeveral parties of Horſe to enquire of the King of Pontus and Mandana; and after he had given command at all the gates, that none ſhould go out before it was known who they were, and to Guard the walls; as if the Town were yet beſieged, leſt the King of Pontus ſhould get out by the help of Ladders; and after he had taken all the courſes which either Love or Prudence could invent: Andramites came to tell him, how he underſtood from a ſervant of Pactias, Governour of the Cittadel, that his Maſter ſent a ſervant the laſt night for ſix of his beſt horſes to be brought unto the ſide of Pactolus, towards the great Rock by which the Town was taken, and therefore it was probable that the King of Pontus, and Mandana were gone out of Sardis: Cyrus no ſooner heard this, but he deſired to ſpeak himſelf with the man whom Andramites ſpoke with; and ſince the King of Aſſyria was not then with him, nor any but Mazares and the Prince Artamas, he went with them unto the place where this ſervant of Pactias ſaid the Horſes were carried, to the end he might judge which way they took: But Feraulas thinking it not fit that Cyrus ſhould go in a new taken Town with ſo ſlender a retinue, did hint it unto him: So that Cyrus commanding two horſes to follow him, went unto the ſide of Pactolus: He was no ſooner there, but Andramites who was that Country man, coming to the River, and ſeeing the Golden ſand which is ſo famous throughout the world, he knew by it that the water was very low in that place, and that it was not impoſſible but it might be foorded, there being at ſome times of the year not water enough to carry the little Boats which uſe to paſs. Moreover, Cyrus obſerved, that the tracts of the Horſes feet did not go along the River Pactolus, but went into it: Alſo, there were ſome Fiſhermen, who came unto the ſide of the River to look at Cyrus, who ſaid, that the laſt night they ſaw from their houſes, which were cloſe by, ſome horſes paſs over the River: one of them adding, that he alſo ſaw a little Boat, but the Alarm to the Town being ſo hot in all quarters, they would not ſtir out of their houſes to ſee who they were: imagining that they were ſome, who fearing a Famine, had rather venture themſelves among their enemies, than hazard to dye for hunger. Then Cyrus asked whether they ſaw any women? One of them knowing what they ſought for, anſwered, yes, in hopes of recompence proclaimed; and others more ſincere, anſwered, no: But indeed, though Cyrus ſaw, they knew not what they ſaw, yet he imagined, that infallibly the King of Pontus was out of Sardis, ſo that without more delay, he reſolved to follow in perſon; yet not being cleared of all his doubts, he ſent Andramites to tell the King of Aſſyria, that he left him in the Town to make all diligent ſearch there, whilſt he went without the Town in queſt of intelligence. He would needs have the Prince Artamas to return and comfort the Princeſs Palmis for the misfortune of the King her father: But Artamas being a debtor unto him for the liberty of his Princeſs, would not forſake him when he was in queſt of his own: As for Mazares, there was no doubt which way he would take: Thus theſe three Princes did happily foord the River with their men. In the mean time, Cyrus could not chuſe but wonder at the weakneſs of Sardis on that ſide. 'Tis true, that as the River Pactolus did riſe and fall in a ſhort time, it was not above four hours in that condition: When Cyrus was on the other ſide of the River, he ſaw the prints of horſe feet come out of it; but he ſaw within a ſhort way they were ſo mingled with many other, that he knew not the right ones he would follow: When he was about a Furlong off, he came to a place where three ways parted, ſo that ſtaying to confer with Mazares and Artamas what courſe was beſt to take, they reſolved to divide themſelves, and did ſo, into three companies; Cyrus letting Feraulas go with the Prince Artamas, becauſe he knew not Mandana; all promiſing to return unto Sardis within three days at the furtheſt, or elſe to ſend news of their adventures: But when Cyrus was to chuſe which of theſe three ways he ſhould take, he was much put to it; for he had no ſooner reſolved upon one, but he repented; and to ſay truly, he would have been in all three, and at Sardis alſo; yet at laſt he made choice of that way which was towards the Sea-ſide, ſuppoſing that the King of Pontus would draw that way: But alas, what a miſcellany of ſad thoughts poſſeſſed the ſpirit of this Prince during this voyage. He talked with all he met, he ſent unto all the houſes he ſaw either on the right or left hand, but could not hear any tidings of them. As oft as he came unto any croſs way, he would again divide thoſe men he had; thinking if he did not ſo, he ſhould leave the way which Mandana took. And indeed he did ſo divide, and ſubdivide his men ſo often, that he had left but ten with himſelf, and at laſt but five, and having none of quality with him but Ligdamis, who was fitter for him than any other, becauſe he knew the Country very well. As he was in a Wood which was full of ways, he heard on both ſides of him the noiſe of men on horſeback, which were in the thick of the Wood, thinking alſo that he heard the voices of women: So that he knew not what to reſolve upon; yet rather than miſs Mandana, or at leaſt not know whither they carried her, he divided his men again, and kept only with him Ligdamis and another, and ſent the other two on the two ſides; then they ſtruck ſeverally into the thick of the Wood, in hopes to get where they heard noiſe of horſes, men and women, Cyrus thinking

ing that he heard the voice of Arianita; but the Wood being full of Leaves, Cyrus could not get to them, but thoſe who followed him, finding a clearer paſſage, they got before him: Alſo he perceived, that the noiſe he heard was leſs and leſs: and in lieu of going forward he went back towards the high way; hoping when he was in the way, more eaſily to gain what he had loſt: yet it fell not out as he imagined: for in his croſſing the Wood to the high way, he could not hear any thing either of his own company or any elſe, yet he hoped to overtake them, and indeed he galloped ſo faſt, that he overtook Ligdamis, and the other man; and finding two ways, he ſent the man one way, and he with Ligdamis took the other; he had not gone above thirty paces, but he met with two country women with baskets of fruits upon their heads, whom he asked whether they met with any before them? But they anſwered, that about half an hour ſince, they thought they heard ſome horſes paſs by them, yet they could not ſee any thing: Such an odd anſwer, made Cyrus ask no more queſtions of theſe women, only the way to the place where they heard thoſe horſes which they could not ſee; but the two women could not agree upon the place: So that Cyrus ſeeing he loſt his time in talking with them, he went on his way: but all to no purpoſe, for he could not find what he ſought after, ſo that he began extreamly to deſpair; and the more, becauſe his horſe was almoſt tired, and night came on: So that he was forced to take counſel of Ligdamis, and to refreſh their horſes at the firſt Town they came at; but in going to it, the Wood by degrees grew thinner, and they came to a place where ran a violent Torrent, which fell impetuouſly from a Mountain not far off, and ſeparated the Wood from a pleaſant Meadow, and ran ſo deep, that there was no poſſibility of paſſage, and the banks were ſo ſteep, that it could not be ſwum with a horſe: Cyrus coming to the ſides of this Torrent, along which he muſt of neceſſity go, he eſpied a woman ſitting in the midſt of this Meadow, whoſe head lay upon the knees of another woman: Upon the firſt rapture of this ſight, needs would he croſs the Torrent, but his horſe would not take it;

ſo gave him time to conſider what was beſt to be done, though he was ready to attempt any impoſſibility: Then did he go more into the Wood, that he might ſee the better, and was even wonder-ſtruck when he ſaw the one was Mandana, and the other Marteſia; he no ſooner ſaw them, but he called Ligdamis, who was behind him, to ſhew them unto him; but as ſoon as he had ſaid ſo, they vaniſhed, and he ſaw them no more, and conſequently could not ſhew them. This prodigious adventure did ſo aſtoniſh him, that he durſt not believe himſelf: he went then as near as he could to the Torrent, to look at the place where he thought he ſaw Mandana, but he could ſee nothing; he could not imagine that whilſt he turned his head to call Ligdamis ſhe could get to a croſs way which was towards the foot of the Mountain; ſo that not knowing whether it was an apparition, or a phantaſie, he ſtood ſtill, and ſpoke not one word: his reaſon gave his eyes the lye, and perſwaded him it could not poſſibly be Mandana which he ſaw; yet this Idea made ſuch a deep impreſſion upon his ſpirit, that after he had told Ligdamis what he ſaw, he asked him where one might get over the Torrent? But Ligdamis anſwered him, that they muſt turn back, and that they left a way in the Wood which would have carried them into that Meadow. After this, he told him, that he was abſolutely reſolved to go unto the place where he had ſeen this fair Viſion. Ligdamis diſſwaded him, and ſaid, it was but labour loſt: but needs would he go unto the place notwithſtanding. Then did Ligdamis carry him to a way where the Torrent was more ſhallow, which they eaſily forded, and made all haſte to the Meadow, leſt night ſhould be upon them before they got thither; yet had they day enough to get thither: And when Cyrus was come to the place where he ſaw Mandana, he found the graſs all rufled, and laid in that place, and ſhewed that ſome did ſit upon it, and their footſteps were plainly diſcerned in the Meadow: for in all other places the Flowers and Graſs were freſh and untrodden, but in this place where they had been, and which way they went. Cyrus was ſo amazed at what he had ſeen, and did ſee, that he was almoſt out of his wits: As for Ligdamis, he was perſwaded, that chance only had ſo foiled the graſs, where Cyrus ſaid he ſaw this apparition, and believed what Cyrus ſaw, was only the ſtrength of imagination and love together. Then ſeeing that night came on, that it was a long way to the neareſt Town, and that their horſes were ſpent: he forced Cyrus to be going, and leave the place where he ſaw Mandana, or a phantaſm reſembling her, for he knew not what to think it was: But in their going they light upon that path which was newly made in the Meadow; but in the going out of this Meadow it was ſo dark that neither Path, nor Men, nor Horſes could be diſcerned, and he was forced to ſubmit unto this conduct of Ligdamis; and going in the dark, he called to memory a dream which he had, in which he ſaw Mandana in a Meadow, and that ſhe immediately vaniſhed: To think how his dream proved true, did much augment his wonder: Afterwards calling into his memory the long Catalogue of his misfortunes ſince he came from Perſepolis at ſixteen years of age, and conſidering that he yet was but four and twenty, he thought that if the gods would have him live longer, and torment him with more misfortunes, they muſt invent ſome new ones, ſince there was none in the world which he had not gone through: 'Tis true, in matters of glory and war, he had been happy: but ſince all his Victories did not avail his Princeſs, he valued them rather as miſeries than good fortunes: But whilſt Cyrus was rapt in theſe ſad thoughts, he ſtill inſenſibly went on, onely following Ligdamis, who went before: At laſt, being come to a houſe at the foot of a hill, which ſtood ſome hundred paces from a Village; Cyrus lighted from his horſe, and never enquiring whether the lodging was good or bad, he went into a little Chamber which was ſhewed him: Ligdamis took care for every thing, that Cyrus might take the better reſt: And Ligdamis would not let the woman go unto the Town to provide any neceſſaries; for he conceived, that if it ſhould come to be known that Cyrus was the Conquerour of Crœſus, and him that kept him priſoner, ſome well-wiſher of that unfortunate King might ſeiſe upon Cyrus; therefore he choſe rather to have bad entertainment, than run that hazard: However, the poor woman, whoſe husband was not at home, made a thouſand excuſes, telling them that if her husband were at home, their entertainment might have been better: Cyrus asked her, whether ſhe ſaw any women of quality paſs by on horſeback that day with ſuch a man in their company as he deſcribed the King of Pontus to be? but ſhe anſwered, No. Then Cyrus and Ligdamis after a homely repaſt went to their reſt; yet Cyrus waked before day, and made ready to depart: When he was taking Horſe, the Maſter of the houſe being returned home to entertain him better than his Wife had done; ſaid, Sir, I muſt tell you, that I can hardly repent of my abſence, for I aſſure you it hath been very ſerviceable unto a diſtreſſed Lady. A Lady? (replied Cyrus haſtily) Yes, Sir, ſaid he, and I left her at a Town about twenty furlongs from hence, where heretofore I dwelt. Cyrus hearing this man ſay ſo, was very urgent with him, to relate where he found this Lady; what ſtature ſhe was of, and how ſhe was diſtreſſed? As for her diſtreſs, replied he, I cannot give you an exact relation; but I can aſſure you ſhe is very fair, that ſhe hath cried very much, and that a man who was with her, was very diligent to comfort her. Where did you find her, replied Cyrus, and when? I found her the laſt night, replied the man, a little before Sun-ſet, as I was returning from a place where I had ſome buſineſs; and I heard the man ſay, that her horſe did throw her into the River, where ſhe was in danger to be drowned; and that ſhe had ſo hurt her leg that ſhe was not able to ſtand, or endure the jogging of a horſe; ſo that I coming to the place where ſhe was in this condition, I offered my ſelf to help her; and the man who was in her company taking me at my word, deſired me to carry him to a place where his Lady might have help; and I conducted them to this Town where I told you I had been: The man carrying her in his arms, and I leading her horſe which threw her into the Torrent. Cyrus no ſooner heard this, but he deſired him in all haſte to carry him unto the place where this Lady was; but the man ſeeing him ſo very earneſt, knew not whether he ſhould ſhew him the way or no: yet Cyrus at laſt did promiſe him ſuch rewards, that he made himſelf ready to be his convoy, and carried him unto the very chamber where ſhe was, without acquainting any in the houſe, for the people of that houſe where ſhe lodged being of his acquaintance, never examined him: Yet Cyrus asked them whether ſhe was very much hurt, but they anſwered him, that ſhe was much better than ſhe was thought to have been; for the Chirurgeon ſaid her leg was not broken, but only ſtrained; and aſſured them it would mend quickly, ſo ſhe might reſt ſome days. After this, Cyrus went into this Ladies Chamber, and knew her to be Arianita: He no ſooner ſaw her, but going to her, and ſeeing none could underſtand him but Ligdamis: Ah, my dear Arianita (ſaid he unto her) what have you done with my Princeſs? Sir, (anſwered ſhe, much amazed to ſee him) I have left her much againſt my will, by reaſon of an ill accident which happened unto me, and I am not ſo happy as Marteſia who is gone with her. But where is ſhe? replied Cyrus: Into what part of the World hath the King of Pontus carried her? Is it far off? And can you not inform me which way I ſhould follow. Alas, Sir, replied ſhe, you ask me ſuch queſtions as I cannot anſwer; for I know not whither the King of Pontus will go; all I know is, that I left them yeſterday a little before Sun ſet, and that they reſolved for to travel all night, and that it will be very hard for you to follow them, not only becauſe they are far before you, but becauſe they go inviſible: You tell me ſuch wonders, replied Cyrus, that they tranſcend my underſtanding: yet I will tell you nothing but what is true, replied ſhe: therefore, Sir, ſince you cannot follow the King of Pontus, until you firſt know in what manner he goes, you muſt allow ſo much patience as to let me tell you. I would gladly ask you, replied he, how the King of Pontus got out of Sardis? whether he carried away my Princeſs, or whether ſhe followed him? whether I ſaw her yeſterday with Marteſia in the midſt of a Meadow? and whether ſhe hate me? I have alſo a great deſire to ask you how you do after your fall, and carry you unto ſome place of better accommodation; but I muſt confeſs, I have a moſt earneſt deſire to follow Mandana, and deliver her from her unjuſt Rival: yet, Sir, replied Arianita, you cannot follow them with ſucceſs, unleſs you know as much as I do: Then I conjure you to tell me quickly, ſaid this amorous Prince. Ligdamis would then have withdrawn to the other end of the Chamber, but Cyrus would have him be partaker of what Arianita would relate. So that after the door was ſhut, and Cyrus ſitting upon the ſide of her bed, he deſired her to relate all ſhe knew concerning Mandana. Sir, replied ſhe, I could tell you many paſſages concerning that Princeſs whom I have the honour to ſerve, and which I believe you would gladly know: but conſidering the preſent ſtate of things, I will only relate what is requiſite to be known at this preſent; and tell you which way I come to be acquainted with the ſecret of the King of Pontus: That there was a man of quality with him, who certainly is moſt innocent of his Maſters injuſtice, and who pitying the miſeries of the Princeſs Mandana, hath often lamented them unto me: and I aſſure you, that by his means we have received many civilities and comforts in our Priſons: And, Sir, I muſt tell you, that I think there is ſuch terms of friendſhip between us, as I have ſome power over his ſpirit. And it is by him I know which way your Rival robs you of the fruit of your victory in taking Mandana from you. Know then, Sir, that when the King of Pontus perceived that you reſolved to take Sardis by famine, when you could not by force, he thought himſelf loſt, though he would not confeſs it unto any but to Pactias, and him who told it unto me, whoſe name was Timonides. Seeing then that your lines were begun, he knew that if once they were but finiſhed, it would be impoſſible for him to get out of Sardis, and have recourſe unto flight, therefore he fell into a moſt extream deſpair; Timonides told me, that then he did ſtrive with himſelf to overcome his paſſion, but could not poſſibly, and the greateſt reaſon was, becauſe he had ſome hopes, that the jealouſie which he had infuſed into the heart of the Princeſs, would make much to his advantage: In the mean time, he could not conceive it poſſible to get himſelf and Mandana out of Sardis; yet he was continually contriving ways how to compaſs it; and diſcourſed often with Pactias about it; who came unto the King of Pontus one morning, and told him, that he had found out a way to get Mandana out of Sardis. At firſt, this Prince was ſo tranſported with joy, that he embraced him, but afterwards conceiving it to be impoſſible, he would not ſo much as ask him what his way was: But, Sir, (ſaid Pactias to him) I know you are not ignorant of the wonderful virtue which is in that ſtone called the Heliotrope; and you know, that the famous Ring of Gyges (which by making him inviſible, got him a Crown) hath always been carefully kept in the Royal Family of Lydia; and that the Prince Mexaris, Brother of Crœſſus, had it from the King his Father. And I think I have heard you ſpeak of an effect of this Ring when Mexaris one day made an entertainment for Panthea, when he was in love with her, and when Abradates was his Rival. Therefore I ſhall not need to relate, that there is a certain kind of luſtre in this ſtone, dazles or caſts a kind of miſt about the perſon who carries it, and makes them inviſible. Then, Sir you muſt know, that before Mexaris died he went out of Sardis, and out of favour with the King his brother, becauſe he would have carried away the Princeſs of Claſomena: ſo that when the news of his death was known amongſt the Kings Domeſticks, they filched away the greateſt part of his Treaſure, before any orders could be given concerning them: and amongſt the reſt, they took this famous Ring of Gyges. A ſtrict enquiry was made for the Thief: for Crœſſus valued this Ring more than all the reſt, but nothing could be heard of it. In the mean time, one of the Officers of Crœſſus had a command in this Cittadel under me, and this morning died; but a little before his death he deſired to ſpeak with me, and told me, that he was a complice in the theft which was committed after the death of Mexaris: Adding, that having nothing but this Ring of Gyges in his poſſeſſion, he gave it into my hands. I cannot tell whether he meant to give it the King or me, for he died preſently. However it was, Sir, I have the Ring, whoſe effects are ſo wonderful, that I believe it may be ſerviceable to you: The King of Pontus was at firſt exceedingly joyed at what Pactias told him. But upon ſecond thoughts he thought it would not ſerve his turn, for the virtue of this ſtone extended only to him who carried it, and therefore he was as much grieved as before. Then he fell into a deep and ſerious contemplation of it; and Love being a paſſion which fills the mind full of Fancy, and gives new and quicker fire to the imagination, he found out an expedient uſe of it: He conſidered, that as a Loadſtone divided into ſeveral parts doth ſtill retain his whole virtue in every part, and will attract Iron; and that Amber, and Jet do keep the qualities which Nature gave them, though they be divided; therefore the Stone in this Ring if divided might as well retain his efficacy in every part, and conſequently he might make Mandana inviſible as well as himſelf: He had no ſooner apprehended this, but he imparted it unto Pactias, who approved of his Fancy very well, not doubting but that the Heliotrope would admit diviſion as well as the Loadſtone: He added further to fortifie his opinion, that all inanimate things in nature, either Stones or Mettles would keep their qualities, though divided; and therefore the Heliotrope: But if it be divided only into two, replied the King of Pontus, Marteſia, and Arianita, and you muſt be left behind, and if you do ſtay behind when I am gone, I know Crœſſus will do what he can to ruin you; and I know further, that it will be much more difficult to get Mandana away by her ſelf than with Marteſia and Arianita: Yet I cannot conceive, ſaid Pactias, that this ſtone ought to be divided into ſo many parts: And as for me, never take any thought; for I will diſguiſe my ſelf, and get out the next ſalley which is made, until which I will hide my ſelf in Sardis: and as for the Princeſſes women, we will lock them up until you be far enough off from being followed. Though this deſign was not very well examined, and though the King of Pontus ſaw it full of difficulties, yet the execution was reſolved upon, hoping in time to ſurmount all the obſtacles. Pactias then brought a Workman to divide this Heliotrope, and ſet it when it was divided; he brought him into a Chamber of the Citadel, where he was ſhut up until he had done his work: But, Sir, as this Artiſt was dividing the ſtone, whoſe nature he was ignorant of, and which indeed was too big for a Ring, in lieu of dividing it into two, it ſhivered and fell into ſix pieces of different bigneſs: The King of Pontus, who would needs be preſent, ſeeing this accident, and fearing that this ſtone had loſt its virtue, and was altogether uſeleſs, he was extreamly angry and ſad, and was very angry with the man; but making tryal of the pieces, he found that every one retained their whole virtue, ſo that in lieu of chiding, he thanked the man; for now he ſaw it would be much eaſier for him to get away Mandana, than if it were divided but only into two; and now he conceived his deſign, which before he thought impoſſible, to be only difficult. In the mean time, before he ſet the ſtones, he conſidered how he ſhould do to get Mandana to carry one, and Marteſia and I another; for he imagined that for all her jealouſie, he could never win her to contribute any thing unto her carrying away: and conſidering, that to make this ſtone do his effect, it muſt be turned towards the perſon who was to carry it, he could invent no better way, than to fix one unto the Pomel of the Saddle which Mandana was to ride upon, for that way the ſtone might be turned towards her. and almoſt as near her body as if it were in a Ring: So that conceiving no better way could poſſibly be found out, he commanded him who was to ſet the ſtones, to ſet three of them in ſilver only, and in ſuch a manner as one might put them in, and take them out when they would; and for the three others, he would have them ſet in Rings. Then the man conſidering upon the propoſition which was made, he deviſed a way according to the King of Pontus his deſire; for he would place this Heliotrope in the Pomel of the Saddle, as if it had been only the head of a nail, and did drive in many other Nails, to the end that this like them might ſeem only an ornament, and was placed ſo cunningly, that it was always turned towards the perſon who ſat in the Saddle. This invention did ſo take the King of Pontus,

Pontus, that I did preſs on the execution of it very earneſtly; and indeed it was done with as much ingenuity as it was invented: But whilſt he was working, the King of Pontus was upon two deſigns at once: The one was, to augment thoſe ſparks of Jealouſie which were kindled in the Princeſs; and the other was to be as cautious in his going out of Sardis as if he had not this miraculous ſtone. In order unto theſe two things, after thoſe Ladies who at the Princeſs Araminta's requeſt you permitted to go out of Sardis, were gone out———Ah Arianita (ſaid Cyrus, and interrupted her) it was not at the Princeſs Araminta's requeſt, that I permitted thoſe Ladies to go out, but at the inſtance of one who was Couſin unto them, named Doraliſa, who was with the late Queen of Suſiana. However, Sir, (replied Arianita) Mandana does think it was at her requeſt, and accuſeth you of too little affection unto her, and of too much unto Araminta: But, I beſeech you, Sir, be ſo patient as to hear me, and know, that after theſe Ladies were gone out, the King of Pontus cauſed one of the Guard to tell us the next morning, as news which he had from one who was taken Priſoner, that you treated them with extraordinary civilities; that you ſent them to the Princeſs Araminta, cauſing all imaginable honours to be done them in her conſideration. Adding, that at preſent, this Princeſs had the ruling of the whole Army; that all addreſſes were unto her for any office; that ſuch Priſoners were releaſed as ſhe thought good, and indeed that you were ſo far in love with her as every one was aſtoniſhed at it, and ſaying that many condemned you for it. You may well imagine, Sir, that Marteſia and I would never have told all this unto the Princeſs though we had believed it; but he who told us, took ſuch a time, as when the Princeſs was in her Cloſet, and ſpoke ſo loud, that ſhe heard, and was extreamly moved at it, and was extreamly incenſed againſt you, inſomuch that ſhe commended the King of Pontus his diſcretion, that he would not tell her himſelf. Alas Arianita (cried out Cyrus) what diſmal news is this you tell me? Believe me, Sir, ſaid ſhe, I do not tell you that the Princeſs loves the King of Pontus; but to be ſincere with you, I muſt needs ſay, ſhe complains againſt you. She is ſo unjuſt in her complaints (replied this ſad Prince) that the gods to puniſh her, hath hindered me from releaſing her: But, I beſeech you, Arianita, go on, and tell me all you know. I ſhall tell you then, Sir, that Mandana had ſuch an incenſed ſoul againſt you, that ſhe could not ſleep one wink all the night following, but accuſed you ten thouſand times of ingratitude and inconſtancy, and ſaid ſhe would never love any as long as ſhe lived; reſolving with her ſelf to leave loving you, or at leaſt to love you leſs: ſhe was full of ſad expreſſions unto Marteſia and me, as were enough to move the hardeſt heart in the world, which if rightly conſidered, may give you more ſatisfaction than ſorrow, becauſe they are ſymptoms of her affection to you. Though the ſatisfaction you mention be but bitter; yet I conjure you to tell me all that Mandana ſaid: for the reſpects I owe unto my Princeſs are ſo high, that her very injuries ſhall not make me murmur againſt her. Alas, Sir, replied Arianita, if I ſhould tell you all the Princeſs ſaid, I ſhould not end this day: For I aſſure you, ſhe ſpoke more that day in a quarter of an hour than at other times ſhe was accuſtomed to do in two hours. No, no, (ſaid ſhe to Marteſia, who entreated her to ſuſpend her judgment of you till Sardis was taken) do not think that the Victory of Cyrus will produce my liberty: 'Tis true, I wiſh him victorious (ſaid ſhe) and do not yet hate him ſo much as to deſire he ſhould be overcome, but yet I would not have him releaſe me; and I look upon that liberty which he ſhould give me, as upon a thing that would grieve me more than any thing upon earth. Oh Heavens, ſaid ſhe, is it not poſſible that one of my quality, conſidering the ſtate of things, ſhould ſuborn her Guards? For as the caſe of Crœſſus ſtands upon bad terms, the King of Pontus his caſe is much worſe: Why ſhould not the hopes of a rich reward from the King of Medes move ſome of my Guard to ſet me at liberty? I ſhall think you want either wit or affection to me, if you do not ſo much for me, or at leaſt if you do not attempt it. It is ſo ordinary to ſee men change with fortune, that I make no queſtion but you may do that for me, which will make me more joyful than I am able to expreſs. Imagine what a joy it would be unto me to get out of the King of Pontus his power, and not be beholding unto Cyrus for my liberty; but that I may upbraid him with his Inconſtancy, and have no new obligations upon me to him. Conſider, I conjure you, what conſiderable ſervice this would be unto me, and how I ſhould be obliged unto a recompence. But, Madam, ſaid Marteſia to her, though it were poſſible that Arianita and I ſhould ſuborn your Guards, yet how can you ever think to eſcape? Do you not conſider, though they let you go ſafe out of Sardis, yet you cannot eſcape the beſiegers? Oh Marteſia, ſaid ſhe, never make that objection; for if I were once out of Sardis, aſſure your ſelf I ſhould well enough eſcape both the King of Pontus and Cyrus, eſpecially if they let me out on that ſide where the Medes keep guard: for I muſt needs think that they who are ſubjects unto the King my Father will ſo far obey me, as to carry me unto Ecbatan, before they will carrry me unto Cyrus: However, though they ſhould not, but ſhould carry me to that perfidious man, yet I ſhould thereby take away the honour from him of delivering me: In ſhort, Sir, the Princeſs uſed ſuch arguments unto us, that ſhe perſwaded us it was not difficult to ſuborn her Guards: Then I offered to ſpeak unto Timonides over whom I knew I had ſome power, but ſhe did expreſly forbid me, telling me, that it muſt be unto the officers of Pactias, or Pactias himſelf, that I muſt break the matter, and not unto any man that had relation unto the King of Pontus: She gave us commiſſion to promiſe any thing in her behalf, aſſuring us that ſhe would punctually perform whatſoever we promiſed: Then we talked that very night with one of the officers under Pactias, and falling into a diſcourſe of the Princeſs and her misfortunes, we told him that both he and all his company were alſo infortunate, ſo that after all their fidelity and care in guarding Mandana, they could never hope for any recompence; ſince they were all ready to become the Slaves of Cyrus. Afterwards, adding many other reaſons, and joyning his own intereſt unto the pity which he ought to have of ſo great a Princeſs, we moved him to ſerve the Princeſs, and that way to ſhelter himſelf from that ſtorm which Crœſſus would bring upon him: This Officer hearing us ſay ſo, did not abſolutely reject our propoſition, though he did not accept it: and we imagined that the difficulty which he made was to draw on a greater recompence for the ſervice which he ſhould do in delivering the Princeſs: yet that was not his thought: nor would he put us out of hopes to gain him, leſt if he had abſolutely denied us, we ſhould make the propoſition unto ſome other, who perhaps would lend a more willing ear unto it than he did: But be pleaſed to know, Sir, that he was no ſooner gone from us, but he acquainted Pactias with the propoſition which we had made, who conceiving that this would exceedingly forward the King of Pontus his deſign of carrying away Mandana, he imparted it unto him, and made him beyond all expreſſions joyful, not doubting now but to get the Princeſs out of Sardis very eaſily; and he did the leſs fear it, becauſe the River Pactolus was ſo low that he knew it was fordable at a place near the Citadel: So that ſeeing the main obſtacle which he found in his deſign (which was, that if he carried us by force we would cry out) was overcome, he thought how to execute the matter immediately; yet reſolving to ſtay until ſuch a night as there was an alarum given on that ſide of the Town, oppoſite unto the Citadel: In the mean time, Pactias appointed him whom we had ſpoke unto, to hold us in hand, as if he intended to make his fortune by releaſing Mandana, and that he ſhould have carried the matter ſo cunningly, that we ſhould not have the leaſt ſuſpicion he would deceive us: And indeed, he acted his part ſo well, that Marteſia and I did verily believe we had won him to us: for he ſeemed as if it went ſomething againſt the hair of his mind, to betray his Maſter, and yet ſeemed as if he were infinitely compaſſionate of the miſery in which the Princeſs was: And Marteſia and I were ſo deluded in him, that we alſo deluded Mandana; but the truth is, ſhe was as much deluded by the words of him with whom we treated, as by ours: for ſince he told us, to delude us the more, that he would not undertake the buſineſs, unleſs he ſpake unto the Princeſs; we did ſo bring it to paſs, that he did ſpeak with her, and concluded what we had begun: Thus taking the whole matter upon him, we had nothing to do but to be ready for a departure, when he ſhould advertiſe us: And to make the matter ſeem more likely, he told us of the ſhallowneſs of the River, adding, that unleſs it were ſo, he could not poſſibly deliver us. But the Princeſs thinking that ſhe muſt needs be at ſome expences in the execution of his deſign, ſhe gave him a very rich Ring: which he took, leſt ſhe ſhould ſuſpect him if he refuſed; ſo that now we were full of hopes. The Princeſs was very ſorry to leave the Princeſs Palmis, but ſhe knew that though ſhe ſhould ſhew her the way how ſhe might get out of Priſon, yet out of her reſpects unto the King her Father, ſhe would refuſe it, therefore ſhe did not impart her deſign unto her: but waited with much impatience for the execution of it: and we waited not long: for the Heliotropes being ſet, and Pactolus at an ebbe, Pactias having procured a boat to waft over the Princeſs, Marteſia, and me, leſt there ſhould be any danger in riding the River: the King of Pontus bidding Timonides to be in a readineſs, and Pactias having given all requiſite orders for our going out of Sardis: It chanced that about two hours after we were gone to bed, we heard a great noiſe in the Town: ſo that the Princeſs fearing ſome ſedition, ſhe did riſe, and dreſſed her ſelf: And ſhe was no ſooner ready, but the men from whom we expected our liberty, came to tell us, that now we might eaſily make an eſcape whilſt there was a diſorder in the Town, occaſioned by a falſe Alarm which he ſaid Crœſſus gave, purpoſely to keep the inhabitants awake: the reaſon why he told the Princeſs it was a falſe Alarm, was, becauſe the King of Pontus feared, that if Mandana knew Sardis was taken, ſhe would then change her reſolution, and not go out: for he knew not how high her jealouſie was, though he had a great gueſs at it: You may well imagine, Sir, that the Princeſs received this news of her pretended liberty with much joy: So that telling the man ſhe was ready, he left us, and returned about a quarter of an hour after to conduct us down a back pair of ſtairs where none could ſee us, himſelf and two of his companions, until we came unto the Court of Guard, where we found very few Souldiers: for you muſt know, Sir, that the King of Pontus would not have the Princeſs ſee him until ſhe was out of Sardis, and paſt the Camp of Cyrus: therefore taking one Ring himſelf, and giving one to Pactias, and one unto Timonides, they followed us unperceived. I will not trouble, you with a relation how the Princeſs was amazed when ſhe was out of the Cittadel only with three men, and us, and when ſhe heard the horrid noiſe that was in the Town. But let me tell you, that the ways being very fair and ſandy from the Cittadel unto the River Pactolus which was cloſe by, we went in more fears than trouble: The King of Pontus and Pactias followed us, alſo Timonides who carried the Heliotropes, which were to be put into the Pomels of the Saddles as I told you: when we were come to the River, we ſaw horſes ready, and a little Boat, into which the Princeſs Mandana, our conductor, Marteſia, and I entered: the two Souldiers rode over the River upon two of the horſes, and carried the reſt in their hands. And give me leave to tell you, Sir, that when the Princeſs ſaw her ſelf in the midſt of the River, her fears began to vaniſh, and joy took poſſeſſion of her heart: it plainly appeared, that ſhe did not ſo much fear being taken by your forces, as by thoſe of Crœſſus or the King of Pontus: Now ſhall I be preſently out of the King of Pontus his power, ſaid ſhe unto Marteſia and me, and ſhall not be beholding unto a perfidious Prince for my liberty: when we landed, he whom we called our deliverer, went where Timonides was, who was fixing the Heliotropes unto the Saddles on which the Princeſs Mandana, Marteſia, and I were to ride: It being night, and the Moon ſhining but dimly, alſo our minds being taken up with various thoughts, we never obſerved that the horſes on which we rid were inviſible, nor had we any leaſure to deſcant upon what we ſaw or not ſaw: for as ſoon as we were on horſeback, we went away: I forgot to tell you, Sir, that Marteſia riding behind our conductor the vertue of the Heliotrope ſufficed for both: As for the two men who came in the boat with us, they went on either ſide Mandana to conduct her: And to the end theſe two Souldiers who were not inviſible, ſhould not be obſerved by your forces; Pactias had put them into Perſian habits: alſo the King of Pontus, not truſting wholly unto the virtue of theſe Heliotropes, was ſo careful in chuſing his way, and paſſing between the Quarters on that ſide where the line of communication was not finiſhed, that I am perſwaded, though there had been none of theſe Heliotropes, he had paſſed ſafely. In the mean time, the King of Pontus let Mandana go firſt, that the two men that were viſible might be guides unto all the company who ſaw not each other: commanding them, that if any of the Enemy came to take them, not to make reſiſtance, but to let Mandana go, next whom he always rid, though ſhe ſaw him not: Though our minds were ſo full of hopes and fears, and the night was ſo dark, that we took no notice of this wonder; yet when we had rid a while, and I obſerved that we could not ſee any but the two footmen which ran by the Princeſs, but could not ſee either Marteſia or our Conductor, wondering what ſhould be become of the other horſes which we ſaw at the water ſide, I confeſs that fear did ſo poſſeſs me, that I could not chuſe but cry out: I thought that I had wandred out of the way as well as thoſe two men: The cry which I made, cauſed the Princeſs to look about her, and ſeeing only the two men who held the bridle of her horſe, ſhe was as much ſurpriſed as I was: Marteſia who was behind our Deliverer, and who committed her ſelf wholly unto his Guidance, coming out of a deep contemplation, had her ſhare in the aſtoniſhment, when ſhe looked and could not ſee us: In the mean time Mandana ſtopped, and I alſo, and we were ſo affrighted, that the King of Pontus thought twenty times to diſcover himſelf, and comfort us: but he did not, ſtill leaving the care of us unto him whom we looked upon as the Author of our Liberty, and he coming to Mandana, let her feel the hand of Marteſia, aſſuring her that ſhe needed not to fear any thing, and that the wonder which ſhe ſaw was an inchantment only to ſet her at liberty: if you only were inviſible, ſaid ſhe unto him, I ſhould think you had found the Ring of Gyges, which I hear Crœſſus hath loſt; but I cannot ſee either Marteſia or Arianita, and I perceive by what they ſay, that they do not ſee me: However it be, Madam, ſaid he unto her, I aſſure you that you have no cauſe to fear any thing; and the better to aſſure you, when none paſſeth by, you may ſpeak either with Marteſia or Arianita, whom I will cauſe to come nearer you: However, when you hear any ſtrangers paſſing by, I would intreat you to be ſilent, for fear of any diſcovery, and to prevent any attempt upon us. Whilſt this man and the Princeſs were talking thus, Marteſia and I were in an extream fright: yet being under the conduct of a man, who had ſo much power as to act ſuch wonders, we durſt not but ſpeak him very fair, thinking that ſince he was able to make us inviſible, he was able to do what he pleaſed. The Princeſs having the ſame thoughts, did not much preſs him to tell her how he wrought theſe miracles, and thought it more expedient to concur with him only to carry her unto the place where ſhe deſired to go, to wit, unto Ecbatane, and to ſtay at ſome Town where ſhe might ſtay with ſafety, and have ſo much time as ſend her a fitter Equipage. Since we were yet in the place where we might meet with ſome of the Troops of Cyrus; he promiſed her all ſhe deſired, leſt ſhe ſhould meet ſome and cry out: So that the Princeſs putting a new confidence in him, ſhe only admired the prodigie, without any fear of his deceiving her: contenting her ſelf with ſeeing only thoſe two men who guided her horſe, and ſpeaking unto Marteſia and me. Thus then we paſſed the Camp of Cyrus, between two Quarters, we met ſome Troopers and Souldiers ſeveral times; but ſince the two viſible men were cloathed in Perſian habits, they paſſed for their own men, who were going from Quarter to Quarter; ſo that we travelled without any obſtacle: And that which at firſt was a terrour unto us, became afterwards our diverſion. Marteſia and I had a hundred phantaſtical wiſhes: For my part I wiſhed to ſee the King of Pontus, to upbraid him with his injuſtice, at a time when he could neither ſee, nor follow us. Marteſia wiſhed to meet the King of Aſſyria to tell him, that this device was better than the white habits in a ſnow, which he uſed to get out of Babylon; that we might have the pleaſure of ſeeing him deſperate, when he could hear the Princeſs, and not ſee her. As for Mandana, ſhe hinted to us, though ſhe did not name you, that ſhe was deſirous to ſee you, Sir, and that you might only hear her voice. Thus we went on, not ſuſpecting that the King of Pontus was ſo near as to hear us: Yet me-thought, that as we went over a ſtony way, I heard more horſes than we had in our company, but durſt not expreſs my thoughts. Thus we got out of the Camp, and about the height of the day the Sun began to be ſo hot, that the Princeſs complained very much. And coming to a place where were two ways, the one leading unto a thick ſhady Wood, and the other into an open Plain; the King of Pontus ſeeing the men who guided Mandana's horſe to take the open way, he forgot that he ſhould not ſpeak, and commanded them to turn upon the right hand into the ſhade. I leave you to imagine, Sir, how we were ſurpriſed when we heard the King of Pontus his voice, which we knew full well. The truth is, it was ſo great, that we cryed out all at once. The Princeſs ſtopped upon a ſudden, and leaping haſtily from her horſe, ſhe became viſible, and fell into ſuch lamentable complaints, as would have moved pity from very ſtones. I no ſooner ſaw her lighted from her horſe, but I did the ſame, and ſo did Marteſia, and went both unto the Princeſs; the King of Pontus was extreamly perplexed; for ſince he had only four in his company, he thought it would be difficult to carry us away by force, therefore he went politiquely to work; for leaving his Ring with Timonides, he came and threw himſelf at Mandana's feet, giving her all the reſpective language that a violent and ſubmiſſive paſſion could deviſe; beſeeching her to pardon him, proteſting he would ſtill obſerve the ſame ſubmiſſion unto her as formerly, and aſſuring her that he would only endeavour to win her by his tears: adding, that if he could not obtain this happineſs in a ſhort time, he would then carry her unto Ecbatan: Yet all his ſubmiſſive eloquence could not move the Princeſs, who told him peremptorily, that ſhe would abſolutely die upon the place. Inſomuch as the King of Pontus perceiving her obſtinate, and would go no further, he began to beſeech her not to force him to fail in his ſubmiſſive reſpects, and force her to follow him. And to ſhew you, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) that I am able to do it, know that I have fifty Horſe with me, though you ſee them not. At firſt the Princeſs did not believe him, but the King of Pontus cauſing Pactias and Timonides to ſpeak, ſhe did no longer queſtion the truth; for ſhe knew both their voices: So that exceedingly grieving at it, and chuſing rather to follow her Raviſher, than to force him by a vain reſiſtance unto any violence, ſhe yielded, ſince ſhe could not chuſe, and got upon her horſe. Yet firſt ſhe told the King of Pontus, that he ſhould never hope for any thing from her but hatred and contempt. In the mean while, ſince in lighting from my horſe, I had let go my bridle, it was a piece of difficulty to find him again, ſince he carried with him that which made him inviſible; and Timonides was ready to take me up behind him, when this horſe which was kept with that which Pactias rid upon, came unto him when he neighed; ſo that Pactias hearing him ſo near to him, layd hold on him, and I got up. Then after that Timonides had given the King of Pontus his Ring again, we went on, but alas, it was with thoughts different from thoſe we had before, and certainly this Princeſs did repent of her eſcape, yet I cannot tell you her thoughts, but by conjecture, for ſince that I never heard her ſpeak: When we were come into the Wood, where we ſaw ſome houſes, the King of Pontus let the Princeſs ſtay under a ſhade, and brought ſome meat unto her, but ſhe would take nothing, only a glaſs of water, and that at the requeſt of Marteſia; after which we continued on our journey. In the mean time, Timonides feared that I ſhould complain againſt him, for not imparting his Maſters ſecret unto her, therefore he rid always next me, and I having a great deſire to know how we came to be inviſible, conjuring him to tell me, and aſſured him that if he would tell me the truth, I would pardon him. I had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but Timonides being glad that I would accept of his juſtification, bad me in a low voice ſtop my horſe, and ſtay a little behind the King of Pontus; for ſeeing the two Footmen which guided Mandana's horſe, we knew he was not far off her: So that ſtopping our horſes until we were out of hearing, after Timonides told me with a thouſand oaths, that he knew nothing of the deſign until the laſt night, that Pactias told him, he related all unto me: adding, that it would be long before the King of Pontus came unto any place of retreat, and that he was reſolved to travel all night, and not to reſt the Princeſs until break of day. In the mean time, we were ſo attentive unto our diſcourſe, that we never minded our way; ſo that being in a thick Wood full of ſeveral ways, we took a wrong one: and we minded it ſo little, that though we met with two women with baskets of fruit upon their heads, we never ſo much as enquired of them. Alas, ſaid Cyrus and interrupted her, I met thoſe women alſo, and what they told me was the reaſon why I took not that way which would have conducted me unto the Princeſs. But I beſeech you relate unto me quickly all that you know, that I may in all haſte go and repair my fault: I ſhall quickly end, Sir, ſaid Arianita, for Timonides and I perceiving we were out of the way, we doubled our pace back, hoping to overtake them; but we never could: Then this accident did happen unto me, for be pleaſed to know, riding along the Torrent, my horſe ſlipped, and threw me into it, ſo that being much hurt, Timonides was much troubled with me; and I know not what he could have done without the help of him who brought you hither. Ah Arianita, cryed Cyrus out, what will all you told me avail me, unleſs you will let me have that ſtone which made you inviſible, that I may make uſe of it, if ever I meet with Mandana: Alas, Sir, replied ſhe, one misfortune never comes alone, for be pleaſed to know, it fell into the River, when my horſe did throw me: and as for that of Timonides, he took it from his finger, when he came to help me out of the Torrent, and knew not where he laid it, ſo that both of them are loſt. As Cyrus was going to anſwer Arianita, a great noiſe of horſes was heard in the Court. He no ſooner heard it, but he went unto the window to ſee what made it, and ſaw it to be the Prince Artamas, and his retinue, who in his fruitleſs ſearch of Mandana, heard there was a Lady in that houſe, brought thither by one man, and therefore he came to ſee whether or no it was the Princeſs Mandana: When Artamas ſaw Cyrus out of the window, he hoped that it was indeed the Princeſs: he lighted haſtily from his horſe, and came unto the Chamber where he was, Feraulas following him: but his joys were preſently converted into deſpair; yet he ſaluted Arianita, of whom Feraulas enquired concerning Mandana and Marteſia, whilſt Cyrus, Artamas and Ligdamis adviſed upon the beſt expedients: but ſince haſte was the moſt neceſſary courſe that could be taken, they reſolved to ſeparate themſelves once more, and dividing the men which they had amongſt them to ſearch ſtill towards the Sea ſide: For truly, ſaid Cyrus, ſince Mandana hath two footmen with her, who are not inviſible, and ſince ſhe is when ſhe is not on her horſe, it is not impoſſible to get ſome intelligence of her: Cyrus would needs ſee Timonides, before he departed, and ſince Arianita had told him he had done many good offices for Mandana during her impriſonment, he received him not ill. Yet he was very urgent with him to confeſs whether he knew which way the King of Pontus his Maſter did take: and the ſooner to induce him unto it, without any perfidious treachery unto his Maſter, Cyrus told him, that he would engage his word to ſet that Crown which was taken from his Maſter, upon his head again, if by his means he could find out the Princeſs Mandana: But all his importunities and promiſes were ineffectual. So that Cyrus ſeeing he could draw no more out of him, he left him to Guard Arianita, when ſhe was in a condition to go unto Sardis, leaving Feraulas with him for a conductor: after which he took horſe, and parting from the Prince Artamas, he went in queſt of Mandana, though with leſs hopes than before fore he met with Arianita: But whilſt this great Prince was wandering through woods, and Mountains, and Plains; Mandana was in a moſt deſperate condition, eſpecially ſince Arinaita and Timonides were loſt, for ſhe knew the power ſhe had over that man, and what good offices he had done her in Sardis, and had the ſame hopes in him when ſhe was out: She had a great deſire to ſtay in that Meadow where Cyrus ſaw her, until Timonides and Arianita overtook them, and the King of Pontus could not hinder her for a while, becauſe Mandana leaped from her horſe, and Marteſia alſo, ſo that he was forced to conſent unto her: But ſince the Torrent was betwixt Arianita and Mandana, and this accident chancing, the King of Pontus his meſſenger could hear no news of her: ſo that he forced her to get up, and Marteſia alſo, juſt after Cyrus ſpied them; in the mean while, Mandana is forced to travel all night until break of day: and then the King of Pontus, finding a little private houſe, ſuffered her to reſt ſome hours; after which, he conſtrained her to take horſe again, asking her a million of pardons; for the pains he put her unto; and his ſorrow for being a cauſe of that exceſſive grief which he ſpied in her eyes when ſhe was from the Heliotrope, was as great as Mandana's: But his love having the predominancy over his virtue, his reaſon was not ſo clear as to be aſhamed of his crime, but he went on ſtill in a continual courſe of committing it: Therefore paſſing on with Pactias, and him who rid before Marteſia, and the two footmen which waited upon Mandana, he came the next day very late unto a little Port called Atarmes, where the Princeſs had time enough to reſt her ſelf all night: and where indeed ſhe did ſo, for her wearineſs did ſo ſtupifie her ſenſes, that ſhe ſlept with more tranquility, than one would have imagined her ſorrows would have permitted her. As for the King of Pontus, he being of an indefatigable conſtitution, and his paſſion being incompatible with ſleep, in lieu of thinking upon any reſt, his thoughts were all of guarding Mandana, and procuring a Ship: but ſince it was ſomething difficult to find one ready to depart, and more eaſie to find one in the morning, he ſtayed till then, when indeed he found one: ſo that Mandana was no ſooner awake, but he let her know by Marteſia, that ſhe muſt prepare for a departure; ſhe had a mind to make reſiſtance; but ſince he had lodged her upon the very Port, and not above ſix paces from the ſhip, ſhe thought her reſiſtance would be in vain, and the rather, becauſe he would not ſuffer either Marteſia or her to ſpeak with any in the houſe where ſhe lodged, denying leave to go into the Temple: So that all Mandana could do, was to protract her departure only one hour longer, finding out ſeveral pretences for it, though ſhe knew not to what end; for in her belief of Cyrus his love of Ariaminta, ſhe could not imagine he would follow her: yet ſhe made as many excuſes as if ſhe had expected ſome relief. As ſhe was in this condition, and as the King of Pontus was in a Chamber which joyned unto hers, talking with Pactias, ſhe eſpied out of her window, a man of moſt admirable Garb, and rich in clothes, walking by himſelf: ſhe looked ſtedfaſtly upon him, to the end that when he turned, ſhe might ſee if ſhe knew him, and whether he could relieve her: As ſhe had this thought, he turned towards her, and to teſtifie her wonder at the ſight, ſhe cryed out: yet preſently checking her ſelf, and not crediting her own eyes, becauſe he whom ſhe ſaw was at ſome diſtance, ſhe called Marteſia, and ſhewed her the cauſe of her admiration: Look Marteſia, ſaid ſhe unto her, look whether that be the perfidious Cyrus or no. Marteſia coming to the window, did perceive that Mandana had good reaſon for her thought, and that it was Cyrus: Well, Madam, ſaid Marteſia unto her, never ſay Cyrus is unfaithful, that will leave the Siege of Sardis to follow you: Ah my dear Marteſia, anſwered Mandana: I know not whether it be him or no, but I am ſure, I am exceeding afraid, leſt the King of Pontus ſhould either go out or come hither, leſt I ſhould be a ſpectator of ſome ſad accident: my greateſt fear is, ſaid ſhe, becauſe I ſee Cyrus by himſelf: certainly replied Marteſia, he has company in the next houſe, which he hides to prevent ſuſpicion: Did I not know, replied Mandana, that the Prince of Spitridates was Priſoner in Chalcedonia, I ſhould alter my opinion, but ſince I know he is, I cannot doubt: but he whom ſhe thought to be this great Prince, and who indeed was the Prince Spitridates, walked nearer her: Marteſia then adviſed her, to ſhew her ſelf, to the end, that if he were come to relieve her, he might bring out his men: Mandana without further arguing the matter, took the counſel of Marteſia: So that looking out of the window juſt as Spitridates was within ten paces of her, and Marteſia was ready to make a ſign unto him, this Prince, whoſe mind was taken up with many a ſad thought, ſeeing Ladies out of the window, and that he were obliged to ſalute them if he paſſed by, turned ſuddenly aſide the other way, ſeeming as if he had not ſeen them, though he was the moſt civil man upon earth, when he was not overwhelmed with ſorrows. In the mean time, Mandana ſeeing this, and thinking that this pretended Cyrus had ſeen her, and ſeemed as if he did not ſee her, ſhe was even ready to ſink down with ſorrow: Well Marteſia, ſaid ſhe unto Marteſia, whether or no is Cyrus innocent now? and whether I were not juſt if I ſhewed him unto the King of Pontus, that he might revenge my quarrel? However ungrateful and perfidious Prince that thou art, I cannot chuſe but tremble, that thy Rival ſhould be ſo near thee and not know it: yet, Madam, I beſeech you, ſaid Marteſia, what can it poſſibly be imagined, Cyrus ſhould do at Atarmes, if he did not follow you? For my part I am confident that he waits as you do for the hour that you are to imbarque, that he may then call out his men and redeem you out of the power of the King of Pontus: We will ſee that preſently (ſaid ſhe with as much anger as haſte) and indeed Marteſia uſed her beſt perſwaſions to have a little patience, and to conſider upon it: but her ſpirits were ſo incenſed, that ſhe went immediately and told the King of Pontus ſhe was ready to depart: Yet ſhe had no ſooner told him, but ſhe repented, but it was too late. In the mean time, the Ship being ready, the King of Pontus never thought of a way how to get Mandana to take a Heliotrope, but giving them all unto one of his men to carry, he followed the Princeſs, whom Pactias did lead, becauſe ſhe would not ſuffer her Raviſher to have that honour. But when ſhe was ready to go out of the houſe, and imagined that perhaps Cyrus and the King of Pontus would fight in her preſence, ſhe could hardly find a heart to walk: Yet at laſt, thinking that if Cyrus were there to releaſe her, he would bring men enough for it, and if he did not, that he was worthy of puniſhment, ſhe went forward: ſhe had no ſooner gone three paces but ſhe thought ſhe ſaw Cyrus, who was ſo far from intereſting himſelf in the quarrel, that he ſlightly turned aſide, and ſhunned meeting with her: this ſecond adventure did ſo ſurpriſe her, that ſhe was not able to retain her reſentments, but cryed out with as much anger as ſorrow; Oh thou perfidious man, canſt thou ſee me carried away before thy eyes, and not reſcue me? Theſe ſharp words reaching the ears of Spitridates, he turned his head to ſee who pronounced them, and whether ſhe addreſſed them unto himſelf, and turned juſt as the King of Pontus turned: So that thinking he had ſeen Cyrus as well as ſhe, fearing he followed with much company, and remembring how he owed both his life, and liberty unto that Prince, he took Mandana's hand by force, and Pactias aſſiſting him, put her haſtily into the Ship with Martesia, and the man he brought with him; and without ſtaying for the two footmen, who waited upon Mandana, he lanced forth immediately, and left them with the horſes at Atarmes: In the mean time, ſince Spitridates conceived that Mandana's words were addreſſed unto him, and who thought that he had ſeen the King of Pontus his face, though at firſt he took him not for the Princeſs Araminta's brother, he came to the water ſide, and called unto ſome Marriners in the Port to carry him into the Ship which newly lanced out, and that they would help him to relieve a Lady who was carryed away in it, conceiving that in honour he ought not to ſuffer this violence to be done unto her, though he knew her not: But call, and cry, and make what promiſes he would, they would not hazard themſelves againſt thoſe they knew not: So that ſeeing he could not prevail with them, he ſet himſelf to look upon thoſe that were in the Boat, who by that time were ſo far off in the River, that he could receive no ſatisfaction, for he knew not Mandana; and the King of Pontus his back was towards him, who ſpoke unto the Mariners to make all the haſt they could. But Spitridates obſerving that there were two men who came unto the Ship, and were too late to get in, who afterwards went into the houſe over againſt the Port, he ſent a ſervant thither, who came to tell him, there came a man unto the place where he lodged, who ſaid that Sardis was taken; But theſe two men fearing they ſhould follow the King of Pontus, would not tell who he was unto the ſervant of Spitridates, who returned to his Maſter and told him that he could get nothing out of thoſe two men: but aſſured him, that thoſe who were ſhipped away, were perſons of good quality, as may be conjectured by their horſes which they left behind them: Spitridates being fuller of curioſity than before, ſeeing he had loſt the ſight of the Ship, went himſelf to talk with theſe two men: but he no ſooner ſaw them, than he knew one of them to be a man who was heretofore in the King of Pontus his ſervice when he was at Heraclea, before Arſamenes revolted: He no ſooner ſaw him, but the Idea of the King of Pontus came into his fancy, and he made no queſtion but it was he, ſo that calling him by his name, the man knew him alſo, and they freſhly renewed their old acquaintance: So that he could not deny but that he who was imbarqued, was the King of Pontus, his Maſter, and that he having carried away the Princeſs Mandana from Sardis, came to imbarque at this Port. Spitridates no ſooner heard this, but he fell into an exceſſive grief: for knowing that he did ſo very much reſemble Cyrus, that his own Mother took that Prince for him in Bythinia, he made no doubt but Mandana was in the ſame errour, and that the infidelity which ſhe upbraided him withall, thinking him to be Cyrus, was grounded upon the infidelity of Araminta. So that entering into a new deſpair and jealouſie, he altered his intentions of ſtaying at Atarmes, waiting of the ſucceſs in the Siege of Sardis, and reſolved to go and carve out his own Revenge upon that Prince whom he thought to be his Rival, and to go and chide the Princeſs of Pontus for her infidelity: Is it ſo, (ſaid he unto himſelf) that Araminta hath forſaken me, and follows the favourite of Fortune? However, unjuſt Princeſs, I have done all that was poſſible to teſtifie my love of you: I have voluntarily forſaken Crowns for your ſake: I have renounced all my ambition, I have ſtifled all thoughts of revenge upon an uſurping Prince, only becauſe he had a near relation unto you: I have diſobeyed the commands of the King my Father; I have ſuffered the rigour of a long impriſonment, I have wandered like an unknown vagrant throughout the world, only to obſerve your will: there is nothing which I have left undone, that was within the compaſs of poſſibility, to pleaſe you: yet the Conqueror of Aſia hath got a greater ſhare in your heart than I have; his glory charms you, and dazzles your eyes: and queſtionleſs you may imploy all your Arts to make him as perfidious as your ſelf. But what likelyhood is there, (added this incenſed Prince) that Cyrus, who hath expreſſed ſuch high teſtimonies of a conſtant paſſion unto Mandana; who hath gained ſo many battels; taken ſo many Towns, and put all Aſia in arms for her deliverance, ſhould after all this become inconſtant, if you had not cunningly imployed all your charms, to ſupplant a Princeſs, whom he had ſo long loved? Doubtleſs you think, unjuſt Princeſs, that I am ſtill in Priſon, and that nothing can interrupt your joys: perhaps you hold intelligence with the King your brother, which hath raviſhed away Mandana, leſt that Prince ſhould ſhake off your fetters, and aſſume hers: Doubtleſs, you hope that Cyrus will reconquer the Kingdom of Pontus for your brother: and that if you give me my liberty, it is more than you ought to do. But thanks be unto the Heavens, I am not your debtor for it, but ſhall perhaps be in ſuch a condition as ſhall revenge Mandana for the infidelity of Cyrus, and to puniſh you in his perſon for infidelity to me: As Spitridates was entertaining himſelf with theſe thoughts, the taking of Sardis was confirmed by divers reports: So that having nothing to do any longer at Atarnes, he took horſe, and reſolved rather to ruine himſelf, than not him who took the heart of Araminta from him: However (ſaid he unto himſelf) Araminta can diſſemble her inconſtancy no longer, for ſince Sardis is taken, and Mandana carried away: if I find Cyrus courting her without any care of Mandana, or thoughts of following her; there is no colour or excuſe for them: I know very well, that to fall upon the great Conqueror of Aſia, will be a moſt dangerous attempt, but ſince I hope for death not victory, what need I fear? After this, Spitridates plunged himſelf ſo deep in his own thoughts, that he himſelf knew not what he thought: and thus he went on till towards the evening; and then deſiring to ſeek out a lodging in a village which he ſaw on his right hand, he ſpied a party of twenty horſe, who coming out of a little Wood, croſſed his way, and one of them came to him: Spitridates then, rouſing himſelf out of his contemplation, went to meet him, but he was exceedingly aſtoniſhed, when he ſaw him to be Cyrus, ſince it was impoſſible any other in the world ſhould ſo much reſemble himſelf: Cyrus (for it was he) was as much amazed on the other ſide, making no queſtion but it was Spitridates, thinking no man upon earth elſe could ſo much reſemble himſelf: The aſtoniſhment of both theſe Princes was ſo great, that they ſtopped their horſes ſome three or four paces off each other: during which time, the whole Troop came up, and all of them were as much ſurpriſed to ſee Spitridates, as Spitridates, and Cyrus were to ſee each other: Spitridates, had a mixture of joy amongſt his wonder, to ſee Cyrus in a place where in all probability he was in queſt of Mandana: and Cyrus amidſt his miſery was glad he was in condition to cure ſo great a Prince of ſo unjuſt a jealouſie as he knew had infected his ſoul: Alſo he was the forwarder to ſpeak not only to eaſe Spitridates of his tormenting paſſion, but alſo to ask whether he knew any thing concerning Mandana. Yet ſince he would not wholly truſt unto this prodigious reſemblance; Generous ſtranger, (ſaid he unto him, after a long pauſe of looking upon him) if you be the ſame which my eyes make me believe you are, I have very joyful news to tell you: and I wiſh unto the gods, that in recompence of it, you could tell me as good concerning Mandana whom I am in queſt of, and whom perhaps you met. Spitridates hearing Cyrus ſpeak in this manner, his ſoul was fuller of joy, than he was able to expreſs: for now he knew not whether he ſhould look upon Cyrus as his Rival, or as the protector of Araminta; but at laſt, calming the tumultuous turbulency of thoughts, and deſiring clearer ſatisfaction of all his doubts: Sir, (ſaid he unto Cyrus) you need not doubt, but that I am the unfortunate Spitridates, who, for ſome reaſons which now I ſhall forbear to tell you, is come into Lydia, to find out the end either of my days or of my miſeries: But in coming thither, as ſtaying at the Port of Atarmes which is a days journey from hence; it was my fortune to ſee a thing which I cannot chuſe but wiſh earneſtly, that it may trouble you; to the end you may make me as full of joy as you have done of hope: For truly, Sir, it was my fortune to ſee the King of Pontus carry away the Princeſs Mandana, but I was not able to help it, or know it, till after they were embarqued. How (ſaid Cyrus, with ſo much ſadneſs as pleaſed Spitridates) did you ſee Mandana embarque? And cannot I follow? However, for heavens ſake, tell me which way the unjuſt Raviſher carried her from me.

Spitridates then ſeeing all the ſymptoms of a real ſorrow in the face of Cyrus, was ſo well pleaſed with it, that ceaſing to hate him, and beginning to hope that Araminta was conſtant, he told him all he knew concerning Mandana, and with all aggravations poſſible, for he could not chuſe but rejoyce at the deſpair of Cyrus, becauſe the more he ſaw him troubled, the more he believed Araminta was faithful: and the exceſſive ſorrow of Cyrus did ſo perfectly undeceive him, that he began to intereſt himſelf in the ſame ſorrow which procured his joy. As they were thus talking, the Prince Mazares came unto that place with his Troop, where Cyrus acquainted him with all he underſtood from Spitridates, the ſight of whom did much ſurpriſe him: Cyrus then obliged them to ſalute each other, after which adviſing upon the beſt courſe, they were extreamly perplexed; for Cyrus could not go unto Atarmes, becauſe it was not yet brought into ſubjection, and where a guard was kept, without a hazard of being arreſted, and diſabled from ſerving Mandana; nor did he know which way to ſeek her, ſince he knew not which way ſhe was carried.

The reſult of their conſultation was, to ſend unto all the Sea-ports, to ſee if they could hear any thing of her: Cyrus then went unto the next houſe to write, where in one hour he ſent diſpatches unto Epheſus, Milete, Gnides, Cuma, and all other Ports on that Coaſt, with orders to make ſtrict enquiry, and to entreat Thraſibulus and Euphranor, Father of Alcionida, to ſend out Ships to Sea, and to give intelligence unto Sardis of all their adventures: for ſince this Town was almoſt at an equal diſtance from all theſe places, his beſt courſe was to go thither, that he might ſo order his Troops as they might in an hours warning be ready to march where he ſhould hear the King of Pontus was: After which, and before he took Horſe, he took Spitridates aſide, and told him with as much generoſity as ſincerity of his unjuſt jealouſie, ſo that this Prince being aſhamed of his weakneſs, and unjuſt hatred of him, did now give him ſuch plauſible language, as ſpoke him not unworthy of his friendſhip: Cyrus to ſettle his mind in tranquility, offered him never to ſee the Princeſs Araminta again, though he had a moſt high eſteem of her: But ſince the extraordinary ſorrows of Cyrus had entirely cured Spitridates of his jealouſie, he anſwered with as much generoſity as ſpirit; and theſe two great Princes began to contract as great a league of friendſhip, as there was a reſemblance in their faces. After this they took Horſe and went towards Sardis, unto which he could not come until the next day at noon, becauſe they were forced to reſt themſelves four or five hours at a little Town in the way. In their return they met with the Prince Artamas: Cyrus alſo met with thoſe whom he ſent into the Woods, ſo that all theſe Princes being met again, they came to the Gates of Sardis, where they were received with loud acclamations of joy: But at his entrance he met with Hidaſpes, who came haſtily to him; Sir, ſaid he unto him, in a low voice, you come in a happy hour to calm a great diſorder which is in the Town; for be pleaſed to know, ever ſince your departure, the King of Aſſyria, having made a ſtrict ſearch in all the Houſes of the Town to no purpoſe, he is faln into ſuch a fury, eſpecially ſince he miſſed you, that he is almoſt out of his wits: But the worſt of all is, that by a hundred ſlight conjectures, he thinks Crœſſus knows where Mandana is; ſo that this violent Prince having tried all ways of mildneſs to make this King confeſs that which perhaps he knows not, hath added menaces, and is reſolved to ſeem as if he would put him to death, and make him diſcover out of fear that which he deſires to know. Oh Heavens, ſaid Cyrus, is it poſſible ſo great a Prince ſhould be culpable of ſo great a crime? Yes, Sir, replied Hidaſpes, and the people are ſo incenſed, that to prevent any Sedition, I am come unto this Gate to ſee whether the Guards be ſtrong, and all the Officers there; for juſt now I believe Crœſſus is upon the Scaffold, the Princeſs Palmis all in tears; the Prince Myrſiles lamenting, and all the Inhabitants of Sardis in a general revolt. Cyrus no ſooner heard this, but riding immediately unto the great Plain which i[illegible]tween the Palace of Crœſſus and the C[illegible]del, where Hidaſpes told him this ſad ſpectacle might be ſeen, he came with ſuch haſte, as made it apparent that he blamed the King of Aſſyria's violence; when he firſt came upon the Plain, he ſaw all the Plain full of Souldiers in their Arms, and people crying; in the midſt of which was a Scaffold erected, and a Stake unto which Crœſſus was tied, and Faggots round about him ready to be kindled, many Aſſyrian Souldiers holding lighted Torches in their hands ready to ſet them on fire, if he would not tell where Mandana was. Cyrus beholding ſo ſad an object, was ſtruck with ſo much horrour to ſee a man of that quality in ſuch a pitiful condition, he made his way through the crowd, and came unto the Scaffold juſt as the King of Aſſyria, the more to terrifie Crœſus, had put fire unto a Faggot, which began to kindle, and juſt as that unfortunate King, remembring the ſaying of Solon, That none was happy before his death, began to cry out, Oh Solon, Solon, how true is thy Speech? Cyrus then coming to the Scaffold which the fire began to burn, and hearing theſe words, commanded the fire to be quenched, that Crœſus ſhould be untyed, and carried back unto his Palace, turning towards the King of Aſſyria, who was preſent, to check him for his violence, and told him he was certain that Crœſus did not know where Mandana was. As ſoon as Cyrus had given this command, the People [illegible] Souldiers did make the air eccho with their acclamations, every one being forward to quench the fire, ſome to pull away faggots, others to fetch water; but there was no need of it; for as if the Heavens had been obedient unto the command of Cyrus, it rained upon a ſudden ſo abundantly, that the fire was immediately extinguiſhed. After which Crœſus coming down from the Scaffold, Cyrus made a thouſand excuſes for the injury done him, and went with him as far as his Palace, to give him all the conſolation he could. As for Cyrus he went to lodge in the Cittadel, and the King of Aſſyria followed him, whom he did extreamly chide for his violent proceedings, and then he related unto him all he knew concerning Mandana. Mazares, Artamas, and Spitridates followed him; ſo did Seſoſtris, Tigranes, and Anaxaris, who having an extream deſire to know the ſucceſs of his voyage, did accompany him unto the Chamber which was prepared for him, that they might know whether they ſhould rejoice or grieve with him; alſo to know who Spitridates was, whoſe extream reſemblance with Cyrus, begat a great curioſity in all that ſaw him.

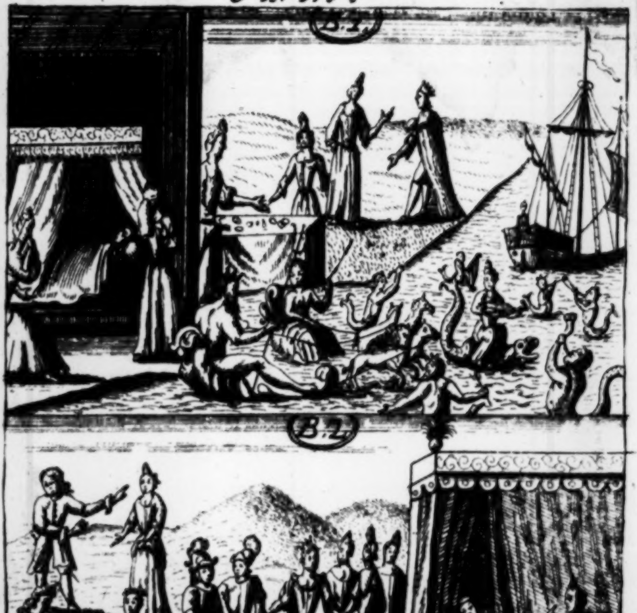
Part. I.



ARTAMENES, OR THE GRAND CYRUS.

PART VII. Book I.

IT was not Seſoſtris, Tygranes, and Anaxaris alone, who were full of curioſity to underſtand who Spitridates was, and who were deſirous to know the ſucceſs of Cyrus his voyage, for that Illuſtrious Conquerour was in a moment inviron'd with a croud of Princes, Captains, and men of Quality, who did moſt feelingly intereſt themſelves in all that concerned him, inſomuch, as for a while he was forced to ſmother his ſorrows, purpoſely to aſſure them, that theirs for him did oblige him, and that he would not be ungrateful unto them for it. But whil'ſt he was expreſſing his acknowledgment unto theſe illuſtrious perſons, Tegeus came to preſent him moſt hearty thanks from the Princeſs Palmis, for quenching thoſe flames which were ready to devour the King her Father. The Prince Myrſiles ſent alſo to the ſame end, and Cyrus had ſo many complements both to pay and receive, that he had but a very little time of liberty to enjoy his own thoughts; handſomneſs alſo required that he ſhould dine in publique. In the mean time, the Prince Artamas went to viſit the Princeſs Palmis, and to aſſure her, that he would imploy the very uttermoſt of his credir with Cyrus to move him unto a well treating of the King her Father: He ſaw alſo the Prince Myrſiles, and was extreamly joyed to find him able to return an Anſwer: As for Crœſſus, he durſt not attempt to viſit him, but reſolved to ſtay, and ſee whether Cyrus would preſent him: In the interim,the King of Phrygia and Hircania hearing of Cyrus his return, came to the Camp at Sardis, to acquaint him with two things which could not be pleaſing unto him: The firſt, That all the parties which they had ſent out in queſt of Mandana, could meet with no intelligence of her: And the ſecond, that the taking of Sardis had more weakned his Army, than either the laſt battel, or the ſiege of that Town had done; for ſince Plunder was not reſtrained, thoſe who had inriched themſelves had disbanded themſelves during his abſence, ſome carrying away what they had got, and others ſelling off their ſhares, that they might more eaſily ſlink away. This news did exceedingly grieve Cyrus, but to prevent any further diſorder, and to keep thoſe which remained within the compaſs of their duty, he cauſed more to be given unto them than he had promiſed at the beginning of the Siege, and ſeverely puniſhed ſome of them which fled, and were taken again: But his Army was yet ſo numerous, that if his Love of Mandana had not been in a moſt ſuperlative degree, he would not have apprehended it too weak to aſſault and take all the places which the King of Pontus could chooſe for a Sanctuary. But ſince it is the nature of that paſſion to think no obſtacle ſmall, though really they be ſo; Cyrus apprehended this accident, as if it were much more conſiderable than indeed it was, yet was he very circumſpect to perceive, that Phraartes appeared not amongſt all thoſe who came to viſit him upon his return, and his thought alſo was to give Spitridates ſpeedy ſatisfaction in ſeeing the Princeſs Araminta: Then he began to inquire where Phraartes was, but none could give any direct accompt of him where he was; all that any knew was, as ſoon as Cyrus departed, Phraartes vaniſhed alſo.

Cyrus knowing his affection to the Princeſs of Pontus, made no doubt but that he was gone to viſit her, and knowing him to be of a haſty and violent temper, his fear was, leſt ſome diſaſtrous chance ſhould fall out, if Spitridates went by himſelf to ſee that Princeſs; therefore he prevailed ſo far with Spitridates, as notwithſtanding his impatience to ſtay until the next day, before he went unto the place where his longing deſires called him; Cyrus moſt obligingly telling him, that ſince he was cured of his jealouſie, he would wait upon him to the Princeſs Araminta, but could not poſſibly that day, by reaſon of divers orders of grand importance, which he was to give out: Since the Term was but ſhort, Spitridates conſented unto the deſires of Cyrus, who in the mean time ſent unto the Caſtle where he left Araminta, to ſee whether Phraartes was there, and to command his return unto Sardis: After which, this Prince, after he had given all requiſite orders for the tranquility of the Town, for the incampment of his Army, and for the Guard of Crœſſus, he went to viſit the Princeſs Palmis, and the Princeſs Timaretta, to crave their pardon for his abrupt departure, and leaving them when he went out of the Cittadel without any tenders of civility, beſeeching them to accept his excuſe, that ſince he was buſied about the liberty of the Princeſs Mandana, it had been a grand crime in him if he had ſtayed a little longer with them, after he underſtood the King of Pontus had carried her away. Theſe two Princeſſes being both of them ſenſible of their obligements unto Cyrus, Palmis in reſpect of Crœſſus and Artamas, Timaretta alſo in reſpect of Seſoſtris and her ſelf, they returned unto him as many thanks, as he made excuſes unto them: They were obliged alſo unto it by the freſh favours which he did them, for he told the Princeſs Palmis, that he would carry the Prince Artamas unto Crœſſus, and that way put him in remembrance of his obligations unto Cleander; afterwards he told the Princeſs Timaretta, that as ſoon as he had taken convenient order for the handſomneſs of her voyage, and for the magnificency of her Train and Equipage, ſhe ſhould when ſhe pleaſed return into Ægypt, under the conduct of Seſoſtris, upon condition notwithſtanding that ſhe would honour him with her promiſe, to make that renowned Prince as happy as he deſerved to be.

Theſe two great Princeſſes having anſwered Cyrus as civilly as generoſity obliged them, he left them to viſit Crœſſus, to the end he might ask his pardon for the King of Aſſyria's violences, to condole with him his miſery, and to preſent the Prince Artamas unto him, knowing well that the King of Phrygia would conſent unto this reconciliation: But in going thither, Hidaſpes, who had the guard of theſe Princes, and of all the Caſtle, cauſed them to paſs through the ſtately Chamber wherein all the Treaſures of Crœſſus did lie. The ſight of ſuch a maſs of riches, and ſo many gliſtering things, had not brought him out of that profound ſtudy into which the taking away of Mandana had put him, if Tigranes, Anaxaris, and Chriſantes, who followed him as well as the Prince Artamas, had not expreſſed their wonder and aſtoniſhment by the cries which they could not reſtrain, notwithſtanding thoſe reſpects which they were always wont to obſerve unto that Heroique Conquerour: Yet notwithſtanding their admiring noiſe had not invited Cyrus unto any conſideration of ſo many glorious ſights, if Chriſantes who was loath to paſs ſo ſoon out of ſo fair a place, had not by his words awakened him: Look Sir, at leaſt, I beſeech you (ſaid he, and ſmiled) upon that you have conquered; and be confident, that ſince Fortune has ſo far ſmiled upon you, as to make you Maſter of all theſe Treaſures, it is impoſſible ſhe ſhould frown ſo much as to let you loſe the Princeſs Mandana: Therefore, Sir, you may very well look upon them as moſt certain pledges of your future good fortune: I ſhall look upon them ſo (replied Cyrus) when Ciaxares gives me leave to recompence the valour of ſo many brave men, who hath aided me as you have done to conquer them, or when he has permitted me to reſtore them unto the unfortunate Crœſſus, in the conſideration of the Prince Artamas: But ſince that is not yet, it is ſufficient I appoint Hidaſpes to have a care of them; and indeed Cyrus had not ſtayed a minute longer in conſideration of all that magnificence, if he had not obſerved that Tigranes had an earneſt deſire to ſtay longer: So that being unwilling to oppoſe his curioſity, he walked ſoftly through three great Chambers, and two Galleries, which paſſed from one into another, and which were all filled with moſt rare and precious things: All placed in ſuch an order, and by ſo much Art, that one might every where obſerve a regular confuſion, and pleaſant diſorder, which the luſtre of the magnificent Cabinets did make; all which did fill the imagination of beholders with abundance of pleaſing conceipts, and forced their minds and ſpirits into admiration; and certainly not without good cauſe, and Cyrus as diſintereſted as he was, and though full of ſorrow and paſſion, yet in the end honored with his obſervance, this prodigious heap of riches which Crœſſus had ſo dearly doted upon, and which Solon ſo little eſteemed, that they purchaſed his averſion: Never was ſeen together ſo much ſilver, ſo much gold, ſo many precious ſtones, nor ſo many rarities, as there were in thoſe three Chambers and two Gallеries: The Grandure of the Diſhes and Veſſels were prodigies, the Statues of the ſame mettle were innumerable, and in beauty incomparable; but amongſt all theſe ſeveral figures of gold, there was one of Marble ſo admirable, that it invited Cyrus to ſtay, and a long time to admire it above the reſt, though the material of it was not ſo precious as many others; if it was faſhioned with ſo much art, and repreſented ſo fair a perſon, as it is no wonder, if it charmed the eyes of a Prince, whoſe judgment was moſt delicate, and who was exquiſitely able to judg of all beauties. This Statue was of a natural and ordinary grandeur, ſtanding upon a Pedeſtal of gold, between Pillars on four ſides, of an admirable beauty, to each of them were Captives chained of all ſorts and conditions, but they were inchained by little Cupids, ſo rare and admirably wrought, as eye never ſaw better. The figure repreſented a Woman of about eighteen years of age, of a moſt ſuperlative, ſurprizing, and exact beauty, all the features of her face were wonderfully fair, her ſtature ſo noble and handſome, that nothing could be more alluring, her dreſs was ſo courtly and extraordinary, that it was equally after the mode of the Tyrian Ladies, after the faſhion of the Nymphs, and after that faſhion in which the Goddeſſes are dreſſed, but particularly the Goddeſs of Victory, as the Athenians deck her, that is without wings, and only with a Coronet of Lawrel upon he head: This Statue was placed upon its Baſis, with ſuc a ſprightly action, as it ſeemed to be animated: Th face, the neck, the arms, the hands were of white Marble, as well as the thighs and feet; whereof one par only was to be ſeen through the lacing of her buskins, becauſe ſhe did with her left hand a little hold up her Mantle, that ſhe might, as if it were, the more eaſily walk holding in her right hand the skirt of her Vail, whicl deſcended from the hinder part of her head, under th Coronet of Laurel, as if ſhe would prevent the Win from whiſling it too much. All the garniſhings of thi figure were cut in Marble and Jaſper of various-colours The garment of this fair Phenician, which was lapped i a thouſand pleaſing folds was of Jaſper, whoſe colour wa ſo lively, that it reſembled the Tirian purple. A Scar which was negligently thrown about her neck, and reached her ſhoulders; was of a kind of Marble, mingled blew and white, which infinitely pleaſed the eye: The Vail o this figure was of the ſame piece, but carved with ſo much art, that it ſeemed to be as ſoft and pliant as a peice o Tiffiny: The Coronet of Laurel was of green Jaſper, and the Buskins were of enamel'd Marble, but the rareſt piece of admirable art was, there was a kind Ayr and Spirit in this figure, which did inanimate it, and which perſwaded all beholders that it was ready to walk and ſpeak: One might perceive a ſprightly Phiſiognomy, and a certain kind of fierceneſs in her action, as let all beholders know, that ſhe whom it repreſented had a fierce ſoul, this figure looking with ſcorn upon the Captives which were inchained at her feet. Moreover, the Carver had ſo exactly imitated the freſhneſs and plumpneſs of young fair ones, that one might know the age of her whom he repreſented by that Statue. This figure being thus admirable, it was not without reaſon that the illuſtrious Cyrus was ſo curious as to ask the Prince Artamas, whether it was not the work of Dipœnus, or of Scillis, who were the two moſt curious Carvers that were then in the world, imagining notwithſtanding, that this Statue was more than the bare effects of a fine phancy: But the Prince Artamas, after he had told him, that it was indeed the work of one of thoſe Carvers whereof he ſpoke, who were of the Iſle of Crete; he told him further, that it was made in repreſentation of a Lady of Quality in Tyre, with whom the late King of Phenicia was in Love, and who was reported to be one of the faireſt perſons of the World, much fairer than her Statue: This being ſo (ſaid Cyrus) Why did not that amorous King keep this figure? Becauſe as I have heard ſay (replied Artamas) this Statue was not finiſhed when that King died; and as doubtleſs, you know Sir, ſince you have been in Greece Dipœnus and Scillis did leave four images imperfect, which they began in Peloponneſis, to wit, of Apollo, of Diana, of Hercules, and of Minerva, becauſe there was not ready payment made of what was promiſed unto them; ſo you may eaſily conceive, that the King of Phenicia being dead, and the Prince his Son who ſucceeded him, having buſineſs of more importance upon him, then to give them what the King his Father had promiſed; Dipœnus and Scillis were no more patient with him, then they were in Greece; for after one demand of their wages, perceiving there was ſome reſpite of time required for the payment, they imbarqued in the night, and carried their work with them. And Cræſſus then having a repute to collect all the rarities in all Aſia, they addreſſed themſelves to him, and ſold this Statue unto him: 'Tis true, the report is, that a little after the War, the young King of Phenicia ſent to demand it of Cræſſus, offering the double of what is coſt, but he would not part with it: This adventure, replied Cyrus, is doubtleſs worthy the beauty of this Statue which cauſed it. After this, he looked upon the miraculous quantity of Arms belonging to all Nations in the world, Arms of pure gold ſet with precious ſtones: He alſo admired the Thrones of maſſy gold; the figures of all the Gods which were adored throughout all Aſia, whoſe price of the bare materials only were worth more then is imaginable: He ſaw alſo in that place, Tables, Mirrons, and Cabinets of an ineſtimable price: All the Tables which were ſet round thoſe Chambers and Galleries, were filled with a million of moſt rare and rich things, Pearls, Rubies, Emeralds, Diamonds, and ſuch things, made ſuch a glorious and precious miſcellany, that no diapared Meadow in its glory of the Spring could make a more pleaſant object, than the variety of precious things did which lay upon thoſe Tables : In the midſt of theſe magnificent varieties, the ingenuous Fables which Æſop compoſed at Sardis were ſhewed unto Cyrus, in which he had writ, and with ſuch art couched all the hiſtory of Cræſſus his Court, and which this Prince ſo eſteemed, that when Æſope departed out of Lidia, he would needs have him give them unto him : And to teſtifie how much he eſteemed them, he cauſed them to be richly bound with thoſe which he had before compoſed, which taught moſt excellent Morals unto thoſe who underſtood well the language of Beaſts, whom he made to ſpake ; Indeed the book was covered with enamelled gold, and ſo ſet with Diamonds, as turn it which way one pleaſed, the name of Æſope appeared ; the Claſps were as rich, and ſuitable to the reſt ; and Cræſſus did not more honour unto Homer, or any of the books of the Sibels, ſo famous throughout all Aſia, then he did unto Æſope, ſince he thought his works worthy to be amongſt his Treaſures, which he prized at a higher rate than all things in the world beſides. After a ſerious contemplation of this world, of riches, and with aſtoniſhment beheld the vaſt number of huge goblets of gold and ſilver. After, I ſay, he thad reflected upon the misfortune of the Prince who loſt them, and ſo paſſionately loved them, Cyrus went out of this place of riches, unto the Chamber of miſerable Cræſſus, with whom was the Prince Myrſiles : This old King, and this young Prince, received Cyrus with all civility due unto a Conquerour, yet without any baſe dejection of Spirit : As there appeared a ſorrow in their eyes, ſo alſo there appeared a conſtancy in their ſouls, and Cyrus ſeeing with what reſoluteneſs they endured ſo great a miſery, ſaid aloud, That they deſerved to wear all their lives that Scepter which they had loſt, and that it ſhould not be his fault, if Cyaxares did not reſtore it unto them : And indeed, this generous Prince did ſo behave himſelf towards Cræſſus, and his ſon, in ſuch an obliging manner, that it may be ſaid he made a moſt abſolute conqueſt of them, and gained their hearts by his civility, lity, as well as conquered their Kingdoms by his valour. As ſoon as Cyrus entred into the Chamber where they were, they advanced towards him: But this generous minded Prince,making haſte to meet them,received them with as much civility, as if it were in time of peace, or as if their preſent fortune were equal: I could never have believed (ſaid Crœſſus to his illuſtrious Conquerour) that I ſhould ever have thought my ſelf able to give thanks unto a Prince who conquered my Crown: Yet Sir, ſince I owe my life unto you,and ſince the ſame hand which pull'd me from my Throne, pull'd me alſo from the Scaffold which the King of Aſſyria's violence cauſed me to aſcend , I think it rather my duty to commend you, than to complain of my misfortune: But Sir, ſince the life which you have preſerved, can neither be glorious nor pleaſing unto me, let it ſuffice I only commend you without giving you thanks, and that I acknowledge you to be worthy of that glory which you poſſeſs : I do not deſire you ſhould thank me, replied Cyrus, nor do I fully conſent you ſhould commend me ; but I cannot indure that you ſhould hold ſo bad an opinion of the Median King , as to deſpair of your being in a more happy condition than you are , eſpecially conſidering, that this Prince (added he, and preſented Artamas unto him) is my moſt dear friend , and conſidering that I have almoſt as much credit with Cyaxares, as Artamas hath with Cyrus. The King of Lydia, who had after the taking of Sardis, more than once repented himſelf of the injuſtice which he had done the Prince Artamas, did receive him very civilly, yet with much ſhame, it not being poſſible he ſhould ſee him, and not remember the obligements wherein he was bound , when he carried the name of Cleander , and the unjuſt impriſonment which he cauſed him to ſuffer , after he was known to be the Prince Artamas ; yet notwithſtanding, as he was reſolved to acknowledge unto Cyrus, that he did not deſerve his misfortune, he did check himſelf, and ſaid, ſince Conquerours may impoſe what Laws they pleaſe upon the Conquered, I will believe what you pleaſe , and beſeech the Prince Artamas to bury all my violences and injuries in Oblivion: It becomes me, replied the Prince of Phrygia, to forget all the miſeries of Arta-

Artamas, but it becomes me alſo never to forget the obligations wherein Cleander ſtands bound unto you; therefore Sir, I do promiſe you, to be unto you as long as I live the very ſame I was when you honoured me with your friendſhip: I beſeech you Sir (ſaid Cyrus, and interrupted him, ſpeaking to the King of Lydia) renew that old friendſhip with a Prince, who by many ſervices and much fidelity hath deſerved it: The friendſhip of a King without a Kingdom (replied Crœſſus, and ſighed) ought not to be twice asked, by my moſt illuſtrious Conquerour; therefore Sir, I conſent unto all you deſire of me, and re-admit the Prince Artamas into the ſame place which formerly he poſſeſſed in my ſoul, being extreamly ſorry that I have not in me a power whereby to recompence his virtue: When I have intreated the King of Medes, replied Cyrus, to recompence your own, I ſhall let you know, that you have power enough to remenerate his, and I wiſh unto the Heavens you had prevented your misfortune at the beginning of the War, by giving him the Princeſs Palmis, and reſtoring me the Princeſs Mandana: But, I beſeech you, added Cyrus, Give me leave to ask you, (if I may do it without exaſperating your ſorrows) by what motives and policy were you ingaged in this unjuſt War? And what was the true reaſon which moved you to ſlight the King of Medes and my friendſhip? No reaſon (replied Crœſſus ſadly) but your good fortune and my bad: For truly Sir, it doth moſt clearly appear, that the Gods would never have permitted me to protect the Raviſher of Mandana, but only to make you a Conquerour of my Kingdom: Never believe Sir that you can loſe this Princeſs; and to manifeſt it unto you, conſider, that every carrying her away hath gained you a Kingdom; and be aſſured, that it is to make you Conquerour of all Aſia, the Gods have ſuffered ſhe ſhould wander from Province to Province: But oh you unjuſt Gods. (cried he out) Why have you deluded me by Oracles ſo clear in appearances and ſo obſcure in reality? Cyrus perceiving that without any deſign he had incenſed the ſorrows of Crœſſus, to comfort him, would hearken to his complaints, and dive into his thoughts; therefore he deſired him to give a reaſon why he accuſed the Gods? I accuſe them Sir (ſaid he) for adadvertiſing me by their Oracles of all the leaſt conſiderable paſſages of my Life, and deceiving me in the moſt important buſineſs that ever I conſulted with them about: When I beſeeched them to tell me the iſſue of the War againſt you, they anſwered in theſe very Terms,

If thou unto this War will go,
An Empire Great thou'lt overthrow.

Is it juſt Sir (ſaid this grieved Prince) that after ſo many offerings unto them, they ſhould ſo far delude me, as to make me believe I ſhould deſtroy them, who have deſtroyed me? Therefore Sir, I beſeech you permit me amidſt the tranſport of my ſorrows, to ſend unto Delphos, to the end it may be a Teſtimony unto all poſterity, that it is dangerous to be curious in future matters, and that men ought not to pry too narrowly into the ſecrets of the Gods; for though I do accuſe them of injuſtice, yet my ſecond thoughts are more reaſonable than my firſt, and that it is my ſelf who am injuſt in complaining of them; whereas in very truth, I ought only to complain againſt my ſelf: For indeed the Gods are juſt, and ſaid truly, ſince in overthrowing my own Empire, I have overthrown one of the greateſt in all Aſia: However (replied Cyrus, and interrupted him) I will do my utmoſt that you may have cauſe to commend my way of dealing with you, and to ſweeten all your bitter misfortunes. In the mean time, if any of your Guards do diſobey my commands, and not render you that reſpect which I would have them, let me be advertiſed of it; to the end, that their puniſhment may ſatisfie you, and juſtifie me. Oh Sir (cried Crœſſus) I do not wonder that a Prince who knows ſo well how to uſe his virtue, ſhould always Conquer: And I wonder leſs that the King of Aſſyria hath been Conquered by a Prince, whoſe virtue tranſcends his: The King of Aſſyria (replied Cyrus modeſtly) hath been unfortunate, becauſe his deſign was unjuſt; but for the reſt, though he hath been ever my enemy, and though he be ſtill my Rival, yet I muſt needs juſtifie him in ſome part of that violence which he uſed towards you; and aſſure you, that his deſign was only to terrifie you ſo far, as to make you out of fear to tell where Mandana was, but his intentions never were to put you unto death: It is a thing which I am bound to tell you, becauſe I know it to be a truth; and to tell the ſooner, becauſe I cannot indure, that the man whoſe quality is equal unto yours and mine, ſhould be accuſed of an action ſo barbarous. After this, Crœſſus began again to commend him, the Prince Myrſiles did ſecond him, Artamas, Tigranes, and Anaxaris could not chooſe alſo but applaud Cyrus: Whoſe modeſty not being able to hear ſuch commendations of himſelf, was forced to depart a little ſooner than otherwiſe he would from the King of Lydia. This unfortunate Prince did intreat Cyrus before he went away, to uſe well his new conquered Subjects, beſeeching him not to take it ill, if he uſed his beſt endeavour to be their Protector, though he could not be their King. Cyrus was ſo moved at this requeſt, that he renewed all the proteſtations and promiſes which he formerly made unto Cræſſus; aſſuring him, that he would imploy all his power with Ciaxares, that he would reſtore the Crown unto him which he had loſt, upon condition that he ſhould become his Vaſſal, as the King of Armenia was, and that he ſhould follow the Wars until he had releaſed Mandana. And indeed Cyrus was no ſooner returned to the Cittadel, but he began to write unto the King of Medes, both in the behalf of Cræſſus, and to render him an accompt of all paſſages, intending to diſpatch a Poſt the next morning, and then to be in a readineſs for a viſit of the Princeſs Araminta, and to carry with him the Prince Spitridates: The truth is, he could not write without perturbation of mind, and interruptions to himſelf, for his imagination was filled with thoughts of the Princeſs Mandana; upon the leaſt noiſe which he heard, he always thought that ſome was bringing intelligence of her, and the place where ſhe was carried unto; ſo that theſe flattering hopes begot a moſt horrid renovation of grief, when he found they were deceived. But whil'ſt he was writing in theſe perturbations of mind, Spitridates was entertaining himſelf with hopes ſo full of impatience, that it may be well ſaid, time was a torment unto him, For believing he ſhould ſee the Princeſs Araminta the next morning, every minute ſeemed an Age unto him: As for Seſoſtris and Artamas, after they had conducted Cyrus unto the Cittadel, they returned to the Palace, to ſee at once thoſe two Princeſſes who raigned in their Souls: The firſt of theſe, ſince he had not of a long time ſeen his deareſt Timaretta, he thought he ſhould never ſee her enough: And the ſecond, beſides the joy which he ſhould have to be with his Princeſs, he was joyed, that he was able to render an accompt unto her of the conference between Cyrus and the King her Father, and that he was able to tell her that he was well received. Since theſe, two Princeſſes had two Chambers which joyned together, and ſince they were both in their own Chambers, when Seſoſtris and Artamas came to ſee them, they parted at the doors of the Chambers. But whilſt Seſoſtris was entertaining his deareſt Timaretta, and whil'ſt he was proteſting that his Love was as violent, as when ſhe was the faireſt Shepheardeſs of all Ægypt, and he the moſt amorous Shepheard of the World: The while, I ſay, Artamas was proteſting unto the Princeſs Palmis, (after he had rendred her an accompt of all paſſages betwixt Crœſſus and him) that the alteration in her fortune had wrought no change in his heart, and that he did love her with more zeal and reſpect, though the King her Father was a Captive, and though he had loſt his Crown, than he did before, when ſhe was the Daughter of the moſt puiſſant and richeſt King of all Aſia: Whil'ſt (I ſay) theſe two illuſtrious Lovers found ſome ſweetneſs in diſcourſing of their paſt misfortunes and preſent miſeries, Andramites prepared himſelf to wait upon Cyrus the next morning, when he intended to carry Spitridates unto Araminta, to the end he might the ſooner ſee his beloved Doraliſa: Ligdamis alſo, as well as he, had the ſame deſign to ſee his deareſt Cleonice: Parmenides alſo, who came to Sardis as ſoon as he heard it was taken, thought of returning to ſee Cydipe; ſo that all theſe Amorites being no leſs amorous than Spitridates, were no leſs impatient than he, and expected the happy hour with as much reſtleſsneſs of mind: They all departed, not ſo early in the morning as they could have deſired, becauſe Cyrus had yet ſo much buſineſs to diſpatch that the Sun was a great height before he took horſe : for he had not only his laſt orders to give unto the meſſenger whom he ſent unto Cyaxares, but he had commands to to give concerning the bringing of Menecrates and Thraſemedes unto Sardis : He had written and ſent unto Perſipolis, but he had yet to command, that they ſhould go unto certain ſmall Maritine Towns, whoſe names were out of his memory when he ſent unto Epheſus, Millete , Guides, and Cuma ; for though in his ſending thither he had given order in general to go unto all the Ports on that Coaſt ; yet becauſe he had not preciſely named the Towns which he then remembred, he would ſend thither, chuſing rather to do a hundred things to no purpoſe concerning the Queſt of his Princeſs, than to fail in the leaſt circumſtance that had any ſhadow of poſſibility in doing her ſervice : But at laſt all buſineſs was diſpatched, and he departed, firſt asking pardon of the Prince Spitridates, for keeping him ſo long from the ſight of the Princeſs Araminta, conjuring him to pardon the fault of an unhappy Lover, who was not ſo near the ſight of her he loved as he was. After this complement which Spitridates received with the ſame civility it was expreſſed, they rid towards the Caſtle where Cyrus had lodged Araminta: Tigranes knowing the violent diſpoſition of his Brother Phraartes, would alſo make one in this journey, to prevent any unruly attempt, which his Brother might fall upon at the ſight Spitridates ; As for Andramites, Ligdamis, and Parmenides, they waited upon Cyrus at this time, more for their ſakes whom they loved, than for any other reaſon: Aglatidas who was intereſted in all theſe Lovers was very deſirous to be a witneſs of all their joys, ſo that he accompanied Cyrus as well as Anaxaris, Artabanes, Chriſantes, Hirmogenes, Leontidas, Megabiſes, and many others. This Prince took with him two hundred horſe for his Guard, conceiving that there was not need of any more, though it was a days journey in a Country newly conquered, for Crœſſus had no Troops in the field, the diſorder was ſo great amongſt the people, and the Dominion of Cyrus was hoped to be ſo gentle, that conſidering the ſtate of things, there was no fear of any revolt: Alſo a great part of the way he was to go, was through the Camp, and their own Quarters, and by conſequence leſs dangerous: But when theſe Princes were about fifty furlongs from Sardis, Cyrus met a ſervant of Artabaſes, unto whom he had committed the Guard of Panthea and Araminta, when he diſplaced Araſpes: This ſervant came to tell him him from his Maſter, that the Prince Phraarte had carried away the Princeſs of Pontus: This ſervant had no ſooner openly delivered his meſſage unto Cyrus, but Spitridates gave ſo ſad a cry, that he did moſt ſenſibly move the hearts of all who heard him unto pity: As for Cyrus, though he had only a moſt pure harmleſs affection unto Araminta, and pity of Spitridates, yet was he moſt extreamly troubled at the accident; the ſenſe of honour, mixing with the tenderneſs of his ſoul, cauſed him to reſent very bitterly this little reſpect which Phraartes had of him in taking away a Princeſs who was his priſoner: Tigranes for his particular was exceedingly grieved at his Brothers fault; and it had been a difficult matter for a ſtranger, ſeeing theſe three Princes to know which of them was the Lover of the Princeſs who was carried away: Though the ſorrows of Spitridates were a thouſand times deeper then thoſe of Cyrus and Tigranes, yet his eyes, his words, and all his actions, could not make it appear how great they were: After his firſt apprehenſion of ſorrow and deſpair, he ſtood ſtill more then a quarter of an hour in a Lethargy of Spirit, which made him hear what others ſaid, as if he underſtood them not. During all this time of this ſad ſilence, he had ſuch a cloud of diſmal melancholy in his face, as made it moſt apparent, that his ſoul was in moſt horrid torments, The firſt words he uttered were, Is it poſſible that Artabaſes, the fidelity of whoſe heart I make no doubt, ſhould not prevent ſo great a misfortune? Sir, replied the ſervant, the great wounds which he hath received upon this occaſion, will ſufficiently teſtifie, that he hath not failed in the duty which he owes you, and that his extraordinary valour did not at this time fail him: But how is it poſſible (replied Cyrus, and interrupted him) that Phraartes could execute his deſigne? Sir (replied the ſervant) to acquaint you exactly how it was, be pleaſed to know, that when the news of taking Sardis came unto the Caſtle where we were, all the Souldiers in it looking upon thoſe who were with you as much more happy then themſelves, becauſe there they might inrich themſelves with the plunder of that rich Town, inſomuch as the very night following, the greater half disbanded themſelves, intending to mingle confuſedly amongſt your victorious Troops, and ſhare with them in their booty, ſo that by this means the Garriſon was extreamly weakened, My Maſter determined to acquaint you with it, but ſince he was to keep ſuch as were priſoners, as no priſoners, but ſuch as looked upon you rather as their Protector, then as their Conquerour, he conceived that it was not neceſſary to acquaint you, eſpecially ſince there was no likelyhood that any ſhould attempt their releaſement. Thus fearing leaſt you ſhould tax him with negligence, he would not advertiſe you of your Souldiers flight, but reſted quiet as before. After this Sir, ſo it chanced, that the ſame day you went in queſt of the Princeſs Mandana, the Prince Phraartes came to ſee the Princeſs Araminta, who gave him a moſt cold entertainment. As ſoon as he had left her, ſhe ſent for my Maſter to complain unto him of you, ſaying that ſhe had entreated you to prevent Phraartes from ſeeing her; but he telling her, that you were ignorant of his coming, and that he came out of Sardis after your departure, it was ſome conſolation unto her, conceiving then that ſhe had more right to treat him ill: But truly I being at the Princeſs Chamber to ſpeak with Heſionide, when he came unto her the ſecond time, I was a Witneſs that her language was ſo ſharp, and bitter unto him, as I admire he would ever carry away that Princeſs, who expreſſed ſuch a terrible averſion towards him. As ſoon as he was gone out of her Chamber: Se charged me to tell my Maſter, that ſhe conjured him not to let Phraartes enter any more into her Chamber: And the truth is Sir, Artabaſes went unto him, deſiring him to ſee her no more, but to go out of the Caſtle. Phraartes as violent as his humour is, did upon this occaſion curb himſelf, and anſwered him with ſo much civility that he did not think it fit to force, a man of his Quality out, without ſpecial order from you. And ſince he was then ignorant where you were; he could not advertiſe you of the paſſage; ſo that contenting himſelf with keeping Phraartes from going unto the Chamber of the Princeſs Araminta, and could not in any reaſon fear, that a Prince who had only one Page with him, would ever attempt any thing in force. During this time, Phraartes would often viſit Cleonice, Arpalice, Lycaſte, Doraliſa, Cydipe, Candiope, and Pherenice, with all the reſt of the priſoners, diſcourſing continually with them of the Princeſs Araminta: When he was not with any of them, he would walk under the Window of that Princeſs, from whence he ſometimes ſaw her againſt her will; for you know Sir, ſhe lodged in a low Chamber towards the Garden: But whil'ſt he carried it thus, his Page, who was very obſervant to him, was continually talking and playing with thoſe Souldiers, who were oft from the Guard. In this manner,Sir,did Phraartes behave himſelf until yeſterday, when one of thoſe you ſent unto Epheſus, to Guides, to Cumes, to Miletes, and many other places, after you had met with the Prince Spitridates, came to this Caſtle, where he lodged, becauſe it was in his way; So that he meeting with Phraartes, who was walking before the Gate, where by chance I was, I ſaw he knew him: He asked him from whence he came, and whether he went. The other anſwered,that you Sir had met with Spitridates, that he had told you how the King of Pontus was imbarqued with the Princeſs Mandana at a Port called Artames, that you treated that Prince with a thouſand welcomes, and that you went both together unto Sardis. Phraartes no ſooner underſtood that the Prince Spitridates was with you, but he changed colour, cauſing him to repeat over again what before he told him: After which, not doubting but that Spitridates was the very ſame who was ſo much talked of for the prodigious reſemblance, which this man ſaid was between him he had ſeen, and you Sir, he conceived that without all doubt he would be ſhortly with Araminta, and that they would carry this Princeſs unto Sardis: So that it is probable, for this reaſon he haſted the execution of that deſign which he was hatching when he came firſt to the Caſtle:The reaſon why I ſay ſo is, becauſe we underſtanding this morning, that his

Page by talking and playing with that ſmall number of Souldiers which we had, he had corrupted moſt of them by preſents and gifts, for one of them who is now wounded, hath diſcovered the truth unto us. But in concluſion, Sir, not to abuſe your patience any longer, preſently after all the Ladies were retired unto their Chambers, and Artabaſes according to his cuſtom had gone the Round, viſited the Guards, and was entred into his Chamber, Phraartes came out with his men, from the place where we thought he had been aſleep; ſo that aſſembling all the Souldiers whom he had ſuborned, the reſt were ſo ſmall a number, as they were not able to reſiſt their companions: Alſo to affright them, he threatned to kill them. After which, dividing themſelves, ſome went unto the Chamber of the Princeſs Araminta, and others unto the lodging of Artabaſes, to prevent him from relieving her: In ſhort Sir, their deſign took ſuch effect, as they carried away the Princeſs, and we not able to hinder them; not but that the noyſe which they made in breaking the Windows of the Chamber, and the cryes of the Ladies did awaken us at the firſt; Artabaſes was wounded at the beginning of the tumult, and ſome felt the weight of his arm, who would have kept him from coming out to the relief of the Princeſs; yet at laſt he received ſo many Wounds, and loſt ſo much blood, that he fell down as dead, and was no longer able to oppoſe the violence of Phraartes: In ſhort, he has thriven in his unjuſt deſign, and hath made uſe of ſome of my Maſters Horſes to carry away the Princeſs, and indeed leaving none that were able to follow, for he mounted upon them all the acomplices of his Crime. I ſhall not relate unto you Sir, the cryes and tears of Cleonice, Doraliſa, Pherenice, Candiope, Licaſte, Arpalice, and all the reſt of the Ladies: But give me leave to tell you Sir, that as ſoon as my Maſter came unto himſelf, he commanded me to get a horſe at the next houſe, and to come in all haſte to acquaint you with this diſaſterous adventure, and his ſorrows, which Sir is ſuch, as he would not let me ſtay a minute to get his Wounds dreſſed, though I aſſure you there was great need of it. As long as this diſcourſe of the ſervant laſted, the ſoul of Spitridates was in torment, his ſorrows for the carrying away the Princeſs was not all the cauſe of it, for many pangs of an unjuſt jealouſie of Cyrus began to revive, and his fear was, that it was Cyrus who cauſed Araminta to be carryed away: For ſince he did not yet know that Phraartes was in Love with her, he could not deviſe what motive ſhould induce him unto that act of Violence. On the other ſide, the ſorrow and anger which he ſaw in the eyes of Cyrus, did thwart his unjuſt opinion: Alſo conſidering that Artabaſes was very much Wounded, he could not underſtand why Cyrus ſhould let ſuch a man to periſh, whom he eſteemed worthy to have the Guard of two great Princeſſes: However, tho he ſaw ſome reaſon on the one ſide, and no appearance of any on the other, yet he could not compoſe his reſolutions, and his ſoul ſuffered more torments than his tongue was able to expreſs: But theſe jealous thoughts had no long time of reſting in his heart, for as ſoon as the ſervant of Artabaſes had ended his relation of all the buſineſs, Cyrus expreſſed himſelf ſo obligingly, ſo generouſly, and ſo tenderly unto Spitridates, that his candid language had a more prevalent operation, then reaſon only and truth had, for he did quite eradicate thoſe ſparks of jealouſie which began to kindle in the mind of that Prince, and which would not ſuffer him to complain againſt the cruelty of his adventnre, not well knowing whether he ſhould quarrel with Cyrus, as the Raviſher of Araminta, and as his Rival, or complain againſt him as his friend, and as the Protector of his Princeſs. But when he heard Tigranes ask Cyrus and him pardon for the violent crime of his Brother, and ſaid, That he himſelf would be the firſt who would help to puniſh him, and that he would never leave Cyrus until he had found that Princeſs which he had loſt: And when he underſtood from the mouth of Cyrus, that the Prince Phraartes fell in Love with the Princeſs Araminta, as ſoon as ſhe came unto Artaxates, his ſoul found ſome eaſe amidſt his ſorrows; and then he began to hearken and anſwer unto the ſincere proteſtations which Cyrus made unto him: You know (ſaid that free-minded Prince) That I am more obliged than any other to intereſt my ſelf in what concerns you, ſince I owe my life unto the Queen Arbiana your Mother, at that time when ſhe received me into her houſe in Bythinia: For though ſhe did think me to be her Son, yet I muſt ſet a value upon her cares of me; and truly ſhe treated me ſo generouſly after the diſcovery of her errour, that though there were no other reaſons than this, yet I ſhould think my ſelf obliged to ſerve you with my real affection: But generous Prince, I have more prevalent reaſons than that; your own merit, Noble Prince, hath arguments enough to oblige me; the Virtue of the Princeſs Araminta requires my beſt ſervices, and the injury which I have received from Phraartes, makes the matter as much mine as yours, ſince the Prince Tigranes, before whom I ſpake, is of a juſt and generous ſoul, I am confident he will allow me to complain againſt his Brother: But not to loſe a minute of precious time, let us haſte unto the place where the crime was committed, and try if we can find which way they took: Then would Spitridates have diſſwaded Cyrus from going any further towards the Caſtle, deſiring of him only fifty horſe, with whom he himſelf only would purſue the Raviſher, but Cyrus would not be diſſwaded: So that all of them ſetting in all haſte forward, they came thither betimes, where they underſtood more than they could by the ſervant of Artabaſes, whom they found ſo ill of his Wounds, that Cyrus had not power to accuſe him for not acquainting him with the flight of his Souldiers, which was the cauſe of the Princeſs Araminta's being carried away: Spitridates not being able to reſt all night in the Caſtle, intreated Cyrus that he might go out the ſame night, and that he would lend him fifty horſes: Cyrus then excuſed himſelf a thouſand times unto that Prince, in that he could not quit the intereſts he had in Mandana for his, and in that he ſhould part from him before he had recovered Araminta, conjuring him to acquaint him with all paſſages concerning her, to the end he might ſend him an Army if need were, proteſting, that there was nothing which he would not do for his ſatisfaction, and the liberty of ſo virtuous a Princeſs; adding, that ſince Tigranes would go with him, there would be leſs need of his valour. Spitridates at the firſt did oppoſe the intentions of Tigranes to follow him; but afterwards, conſidering that his preſence might be uſeful, he accepted his offer, and went together; after they had reſted their horſes ſome two or three hours, during which time they had intelligence which way Phraartes did firſt take: But in leiu of fifty horſes, Cyrus gave an hundred unto Spitridates, who would not ſee thoſe Ladies who were in the Caſtle, for his ſoul was too much perplexed for any complements. When this Prince was ready to take horſe, Cyrus imbraced him, and told him, that he was ſo ſorry there was as great a reſemblance in their miſfortunes as in their faces, and wiſhed he might be more happy in releaſing Araminta, than himſelf had been in releaſing the Princeſs Mandana; after which, theſe two Princes parted. Spitridates was no ſooner gone, but Cyrus reſolved to return unto Sardis the next morning betimes, and therefore went to ſee all the Ladies in the Caſtle, and to diſpoſe them for a removal unto Sardis, and alſo to chear them up after the diſaſter of the Princeſs Araminta, knowing very well, that they all did moſt tenderly love her; He found them all in the Chamber of Lycaſte, where Andramites, Parmenides, and Ligdamis were before him, for they were not able to be any longer in a place where the perſons whom they loved were, and not to ſee them. Though Cyrus was full of ſorrow, both for his own misfortune and his friends, yet he carried himſelf with ſuch civility towards all the Ladies, as there was not one who did not highly applaud him.

After he had in a condoling manner ſpoke concerning the Princeſs Araminta's carrying away, he told Lycaſte, that to prevent the like misfortune in Arpalice, her Lovers muſt be agreed, and their differences ended, and therefore he conjured him to return unto Sardis; ſpeaking alſo afterwards in a moſt obliging manner unto Arpalice, Cydipe, and Candiope: Afterwards he talked a while unto Doraliſa and Pherenice, concerning the Queen of Suſiana, and alſo ſpoke ſomething unto Leonice in favour of Ligdamis. But Mandana being the principal aim of all his thoughts, he asked them all in general, whether they did not pity him in his ſufferings of ſo many ſuch ſorrows as Spitridates had now tryal of? And there was not one amongſt them, who did not imploy their beſt eloquence to perſwade Cyrus, that they did extreamly intereſt themſelves in the misfortunes of that Princeſs and himſelf. Cleonice among the reſt, to teſtifie her zeal, ſaid, That as oft as ſhe remembred how and by whom the Princeſs Mandana had been carried away, ſhe conceived ſuch an extream hatred againſt men, as there was not above two or three men in the whole Univerſe, whom ſhe did not hate; Really, ſaid ſhe, I do not think there is any ſuch pernicious Villains in the World, as thoſe who carry away Women without their conſents; I will not except ſo much as Aſſaſſinates, Poyſoners, or Traytors; for revenge, or ſuch like, may ſometimes have cauſes ſo conſiderable, as may juſtifie, or at leaſt extenuate the moſt bloudy effects; But can any one perſwade me, that it is a good reaſon for the carrying away of a Woman, to ſay he was in Love with her? It is impoſſible, for where one loves another, he will do nothing but what ſhall make himſelf loved, and not ſuch things as will procure hatred; I muſt confeſs, (ſaid Doraliſa, and interrupted her) That to look upon the matter as you do, you have cauſe to hate all men; But to conſider it as I do, I think that I have cauſe to ſay, that by the ſame reaſon I ſhould deſpiſe almoſt all Women; and I think my ſelf able to maintain, that if there never had been any who had pardoned their Raviſhers, the Princeſs Mandana, nor the Princeſs Araminta, had never been taken away; But ſince every man can fetch ſome example of ſome Lady or other, who was appeaſed after ſhe was taken away, they flatter themſelves in a hope to thrive no worſe than they did who carried them away: So that it may well be ſaid, that it is the weakneſs of ſome Women which cauſed the inſolent boldneſs of men, for never any did attempt the committing of a crime, without hopes of thriving by it; This which you ſay, replyed Cleonice, does not juſtifie men, but only excuſe them; 'Tis true, ſaid Doraliſa, but they have ſomething to ſay for themſelves, more than Women have who pardons thoſe who take them away, ſince, as I conceive, they are without all manner of excuſe; what can they ſay to authorize their imbecility, but that their ſouls were of a baſe mould, and their hearts puſilanimous? Are they not Miſtreſſes of their own lives, though not of their liberties, in caſe any violence be offered? But certainly thoſe who can pardon ſuch a crime can pardon any thing elſe: For my part, I muſt confeſs ingeniouſly, that I had much rather be accuſed for voluntary abandoning my heart, unto a man whom I ſhould think worthy to enjoy it, than ſuffer my ſelf to be perſwaded by a man who treated me ill, and carried me away: I conceive the opinion of Doraliſa to be ſo generous and reaſonable, replied Cyrus, that I am perſwaded, there is not a Lady in all the company who will contradict her: I aſſure you, Sir, replied ſhe, that peradventure there is ſome one who will allow of it, rather out of reſpect to you, than out of her own opinion: I would gladly know, ſaid Arpalice, whom it is you ſuſpect not to be of your opinion: Since I will aſſure you, that it is not your ſelf, replied Doraliſa, and ſince I confeſs my ſelf to be perſwaded that you would never pardon Menecrates, if he ſhould carry you away, you need not importune me any further, and to ſpeak ſincerely, I do not know: The ſcope of what I ſaid was only this, that I verily believe there are few women of firm and generous ſouls, and that I might the more applaud the illuſtrious Mandana, who though ſhe hath had three of the greateſt Princes of the World asking her pardon for carrying her away, and yet would never grant it them, chooſing rather to ſee all Aſia in a flame, than yield unto the deſires, ſighs, and tears of her Raviſhers: For my part, I do confeſs, that when I had the honour to ſee her at Suſa, I was more raviſhed at the conſtancy of her ſoul, than at the charms of her beauty or Wit, though ſhe be the moſt abſolute accompliſhed Princeſs of the World: But to teſtifie, that all women are not of my opinion, give me leave to tell you, that ſome of the Queen of Suſia's Women, finding the King of Pontus to be a very accompliſhed man, and ſeeing him in Love and much perplexed, they murmured againſt the ſtubbornneſs of the Princeſs Mandana; and wiſhed her of a little more flexible nature: I beſeech you, ſaid Pherenice, declare that I was not of that opinion; I do not remember you were, replied Doraliſa, but though you were, the illuſtrious Cyrus would think never the worſe of you, for then you had not the honour to know him; Doubtleſs I ſhould not, replied Cyrus; But I do confeſs, I had rather ſhe were not of that mind; and you have much more obliged me than I thought I was, by acquainting me with your opinion: If you be obliged, replied Licaste, unto all thoſe who wiſh the Raviſhers of Mandana may periſh, and that you may be happy, you are obliged unto the greateſt part of all Aſia; Since I do believe Madam, replied Cyrus, that you meaſure the thoughts of others by your own, your expreſſion doth infinitely both pleaſe and oblige me; But becauſe I would not be too troubleſome unto her who is a wiſher of my good fortune, by ſtaying too late, I ſhall take my leave of her until to morrow at night, when I ſhall hope for the honour of ſeeing her at Sardis, with all this honoured company, whom Andramites and Ligdamis will convey thither: Methinks Sir (replied Doraliſa cunningly) That ſince it is requiſite your Convoy and Guard ſhould be ſtronger than ours, you were beſt to take Andramites along with you, and leave only Ligdamis with us; Since I think my ſelf a little better verſed in the Orders of War than you are, replied Cyrus, and ſmiled, I hope you will excuſe me, if I do not follow your adviſe in this, though I will obey you in every thing elſe; In ſaying ſo, Cyrus riſe up, without ſtaying for the thanks of Andramites, and after he had ſaluted all the Ladies with extraordinary grace and civility, he retired unto the Chamber which was prepared for him, where he repoſed himſelf until break of day, and then commanding a care to be had of Artabaſes, he departed, but it was with a melancholly Soul, for thinking that this accident unto a Prince whom he ſo much eſteemed, and unto a Prince who reſembled him, was a very bad Omen; and conſidering, that the advantage of the Princeſs Araminta, was now out of his power, it grieved him very much, for ſhe was Siſter to the King of Pontus, and was a very good Pawn which he had loſt, ſo that every ſtep of way was a freſh thought of melancholly; Anaxaris kept the neareſt him, and to him he ſpoke the moſt that day. After a long deſcant upon his misfortunes, Cyrus upon a ſudden began to ſlack his pace, and looking very obligingly upon him; How long valiant ſtranger (ſaid he unto him) will you hide your ſelf from me, and put me to the neceſſity of ſaying, that you are the man whom of all the world I know beſt, and know leaſt? I am moſt confident there is none knows your worth better than I do; I know you are of an excellent compoſure, I am acquainted with the accuteneſs and excellency of your Spirit; Generoſity ſhines in your ſoul, your valour is abſolutely Heroique; but for all this, I know not who you are, nor know whom to ask; therefore, dear Anaxaris, I beſeech you give me leave to ask the queſtion, and let me not be denied; I wiſh Sir, I could deſerve thoſe commendations you are pleaſed to give me; And I wiſh alſo, that I were able to ſatisfie your curioſity; But ſince it is convenient for me to conceal my ſelf, and ſince it will not at all avail you to know, I hope you will not put me to the neceſſity of diſobeying you; Though all this doth but augment my curioſity, replied Cyrus, yet becauſe I love you, I will check my deſires, upon condition you will be perſwaded, that my greateſt reaſon which moved me to deſire the knowledg of whom you were, was my deſires of ſerving you; Anaxaris returned thanks unto Cyrus for the honour which he did him, but it was in ſuch terms as perſwaded that Prince, that Anaxaris was of ſuch a Quality, as was more uſed to receive than give thanks. Since now they drew near the Camp, Cyrus thought of giving out ſeveral orders as he paſſed, he viſited many of the chief Commanders, ſo that it was almoſt night when he came to Sardis; at his entrance in he met Mazares, who came to meet him, and they ſaluted with the ſame civility which they uſually ſhewed unto each other, but in ſuch a melancholy manner, as made it manifeſt there was no news to be heard of Mandana; I will not ask you (generous Rival) ſaid Cyrus unto him, whether you know any thing concerning our Princeſs, for your ſadneſs ſpeaks you do not; 'Tis very true Sir (replied Mazares) I do not know any thing of the Princeſs more than what you knew yeſterday when you parted; But I know another thing which will be a wonder unto you, and which I will immediately tell you; Since it is not any thing which relates unto the Princeſs, replied Cyrus, you may tell me what you pleaſe, and I ſhall hearken unto it without any impatience; I do not ſay, replied Mazares, That it does not relate unto Mandana, but only that I do not know any thing of that Princeſs, for if I had ſaid ſo, I had ſaid untruly, ſince it is to be believed, that the King of Aſſyria is gone to ſeek her; Is the King of Aſſyria gone? (replied Cyrus with aſtoniſhment?) Yes Sir, anſwered Mazares, one of his men whom he left with a Letter for you, told me, that he himſelf took horſe about four hours ſince, and that he intended to ride all night, and do what he could to be the firſt who ſhould know where the Princeſs Mandana is.

Cyrus no ſooner heard this ſtrange news, but he changed colour, and cholor began to mix with his ſorrows; He was afraid the King of Aſſyria had received ſome ſecret intelligence of the place where Mandana was; It vexed him that the violence of his nature ſhould prompt him unto a thing which would be taken for exceſs of Love: He was afraid that he would find out ſome ways to come unto Mandana, and deliver her, though there was no likelyhood of it; As for Mazares, his thoughts were as turbulent as thoſe of Cyrus; for though his Love was without any hope, and though he was reſolved to look no further than the liberty of Mandana, yet many times his heart would ſparkle out ſome hatred of his Rival, and Love of the Princeſs Mandana, ſo that he ſtood in need of all his reaſon to expel and ſmother theſe guſts of his old paſſion. At this time he had no leiſure to vent his thoughts, for Cyrus had ſo great a deſire to ſee what the King of Aſſyria had writ, that he ſent in all haſte for the man who had the Letter, appointing him to be brought unto the Cittadel, whither he went, to expect him with an impatience ſuitable to the grandeur of his Love; yet he was not long in that reſtleſs mood, for the King of Aſſyria's Officer, knowing that Cyrus was returned to Sardis, came unto him at the ſame inſtant that he was ſent for; ſo that within a quarter of an hour after Cyrus came to the Cittadel, he received the Letter, which he ſo impatiently longed for; He opened the Letter in all haſte, and read it ſo faſt, as if he would have known all the Contents of it in one inſtant; yet notwithſtanding his impatient haſt, he was long in reading it; for the King of Aſſyria writing it in haſt, the Character was not legible, yet in concluſion he picked out theſe words.

The King of Aſſyria to the too happy CYRUS.

NEver think that the deſign which I have undertaken to go in queſt of the Princeſs, ſhall make me decline the leaſt jot from our old conditions; on the contrary, leaving you in the head of a hundred thouſand men, and I going alone to diſcover if I can be where the Princeſs is, this confidence which I have in your word, obligeth you to keep exact touch with me; As for my part, never fear that I will fail, ſince a King without a Kingdom or Army, is not in a condition of daring to do it, though he would. Give me leave then to go and be your Spy, ſince it is the pleaſure of Fate I can do nothing elſe, as long as we believed the Princeſs Mandana to be in Armenia, or knew that ſhe was in Sardis, the hope of delivering her, did ſuffer me to indure the ſight of you and Mazares; but now, ſince we know not where ſhe is, and ſince I ſhall be leſs uſeleſs in the Army, then perhaps I ſhall be elſewhere, I will quit my ſelf from the ſight of my Rivals, not but that I know the height of your generoſity in all that relates unto me; But I had rather that the Princeſs Mandana ſhould accuſe you of too little Love unto her, in your too much civility unto me, then ſhe ſhould accuſe me of too little affection unto her, in the too much acknowledgment which I have of you. Therefore I leave it to the publick vogue, either to commend you, or blame me for what we do; However, once more, I incite you to the obſervation of our conditions, and remember always, that you can never enjoy Mandana, until you have ruined

The King of Aſſyria.

After Cyrus had read this Letter, his ſoul was a little more at eaſe, although he found many things which nettled him, and which revived in his heart that old hatred, which he had towards this furious Rival, when he paſſed under the name of Philidaſpes, and when he himſelf under the name of Artamenes; but his comfort was, that he perceived the King of Aſſyria's departure was only an effect of his phantaſtical humour, and of his violent temper, not that he knew any particulars of the Princeſs Mandana; yet the remembrance of that favourable Oracle which this Prince received from the Temple of Jupiter, Belas at Babylon, did ſomewhat ſting his apprehenſion; And ſince he could not think upon that Oracle, but he muſt needs alſo remember that ſad anſwer which the Sybel gave him, theſe thoughts revived ſome fears in him; yet notwithſtanding, when he conſidered, that the plauſible Oracle of Crœſſus had been ill interpreted, his hopes revived. In the mean time, ſince he found extraordinary virtue to be in the Prince Mazares, and ſince he did not then look upon him as his Rival, he ſhewed him the King of Aſſyria's Letter, as if he had been his intimate friend. Theſe two Princes did diſcourſe a while upon the violent humour of their Rival, of the deſign which he could have; and the more they conſidered it, the more they believed it to be a meer Vagary of his humour: As they were in theſe thoughts, Feraulas came in, who came to acquaint Cyrus, that he had brought Arianita and Timonide unto Sardis; and that he had brought that Lady unto the Palace, unto whom Cyleniſe had given half of her Chamber. Cyrus, who loved all that belonged to his Princeſs, was very glad to know that Arianita was better then when he laſt ſaw her, though ſhe was not always favourable unto him; and he appointed Feraulas to have a care of her, deſiring alſo Tegeus, whom he ſaw in his Chamber among the reſt, to tell Cyleniſe, that he took all her good Offices done unto Arianita, as done unto himſelf. Preſently after, Ligdamis and Arianita came in, who told Cyrus, that all the Ladies which he ſaw the night before, were come to Sardis; and ſince they had no deſire to ſeparate, they were all lodged at the houſe of Licaſte's Siſter. But Cyrus not liking that, he ſent to entreat them they would be pleaſed to lodg in the Palace, which was of capacity enough to lodg them all conveniently; which offer, after once refuſal, they accepted; So as it may well be ſaid, That never was there ſuch a company of Beauties as this was in the Palace of Crœſſus: 'Tis very true, every one of them was not equally ſatisfied ed; There was three of them who were unfortunate, and the reſt very happy; Timaretta was all hopes, and had nothing to fear; Seſoſtris was living, Seſoſtris was faithful, and Heracleon was dead; ſo that nothing wanted to compleat their contentment, but to return into Ægypt, where Amaſis did earneſtly deſire them. On the other ſide, Crœſſus was as unfortunate, as Timaretta was happy; and all his conſolation was in the generoſity of his Conquerour. The Prince Myrſiles, though he loſt the hopes of a Crown, yet obtained of the Gods the liberty of his ſpeech; but he only imployed the uſe of that Organ in lamenting his misfortune, tho it was a benefit too dear to be inſenſible of. As for the Princeſs Palmis, ſince Artamas proved ſo highly generous and conſtant; and finding Crœſſus was well received, and the King of Phrigia was not oppoſite to his deſign, ſhe had reaſon to be very well ſatisfied, if ſhe could have without ſorrow ſeen the King her Father, and the Prince her Brother turned out of the Throne, and made Captives. As for Ligdamis and Cleonice, they were the happieſt of all, and injoyed all the ſweets of a moſt pure love and friendſhip: As for Arpalice, the incertainty of what agreement Cyrus would make between Thraſimedes and Menecrates, did keep her in a reſtleſs condition, though yet ſhe hoped, that at the requeſt of Andramites, he would favour the firſt of theſe; Cydipe for her part, ſhe was not ſorry to ſee that her beauty did eclipſe that of Cleoxere, in the phancy of Parmenides: Candiope thought ſtrange ſhe could hear no news of Philiſtion; And to ſay truth, there was very few who had not their perplexities, not only in the Palace and the Cittadel, but alſo in all the great Town; for certainly, there was then a ſtrange kind of tumultuous conſtellation, which moved thoſe who had not buſineſs, to make ſome; and queſtionleſs every one was a ſufferer, either in the perſon of their friends, or their own; Yet the behaviour of Cyrus towards Crœſſus, and the Prince Myrſiles, did ſo win the hearts of the people, that he was as ſafe in Sardis as he could be, either in Perſipolis, or Ecbatane. The next morning Lycaſte, and all the Beauties who came to Sardis, went to viſit the two Princeſſes, who received them according to their deſerts. The Prince Myrſiles, who had the liberty to go unto the Chamber of the Princeſs his Siſter, with whom all this pleaſant company was, he was there alſo, but his deſign was only to ſee Doraliſa, whom he had not ſeen ſince ſhe went from Sardis to Suſa with Panthea : So that after he had addreſſed his complement unto the Princeſs Timaretta, and whiſpered with the Princeſs Palmis, he asked their permiſſion to go neerer Doraliſa, ſince ſhe was then far off the Princeſs and buſie in talk with Candiope, ſhe heard not what he ſaid : So that when he came neer her, ſhe thought he would have expreſſed himſelf by the help of that Table Book, which heretofore he uſed ſo wittily, when Æſope was in the Lydian Court; for though ſhe heard he was not mute, yet ſhe could not imagine that he could ſpeak, or at leaſt ſpeak well : The cauſe of her errour was, becauſe ſhe did not conſider that he was never deaf : She was extreamly ſurprized, when ſhe heard him ſpeak better then moſt did, who ſpoke always : So that when ſhe heard his firſt complement, in lieu of anſwering, or teſtifying her ſorrows for the misfortune of his houſe and Country, ſhe could not chuſe but go back, and look upon him with admiration : How Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, is it not above five or ſix daies ſince you could ſpeak ? No, no, it is impoſſible : Moſt certainly you ſpoke long in ſecret, otherwiſe you could not ſpeak ſo well in publique : And certainly you have been ſilent for the time paſt, purpoſely to put all other to ſilence for the future : Your language, replyed the Prince Myrſiles, is not perhaps ſo pleaſing as you think; for truly theſe exceſſive applauds you give me, does argue, that my ſilence did much diſpleaſe you, and was troubleſome, ſince yon think this little which I ſpeak to be worthy of admiration. Doraliſa, who was recollecting her ſelf, conſidered that ſhe had commended this Prince too much : And to carry it more prudently, it were better to commend him leſs, and lament his misfortunes more : So that to repair her errour, ſhe altered his diſcourſe, and began to talk with him upon all the misfortunes of Panthea, and of all the alterations which ſhe found in Lydia at her return : However, ſaid ſhe unto him, you have this advantage, that your Conquerour is the moſt generous Prince in the World :

World: 'Tis true, replied Myrſiles, But for all that, moſt amiable Doraliſa, The King my Father is the moſt miſerable, ſince it is a very great misfortune for thoſe who are uſed to confer favours upon others, to be put unto the neceſſity of receiving them from another: Yet this is ſome conſolation, that we are ſubjected unto one of the greateſt Princes of the World, and unto one whom you eſteem, and unto one whom I know you are obliged. 'Tis very true Sir, anſwered Doraliſa, I am obliged unto him, but I wiſh that you were not in a condition to be ſo; and that on the contrary, the King had obliged him which he might have done, by rendring back the Princeſs Mandana. What's paſt, replyed Myrſiles, cannot be recalled; and in lieu of acknowledging thoſe faults which cannot be repaired, we muſt endeavour to indure our bad fate, like men who are worthy of better: And to teſtifie that I do all I can to ſweeten my miſeries, I proteſt unto you, I find ſome ſweetneſs to think, that the Gods, who once had made me above the Quality of the amiable Doraliſa, hath now made me her equal: Oh Sir, (replied Doraliſa, and interrupted him) Your civility is exceſſive; and it had been a better wiſh, to have deſired the Gods, that I might be exalted unto your Quality, then to ſay you find any ſweetneſs in their debaſing you down unto mine: Since the firſt of theſe is not in my power, and the other really is ſo, you need uot wonder, I ſhould chuſe rather to tell the thoughts of my heart, then to trouble my ſelf in making unprofitable wiſhes. Doraliſa was going to anſwer when Cyrus entred and broke off their diſcourſe: But that which moſt ſurprized Lycaſte, Arpalice, Cydipe, and moſt of all Candiope was to ſee Philiſtion enter amongſt thoſe who accompanied him; they could not imagine ſo readily as they wiſhed, why he would not ſee them before he ſaw Cyrus, they durſt not change their places to ſpeak unto him, nor could he come handſomely unto them, though he much deſired it: But preſently after the Prince Seſoſtris entred, and ſome of thoſe who were with Candiope went out, Philiſtion at laſt came up, talked with as much delight, as before his impatience was great. Candiope for her part received him with abundance of joy, inſomuch as it was eaſie for Doraliſa to obſerve, that there was a greater love between them, than Candiope had ſpoke of, when ſhe related the adventures of Thraſimedes and Arpalice, for ſhe took notice that Philiſtion was ſo taken up with looking upon Candiope, with ſpeaking and hearkning unto her, that he never ſo much as thought of any civility unto Lycaſte, Arpalice, and Cydipe, who were cloſe by him, and it was not long before ſhe told Candiope what ſhe thought.

Doraliſa then hearing the name of Philiſtion, when Cyrus preſented him unto Palmis, and knew very well that it was the ſame Philiſtion who ſhared in the adventures of Arpalice, ſeeing with what earneſtneſs and affection Candiope and he talked together, ſhe went towards Candiope, and pulling her gently by the Gown; I pray tell me (ſaid ſhe cunningly) whether this Philiſtion unto whom you ſpeak, is that Philiſtion, who is the friend of Thraſimedes, and who counterfeited Arcon ſo well, as for my part I cannot imagine it is he. Candiope was ſo ſurprized at the diſcourſe of Doraliſa, that ſhe bluſhed, imagining that it was becauſe the ayr and garb of Philiſtion did not pleaſe her, and that the Idea which he had formed by the recital which ſhe had made of him to her, was more advantageous for Philiſtion, than that conceipt which himſelf begot; So that being much aſhamed, and fuller of anger than ſhe would ſuffer to appear, which yet appeared more than ſhe would have it, ſhe aſked her friend, why ſhe made a queſtion, whether he ſhe ſaw was that ſame Philiſtion of whom ſhe heard her ſpeak? The reaſon why I did not believe it to be him, replied Doraliſa, becauſe you told me, that there was only terms of eſteem betwixt you and him, or a kind of ſlight affection, which you could not phraſe either Love or Friendſhip; and which was of ſuch a nature only, as that you would ſpeak well of each other in all places, and this is all the proofs of his affection you ever had from him; So that finding in the face of this Philiſtion the joy of a Lover, who ſees his Miſtreſs after a long abſence, you may well pardon me if I doubted whether Philiſtion was Philiſtion; If you believe, as you ſay, (replied Candiope, and both ſmiled and bluſht) You were very malicious to interrupt me: To deſerve the title which you give me (anſwered ſhe) I profeſs that I will not ſuffer you to ſpeak with Philiſtion in private all this day, unleſs you entreat me to let you talk with him: Then I will entreat you, replied Candiope, For there are ſome things of importance which he began to tell me, the which I muſt needs know, becauſe they will facilitate the agreement between Thraſimedes and Menecrates: No, no, replied Doraliſa, That ſhall not ſerve your turn; for if you do not entreat me, and confeſs that I do you a pleaſure in it in conſideration of your ſelf, I will not let you be in quietneſs. I beſeech you let it ſatisfie (replied ſhe and ſmiled) That I entreat you only for the Love of Philiſtion: I will, anſwered Doraliſa, upon condition you will promiſe me, to tell me what he ſaith unto you: I do proteſt I will, ſaid Candiope, and turned towards Philiſtion, who really had ſomething to impart unto her, which did conduce to the reconcilement of Thraſimedes and Menecrates, though Candiope ſaid ſo unto Doraliſa, as an excuſe of her ſelf. Alſo after that this counterfeit Arion had expreſſed himſelf as fully as Love could prompt a Lover after a long abſence, and had aſſured her of the fidelity of his heart, and proteſted that he never ſaw her ſo fair and lovely in all his life, as at this his return: Then he told her the reaſon why he did not follow Thraſimedes, when he came into Sardis, which was, becauſe he was forced to ſtay in Halicarnaſſus, by reaſon of ſome Wounds he had received in a combat, in which he was ingaged, concerning the intereſts of both Arpalice, and of one of his Siſters, Candiope not comprehending how Arpalice, who was of Patara, could have any intereſt mixed with a Siſter of Philiſtion, who was of Halicarnaſſus, ſeemed to be much ſurprized: But for her ſatisfaction, Philiſtion told her, how he had a Siſter whoſe name was Androclea, who was loved by a man of Quality in that Town, named Ephialtes, whom ſhe much diſliked, but durſt not ſhew it, becauſe ſhe had an imperious Mother, who would needs have her marry him; that whil'ſt Ephialtes was abſent, Menecrates and Parmenides chanced to come unto Halicarnaſſus: When were they in that Town? (ſaid Candiope and interrupted him.) They were there, replied Philiſtion, after their departure from Apamea, and whil'ſt Thraſimedes and I were at Patara; So that whil'ſt Thraſimedes fell in Love with the Miſtreſs of Menecrates, Menecrates fell in Love with my Siſter at Halicarnaſſus: Was Menecrates in love with your Siſter? (replied Candiope) Doubtleſs he was, replied Philiſtion, and the worſt was, my Siſter had as great an inclination to him, as ſhe had averſion unto Ephialtes; So that ſhe being eaſily perſwaded unto a thing which ſhe much deſired, ſhe believed he loved her, and he quickly perceived that ſhe did not hate him; and by this means there grew ſo great an amity betwixt them, as to impart all their ſecrets unto each other: This being ſo, my Siſter acquainted him that her Mother would marry her againſt her will unto Ephialtes, and Menecrates alſo acquainted her, that his friends would likewiſe ingage him unto a Lady of Licia, whom he loved not. Thus this conformity augmenting their affections, they grew to ſuch a point, as to promiſe each other to uſe their beſt endeavours that they might marry together: So that when Menecrates departed from Halicarnaſſus, he told my Siſter, that he went to uſe all his endeavours for breaking off with Arpalice, and that as ſoon as it was done, he would return unto our Town: But he being of ſuch an humour, as very often to begin Love phantaſtically, and ſo to end it, he forgot my Siſter as ſoon as he was out of her ſight; for indeed you know how he behaved himſelf at his return to Patara, how Cydipe for a while did take him, and how the love of Thraſimedes to Arpalice revived the love of Menecrates unto that Beauty. In the mean time, my Siſter being nothing of the temper of Menecrates, when Ephialtes came to her, he was courſely entertained, and all the authority of a Mother could not compel Androclea to marry him. This was the ſtate of things, moſt amiable Candiope, when Thraſimedes and I returned from Halicarnaſſus, after we had left you at Patara: Since the Love of Menecrates and my Siſter was cloſely carried, I was ignorant of it at my return; but afterwards, my Mother dying, as well as the Father of Thraſimedes, and Ephialtes addreſſing himſelf unto me for my Siſter, as one whom my Mother had promiſed unto him, I preſſed Androclea to tell me why ſhe would not marry him? And ſhe being driven to the neceſſity of giving me a reaſon for her proceedings, ſhe confeſſed the whole truth unto me. I no ſooner knew this, but deſigning to advance the marriage of Thraſimedes with Arpalice, and break off that of Menecrates and her, I conſulted with Thraſimedes, and told Ephialtes, that not being of the ſame humour of my Mother, nor having the ſame power over my Siſter which ſhe had, I could not force her to marry him; and therefore I wiſhed him to deſiſt from any further thoughts of it, intending afterwards to return unto Patara, and to carry Androclea thither alſo, under a pretence of conſulting with the Oracle, to the end I might ſummon Menecrates unto his promiſe, and to trouble all his deſigns. But Ephialtes would not permit me to do as I intended, for he being of a moſt violent and haſty temper, and deep in Love, he could not brook my refuſal of forcing my Siſter to accompliſh my Mothers promiſe; So that he ſent me a challenge, and we fought, unknown to Thraſimedes, I had the good fortune to get the better, and to make him quit his pretences; but I had the misfortune alſo to be much wounded, and could not follow Thraſimedes when he got into Sardis, which doubtleſs I had done, if my hurts had permitted me. In the mean time, ſince I was not able to live out of your ſight, and ſince I had promiſed Thraſimedes to make uſe of the Love which Menecrates bore unto my Siſter, I brought Androclea with me, intending to leave her at a Frontire Town of our Country which joyns upon Licia, and which is not far from hence, where we had ſome friends, to the end that when I had found Menecrates, ſhe might be nearer the place where I knew he would be: But hearing by the publick talk, that Sardis was taken, and alſo by a Halicarnaſſean Souldier, who was returning into his Country loadened with booty, who ſaid, That Thraſimedes and Menecrates were both in the power of Cyrus, and that there were ſome Lician Ladies which went out of Sardis, who were ſharers in the intereſt of thoſe two priſoners, I collected that it muſt needs be you; So that without more delay, I took a reſolution of coming hither, and bringing my Siſter with me; So that taking the benefit of a Convoy of Cyrus his Troops, we came ſafely to Sardis without any danger; but ſince no ſtrangers were ſuffered to enter, whoſe names were not preſented unto Cyrus, I anſwered unto thoſe who asked mine, by the name of Philiſtion, and that I was friend unto a valiant man who came into Sardis, and who Cyrus treated ſo well. They told that Prince poſitively the very ſame words which I told them: ſo that the name of Thraſimedes, cauſed me to be brought unto him, after I had conducted my Siſter unto the place where the ſtranger Ladies lodged. This Prince received me very well, and told me, that I came opportunely to be a witneſs of that accord, which he would that day make between Thraſimedes and Menecrates. I no ſooner heard this, but I took the liberty to tell him, that he could not juſtly do it, unleſs firſt he did me the honour to give me a little audience, and he conſenting unto it, the ſame hour I told him what now I told you: Afterwards, he commanded me to follow him hither, telling me, that he would go unto the Chamber of Lycaſte, whether he would have Thraſimedes and Menecrates brought, to the end he might reconcile their differences: The matter will not be difficult, replied Candiope, after this which you have told me; but I do conceive it requiſite, that Lycaſte and Arpalice knew what you have told me, before any accommodation be made. Philiſtion, conceiving what Candiope did ſay to be reaſonable, permitted her to advertiſe her friends of what ſhe thought fit, before Cyrus began to ſpeak of the buſineſs between Thraſimedes and Menecrates: And Candiope had no ſooner imparted it unto Lycaſte and Arpalice; but Cyrus addreſſing himſelf to the firſt of theſe, I intended, ſaid he unto her, to have come unto your Chamber, purpoſely to endeavour the reconciling of two friends, by ſetting Thraſimedes and Menecrates at liberty: But ſince there is ſome difficulty in the buſineſs, I conceive it were more expedient to take the advice of theſe two great Princes, before whom I ſpeak, and of theſe two Princes, upon condition notwithſtanding, that the fair Arpalice conſent unto it: Arpalice, replied Lycaſte, is not ſo accuſtomed unto her own will, that it is neceſſary to conſult with her thereupon: therefore Sir, I beſeech you follow the dictates of your own will without any further information of hers; And indeed Sir you may judge by the bluſhes in her cheeks, that ſhe has not confidence enough to tell you what ſhe thinks: I can deſire nothing Sir (replied Arpalice modeſtly) But what ſhall pleaſe you, and therefore it is not neceſſary my words ſhould expreſs my thoughts: Since ſo (ſaid Cyrus unto Lycaſte) I beſeech you Madam, let the matter be before ſuch an illuſtrious company: My will Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, is what ſhall moſt pleaſe you, hoping that the more illuſtrious perſons there are, who ſhall give their Votes in favour of him who ſhall be happy, the more patient will he be, againſt whom the ſentence is given. After this, Cyrus who had a moſt admirable memory, and rare eloquence, and who knew how to compoſe the largeſt adventure in few words, began ſuccinctly to relate the whole buſineſs of Thraſimedes and Menecrates, which he received either from Andramites, or Doraliſa, or Philiſtion, bringing the ſtory unto the very day when Thraſimedes would have got into Sardis, which was beſieged, becauſe he thought his Miſtreſs to be there, and when Menecrates would have come out, becauſe he thought ſhe was not there; adding alſo, that the Siſter of Philiſtion was in Sardis: You remember Madam, (ſaid he, and addreſſed his diſcourſe unto the Princeſs) That Menecrates and Arpalice were deſigned by their Parents to marry: That Arpalice cannot conform her mind unto the will of her Parents without extream violence upon her ſelf: That Menecrates hath a long time ſlighted her, and alſo played away her picture unto Thraſimedes: Moreover, he ſeems to have renounced all right unto that fair Lady, in promiſing the Siſter of Philiſtion to do all he could to break off with her: That Thraſimedes hath ever loved Arpalice ſince firſt he knew her, and that Menecrates never began to love her, until he began to fear leſt Arpalice ſhould love Thraſimedes. Then after Cyrus had ſet forth the intereſt of both theſe perſons unto thoſe who knew it not, and had revived it in the memory of thoſe who did know it, he thought it requiſite to ſee the Siſter of Philiſtion, and therefore he ſent immediately for her: Though Androclea had no mind to appear amongſt ſo great a company, yet the affection of her ſoul unto Menecrates, and her deſire to break off this marriage with Arpalice, prompted her to appear; and the ſooner, becauſe her Brother, in point of honour, and for her intereſt, and that of Thraſimedes, did extreamly preſs her unto it; So that after ſhe had imployed a quarter of an hour in dreſſing her ſelf, ſo that it might appear her beauty deſerved not to be ſlighted, ſhe went unto the Palace of Crœſſus, being conducted by Philiſtion; But ſhe entred with ſo good a grace unto the Chamber of the Princeſs Palmis, where all the illuſtrious company was aſſembled, that ſhe did attract the eyes of all thoſe who were preſent: Androclea was handſome, and of a large ſtature, her aſpect was very Majeſtical with a mixture of ſweetneſs with it; and though every particular feature was alike beautiful, yet ſhe had the ayr of a high beauty. After ſhe was come into the Chamber of the Lidian Princeſs, and that Cyrus had very civilly received her, he preſented her unto Timaretta and Palmis. As ſoon as ſhe entred, ſhe looked about her, to ſee if ſhe could know Arpalice, by the diſcription of Philiſtion. Arpalice for her part, having a great deſire to ſee Androclea, who had the advantage to move the heart of Menecrates before her, ſhe did moſt attentively look upon her, ſo that looking accidentally upon each other at once, and Androclea believing her ſhe looked upon to be Arpalice, ſo it chanced that they both bluſhed, and Cyrus perceived it: I ſee very well (ſaid he unto them) That there is no need you ſhould be named unto each other, and that you know one another before you be acquainted: Since I would excuſe Menecrates, replied Androclea, I ſhall be very glad that ſo perfect a beauty as this Lady I look upon hath cauſed his inconſtancy, upon condition, that this inconſtancy do ceaſe: The applauds which you give me, replied Arpalice, may well make me bluſh for ſhame; but in lieu of rejecting them, give me leave to tell you, that I am much joyed, to ſee how according to all likelyhood Menecrates will no ſooner ſee you, but he will repent himſelf of the injuſtice which he hath done you, and the trouble he hath put me unto. After this Cyrus, who deſired to be ſpeedily delivered of all buſineſs that might hinder him from the the thoughts of Mandana, began to aſk Arpalice what were her intereſt in this buſineſs? But this diſcreet Lady anſwered him, That ſhe had only two: The firſt, To be diſpenſed from that ingagement wherein the teſtament of Menecrates his Parents and hers had brought her with him: The other, That by his wiſedom and prudence, he would prevent Thraſimedes and Menecrates from fighting. After this, Arpalice was ſilent; though if ſhe had humored the ſecret motions of her heart, ſhe would have urged the matter more preſſingly in advantage of Thraſimedes, but her modeſty did check her. After this, Cyrus aſked Androclea, What ſhe pretended unto? I pretend, ſaid ſhe, unto nothing, but to puniſh Menecrates, for not beginning to love the fair Arpalice as ſoon as he began to know her: that you will oblige him to keep his word with one, whoſe merit and beauty is much inferiour unto hers whom he hath preferred before her; but I think him obliged to love her only, becauſe he hath promiſed: After this, Cyrus willed Philiſtion to give his opinion, who being no leſs bold than generous, told him freely, That ſince he was the friend of Thraſimedes, he would to his utmoſt oppoſe the Marriage of Menecrates with Arpalice: And moreover, he being the Brother of Androclea, he could not endure it; and therefore Me*necrates* muſt of neceſſiy prepare himſelf to fight both againſt Thraſimedes and himſelf, if he thought of marrying Arpalice.

Cyrus hearing what Arpalice, Androclea, and Philiſtion pretended, deſired them to withdraw into another Chamber; after which he ſent for Menecrates, Parmenides, and Thraſimedes, one after another: But before he aſked the firſt of theſe, what were his pretentions? He hinted unto him, That now Philiſtion and Androclea were at Sardis, with intentions to hold him to his word. But Sir (ſaid he and cryed out) If the heart which I had then, when I promiſed Androclea to love her, be changed, what can I do to ſatisfie her? Moreover, I did make no further promiſe unto her, but to do what I could to break off with Arpalice, and I wiſh unto the Gods that it were in my power to do it: for conſidering the ſcorn of that cruel Lady, and the goodneſs of Androclea not yet to hate me, I ſhould be moſt glad to be revenged of her; but ſince I am not able Sir, I conjure you to remember, that the wills of the dead ought to be inviolable: However (ſaid Cyrus unto Menecrates) It is juſt you hearken to the complaints of Androclea: Menecrates would have refuſed it, but the Princeſs Timaretta, and the Princeſs Palmis commanded him to go into the room where ſhe was with Arpalice and Philiſtion, upon condition, that Cleonice and Doraliſa would conduct him thither, unto which he was obedient. Then Parmenides appeared, who, having quite forgot Cleoxene for Cydipe, declared that he had no other intereſt in the buſineſs between Menecrates and Thraſimedes, but only his promiſe to the firſt of them, to do him all the good offices he could unto his Siſter, from which he would not alter, though he did not marry Cleoxene. Parmenides having ſaid all he could, he retired, and Thraſimedes was brought in, tho' it was not neceſſary to ask him what he pretended unto, it being eaſie to comprehend, that ſo they would give Arpalice unto him, he would be no longer an enemy unto Menecrates: Yet for orders ſake, Cyrus would have him ſpeak, which he did with ſo much Spirit, and expreſſed ſuch ſenſible ſymptoms of Love unto Arpalice, that all thoſe who heard him, were abſolutely on his ſide; ſo that retiring, as the other did, he left the illuſtrious Cyrus at liberty to take the advice of the Princeſs Timaretta, of the Princeſs Palmis, of the Prince Seſoſtris, of the Prince Myſiles, and of all the company. But though it was not uſual to ſee ſo many perſons together without difference in opinion, yet at this time they all concurred. At the firſt, there were ſome who though they were perſwaded that Thraſimedes did better deſerve Arpalice than Menecrates, yet they had much ado to diſpenſe with the laſt will of a Father which he makes when he is dying: But after they heard Cyrus ſpeak, they altered their opinion, and conceived that Marriages ought to be ſo free, as Parents, if they be wiſe, will never conſtrain their children to marry againſt their inclination: Judge then I beſeech you ſaid this great Prince, whether it be not blameable in a Father to marry his child againſt her inclination; and whether it be not permittable for Arpalice to follow her own will, not her Fathers: Since he could not foreſee when he appointed her to marry Menecrates, that Menecrates would ſlight her a long time, that Menecrates would promiſe Androclea to break off with Arpalice, that Menecrates would love his Daughter only out of a capritious humour, and to hinder his Rival from being happy: For my part, ſaid the Princeſs Palmis, I cannot think a Father ought by will to diſpoſe of the affection of his children; who would undertake, ſaid the Princeſs Timaretta, that the young child which the Father would have to be the Husband of his Daughter hereafter, will be virtuous? I am perſwaded, replied Seſoſtris, That Fathers who make ſuch Teſtaments, do intend they ſhould be obeyed only in caſe the match prove fit and reaſonable: Since ſo, ſaid the Prince Myrſiles, a ſentence muſt be pronounced in favour of Thraſimedes; My opinion is, ſaid Cyrus, to endeavour the making of as few unhappy in this buſineſs as we can, and to prevent the fighting of ſuch brave men, as on which ſide ſoever the Victory falls, the Conquerour will have cauſe to regret it: For though Menecrater be inconſtant, and a little capritious, yet he is a man of Soul and Spirit: I beſeech you conſider (ſaid Cyrus, and turned to both the Princeſſes) that if Arpalice be injoyned to accompliſh the Teſtament of her Father by marrying Menecrates, they will all be unhappy: Menecrates will be ingaged to fight both againſt Thraſimedes and Philiſtion; againſt the firſt upon the ſcore of his Miſtreſs, againſt the ſecond upon the ſcore of his Siſter: Doubtleſs there would be many unfortunate, replied Lycaſte, but not all, for Menecrates would enjoy his Miſtreſs: 'Tis true replyed Cyrus, he would enjoy the beauty of Arpalice, but I am fully perſwaded, that ſince he would not enjoy her heart, he would never enjoy contentment; and the greateſt good that Menecrates would have in the buſineſs, would be the hindrance of his Rival from being happy; for as ſoon as the firſt days of marriage are over, he will turn even deſperate for marrying one who hates him, and who perhaps he will hate alſo, for conſidering the temper of Menecrates, I am the moſt deceived of all men living, if the enjoyment of that which he loves, be not an infallible means to quench the flames of Love in his heart: As for Arpalice, it muſt needs be concluded, that ſince ſhe marries Menecrates whom ſhe loves not, and does not marry Thraſimedes whom ſhe loves, ſhe would be moſt miſerable. Androclea for her part, ſhe would not be ſatisfied, to ſee a man whom ſhe loved become the Husband of another; nor would Philiſtion be at all contented to ſee Menecrates; after a promiſe to marry his Siſter married unto another; and as for Thraſimedes, it muſt be concluded, that he being in love with Arpalice, and knowing himſelf to be loved, he would be one of the moſt miſerable Lovers in the World, if his Rival ſhould enjoy his Miſtreſs: So that it is apparent, by giving Arpalice unto Menecrates, all thoſe who are intereſted in this buſineſs, are made unhappy; for Parmenides himſelf, though he make a ſhew of being ingaged in the intereſt of Menecrates, yet if I be not deceived he will be glad that his Siſter would not marry the Brother of one whom he will ſee no more, and one who hath treated him ill. On the contrary, if Arpalice be given unto Thraſimedes, both they will be happy: Philiſtion will be ſatisfied, Juſtice will be done unto Androclea, Parmonides will not be diſobliged, and Menecrates will be forced to be happy whether he will or no, ſince he may have a Wife who loves him, and is delivered from one who hates him. Moreover, though he will not ſubmit his mind unto reaſon, yet he will have no ground of any quarrel but with Thraſimedes, and hath nothing to ſay with Philiſtion: And alſo as ſoon as Thraſimedes is married unto Arpalice, the mind of Menecrates may change; Many will fight with a Rival in hopes to benefit by his defeat, but few will fight ſo willingly againſt the husband of his Miſtreſs. Cyrus having given his opinion all the company was of his opinion; So that contriving how to perſwade Menecrates to be contented with Androclea, and to yeild Arpalice unto Thraſimedes, they began to ſweeten the matter as much as they could, reſolving to make up the marriage between Thraſimedes and Arpalice before Menecrates was delivered from his Guards: But as they were diſcanting upon this buſineſs, and whil'ſt his deſtiny was in the hand of ſo many illuſtrious perſons, he was pitifully perplexed between Arpalice,who looked upon him extreamly ill on the one ſide,and Androclea who chid him on the other,and in ſuch a manner,as would have ſoften'd a heart of ſtone. Unjuſt man that you are(ſaid ſhe unto him,and ſhewed him Arpalice)Why did you prefer me before this moſt excellent Beauty?and ſince you were ſo unjuſt, you ſhould have advertiſed me of your inconſtancy, you ſhould have ſent me her picture, and thereby have rendred your weakneſs more excuſable; at leaſt you ought to have asked me pardon for betraying me, and for giving me a heart, whereof you were not Maſter, but in lieu of that, you left me in an injurious ſilence, during which time to be faithful unto you, I might not have caſt off a man who would have zealouſly loved me; had you acquainted me with your imbecility, I ſhould for ever have concealed that affection which I had towards you, but having manifeſted your weakneſs another way, and diſcovered mine unto my friends, you are obliged either to keep your word with me, or I muſt reſolve upon death: Then we muſt both die (ſaid Menecrates to her in a moſt horrible confuſion) For it is impoſſible I ſhould endure Arpalice to be taken from me, and that you ſhould upbraid me with my crime: I pray (replied Arpalice fiercely) pretend nothing unto me, and be confident, that though I had no other reaſon to hate you, but for your infidelity unto Androclea, I ſhould eternally abhor you: For heavens ſake Madam, ſaid Menecrates, do not look upon this excellent Lady as the cauſe of your hatred: You may look upon your ſelf as the cauſe of my eſteem, replied Arpalice, if you will be juſt in ſatisfying Androclea, and leaving me in quiet: I wiſh it would pleaſe the Gods, ſaid he, That you would let me be quiet,and would not by your inevitable charms moleſt thoſe ſweets which I ſhould otherwiſe find in the fair Androclea: However it be (ſaid Arpalice to him) I do declare unto you, that though the illuſtrious Cyrus ſhould determine it ſo, I will never be yours, I will freely forſake all the eſtate which my Father left me; but as for my liberty, know moſt aſſuredly that I will preſerve it intire unto my ſelf: Therefore without further ingaging your ſelf to do freſh wrongs unto a Lady of Androclea's merit. let me adviſe you to take up a firm reſolution of conquering your ſelf: And to teſtifie I will do you no ill offices unto her, but on the contrary ſhould be extreemly glad ſhe would pardon you, I will become your Interceſſor. And then Arpalice began to Court Androclea unto an Oblivion of his Crime, and there paſſed ſuch a diſcourſe between thoſe two Ladies, as did extreamly divert Cleonice and Doraliſa, eſpecially the laſt of theſe, whoſe ſtout and fiery ſoul took delight in triumphing over the weakneſs of another.

In the mean time, Menecrates full of confuſion and deſpair, was ſilent all the while Arpalice and Androclea talked; he caſt his eyes upon Arpalice, and ſaw ſo many ſymptoms of hatred in her face, that he was forced to recal and deject his eyes. And if he looked upon Androclea, he ſaw in her countenance ſo many ſigns of Love, maugre his infidelity, that he was forced to withdraw his looks, leſt he ſhould be conſtrain'd to find in his heart ſome remorſe of his fault, yet he could not chuſe but ſometimes look upon them both, though he himſelf knew not why he did ſo; but he alwayes found ſo much fury in the eyes of Arpalice, and ſo much ſweetneſs and melancholy in the looks of Androclea, that ſhame began to be as ſtrong in his heart as Love; and he found a kind of trouble in his ſoul, which he thought never to have an hour before. Androclea had ſuch a kind of paſſionate and languiſhing ſweetneſs mixed with her melancholy and ſorrows, as was enough to mollifie even cruelty it ſelf; and one might perceive by the ſober luſtre of her eyes, that if ſhe had not reſtrained them, they would have flowed with tears; ſo that it was impoſſible to look upon her without pity. One might alſo perceive by the motion of her fair neck, that ſhe ſtifled a thouſand ſighs, and it was apparently viſible, that her heart was full of Love and affection. This being the ſtate of things, and Cyrus having reſolved by the advice of the whole company, that Thraſimedes ſhould marry Arpalice, and Menecrates Androclea: He cauſed him to be called in the laſt, and told him, that upon a through examination of all the paſſages between Thraſimedes and him, he could not conceive that he had any cauſe to complain; that Thraſimedes had not loved Arpalice, until he received it from his mouth, that he was not in Love with her, and therefore he had no right to quarrel with him: That as for Arpalice, he could not accuſe her of any injuſtice, conſidering the manner of his carriage towards her: That as for Androclea, he was obliged to make her ſatisfaction by making good that promiſe which he made her, and by this means Philiſtion would be contented as well as ſhe; he conjured him to believe, that he conſidered his intereſt without any prejudication: And to ſpeak with reaſon, he ſhould do him wrong, if he took Androclea from him: He deſired him to conſider, that ſince his ſervices could not prevail with Arpalice, his violences would never move her; and that if ſhe did love Thraſimedes, as it was apparent ſhe did, his fighting with him without juſt cauſe would not alter her. Then he conjured him to be conformable unto his will, and to ſubmit unto the neceſſity of never enjoying Arpalice, and that with a good will, he would by his reaſon and height of courage vanquiſh himſelf.

Menecrates hearkened unto the diſcourſe of Cyrus with a profound ſilence, but yet without any great attention; and one might perceive, that he did more examine his own reaſons, then thoſe which Cyrus repreſented unto him. But in concluſion, ſeeing himſelf put unto the neceſſity of an anſwer, he beſeeched the Prince to give him three daies of reſpite, during which time, he would endeavour to be conformable unto his deſires. With all my heart, ſaid Cyrus, upon condition that you will every one of thoſe daies give me a viſit unto the fair Androclea: I do conſent unto it, replied Menecrates, upon condition I may have the liberty to give another alſo unto the cruel Arpalice. It ſhall be ſo alſo, replied Cyrus, in hopes that her averſion will perſwade you better then my words; and that you may know, I carry my ſelf in this buſineſs more as your friend then as your Judg. After this, Menecrates with his Guard retired: Thraſimedes alſo returned with his, and all the company parted. Arpalice, who was then raviſhed with the ſight of Androclea, deſired Doraliſa to contrive it ſo as that ſhe might lodg in the Palace, but there was no need of her contrivance in that: For Cyrus ſeeing all the Ladies re-enter into the Chamber where he was, told Androclea and Arpalice that ſince it ſeemed they agreed as well, as their Lovers did ill, they ſhould be together, as the other were parted: After which, he deſired Lycaſte ſhe would be pleaſed to let Androclea be her Neighbour in a Chamber neer hers, and ſo it was; by which means, the grandure and beauty of the company was augmented by the preſence of Androclea. In the mean time, Cyrus thinking all time loſt which was not imployed in the ſervice of Mandana, or at leaſt in the thoughts of her: He recompenced that time which he had ſpent all this day about the intereſts of others, by paſſing away all the night without any thought, but of his deareſt Princeſs, or of his Rivals. Poor Mazares, he was the moſt unhappy man of all, becauſe he was without all hope; and if he had not been a man of an extraordinary virtue, he could never have carried the matter as he did, for he did lock up the violence of his thoughts within the cloſet of his heart, that there appeared in his face only a common ſorrow, and as it were an indifferent coldneſs, and thoſe who ſaw him would have ſaid, that he was only a Prince of a natural melancholy, and ſerious temper, ſo abſolutely was he a Maſter over himſelf; but for all that, his flood of ſorrows did one day ſwell very high, and overflowed the banks of his mind by an accident which cauſed them. Since this Prince was not with them in the Chamber of the Princeſs Palmis, when the differences of Thraſimedes and Menecrates were diſcuſſed, he had not ſeen Cyrus all that day, and knew not whether or no he had received any intelligence concerning Mandana: So that having a burning deſire to know whether he had or no, he came betimes the next morning unto the Chamber of Cyrus, who after a diſcontented night without one wink of ſleep, was up very early, and looking in his Cabinet upon the only reliques of his dear Princeſs, to wit, of her picture, and the rich Scarf which ſhe heretofore denied him, and which ſince he had from the hands of Mazares, after his Shiprack with Mandana: So that when he was told that Mazares deſired to ſee him, he imagined that he came to bring him ſome intelligence concerning Mandana: So that commanding him haſtily to enter, Mazares, did ſo; and he was no ſooner two ſteps within the Cloſet, but he ſpied upon the Table the Picture of Mandana, and the Scarf which he left in the hands of Artamenes; the ſight whereof did ſo freſhly revive in his heart the injuſtice which he had done that Princeſs in betraying her, as he had done by carrying her away, as he could not forbear expreſſions of the interior ſorrows of his ſoul: Oh Sir, ſaid he ſadly unto Cyrus, I wiſh you had only let me ſeen that fatal Scarf, without a ſight of that Divine Picture; for by the viſion of that mark of my crime, without the apparition of that Beauty which cauſed me to commit it, I ſhould have been only expoſed to a renovation of my ſorrows and repentance, and had been out of danger to revive my Love: I ask you pardon (replied Cyrus, and would have ſhut the Caſe in which the Picture was) for expoſing you unto ſo great a danger: Alas Sir (replied Mazares, ſighing, and holding Cyrus by the arm) I know not why I ſhould fear it, or complain; but I am moſt certain, that though my Love were more violent, if it were poſſible, then it is, yet I would not attempt any thing which would offend you, as long as our Princeſs loves you, and not me: Therefore ſince you may be confident that ſhe will for ever love you, and never me, do not envy me the happineſs of one minutes ſeeing the Picture of Divine Mandana, to the end, that the ſight of the adored Princeſs whom I have ſo much offended, and cauſed all her misforrunes, might augment my repentance: So that Sir, in lieu of reviving my affection, you will add unto my remorſe that ever I carried her away: Look then upon the picture of our Princeſs, moſt generous Rival, replied Cyrus, but look upon it with ſuch thoughts as will keep me your friend, and not fruſtrate that Heroique reſolution which you have taken, of contenting your ſelf with the eſteem and friendſhip of Mandana, and endeavouring her releaſe: I do promiſe it Sir, ſaid this perplexed Lover; after which he looked upon the picture, and he had no ſooner caſt his eyes upon it, and a little contemplated upon it, but bluſhing, he found ſuch a violent agitation of heart, that doubting the conſtancy of his reſolution, he haſtily ſhut the Caſe, and reſtoring it to Cyrus: Here Sir, ſaid he unto him, take this moſt Angelique Picture, I am of a weaker temper than I thought my ſelf, and dare not ſo confidently anſwer for my thoughts, but to teſtifie the deſires I have to overcome them, give me leave only to look upon this Scarf, which revives in my memory Mandana floting upon the Waves, and ready to periſh through my default: Methinks I ſee her yet (ſaid this amorous Prince) when having no other help but mine, in ſpite of the impetuous Waves, ſhe endeavoured to be looſe from me, chooſing rather to die, than receive life from the hand of her Raviſher: But alas, divine Princeſs, ſaid he, you were ignorant of that reformation which was in my ſoul: I wiſh, moſt generous Rival (ſaid he, and looked upon Cyrus) that I were aſſured to have all my life the ſame thoughts which then I had, when a mountain of horrid Waves overwhelmed us, which looſed this Scarf, and ſeparated me from our Princeſs, whom then I ſaw ſwallowed up by that terrible Element, and thought to be ever loſt: I wiſh Sir once more, that this horrid Idea might be for ever imprinted in my mind: But alas Sir, many times againſt my will I ſee ſuch things as are fuel to the fire of my paſſion.

Mazares ſpoke all this in ſuch ſadneſs and ſincerity, that the heart of Cyrus, though a Rival, melted; and he was ſo ſweet in his expreſſions, that Mazares had no cauſe of complaint: And after this miſerable Prince had condoled his Fate, and Cyrus lamented his bad fortune, and both of them pitied and cheered up each other, they asked one another whether they heard any thing concerning the Princeſs, ſince they ſaw each other, and did mutually diſpleaſe by anſwering, they heard nothing. In the mean time, ſince their diſcourſe had continued long, Cyrus was told, that many waited in his Chamber, ſo that he went out of his Cloſet to diſpatch them who had any buſineſs with him. Afterwards, he went to viſit Arianita, purpoſely to talk with her concerning his dear Princeſs. He had often a mind to do as the King of Aſſyria had done, but upon better thoughts he conceived ceived it better ſervice to Mandana for him to ſtay in ſuch a place where he might receive the intelligence of all who went to inquire after her: So that contenting himſelf with preparation of all things in readineſs to march, as ſoon as he ſhould receive intelligence where ſhe was, he omitted nothing which did become his generoſity, either for the Princes whom he had vanquiſhed, or for thoſe whom he protected, or for his friends, or his Domeſticks, or his Souldiers: So that the third day which Menecrates had taken, being come, he omitted nothing which concerned his buſineſs; but he underſtood, that he was the laſt night fallen ſick, and ſo violently, as it was not fit to ask him his reſolution. Cyrus no ſooner heard of this, but he appointed Phyſitians to take care of Menecrates: When they did viſit him, they found him in ſuch a deſperate condition, as that they durſt not anſwer for his life. This News being told unto Androclea, ſhe was ſo perplexed at it, that her affection would not permit her to follow the exact rules of handſomneſs, conſidering the infidelity of Menecrates, but ſhe did every day viſit him with Lycaſte: Alſo Arpalice, hoping that the ſight of Doraliſa would work upon the heart of Menecrates, ſhe deſired Lycaſte to carry her unto him: At the firſt Menecrates ſeemed angry; afterwards, as his diſeaſe increaſed, he ſeemed to take no notice; but when it began to diminiſh, and when he conſidered that ſhe did not ſo much as think upon him all the while he was ſick, and that he had ſeen the fair eyes of Androclea ſwim a thouſand times in tears for him, he permitted the ſight of her with leſs trouble, and a while after, he looked upon her with delight: It might well be ſaid, that as his Fever vaniſhed, ſo did his infidelity, and that he recovered the health of his body and mind both together, and that he was able to follow the Dictates of reaſon, and the Counſels of Cyrus. In the mean time, ſuch magnificent Equipage was in preparation, for ſending Timaretta unto the King her Father, as it was evident Cyrus would do her all the honours he could. Alſo he ordered that Ships ſhould be ready at the ſame Port where Seſoſtris imbarqued at his coming unto Aſia. But whil'ſt all this equipage was making ready, Seſoſtris without any impatience at all expected the day of his departure, for he found ſo many ſweets in Timaretta, and ſo much ſatisfaction with Cyrus, that he did not regret this little prolixity which kept him from his compleat felicity. The Prince Artamas for his part, did every day find ſo many occaſions of doing ſervice unto his Princeſs, either in behalf of Crœſſus, or of Myrſiles, that he would not change his happineſs with any; and when Cyrus compared the ſtate wherein he was with his own, he thought himſelf much more miſerable; but alſo when he remembred the condition wherein he had ſeen the Prince Artamas, and conſidered the alteration of his fortune, he did not deſpair of his own: but e're long after he was moſt ſenſibly perplexed, for after many days tedious expectation, thoſe whom he ſent unto Milete returned, who told him, that certainly the King of Pontus paſſed not by that Coaſt. Thoſe alſo whom he ſent unto Guides, returned as ignorant as the firſt, who could learn no more than thoſe who had been at Epheſus, and many other Maritine Towns, all who reported for certain, that the King of Pontus touched not in thoſe places; ſo that Cyrus and Mazares were in a moſt inconceiveable perplexity; when one morning he who had orders to go into Cumes returned, and ſo opportunely, that he ſpoke unto Cyrus and Mazares, before he had ſpoken unto any of his acquaintance; for having a great deſire to tell that Prince what he knew, and knowing he ſhould be highly rewarded for the pains he had taken, he went ſtrait unto the Cittadel, where he found Cyrus talking with Mazares in his Cloſet, conſulting what was the moſt expedient reſolutions for them to take. As ſoon as he appeared, Cyrus knew him to be the ſame who had orders for Cumes, he went towards him, and asked haſtily whether he had learned any intelligence: Sir, ſaid he, thanks be to the Gods, I have been more happy than the reſt of my Companions, and am able to inform you where the Princeſs Mandana is. At theſe words Cyrus and Mazares did both of them at once imbrace him, and bad him tell them what he knew. Sirs, ſaid he unto them, I know of certainty, that the King of Pontus and the Princeſs Mandana are at Cumes, but they are known by very few: I know that the King of Pontus at his landing, did ſet up the colours of Milete in his Ship, as if it had been a Merchants Veſſel: I know alſo, that he came thither in the night; that before he landed, he ſent a ſervant in a little Boat unto the Prince of Cumes, who as you know is very young, though he be moſt abſolute in his Dominions. In the mean time, though I know not the Reaſon of his tranſaction, yet he doth not diſcover unto the Inhabitants of Cumes; that he would give any retreat unto the King of Pontus, but on the contrary, to carry it more cloſely, he does not lodge him in his Palace, and the Princeſs Mandana is lodged in a private houſe, though ſtrictly guarded: Moreover, under the pretence of your great Victories; and that all Aſia is in Arms, the Prince of Cumes begins to tackle up his Ships, and to make Levies of armed men in the Country: The reaſon, ſaid Cyrus, why this Prince will not have it known that he gives a retreat unto the King of Pontus, certainly is, becauſe he is not in a condition to defend them: It is not to be doubted, anſwered Mazares: But yet ſaid Cyrus unto him who brought the news, how came you to know all this? And how can we give credit unto your words? Sir, replied he, I have travelled much in my life, and was a Souldier very young, and ſo it falls out, that a ſervant unto him at whoſe houſe Mandana is lodged, was my Comrade in the Mileſian Wars againſt Policrates, ſo that meeting this man upon the Port of Cumes, and there renewing our acquaintance, I reſolved to make uſe of him for the diſcovery of what I deſired to know; but I was not put unto the neceſſity of his diſcretion, for inſenſibly paſſing from one diſcourſe unto another, as I was telling him, that he was a very happy man in dwelling within a peaceable Town, whil'ſt all Aſia was in Arms, he began to tell me, that Cumes e're long would have its turn, and afterward told me all that I tell you: And he told me, that his Maſter with whom Mandana lodged was extreamly troubled, that the Prince of Cumes had given a retreat unto the King of Pontus, becauſe he feared that it would be the ruin of his Country, telling me, that he heard his Maſter expreſs as much unto his Wife, not thinking that he did hear him. But, ſaid Cyrus unto him, know you nothing but what this man told you? Yes Sir, replied he, But I beſeech you lend me a little patience, and then I ſhall tell you, that after this which I have already told you, this man told me, that there was a Woman with that Princeſs, whom he pitied the moſt in the world; that ſometimes ſhe ſpoke unto him out of grated Windows which opened into a back Court, and endeavoured to ſuborn him to carry a Letter for her unto one whom ſhe would direct him unto, after he had promiſed fidelity, ſhe offered Jewels which ſhe ſhewed unto him, which ſeemed to be of a great value: But ſaid he unto me, I was put to a great nonplus, for I would not betray my Maſter, nor would I diſcover what this Woman ſaid unto me, leſt they ſhould lock her up and treat her ill: Oh my dear friend (ſaid I unto him, the better to perſwade him unto my deſires) your virtue is too too ſcrupulous. Let us divide the Jewels,and give me the *L*etter to carry, ſo may you be a gainer without danger: At the firſt he could hardly reſolve upon it; but after, ſeeing me ſo forward to be an accomplice of his crime,I brought him to conſent unto the Commiſſion of it; ſo that without more ado he took my counſel, he ſpoke that night unto Marteſia, he ſeemed to be perſwaded by her, he took the Jewels, and the Letter which was directed unto you, and brought both Letter and Jewels unto me: Oh moſt cruel man, ſaid Cyrus, Why did you not give me this Letter at the firſt? Becauſe, ſaid he, I would firſt make an orderly relation, but to repair that fault, I will give it unto you, and ſo he did, which Cyrus opening, found theſe words.

Marteſia unto the illuſtrious Cyrus.

Though the Princeſs continually complains of you, ſince I am confident it is without cauſe, I thought it fit to acquaint you, that we are at Cumes, where in all likelihood we ſhall for ſome time remain: If you will juſtifie your ſelf

ſelf unto her who accuſeth you, you muſt quit the Princeſs Araminta to come and releaſe her; but to comfort you, know that your Rival is no gainer by your diſgrace; but the Princeſs not being able, as the ſtate ſtands with her, to revenge her ſelf upon you, doth revenge upon him that infidelity whereof ſhe ſuſpects, I will not ſay, accuſeth you. In the mean time, be confident, that as ſoon as I ſee your Forces appear, I will ſpeak in your behalf, and plead hard in your juſtification. After this, I muſt further tell you, that I underſtand both by good fortune and craft, the King of Pontus fears to be beſieged, both by Sea and Land, and fears that if he ſee a Naval Army, he ſhall not be able to carry us away. This Sir is the advice of one, whoſe hopes are, that he who hath taken Artaxates, Babylon, and Sardis, will ere long put an end to all our misfortunes, and take Cumes

MARTESIA.

After that Cyrus had read this Letter, he ſhewed it unto M*azares*, who read it with ſome ſlight reſentments of joy; for though he hoped for nothing, yet it was ſome conſolation to know by this Letter, that M*andana* complained againſt Cyrus; and though he well conceived that time would juſtifie this Prince, yet he could not chuſe but find ſome ſweetneſs, in thinking that at that time ſhe loved him leſs than ſhe had done: As for Cyrus, doubtleſs he was grieved to know that the injuſtice of M*andana* continued; but alſo he was much joyed to know that M*arteſia* was his Advocate, and to know where M*andana* was. But before he reſolved upon any courſe, he asked him who gave him this Letter, if he knew any more? and why he did not endeavour to ſee M*arteſia* himſelf, to tell her how he was ſent purpoſely unto Cumes, to enquire news of the Princeſs? Sir, replied he, it was my deſign; for after I had taken the Letter, I told my friend, that I would leave all my ſhare of Jewels with him, upon condition he would bring me to the ſpeech of M*arteſia*, which he promiſed me: But as ill luck was, this man ſpeaking unto her was ſeen by his Maſter, who obſerving him earneſt with her, turned him away immediately, ſo that he returned unto me, and told me, that now he was not in a condition to do as I deſired; and ſo I ſeeing that I was not able to do you any further ſervice in that place, I returned hither with all the haſte I could make. Cyrus ſeeing that the man had no more to ſay, cauſed him to be ſo magnificently rewarded, as it was apparent that a Prince ſo liberal was deeply amorous: But as he diſmiſſed him, he charged him to be very ſilent, and ſpeak not a word of any thing he knew concerning M*andana*: After this, M*azares* and he conſulted upon the beſt expedient in the buſineſs. And after they had ſeriouſly conſidered upon all the circumſtances, they concluded it the beſt courſe to ſeem being ignorant of where the Princeſs M*andana* was, until they were in a readineſs of beſieging Cumes, eſpecially until they had a Navy ready to block up the Port of Cumes, if it were poſſible; and the better to conceal it, Cyrus gave it out unto all the World, that he could not diſcover where ſhe was,and ſo more ſubtilly deludes the Spies of the King of Pontus which he had in Sardis; yet M*azares* adviſed him to ſend unto divers places, as if he endeavoured to inquire, which Cyrus obſerved, and in publique diſpatched many Officers to that purpoſe: But to loſe no time, and the better to palliate his deſign, he ſent Leontidas to Thraſibulas, with ample inſtructions of what he deſired him to do, conjuring him to ſet out as many Ships as he could, and arm them as well and ſpeedily as poſſible, deſiring him to colour his preparations ſo, as none ſhould ſuſpect they were for him, conjuring him alſo to ingage the Prince of M*ytilene*. Alſo he ſent M*agaſides* unto the Prince of Phyloxipes, to whom he writ a Letter of thanks for the good hopes which he gave him, by letting him know the Oracle which the Princeſs of Salamis had received, and which had been ſo happily accompliſhed; but he conjured him alſo to procure ſome Ships for the King his Maſter: He ſent alſo unto the Prince of Cicily upon the ſame buſineſs: And to have an eye always whether the King of Pontus remained ſtill at Cumes, he ſent thither the ſame man, who brought him the intelligence, but he did not give it out he ſent him thither: He gave him a Letter to M*arteſia*, and Jewels wherewith to ſuborn born thoſe who guarded the Princeſs, and ſo by that means he might get admittance to deliver Marteſia a Letter: He gave him alſo two truſty and faithful Slaves, that he might ſend them any whither if occaſion were, when he came to Cumes Alſo he reſolved with Mazares, that their Land Army ſhould not move until the Navy were out at Sea, leſt it ſhould too ſoon alarm the Prince of Cumes and the King of Pontus, and ſo ruine their deſign of releaſing Mandana in lieu of advancing it. In the mean time, they ſeemed to the World as if they grieved extreamly, that they could not hear any intelligence where the Princeſs was; but their real ſorrow was, to know that ſhe was in ſo ſtrong a Town as Cumes, which at that time was a terror to all her Neighbours; yet notwithſtanding, ſince Cyrus never aſſaulted any which he did not take, and ſince his Valour never met with any obſtacles which he did not ſurmount, the hopes of vanquiſhing once more cauſed ſome tranquility in his ſoul. Things ſtanding upon theſe terms, Cyrus received Letters from Ciaxares, by Poſts which he had ſet up, which Letters intimated unto him, that his power was not at all limited, but that he might diſpoſe abſolutely of all things, that he might give and take away Crowns as he pleaſed, and do with all his Conqueſts what he thought moſt fit; that he thought it convenient as well as he did, it would be more eaſie to keep Lidia, by reſtoring it unto Crœſſus upon the conditions which he propoſed, than by guarding it, and making him a Slave: Alſo that by making him a Tributary King he did himſelf much honour, ſince he made him a moſt illuſtrious Subject; adding notwithſtanding, that to keep him within the compaſs of his duty, and prevent revolts, he would not have him reſtore his Treaſures unto him, but deſired him to take them unto himſelf. After this, Ciaxares lamented the misfortune of Mandana, and incouraged him to purſue his Victories until he had releaſed her. Cyrus then having abſolute Authority to treat Crœſſus as he pleaſed, took up a reſolution worthy of his great ſoul; for as the King of Phrigia, and Artamas were talking in his Chamber, he told the firſt of them, that ſince he could not find to break off the Marriage of the Prince Artamas with the Princeſs Palmis, and having no mind he ſhould marry the Daughter of a King without a Kingdom, he was reſolved to reſtore that Crown unto Crœſſus which he had loſt. Oh Sir, ſaid the Prince Artamas, I pray heaven I have rightly underſtood you: Yes, replied Cyrus, and to teſtifie that I would have a perfect reconciliation between Crœſſus and you, I would have you go and tell him from me, that the King of Medes having left the diſpoſition of his Crown entirely unto me, I do reſtore it unto him, upon condition he will become the Vaſſal of Ciaxares, as the King of Armenia is; that he ſhall pay a ſmall Tribute as a mark of his dependency; that he ſhall follow me to the Wars with the Prince his Son, until I have releaſed the Princeſs Mandana, and that until I ſhall depart unto the place where I ſhall hear ſhe is, they ſhall have Guards upon them; and this, not that I ſhall make any queſtion of their words which they ſhall paſs, but becauſe the people ſhall not make any new Inſurrection which may force me to ruine him. After this, the King of Phrigia returned a million of thanks and applauds unto Cyrus: But Cyrus knowing that it would be the height of joy unto the Prince Artamas, that ſhe could tell the Princeſs Palmis ſhe ſhould ſee the King her Father upon his Throne again, impoſed no ſilence upon him, but conjured him to do it in all haſte, and perform his Commiſſion: But ſince I know you deſire to go unto the Chamber of the Princeſs Palmis, before you go unto the Chamber of Crœſſus her Father, I conjure you to do ſo, and tell her that I am extreamly glad I am able to do any thing which ſhall be pleaſing unto her. Artamas anſwered the civilities of Cyrus with a profound reverence; after which, he went in all haſte unto his dear Princeſs to acquaint her with the happy change in her Fathers fortune.

This news did ſo ſurprize her, that ſhe could hardly believe it; but ſince ſhe could not chuſe but give credit unto the words of Artamas, her joys were above her expreſſions, yet ſhe would not permit any long repetitions of his teſtimony, for ſhe was ſo impatient, that Crœſſus ſhould know his good fortune, as ſhe preſſed Artamas above twenty times to go and tell him, which accordingly he did, after he had preſented the complement of Cyrus unto her: Then he went unto the King of Lidia, whom he found ſitting in a profound melancholy: As ſoon as Artamas entred into the Chamber, Crœſſus did riſe up to receive him; but Artamas, as ſoon as ever he had leaſure told him, that Cyrus had reſtored the Crown of Lidia unto him: Oh, I beſeech you, ſaid Crœſſus, and interrupted him, do not add weight unto my Chains, by puffing me up into any falſe hopes of aſcending the Throne: No Sir, replied Artamas, the happineſs which I tell you of, is none of thoſe which are to be hoped long for before enjoyment; you are already King of Lidia, if you pleaſe. And then Artamas began to tell him the conditions which Cyrus required upon his reeſtabliſhment, which Crœſſus did apprehend to be ſo ſweet and eaſie, conſidering the unfortunate condition which he expected all his life, as they did not diminiſh his joys of aſcending the Throne. As they were thus in diſcourſe, Chriſantes entred, who came to tell Crœſſus, that Cyrus entreated him he would not take it ill, if he added one condition more unto thoſe, which Artamas was to tell him, before he made a publique Declaration of his reeſtabliſhment. The words of Chriſantes did exceedingly perplex both thoſe Princes: Crœſſus began to doubt of his good fortune, and Artamas apprehended no leſs, at leaſt that the condition which Cyrus would add, was of ſome hard and ſhameful nature for the King of Lidia; ſince he had not charged him with it. But in concluſion, Chriſantes addreſſing his ſpeech unto Crœſſus, Sir, ſaid he unto him, the orders which I have to preſent unto you from the Prince my Maſter is, that the ſame day which he ſhall make choice of to reſtore your Crown unto you, in one of your moſt famous Temples, and in the ſight of all your Subjects, you will be pleaſed in the ſame Temple to give the Princeſs your Daughter unto the Prince Artamas, who by many ſervices hath deſerved her.

The diſcourſe of Chriſantes, did ſo pleaſingly ſurprize both thoſe two Princes, that they were a long time before they could ſpeak: But at the laſt, Crœſſus reviving out of his extaſie of admiration at the virtue of Cyrus, deſired Chriſantes to tell his Maſter, that as precious as his Crown was, which he reſtored him, he thought himſelf ſelf more obliged unto him, for giving ſuch a Husband unto his Daughter, than for giving him his Crown and Kingdom: And he might aſſure him, that this laſt thing which he deſired, ſhould be no impediment unto his aſcending the Throne, ſince he did not think him unworthy of it, and ſince his great ſoul conſented unto it. Artamas hearing Crœſſus ſpeak ſo, made a thouſand proteſtations of real ſervice, and afterwards applauded Cyrus to the Heavens: And the Prince Myrſiles coming then into rhe Chamber, and knowing the paſſages, he did participate in the joys of the King his Father, and added his Tribute of thanks and commendations unto his. After they had ſufficiently expreſſed their acknowledgments, the Prince Artamas and Chriſantes returned to Cyrus, to acquaint him with what joy and reſentments of gratitude Crœſſus, Myrſiles, and Palmis, received and admired the altitude of his generoſity to them; it was not only by their reports that Cyrus underſtood it, for Crœſſus not daring to ask the liberty of coming in perſon to expreſs his reſentments, did ſend unto him, as well as the Prince Myrſiles, and the Princeſs Palmis; But Cyrus knowing, that whoſoever obligeth ſoon, doth double the price of the obligation, he told the King of Phrigia, he would give orders, that things requiſite for this double ceremony ſhould be preſently made ready, to the end that the ſolemnity might be before the departure of Timaretta, and that the Marriage of the Prince Artamas might be honored with the preſence of the Prince Seſoſtris, and the Princeſs of Ægypt: In order unto which, Commiſſion is given nnto Chriſantes, and they begin all preparations for this great Feaſt. In the mean time, Artamas as ſoon as ever he went from Cyrus, acquainted Palmis with his freſh and high obligation, aggravating his joyes with ſo many raptures of Love, that this Princeſs never knew the greatneſs of it until now: For her part, ſhe being extreamly modeſt, ſhe expreſſed much leſs joy at the aſſurance of her marriage, than at her underſtanding that her Father was to be reſtored unto the Crown, though the ſucceſſion of it did not directly fall upon her; yet Artamas did not murmur, for knowing this Princeſs ſo well as he did, he ever thought that if ever he chanced to be happy, ſhe would hide ſome part of her ſatisfaction from him. In the mean time, though Cyrus did not intend that the buſineſs ſhould be blazed until the day of the ceremony, yet it was not poſſible to be hid, eſpecially ſince there was an enterview between the King of Phrigia and Crœſſus; ſo that ſome noyſe of it being vogued abroad, it was preſently divulged over all the World. Now was the name of Cyrus highly celebrated amongſt the Inhabitants of Sardis; but the admiration was, that the principal joy was, to underſtand that though their King was reſtored unto them, yet they were in a ſort under the power of Cyrus ſtill, ſince Crœſſus was Vaſſal of Ciaxares. One thing alſo was very extraordinary in this incounter; for though it be the cuſtome of that place, that when any one receives a benefit, to go and viſit thoſe who receive it and rejoyce with them, without any viſits unto him who conferred; yet upon this occaſion it was not ſo; for all thoſe of any Quality in Sardis, went to thank Cyrus, before they went to rejoyce with the King of Lidia, inſomuch as there was nothing to be ſeen but complements, both in the Palace and Cittadel. All the Ladies went alſo unto the Princeſs Palmis, as well thoſe in the Palace as thoſe in the Town, who could not chuſe but extol Cyrus, who in ſweetning the bitter misfortunes of thoſe he had vanquiſhed, did ſharpen his own: For when he conſidered Artamas was ſhortly to enjoy her he loved, and conſidered that Mandana was yet in Cumes, and in the hands of his Rival, that he muſt tediouſly tarry in expectation of a Naval Army to aſſault, and that the ſucceſs of the Siege was dubious, his ſufferings were incredible: The King of Aſſiria's abſence alſo did ſomewhat increaſe his perplexities, though his preſence was almoſt unſufferable. However, not to leſſen the joys of the Prince Artamas, whom he ſo highly eſteemed, he confined ſome part of his ſorrows unto the Cloſet of his heart, leſt they ſhould dull the joys of this glorious Feaſt, and leſt he ſhould fail in any circumſtance, he went to viſit Crœſſus and the Prince Myrſiles, but it was more as their friend than Conquerour: He went alſo to viſit the Princeſs Palmis, and the Princeſs Timeretta; but in his return unto his own lodging, he was much ſurprized to ſee Menecrates, who beginning to quit his Chamber that day, came to render thanks for the care which Cyrus had of him, and to acquaint him, that the malady of his body had cured the malady of his mind, and that ſo perfectly, as he came to tell him, that Androclea did merit his affection, and that he was ready to obey his commands, and not to look upon Thraſimedes as his Rival. Cyrus being even raviſhed at the converſion of Menecrates, did ſend immediately for Thraſimedes, Philiſtion and Parmenides, to whom having told the happy change which was in the heart of Menecrates, he found the two firſt of them very ready to imbrace him; and as for Parmenides, ſince he had no other concernment in the buſineſs, but that of Menecrates, ſince he was ſatisfied, he was ſo alſo, ſo that there remained nothing to do but to advertiſe Licaſte, but Cyrus needed not to trouble himſelf for that, for her Husband being come to Sardis with Liſia, Brother of Candiope, ſhe came to preſent them unto Cyrus, accompanied with Cydipe, Arpalice, Candiope and Androclea; ſo that by this means there was a perfect reconciliation made amongſt all thoſe perſons, whoſe intereſts were ſo confuſedly mingled: But to make it more ſolid, Cyrus conjured Menophiles, Licaſte's Husband, he would permit the marriage of Arpalice and Thraſimedes to be ſolemnized the next morning, which was the ſame day of Prince Artamas: He made the ſame requeſt alſo unto Philiſtion in behalf of Androclea and Menecrates; and ſince he knew the thoughts of Parmenides towards Cydipe, and of Philiſtion towards Candiope, he ſpoke unto Menophiles and Lycaſte in behalf of the firſt, and to Liſia and Candiope in behalf of the other, and he ſpoke with ſuch perſwaſive Rhetorique, and found ſo few obſtacles in the minds of thoſe perſons whom he endeavouring to perſwade, that they all conſented unto his deſires.

Thus theſe four marriages were made up in an inſtant, and three differences, whoſe conſequences might have proved fatal, were happily reconciled: The buſineſs being known, Lycaſte and her fair company were no ſooner returned unto the Palace, but the Princeſſes came to viſit her, Doraliſa and Pherenice were with them, and Cleo- nice came in the laſt, becauſe ſhe had been buſied in receiving her mother, who knowing that her Daughter was at Sardis, was come from Epheſus to ſee her, with intentions to carry her thither: So that Cleonice having advertiſed Stenobea who the Ladies were, and her obligements to them, ſhe came alſo to viſit them, and was conducted thither by Ligdamis, who taking hold of this fit oppertunity, did earneſtly beſeech Iſmenia, who had ever been the confident of his dear Cleonice, that ſhe would ſpeak unto Stenobea concerning his marriage. The buſineſs might the more eaſily be brought to paſs, becauſe her Father, who was Governour of the Caſtle of Hermes was come to Sardis; and Cyrus having made his peace with Crœſſus, he might the more eaſily aſſent unto it: Iſmenia accordingly made the Propoſition, but her power alone was not prevalent enough; but Cyrus muſt interceed who did it ſo effectually, that Ligdamis could not wiſh it better; yet he was a little ſad to ſee Cleonice become a little more reſerved, as ſoon as ſhe ſaw that ſhe was infallibly to marry Ligdamis: And after he had preſſed her himſelf in vain, to tell what it was which interrupted her joyes, he ſet Iſmenia upon her, who anſwered, That it was becauſe ſhe feared, that as heretofore ſhe was grieved, becauſe the friendſhip of Ligdamis was become Love, and ſince that, grieved becauſe his love did not return unto friendſhip; ſo it may happen, that when ſhe had married Ligdamis, perhaps it would become neither love nor friendſhip to her, ſhe conceiving that marriage would rather procure indifferency, jealouſie, and ſcorn, then any eſteem, love, and friendſhip. As ſoon as ſhe had expreſſed her ſelf unto Iſmenia, ſhe told it unto Ligdamis, who expreſſed ſo many teſtimonies of love unto Cleonice by his ſorrows that ſhe ſhould ſuſpect him, that in the concluſion this melancholy cloud did vaniſh out of her mind, and he did perfectly perſwade her, that ſhe might expect from him, both a violent and an everlaſting paſſion; ſo that after this, joy began to ſparkle in her eyes. Then ſhe returned and received all civilities unto Cydipe, Arpalice, Candiope and Androclea: But amidſt ſo many happy Lovers, Andramites was an infinite ſufferer, ſince he found Doraliſa more cruel:

cruel; the joyes of others were his griefs, and the preparatives of theſe marriages tormented him, for ſhe was ſo full of her witty raillary, as made it apparent to him, that ſhe was not in any humour to augment the number of married people. Seeing then that all his ſervices and Courtſhips would not prevail with her, he reſolved to apply himſelf unto the Prince Myrſiles; for obſerving that ſhe much eſteemed him, and that he was reinveſted into his power and authority, he thought that if he would undertake to ſpeak for him unto Doraliſa, perhaps ſhe would then marry him by reaſon of his interceſſion, though not out of affection. But before he tryed this way, he adviſed with Pherenice, with whom he had an intimacy, and ſhe telling him, that this courſe could not prejudice him, he went unto the Prince, to deſire his protection, but he was much ſurprized, when after he had opened his deſign, the Prince told him, that he deſired a buſineſs in which he wiſhed with all his heart he were able to ſerve him; but for divers reaſons which prevented him, he would ſeek out ſome other way whereby he might teſtifie how much he eſteemed him. In the mean time, he adviſed him as a friend, not to perſiſt in his Love to Doraliſa: After which, much company entring, Andramites went out, as ill ſatisfied with the Prince Myrſiles, as with his Miſtreſs As ſoon as he was gone, this Prince, who had not ſeen Doraliſa ſince he was in hopes of ſucceeding to the Crown of Lidia, went unto her Chamber upon a viſit, for he had the free liberty of all the Palace before the ceremony of reſtallation was ſolemnized. In the mean time, Pherenice after ſhe had adviſed Andramites to imploy the credit of the Prince Myrſiles, ſpoke unto Doraliſa in his behalf, the better to prepare her for the Princes mediation, but ſhe ſo fully expreſſed her reſolution of never marrying Andramites, that ſhe was out of all hopes; ſo that ſhe thought it expedient to advertiſe her friend of what the Prince Myrſiles would ſay unto her, to the end ſhe might deny him more civility; but ſhe wondred to ſee Doraliſa extreamly angry at Andramites, for having recourſe unto the Prince Myrſiles: 'Tis true, ſhe had not time to ſay much againſt him, for the Prince entred preſently, and made her change her diſcourſe. As ſoon as he entred into Doraliſa's Chamber, Pherenice went out upon ſome buſineſs which called her away, and by that means Myrſiles had opportunity of diſcourſe with Doraliſa: But he was no ſooner ſet down, then this incenſed Lady, thinking he would ſpeak for Andramites prevented him I perceive Sir (ſaid ſhe unto him ſharply,not giving him leaſure to bethink himſelf)that you are preparing to ſpeak unto me concerning the follies of Andramites:But I beſeech you Sir, tell me nothing which may moleſt thoſe joyes I ought to have at the generoſity of Cyrus towards the King your Father, and your ſelf: Never fear, dear Doraliſa, ſaid he unto her, that I will ever ſpeak concerning the paſſion of Andramites, not but that he hath much ſolicited me unto it, but I have ſo ſtrong a reaſon to the contrary, that you need not fear I ſhall ſolicite you in his behalf: Since it is ſo, replied Doraliſa, I muſt needs expreſs my ſatisfaction to ſee you ſo reaſonable as you ought to be : If I were ſo reaſonable as I ought to be, replied he, doubtleſs I ſhould wiſh that thing now, which I have wiſhed a long time, and which you do not deſire I ſhould. Why Sir, replied Doraliſa, cannot I deſire you were King of Lidia? That is not it which I mean, replied he, nor do my deſires moſt carry me to a Throne; for I moſt deſire that now, which I deſired when the Prince Atis lived, and which then I ought not to pretend unto: For my part, replied Doraliſa, I do believe that at the time you ſpeak of,you wiſhed moſt that you could ſpeak: Tis moſt true, anſwered he, but the chief reaſon of my wiſh was, that I might be able to tell you I do love you: Oh Sir (ſaid Doraliſa, and laughed, not beleiving that the Prince Myrſiles ſpake ſeriouſly) If you had then any ſuch deſire, you were able enough to make me underſtand it, you I ſay, who could ſo well interpret unto Pherenice the Fable of Æſope, which concerned the Princeſs Palmis and her Lovers : 'Tis true, replied he I could then have let you known that I loved you,ſince then I could write a little; alſo as dumb as I was, I could have told you as much in the language of the eyes, but what reaſon had I then to expoſe my ſelf unto the raillary of the moſt witty perſon in the World, I ſay, who have many times ſeen ſome of beſt language ſtand mute before, meerly out of the fear of your Wit: But Sir, replied ſhe, am I not as terrible now as I was then? You are, replied he. and much more Madam, for I find you much fairer. But I am grown more bold, and now dare without difficulty acquaint you with that which I have all my life concealed: Know then beloved Doraliſa, that I began to love you as ſoon as I began to ſee you, from your very infancy I have born you affection, this affection encreaſed with your beauty, and during all the loves of Cleander, Arteſilas, Abradates, and Mexaris, I loved you with more zeal than all thoſe Princes did thoſe Princeſſes with whom they were in love: Yes, charming Doraliſa, all the time of my ſullen ſilence, I then burned in the flames of affection to you: Oh Sir, ſaid Doraliſa, you can never perſwade me of it; for ſince the tenderneſs over the King your Father cauſed you to ſpeak, when you ſaw the Souldier ready to kill him, I am confident that if your paſſion had been ſo violent unto me, you would then have ſpoke and told me of it: But at that time, certainly there was as deep a ſilence in your heart as in your tongue, and there was as much tranquility in your ſoul as in mine: Do you not know Doraliſa, replied the Prince Myrſiles, that Love uſeth to make even thoſe who ſpeak beſt to become dumb? How then would you have him make an unfortunate Lover ſpeak, who was dumb before? Why then do you ſpeak now, replied ſhe? I ſpeak, replied he, by the ſame reaſon that I was ſilent, for I was ſilent becauſe I could not ſpeak, and I ſpeak becauſe I cannot be ſilent. Moreover, ſince I have ever heard you profeſs that you would have a heart freſh, which never loved any but your ſelf, I thought that mine being ſuch a one as you deſired, I might without any injury offer it unto you. Moreover, I do not only offer you a new freſh heart, but I do expreſs my paſſion in ſuch words as never were prophaned with the expreſſion of either faigned or real paſſions: I never pronounced the Word Love, but unto you only, I never ſaid I loved you, but once, and that was unto you: Be not therefore ſo unjuſt, I beſeech you, as to reject me with the ſame rigour, as if I had preſented uno you a heart which had received a thouſand ſeveral impreſſions, or as if I had told you things which I had ſpoken a thouſand times unto another : I aſſure you Sir, replied ſhe, That you do ſo much perplex me, as this little which you have ſpoken forceth me to regret the time wherein you could not ſpeak unto me : Truly I wiſh that I could ſpeak, neither too ſharp nor too uncivilly ; But I fear that if you continue to perſwade me unto this belief, it will be hard for me to keep within thoſe juſt limits, which thoſe reſpects I owe you requires of me ; therefore not to take what you have ſaid ſeriouſly, be pleaſed to know, that when you heard me ſay I would have a new freſh heart, it was when I ſpoke of men whom I knew very well had none ſuch : For to ſpeak the very truth, I neither care for a new nor an old heart, I deſire only to keep mine own entire, and contiuue always an abſolute Miſtreſs of my ſelf. Moreover Sir, I muſt advertiſe you, that for one that is a very ſtupid Sot in matters of the World, I am one who of all Women upon earth knows leaſt how to ſpeak upon matters of Courtſhip and Gallantry : Sometimes I can chide others for it, but to ſpeak my ſelf is a thing which I cannot do ; therefore Sir I beſeech you either change your diſcourſe, or elſe I ſhall wiſh you dumb : Moſt cruel Woman, replied Myrſiles, What pleaſure can you take in blaſting me with all your fury, me I ſay, who hath yet expreſſed but one part of my love to you ? Faith Sir, replied ſhe and laughed, I do not believe the half you have ſaid already, nor will I often give you any occaſion of diſcourſing with me, but that you may not have any cauſe to complain of me, know I beſeech you Sir, that I am much fitter to make a friend then a Miſtreſs ; for tho' to my misfortune I ſhould have a tender ſenſible heart towards you, you would not be a jot the happier, ſince as ſoon as ever I did perceive it in my ſelf, I ſhould carry it as if I hated you : Take heed therefore Sir of being in too good terms with me, for fear of being in too bad ; and to teſtifie how nice and phantaſtical I am in ſuch things, I muſt tell you, that I have often in my life, even almoſt hated the moſt compleat men, only becauſe through weakneſs without reaſon they have put me to the bluſh in talking with them: Conſider therefore what I ſhould do, if you ſhould offer to intangle me in any ſuch kind of Gallantry: Conſider Sir that I am not fit for it; if you pleaſe to eſteem me more than another, I ſhall be glad of it, but let this eſteem be without any ingredient of Love, or tenderneſs, if you would oblige me unto you. As Myrſiles was ready to reply, Arpalice and Cydipe came in, who told Dorolisa after their firſt complements were performed, that within this hour an Ambaſſador would arrive, which the King of Phenicia ſent unto Cyrus, whoſe Equipage was reported to be more magnificent than ever was ſeen; and that the Princeſs Timaretta, whoſe Chamber opened unto the place where he was to paſs, had charged them to tell her ſhe would be very glad of her company with the reſt of the Ladies to ſee theſe Phenicians, who were reported to be ſo magnificent. The Prince Myrſiles hearing what Arpalice and Cydipe ſaid, did withdraw himſelf, having no diſpoſition to ſee an Ambaſſador paſs, who came not to the King his Father. Alſo the paſſion of his ſoul did ſo poſſeſs him, and the manner of Doraliſa's uſage did ſo trouble him, that he was not in any humour of ſeeing ſuch diverſions: But it was nothing ſo with Doraliſa, for ſhe was ſo well pleaſed at her harſh language unto the Prince Myrſiles, that ſhe went with the blitheſt diſpoſition in the World to quibble at theſe Ambaſſadors who were to arrive, but ſhe found not what ſhe ſought for, and her blith and critical humour could not find any cavil in them ſhe went to ſee: The truth is, the like magnificence was never ſeen, both for the great abundance of Camels covered with cloaths of Tirian Purple imbroydered with gold, and for the rarity of their Horſes, alſo for the richneſs of their habits. Moreover, this Ambaſſador (whoſe ſtature was as high as his Quality, which was of the beſt in all Phenicia) had with him above a hundred men of Quality, extraordinary handſom, whoſe curioſity only to ſee Cyrus induced them unto this voyage, Amongſt this hundred, there was one illuſtrious perſon, whoſe merit was rare and ſuperlative, his name was Ariſtheus, a name very famous, both through all Greece and all Aſia, ſo that in what humour of raillary ſoever Doraliſa was in that day, ſhe was forced to commend all ſhe ſaw that day. However, this Ambaſſage was variouſly talked on, though none knew what it was, yet they were not ignorant long, but knew the cauſe of it. After this Ambaſſador was lighted from his horſe at the Gate of the Cittadel, he was conducted by Hidaſpes unto a great Hall, where Cyrus gave him him audience. This Ambaſſador ſpoke in his own language, which Cyrus did very well underſtand, and preſented a Letter from the King his Maſter, which began thus.

The King of Phenicia unto the greateſt Conquerour that ever was.

AS I make no queſtion, but that ſince you have beſieged Sardis, you will ere long take it; So I have ſent this Ambaſſador to ask that favour from you which Crœſſus cruelly denied me, but which I hope you will not: He hath Commiſſion to offer you my alliance and friendſhip with thirty thouſand men, if you ſtand in any need of them: I aſſure you, that if you accept this offer, and accord unto my demand, you will ever oblige me;

The King of Phenicia.

All the while this Letter was reading, Cyrus was thinking what it ſhould be that the King of Phenicia could deſire of him, but not being able to imagine it, he told the Ambaſſador that it was from him he muſt know how to ſatisfie the King his Maſter. Then the Ambaſſador told him with an excellent grace and much Eloquence, that the principal point of his Voyage was to ſatisfie the deſire which the King his Maſter had of being allied unto ſo great a Prince, and to the end that this alliance might be more firm, he deſired that he might be obliged unto him, by requeſting a favour which Crœſſus denied a little before the War. Then the Ambaſſador purſuing his diſcourſe, let Cyrus underſtand, that the young King of Phenicia's deſire was, he would be pleaſed to reſtore that Statue which Crœſſus bought of Depœnus and Scillis, and which the late King his Father cauſed to be made a little before his death, offering for it above three hundred Talents of Incenſe, and whatſoever Arabia the happy produced out of her precious and Aromatical ſtore, for Siria joyning upon Arabia, and Phenicia making part of Siria, there was conſtant commerce between thoſe people; therefore the King of Phenicia made choice of that which he thought moſt worthy for the ranſome of the Statue of the faireſt perſon in his Kingdom, and moſt worthy to be offered unto the greateſt Prince upon earth. This Ambaſſador told Cyrus further, that he came from Tyre, as ſoon as the King of Phenicia heard that he had won the Battel againſt Crœſſus, and as ſoon as he heard that his deſign was to beſiege Sardis, adding in applaud of Cyrus, that he made more haſt in his Conqueſts, than himſelf did in his journey, ſince he came after his Victory. But to teſtifie unto this Prince, that the King his Maſter did not doubt of his generoſity, but beſeeched him before he gave his Anſwer, to honour him with a view of thoſe preſents which the King of Phenicia ſent, beſeeching him to look out at the Window upon the Camels which ſtood loadened, and which by the magnificence of their Coverings, made it evident, that what they carried was precious. Alſo it might be judged by the odoriferous ſmells wherewith the Air was perfumed, by reaſon of thoſe perfumes, that it was a moſt magnificent preſent.

Cyrus ſeeing ſuch generous proceedings, did ſatisfie the Ambaſſadors deſires: To teſtifie unto you, ſaid he unto him, that without further deliberation I conſent unto the King your Maſters deſires, I will accept of what he hath ſent, not as a price of that Statute which I will reſtore him, but as a Gage of his amity, which is very dear unto me: And I do accept of his preſent, to teſtifie that I will learn how to imitate his liberality. After this, Cyrus behaved himſelf with a thouſand civilities to this Ambaſſador, for he ſeemed to be a moſt accompliſhed man. Moreover, Cyrus knowing that the Tirians were very powerful at Sea, he hoped to get ſome aid from them for the ſiege of Cumes; therefore he reſolved to render unto the King of Phenicia in the perſon of his Ambaſſador all the honours that he could deviſe. But ſince the King of Phenicia's extraordinaty deſire to have this Statue, filled Cyrus with much curioſity, he asked whether it were poſſible that the perſon whom it repreſented, were as full of beauty as it? Asking further, whether ſhe had a ſoul and ſpirit worthy of ſo fair a body? But he told him that ſhe was much fairer than her Statue, that her Spirit was as high as her beauty, and that her ſoul was more worthy of eſteem and admiration than her beauty and Spirit, adding, that her fortune was as extraordinary as her merit, and her virtue more admirable than all that he had ſaid. After this, the Ambaſſador preſented unto Cyrus the beſt ſort of thoſe who followed him, and amongſt the reſt, the illuſtrious man, who bore the name of Ariſtheus, and preſented him as a particular friend unto that fair Lady of whom he ſpoke, and as being himſelf one of the rareſt men in the World: I think my ſelf very happy (ſaid Cyrus in imbracing him) that he is only her friend, for had he been her Lover, perhaps I ſhould not have had the happineſs to ſee him, ſince it is probable he would have been with the ſubſtance for whom this Statue is made: I can aſſure you Sir, replied Ariſtheus, that though I were her Lover, and deſired above all things to pleaſe her, yet ſhould I have had the honour which I have received this day; for that moſt excellent perſon takes ſuch great delight to hear talk of your Virtue and Victories, that to obtain her favour, I ever intended to be a witneſs of ſo many truths as you Sir make good, and ſo be able to pleaſe her in talking of you: Your language (replied Cyrus at the ſame time Ariſtheus ſpoke) does much oblige me, but I would not have thoſe who come unto me uſe many adulations and flatteries as you do, leſt in taking too much delight in their applauds, I ſhould grow in the end not to merit them from any: After this, Cyrus gave orders unto Hidaſpes to conduct this Ambaſſador and all his Train unto the lodging which was prepared for him, commanding him to treat him with magnificence worthy of that King who ſent him. In the mean time, though Cyrus by the will of Cyaxares was become Maſter of all the Treaſures of Crœſſus, upon condition not to reſtore them unto him; yet he told him concerning this Ambaſſador, though he was not yet in the poſſeſſion of his Crown which he would reſtore unto him, and though it was not above eight days before the ceremony was to be ſolemnized with the marriage of the Prince Artamas, and all the reſt of the happy Lovers who were then at Sardis; and he did more then that, for he did ſo tranſact the buſineſs, that Crœſſus and this Ambaſſador did ſee each other, Cyrus telling the latter of theſe, that he ought not to conſider this Prince as him who had denied the Statue which the King his Maſter demanded, but as a Tributary King unto Ciaxares, of whom he deſired alliance, ſince he deſired his; ſo that after this reconciliation, which this Ambaſſador had power to make, for his Commiſſion was not limited, he did viſit the Princeſs Palmis, as well as the Princeſs Timaretta, and was ſo charmed with this magnificent Court, and with the beauty of all the Ladies in it, that at the deſire of Cyrus, he promiſed to be at this great Feaſt which was to be kept within eight days, during which time, nothing wat talked of but the King of Phenicia, whom they ſaid was in Love with that Beauty whoſe Statue he demanded, every one were full of curioſity to know more preciſely the particulars of the adventure; the reaſon of the difficulty to know it was, becauſe there were only three or four with this Ambaſſadour who underſtood the Lidian and the Greek Tongue, and theſe three or four were ſo buſied in anſwering all that was asked them, as they could not be moved unto any long converſation. Alſo during the firſt days, they were taken up in ſeeing the rarities of the Town, and all the Treaſures of Crœſſus, ſo that at laſt the great Feaſt day arrived before any knew that which they had ſo great a deſire to know. This ceremony was doubtleſs one of the moſt ſumptuous in the World, and the moſt glorious for Cyrus; if he had followed the dictates of his own inclination, he had ſtopped many things which wounded his modeſty: But there was a ne-neceſſity of ſubmitting unto the cuſtome, and unto the Counſels of the King of Hercania, Gadates, Gobrias, and Chriſantes, who told him, that it was fit the people with their own eyes ſhould ſee their King was a Slave, and that it was he who made this Slave a King, ſo that maugre the repugnance which he had unto it, he yeilded unto cuſtome, and hearkned unto the counſel of his friends, though not in all things, for he would not ſuffer Crœſſus to go chained through the ſtreets of Sardis, from the Palace to the Temple, but thus prevented it, Preſently after break of day, Crœſſus and Myrſiles were carried in a Coach to the lodging of the Higſt-Prieſt, which joyned to the Temple where the ceremony was to be ſolemnized, where they ſtayed until it began. In this Temple, which was one of the greateſt in the World, was erected an Amphitheater, moſt magnificently covered with the richeſt Tapeſtry of Sidon, where all the Ladies, might moſt conveniently ſit and ſee. All the ſtreets from the Cittadel to the Temple, were alſo ſumptuouſly hung, there ſtanding ranks of Souldiers on both ſides, all in ſuch glittering Arms, as never was a more glorious ſight ; a thouſand Martial Inſtruments made the Ayr eccho, with ſhrill and pleaſant ſounds, which attracted all the people of Sardis, either into the Temple, or into the ſtreet which joyned to it, or into the place before the Cittadel, out of which Cyrus came accompanied with all his Court, which was ſo numerous, and ſo glorious that day, as it was ſuitable unto the Court of Aſia's Conquerour. As for the Phenician Ambaſſador, he was in the Temple upon a Scaffold with all his Train, next him was the Princeſs Timaretta, and all the Ladies which lodged in the Palace of Crœſſus. When Cyrus entred into the Temple with a huge croud of people about him, Crœſſus was brought by the Prieſt into the midſt of the Temple, having a Chain, and Fetters of Gold upon his hand, and behind him the Prince Myrſiles in the like manner ; the Princeſs Palmis was next him, but under a Canopy of golden Tiſſue, and without Chains, Cyrus having no mind that ſhe ſhould have any ſign of ſervitude, or that they ſhould upbraid him with triumphing over a Lady. As ſoon as the Prince entred into the Temple, moſt admirable Muſique was heard, which after it had played a quarter of an hour, ſome Hymns that were ſung unto the Gods, did ceaſe: After which, Cyrus who was upon an elevated Throne deſcended, and taking off the Chains and Fetters which Crœſſus and Myrſiles wore, and which he gave unto the Prieſt, he took from the hand of the ſaid Prieſt a Crown, and put it upon the head of Crœſſus, after he had cauſed him ſolemnly to ſwear, that he would acknowledge the power of Ciaxares, never to depart from his intereſts, and inviolably to keep the conditions between them. Cyrus had no ſooner put this Crown upon the head of Crœſſus; but the vault and roof of the Temple did ring with acclamations, and the people could not be ſilenced from extolling the generoſity of Cyrus. But at the laſt all the tumultuous noyſe of joy being appeaſed, Cyrus ceaſing to treat Crœſſus as vanquiſhed, and to behave himſelf as a Conquerour, demanded his Daughter for the Prince Artamas in the preſence of the Phrigian King who ſtood next him.

He had no ſooner asked the queſtion, but Crœſſus taking the Princeſs Palmis by the hand, preſented her unto Cyrus, and bad him diſpoſe of her as he pleaſed: After which, cauſing the Prince Artamas to approach, the Prieſt advanced alſo, and the Princeſs Palmis: At the concluſion of which Muſique did play again, and preſently after the Prince Artamas conducted the Princeſs Palmis into a moſt magnificent Chariot, which waited at the door of the Temple, and which was followed by a hundred others full of Ladies, all the Princes riding on horſeback, accompanied with all the Gallants of Quality. When they came unto the Palace, there was a moſt ſumptuous Feaſt prepared, and after Dinner a Horſe-race in the Great Plain. The repaſt at night was no leſs Princely than that in the morning. Bonefires were made at every door, the Palace was full of harmonious Muſique, but the Princeſs Palmis would not permit any dancing, by reaſon of the exceſſive ſadneſs which ſhe ſaw in the eyes of Cyrus, though he forced himſelf as much as he could. Alſo, though Cyrus had reſtored much unto the King her Father, in reſtoring the Crown yet Crœſſus had loſt much in loſing his independent Authority, and his Treaſures: So that though it was a Feſtival day, yet it was not one that had all the ſigns of joy which it might have had: Yet the Phenician Ambaſſador was extreamly ſatisfied as well as Ariſtheus, who could not enough admire the illuſtrious Cyrus, and he was full of obſervance, that his eye was never off him, as long as he could ſee In the mean time, Cyrus having not forgot the deſires of Ligdamis, Thraſimedes, Menecrates, and Philiſtion, the ceremony of their Marriages were accompliſhed the next morning after that of the Prince Artamas, and the whole Court did honour them with their preſence. This ſecond Feaſt was no leſs magnificent than the firſt, and Cyrus was no leſs melancholy this day than before, to ſee how far ſhort he was of the happineſs of all thoſe Lovers. Mazares was no more pleaſant than he: However, Cyrus had an extraordinary care that the Phenician Ambaſſador ſhould be well pleaſed with his civilities, and to that end he did divert him as much as he could, and prepared preſents for the King his Maſter and him, which were above double the worth of thoſe he received; and finding much ſatisfaction in the company of Ariſtheus, he talked with him very often, aad certainly not without good reaſon, for there was not a man in the World who could ſpeak better concerning Politiques, nor who better underſtood the intereſts of all Princes in that time, than Ariſtheus did: And to ſpeak truth, Ariſtheus ſpoke well in all things whatſoever. And Cyrus did not content himſelf with diſcourſing of Affairs in general, but he carried him along with him into the Viſits which he made unto the Princeſſes and other Ladies. He made uſe of him alſo to know how the King of Phenicia could furniſh him with Ships, before he made any propoſitions of it unto the Ambaſſador of that Prince, inſomuch as Ariſtheus and Cyrus were almoſt inſeparable. Since he was generally knowing in every thing, he ſpoke ſo many ſeveral Languages, that he was able to converſe with all the Ladies there, though there were thoſe of many ſeveral Countries. In the mean time, ſince the Phenician Ambaſſador knew that the ſooner he returned, the more acceptable he ſhould be unto the King his Maſter, he moved for his departure as ſoon as might be. Cyrus deſigning to ſatisfie him, that he might the ſooner obtain thoſe Ships he deſired, told him, that he was rea• to keep promiſe with him. But before he reſtored him the rare Statue which he demanded, the Princeſs Timaretta went to ſee it, and afterwards all the Court: Thoſe who dwelt in Sardis, and had ſeen it ſeveral times, went again, by reaſon of that curioſity which this adventure begot in them. And indeed, the curioſity was ſuch, as nothing elſe was talked on: And Ariſtheus being very converſant amongſt the Ladies, they asked him a thouſand queſtions, but moſt eſpecially Doraliſa, unto whom he applied himſelf more than unto any other, though others courted his converſe more than ſhe did. But the more ſhe talked unto him concerning this admirable perſon whom this Statue repreſented, the more he augmented her curioſity: So that being one day much importun'd in the preſence of the Princeſs Palmis and Cyrus, to relate the Hiſtory of her Adventures, he promiſed that it ſhould be exactly done by a friend of his, who knew the particulars of it better than he did, and who indeed did ſo moſt pleaſingly. Since you are not this Countryman, replied Doraliſa, and ſince I have not the honour to be well known unto you, you do not know that I never uſe to give any time unto thoſe who promiſe me any thing, eſpecially when by holding them to their promiſes, I ſhall oblige two perſons ſo illuſtrious as thoſe who now hear me, and who will certainly be very glad to know the adventures of a Lady in whom the King of Phenicia hath ſo much intereſt. Cyrus approving of Doraliſa's Speech as well as the Princeſs Palmis, Ariſtheus told them, they ſhould be ſatisfied when they pleaſed: So that without further delay, it was reſolved, that at that night he ſhould perform his promiſe, as indeed he did: For he prepared him who was to relate what they deſired to know, to go with him unto the Princeſs Palmis Chamber, where the Princeſs Timaretta would be a partaker of that diverſion. 'Tis true, Ariſtheus could not ſtay there, becauſe the Phenician Ambaſſador ſent a Poſt that night unto the King his Maſter, to give him an account of his happy ſucceſs in his Embaſſie, and he was obliged to write alſo : So that after he had brought his friend thither, whoſe name was Telamis, and that Cyrus and the Princeſſes ſaw him to be a man of good Spirit, he retired, asking leave of Cyrus to go, whil'ſt Telamis was making his relation, and make another unto the King of Phenicia of his magnificence and generoſity, and of all the moſt rare Qualities which he found in him adding further, moſt obligingly, that ſince he intended to conceal none of his active virtues from the King his Maſter, he did not think he could return before the end of Telamis his relation : After which, making moſt low obeyſance, he retired, and left Telamis with the Princeſs of Phrigia, Timaretta, Cyrus, and Doraliſa, who after ſome ſhort preamble to excuſe his imperfections in the Narration of his hiſtory, he began it moſt elegantly in Greek, which all his Auditors did underſtand admirably well, Palmis and Cyrus deſiring him to addreſs his Speech unto Timaretta.

The Hiſtory of ELISA.

THough I know very well Madam, that perſons of your Quality are ignorant of nothing which paſſeth in the Court of Kings, tho moſt remote from their own ; yet I may in reaſon think, that an African Princeſs will take ſome pleaſure in hearing exactly related, the manners and cuſtoms of one of the moſt conſiderable Kingdoms in all Aſia. Alſo, ſince the Hiſtory which I am to relate cannot be very well underſtood, before I give you an Idea of our Court, and the manners uſed, I conceive it better, firſt to make a general deſcription of it, before I came unto the particular perſons whereof it is compoſed, and who are intereſted in the adventure which I am to relate : I muſt therefore tell you Madam, how that ſince the Phenicians were almoſt the firſt people of Aſia, who expoſed themſelves unto long Voyages at Sea, and eſtabliſhed the greateſt Commerce amongſt his Neighhour Nations, they abounded in riches much more then others, and conſequently it may be very rightly ſaid, that their delights, their luxury, their voluptuouſneſs, and their magnificence were more abundant amongſt them then any other people; not but that this State hath been ſhrewdly ſhaken ſeveral times: One while by the commotion which the Phenicians made concerning the Daughter of the King of Argos: Another time by the Rebellion which thoſe of Crete made at Tire, concerning the King of Phenicia's Daughter: Sometimes by the diviſion of Pigmalion and Didon, and by the flight of that Princeſs: And another time by the general Rebellion of all the Phenician Peaſants, who intirely ſubverted the Government. But at the laſt, maugre all theſe revolutions of Fortune, this Kingdom hath of late recovered its firſt ſplendor, and the Cities of Tire and Sidon, which may both of them be termed the Metropolitans of this Eſtate, are certainly two of the goodlieſt, moſt magnificent, and richeſt Towns in the World, either in reſpect of their ſcituations, or the beauty of their buildings; or their great traffique in Purples wherewith they cloath the Kings of the earth, and are an ornament of the World. Moreover, as there is nothing which contributes more unto the perfection of Arts than Riches, nor which more readily attracts all ſtrangers who have any excellencies than abundance: It may very well be ſaid, that one might find all Greece in Phenicia, ſince certainly there were the Workmen of all thoſe famous Towns: So that by this means, the buildings in Tire and Sidon were not only moſt ſtately, but moſt regularly built, the Painters there were good, the Ingravers excellent, and the Muſique comparably charming unto the Lidian. The Ladies were not only fair, but they were alſo ſtately, igenuous and apt in every thing they attempted to learn, there being not one Woman amongſt the Phenician people who did not excel in ſome work or other, either for the ornaments of Women of high quality, or for the uſe of the Temple. As for the Court there, I may well ſay and not ſay too much, that it is the moſt compleat in the World: The lives they lead, are doubtleſs moſt pleaſant, eſpecially becauſe Merits there before Birth are promoted to the higheſt Ranks: The converſe of Ladies is there allowed, but yet in ſuch a medium of liberty as is equally void, both of too much ceremony or any incivility, Dancings, Walkings, and Muſique, are the ordinary recreacreations of that Court : Diſcourſe is the chief buſineſs of all thoſe who have any Spirits, and eſpecially of Ladies unto whom there is daily reſort, and who are the diſpenſors of the glory and reputation of all compleat men ; for whoſoever hath not the approbation of four or five Ladies, can never hope to pretend unto any univerſal eſteem. As for the men, it may be ſaid there are of all ſorts : And indeed there are ſome men of great quality, whoſe merits are infinitely above their quality : And there are alſo ſome who have nothing to boaſt of but their quality : There are ſome whoſe glory conſiſts in the magnificence of their Train, and richneſs of their cloaths : And there are others, whoſe glory is only in their own virtues : And doubtleſs there are another ſort of men, of an inſupportable vain-glory : But to ſpeak generally, there is a kind of ſuch a Spirit of Politeneſs th[illegible] reigns in the Court, as renders it moſt delightful, and which produceth an incredible number of moſt compleat men ; and that which makes them ſo, is, becauſe the men of Quality in Phenicia ſcorn to be ignorant in all ſorts of Sciences, and are not as in ſome other Courts, where they imagine, that if a man know how to uſe a Sword, he may be allowed to be ignorant in all things elſe: But on the contrary, there's not a man of any condition in our Court, who is not able to judg of the rareſt works, or at leaſt who does not ſtrive to honour himſelf, by honouring thoſe who are more knowing than himſelf.

This Madam was the condition of our Court, when that moſt admired Lady, of whom I am to diſcourſe, came into the World ; and this is that ſame which it is at this day. It is requiſite I tell you Madam, before I begin to ſpeak of this moſt excellent perſon, that the late King of Phenicia, who hath a great part in the beginning of this Hiſtory, was a Prince who merited the name of a great Conquerour, making himſelf moſt eminent upon a hundred ſeveral occaſions, and having purchaſed the reputation of extraordinary valour ; but being born under a more amorous conſtellation, then ever any of his condition was : It may very well be ſaid, that he joyed more in the Conqueſts of his Love, then he did in thoſe of Mars. He had an univerſal civility unto all of that Sex which made him generally loved : And his Spirit being infuſed unto all the Courtiers, every man under his Reign had all Ladies in a high eſteem and Veneration : Alſo I aſſure you, the Gods could never have ſent this perſon into the World, of whom I am to ſpeak in an age diſpoſed to adore her Beauty, admire her Spirit, and reverence her Virtue, as in this. Now Madam, I ſhall tell you, that this incomparable Lady, whoſe name was Eliſa, is of a very Noble Family, and hath this advantage, to be born in great abundance of wealth; for her Father, whoſe name was Straton, was extream rich. This man was of Spirit enough, but it was a Spirit of ambition, and for the world : He was of a hot and lively temper, who loved all manner of pleaſures, and who was never content, unleſs his houſe were filled with all the Grandeur of the Court; he kept an open and plentiful Table; his houſe was the Rendezvouz of pleaſures, either in Walkings, Muſiques, or Feaſts : So that it may be ſaid, Eliſa was born in a houſe of joy. The Wife of Straton, called Barcea, was fair, but phantaſtical, and did not contribute any thing, neither to the pleaſures of her Husband, or of thoſe who came to him : And it often ſo fell out, that ſhe was not ſeen, and left in her Chamber without the leaſt, how do you. Since Straton had been long married before he had any children, when Eliſa came into the World, he was extraordinarily joyed at her, and ſolemnized her birth, with a Feaſt of a vaſt expence. I will not inſiſt long Madam upon the extraordinary beauty of this Child, when firſt ſhe ſaw light : But I beſeech you permit me to begin the Hiſtory of her life, from her coming out of her Cradle, ſince certainly in Tire they talked of the little Eliſa, as a great miracle, when ſhe was not above five or ſix years of age : it was not only the prodigious luſtre of her beauty which filled the Court with admiration, but it was as well her rare wit and ſprightly anſwers; it was her excellent grace, and ſtrange facility to learn any thing was taught her, and her pleaſant conceits in diverting company; alſo a ſtatelineſs at that age, as would have becomed the Majeſty of a Queen : Beſides all theſe qualities, ſhe had two more, which did render her moſt amiable, for ſhe had ſuch an admirable voice, and ſuch an inclination unto Dancing, as that at the age of five years ſhe was moſt excellent in both, beginning alſo to play upon the Lute, which ſhe did with ſuch a grace, that ſhe charmed all her hearers. Eliſa being thus qualified as I tell you, and much more amiable then I am able to relate, you may eaſily conceive that her Father did moſt tenderly love her, and he loved her ſo much the more, becauſe he obſerved that his Wife did not love her over-well, and becauſe the beauty of his Daughter, though a child, did ſtick in her ſtomack: Nor did he leave her unto her guidance, but on the contrary, he placed the little Eliſa in a Chamber, far off hers, and ſet a Governeſs over her, who was as virtuous as ſhe was apt, and fit to cultivate the ſweet and noble inclinations of this young Lady: So that ſhe being of a natural ſweetneſs, and educated with ſuch extraordingry care, it is no wonder this rare child ſhould make a greater noyſe in the World at nine years of age, then the faireſt uſe to do at eighteen. Alſo one occaſion did preſent it ſelf, which did make the rare merit of this young Eliſa to ſhine and which was not talked on only in Tire, but alſo throughout all Phenicia, and all the Kingdoms, whoſe Ambaſſadors were then at our Court. Be pleaſed to know Madam, that a Tirian named Cryſiles, who was admirable in Muſique, and had travelled, returned unto Tire, and being a very accompliſhed man, and known of all the Court, he came unto Straton's houſe, as others did, and was ſo charmed with the young Eliſa, that he would needs become her Maſter in Muſique, and teach her upon the Lute, and to ſing all thoſe Songs which he learned of the famous Arion, with whom he had an intimate friendſhip at Leſtos, and whom he had ſeen at the Cape of Tenarus, when that Dolphin which ſaved his life brought him thither: Since this accident was a great miracle, and Cryſiles an eye-witneſs of it, I believe he was deſired by every one to tell it, a thouſand and a thouſand times over, ſo that it was the only talk of the Town for many daies. The King himſelf cauſed him to relate it, and ſo did the Queen; and Cryſiles was ſo tired with ſo often relating it, as he ſaid once laughing, that Arions Dolphin was not ſo weary with carrying him, as he was with telling the ſame thing ſo oft over : The time was then, when the cuſtome was to celebrate a great Feaſt unto Neptune ; For the Tirians being all Seamen, their grand devotion is unto the Sea Gods : They conceived alſo, that their Town being an Iſle, they were more obliged then any others to reverence Neptune : You know Madam, how it is a received belief every where, that during the love of this God unto Amphitrites, there was a Dolphin which did prodigious feats for him, and how this Fiſh was placed among the Stars for the good ſervices which he had done that God : So that the Tirians in the honour of this God and Amphitrites, do extreamly reverence Dolphins ; and underſtanding this adventure of Arion from Cryſiles, they attributed the miracle unto Neptune, as Maſter of the Seas. This time being neer that Feaſt, and it being the King who was to be at the charges of that ceremony, this Prince did contrive a place according unto the cuſtome, to repreſent ſome Emblemes of Neptune, and he made choice of this adventure of Arion.

He no ſooner had this Phanſie, but he did communicate it unto thoſe that had the contrivance of ſuch things, and unto Cryſiles alſo ; and they all agreed, that this adventure would furniſh out a moſt rare Scene, and make a moſt pleaſant ſhew ; So that without any more delay Painters, Ingravers, Engineers, and Muſitians were to be imployed, and the King being then deeply in Love with a Lady of that Court, it may very well be ſaid, that this magnificence intended, was made as much for her as for Neptune. In the mean while, the Engineers and Painters found out an invention to repreſent the Sea, to make Neptune appear ſitting in his Chair, and Amphitrites in hers ; to repreſent Ships, and the Tritons, and the Nereides, to ſhew a Dolphin which ſhould ſeem to ſwim, but they could not deviſe who it ſhould be that repreſented Arion, who as Cryſiles ſaid, was both young and fair ; and ſince the beſt Singers there were neither young nor fair, they were a little puzled ; but in concluſion, Criſiles who aimed at nothing more then the glory of the young Eliſa, made a Propoſition unto the King, that he would command Straton to permit his Daughter to repreſent Arion, which he could not refuſe, ſince the Queen her ſelf was to repreſent Amphitrites. The adviſe of Criſiles was not at the firſt liked by the King, who feared that the young Eliſa would be out of countenance, and ſpoil the fineſt paſſage of the Muſique : But Criſiles anſwered rhe King ſo ſatisfactorily, that the King conſented and he was no leſs buſie in ordering this entertainment, then he would have been in ordering a Battle, and therefore ſent immediately unto Straton, to propoſe the buſineſs unto him : But leſt he ſhould be denied, he did both pray and command at once, ſo that Straton did not deny. This Prince alſo deſired the Queen to ask Barcea concerning Eliſa, leaſt out of her capritious deſign, ſhe ſhould be any obſtacle unto the deſign. But in concluſion, Madam, not to abuſe your patience with any frivolous and impertinent relations, Criſiles taught the young Eliſa the very ſame words and Aire which Arion uſed to allay the cruelty of thoſe that would have devoured him, Criſiles having obtained the favour to have them from him, though he would not give them unto any elſe; and the wonder was, Eliſa did ſo admirably learn them, that Criſiles himſelf was aſtoniſhed; but the greateſt wonder of all was, to ſee the confidence and boldneſs of the young Eliſa, without any more aſtoniſhment, then if ſhe had been in her own Chamber, having no other Spectator but her Governour, though it was in the preſence of a full and glorious Court. I will not loſe ſo much time Madam, as to deſcribe the magnificence of this Muſique, it will be ſufficient I only tell you, that never was a finer in Phenicia, and I will only inſiſt upon that which concerned the young and fair Eliſa : Though I could tell you, Madam, that the Sea was ſo fully repreſented, that all the Spectators feared the Waves would have daſhed themſelves againſt the Company : And that the Chairs of Neptune and Amphitrites, were adorned with all that the Sea produced moſt rich; that Pearls, Coral, and Rubies, were the garments of theſe two Divinities : The veſtures of the Nereides and the Tritons were of Aggates, Mother of Pearl, and Sea Ruſhes : That the Ship out of which Arion was caſt into the Sea, ſeemed to be far diſtant, as if it had floted to catch the Dolphin, and that all the Scenes were ſo lively repreſented, as that they did deceive the eyes. But give me leave to tell you Madam, that when the young Eliſa appeared upon the Dolphin, all the Aſſembly ſhouted a cry of admiration, which in lieu of amazing, did imbolden her, and cauſed their wonder to double. The truth is, never could any thing be a rarer Spectacle, than to ſee Eliſa upon this Dolphin, which ſwimming gently, and lifting his head out of the Water, as if he were proud of ſuch a burthen, ſeemed as if he would leap amongſt the Aſſembly, ſwimming ſometimes on one ſide, and ſometimes on another. The young Eliſa, whoſe hair was fair, like as Apollo is repreſented, did tye up her Locks with much becomingneſs, leſt they ſhould have hung down too long, yet divers of them in Breeds did hang negligently upon her ſhoulders: Her dreſs was of Tiſſue in divers colours mingled with Gold: Her Buskins, which ſuffered ſome part of her white legs and feet to appear under her waving Garment, which to the motion of the Dolphin ſtir'd, did imitate the manner how Fiſhes do ſwim. A thouſand Diamonds ſet in ſeveral places of her Garment did caſt a ſhining flame, but the eyes of the fair Eliſa did out-ſhine them all: The Sleeves of her Garment reached no further than her Elbows, which ſuffered the lovely plumpneſs of her youth to appear.

The Air being than very hot, and Eliſa having naturally a Love incarnate complexion in her Cheeks with a mixture of pure white, her Beauty augmented, and appeared more lively and freſh; her lips were perfect Coral, her teeth no ſnow was whiter, and her eyes no Stars more luſtrious. After all this, you well conceive Madam, that Eliſa was a glorious Object, who without any aſtoniſhment at the motion of the Dolphin, nor at the ſtirring of thoſe well repreſented Waves, nor at the preſence of the King or Queen, nor at that huge number of Spectators, did hold her Lute with a moſt admirable grace, and did ſing with ſo much wonderful confidence and skill, that all the Court was ſurprized and charmed, Cryſiles was in an extaſie of joy, and indeed it was a wonder, that the voice of one ſo young ſhould reach ſo far, as to fill ſo vaſt a place as that was with a harmony ſo charming, as moved all hearts unto admiration. Alſo when ſhe was landed at a Cape, which repreſented the Cape of Tenarus; and when the Dolphin had ſet her on ſhore, the King was ſo tranſported with admiration, that not ſtaying the end of the Muſique, he went to imbrace her, and made extreamly much of her. Afterwards he carried her to the Queen, who was alſo come out of her Chair, and gave her a thouſand commendations, which ſhe received with much reſpect: But the applauds which every one in the Court did give her, ſhe received with the moſt Majeſtick fury in the world,as if for a thing which ſhe thought to be a meer vanity: After this Madam, ſhe went often to the Queen, yet ſhe never went, but ſhe ſtill augmented the admiration of all thoſe who ſaw her; and and I am confidently perſwaded, that ſhe made more Lovers at that time, then did think themſelves to be ſo, and who becauſe of her exceeding youth, imagined their paſſions were no more than only an admiration, and complacency of themſelves, which moved them to ſeek all occaſions of ſeeing her, only becauſe ſhe diverted them: Since the King was ingaged at that time in a moſt violent paſſion, and ſince Eliſa was a very child, he looked upon her only as a miracle, and not as a Miſtreſs, yet he made her a thouſand welcoms, and applauded her to the Skies upon every occaſion: He never ſaw Straton, but he asked how his Daughter the fair Eliſa did; and there was never any extraordinary diverſion, but the young Eliſa muſt needs be preſent. In the mean time, as ſhe grew, ſo did her beauty, and faſter, and every ſpring put freſher Lillies and Roſes upon her cheeks, than grows in any gardens: At fourteen years of age, ſhe was the moſt exact Beauty that ever was ſeen in Phenicia: And Madam, as I have already deſcribed the Beauty of Eliſa in her Childhood, ſo I beſeech you give me leave to deſcribe her, as ſhe was at fourteen, and as ſhe is at preſent; and it is requiſite I let you know her heart and her Spirit, that you may with more delight and attention hear her adventures: Imagine therefore, Madam, a perſon of the moſt handſom and noble ſtature in the world, if you will conceive Eliſa's: And though it was much under the common height of one that can be called tall, yet her ſtature was ſo exactly handſome, as all her body was as fair as her face. Moreover her port was ſo noble and free, and yet ſo full of Majeſty, that never any was ſeen to walk with a better grace, nor ſtand ſtill with a more modeſt counterance, yet confident enough, Moreover, her action was no leſs pleaſing. then her ſtature was noble, and her Port Majeſtick, her favour was neither forced nor careleſs, ſhe looked without affectation, and yet looked, as if ſhe would appear fair: If ſhe conſulted with her glaſs to rectifie any thing that was amiſs in her dreſs, ſhe did it with ſo handſom a grace, and with ſo much art, that any would ſay her hair did with delight obey thoſe fair hands which ordered it. All that ſhe did was done in ſuch a taking way, that one knew not how to look upon her, and not love her. Moreover, Nature never gave fairer eyes unto any than unto her, they were not only full and fair, but they were alſo fiery and ſweet, and ſparkling altogether, but ſo quick and ſparkling, and ſo dazled all that looked upon them, as their true colour cannot be well defined; her mouth was as perfect a beauty as her eyes; the pure whiteneſs of her teeth deſerved the Carnation of her lips, her young and freſh complexion made ſo great, ſo natural, and ſo ſurprizing a Luſtre, that at the very firſt ſight ſhe would force admiration and applauds: Indeed the delicacy and purity of her complexion cannot be expreſſed by any tongue, ingredients of white and red were ſo ſweetly mixed, that the faireſt and ſweeteſt Jeſſamines and Roſes comes not near it in compariſon: Her Noſe was of a moſt exact Cimetry, and Proportion, without riſing too much or too little, but made a moſt compleat beauty: Indeed the whole compoſure of her face being neither very round, nor very oval, though it inclined more to the laſt than the firſt, was a moſt prime work of Nature, who joyning all her wonders together, kept back nothing that could poſſibly be deſired. Moreover, Eliſa's Neck was no leſs fair, than all the parts deſcribed before, ſo that the moſt envious at her beauty could find no fault to carp at: You may well imagine then Madam, that ſuch a young Lady as I have deſcribed, who dreſſed her ſelf to the beſt advantage, who played moſt admirably upon the Lute, who ſung better than ever any did, and who danced with a grace above imitation, was moſt fit to take hearts: Yet I can aſſure you Madam, this is not all, for which Eliſa was commendable: For be pleaſed to know, that her ſpirit and her wit had a million of Charms and Beauties in them, and ſhe knew ſo well how to make a mixture of mirth and jolity with her wiſdom and modeſty, that never any was more exact in the Art: There was in her humour ſuch a jolly pleaſantneſs, as would make a great company very merry, though they were all the moſt ſerious and grave perſons in the world; and ſhe knew ſo well how to anſwer all thoſe who did viſit her, both how to divert them, and how to pleaſe them, and how to oblige them, that every one was infinitely pleaſed with her, be they of what humours they would. Since ſhe had ſeen all the compleat Gallants in Phenicia, one may ſafely ſay ſhe knew all that they did know; and believe it, ſhe could ſpeak of all things very fitly and well, though ſhe ſpoke of many things which ſhe never heard before: But as ſhe was good at converſation in general, ſo was ſhe alſo at particular; for ſhe would be a whole afternoon talking with one of her friends with as much gravity, as if ſhe were at a great Feaſt: Queſtionleſs ſhe was a lover of company, but ſhe would not be weary in ſolitude; and when ſhe was in the Country walking by a Rivers ſide, and hearing the Nightingals ſing, ſhe would be as pleaſant, as if all the Court was with her. Moreover, never any was of more regular nor of more exact civility than ſhe; ſhe did as much as poſſibly ſhe could to accord the diſobliging of any, but on the contrary, did with a ſerious care ſtudy how to oblige all the world: But Madam, her ſoul was yet far greater than her beauty, and tranſcended her wit, and it cannot be better expreſſed, than by ſaying, that it was ſo full of generous and heroique thoughts, that glory only did animate her heart: She was indeed ſomething cholerique, but her choler was ſo temper'd with an ingenious ſweetneſs, as that it never diſpleaſed, and as there was a kind of pride in her ſoul, ſo there was a ſweet tenderneſs in her heart. Indeed never any loved her friends with more zeal, nor treated her Lovers with more rigour: There was never any unto whom ſhe promiſed friendſhip, had the leaſt cauſe to complain, ſhe was ever ready to do them all good offices with joy, even to the expences both of Purſe and Health, by taking pains in their buſineſs; ſhe loved them, though abſent, exiled priſoners, without mony, without credit, and her friendſhip hath ſometimes gone as far as their very graves. Grandeur never daunted Eliſa, ſhe has ſeen Kings and Princes at her feet, and would never permit her ſoul to be taunted with that vain-glory, which looks only at appearances, and ſeduceth all weak ſouls: She was as unmoveable as a ſtone at the intereſt of riches, as you ſhall perceive by the ſequel of the ſtory; ſhe was not capable of any envy, though almoſt all the Beauties envied her: On the contrary, ſhe did ever aggravate the Beauty of others; and one of her greateſt delights was to ſee any good qualities in others, virtue had predominate charms over her, ſhe loved all that was worthy to be loved, and hated vice with as much zeal as ſhe loved virtue; ſhe was not only full of humility, but modeſty; but it was a true real modeſty, which is no leſs in the heart than the face, and which never deceives thoſe who admire it.

Moreover, ſhe was as full of prudence as wit, though far from that which is called ſubtilty, which often paſſeth for that virtue amongſt many perſons: But as for Eliſa, ſhe was full of ſincerity, ſhe was capable of the cloſeſt ſecrets, and of a conſtancy which hath few examples amongſt thoſe of her Sex. The truth, is Madam, Eliſa is a miracle, and it is no wonder at all ſhe ſhould get ſo many Lovers and Friends: But ſince ſhe hath been more happy in the laſt of theſe than the firſt, I will ſpeak as well of her Friends as of her Lovers. But to return to the buſineſs from whence I digreſſed, give me leave to tell you Madam, that Eliſa being arrived at the age of fourteen, ſhe made ſo many Conqueſts, and ſubjected ſo many hearts, that perhaps I ſhould not find belief, If I ſhould number them; for ſhe was beloved of all who were capable of loving; all the Princes in the Court were her Slaves; three Brothers of that Quality Rivals at a time; all men a little inferiour unto that Rank acknowledged her power, and ſhe was a Miſtreſs unto all their Maſters.

Cryſiles in teaching her to ſing, learned to ſigh for her, and he loved her with ſo much devotion, that he would never teach any other but her, to the end ſhe might only ſing perfectly: The very Painters who took her Picture, burned in hot flames of Love; there was not one who had any reaſon that were not in the ſame condition. In the mean time, Eliſa in the midſt of all theſe victories, ſtood firm as Marble, ſtill the ſame, and out of a Noble pride, which rendred her more charming, ſhe was not puft up with her Conqueſts, and it may very well be ſaid, that Straton had more joys then ſhe; but it was not ſo with Barcea, who could not indure the great reputation of her Daughter: The young Eliſa ſuffered all her phantaſtical humours with unparalleled patience, and was very complacential unto the will of her Father; and it was chiefly to pleaſe him that ſhe expoſed her ſelf to ſo much company, who came thither, ſince certainly he affected it much more than ſhe. But to honour the Triumph of Eliſa's Beauty the King of Phenicia, that famous Conquerour, became her Captive, but her Captive in a different manner from that he was accuſtomed to be, for heretofore his heart was able to make a retreat, but his paſſion to Eliſa was otherwiſe obliged, and except ſome that envied her Beauty, none ever ſpoke or thought any thing which could be diſadvantagious to her, and certainly they had no reaſon, for I verily believe, that there was never any perſon whoſe virtue was more pure, nor who was put unto a more difficult trial than the virtue of Eliſa. I then had the honour to be much in the Kings favour at that time, and was the confident of his paſſion, and by conſequence was a witneſs of Eliſa's virtue; tho' ſince ſhe hath confeſſed unto me, that at the firſt ſhe was joyed a little, to ſee a Prince who was beloved of his people proſtrate at her feet: One who was a terrour unto all his Neighbours, and eſteemed of all Aſia: But ſhe did ſo diſcreetly palliate thoſe joys, and always received the King with ſuch an indifferent civility, as I heard that Prince a hundred times ſay, he never came near her but he trembled: I know very well, that thoſe who had a mind to diminiſh the honour of Eliſa, have reported that it was not impoſſible to reſiſt a Prince who was none of the handſomeſt, who had the Garb more of a Souldier than of a King, and one who indeed was no proper man: But for all this, he was one of the moſt Illuſtrious Kings in the World, and one, who by reaſon of his familiarity and affability, was extreamly pleaſing and taking, he would diſcourſe with ſo fine a grace, and behave himſelf with ſo much ſweetneſs, that he gained the hearts of all the world: Moreover, never was Lover ſo civil, ſo obſequious, nor ſo reſpectful as he, and by conſequence it may truly be ſaid, that Eliſa did merit infinite glory in reſiſting ſo great a Prince: I will not inſiſt Madam, upon any relation of his Courtſhips, nor upon the Feaſts which he made in conſideration of her, nor with what aſſiduity he did viſit her, for that would be too tedious and long: But give me leave only to tell you, that he was as diligent in his Courtſhips of her, as he was of all the others whom he loved In the mean while, Straton who was of an ambitious compoſition, was much joyed to ſee the King was in Love with his Daughter, yet he would always tell Eliſa, that he pretended unto no further, than to make uſe of the Kings favour for a certain time, and that ſhe ſhould ſacrifice her ſelf unto his fortune: In order unto this, he was very glad that the King did him the honour to come often unto his houſe, and that it was become an abſolute Gourt. As for Eliſa, ſhe was quickly weary of all theſe gliſtering gallantries, for ſhe ſaw that they were dangerous to her reputation, and deprived her of a million of pleaſure and divertiſements: The reſpects of a King, cauſed all the Lovers of Eliſa to conceal their Chains, and ſome of them ſeem'd to love others for fear of offending the King, and who durſt not ſo much as ſpeak unto Eliſa, which ſhe remembred very well, when afterwards they addreſſed themſelves: Since the virtue of this Lady was well known unto the Queen, the Kings Love did not put Eliſa out of her good opinion, or of the King: On the contrary, when this Prince was at any time in a melancholly mood, the Queen would ſeek out for ſome occaſion to make him go and ſee Eliſa: If he were at any time Sick, ſhe would ſend for Eliſa to charm his diſeaſe with ſinging, and ſhe eſteemed Eliſa as much as the King loved her: Since this Prince had a Genius of raillary, Eliſa did a long time receive the expreſſions of his paſſion, as if he did it only to divert himſelf; but afterwards, his paſſion encreaſing, ſhe ſaw that ſhe was driven to the neceſſity of reſolving what courſe to take, and how ſhe ſhould behave her ſelf towards him: If ſhe followed her own inclination, and the fierceneſs of her natural diſpoſition, ſhe would have made it her glory to have treated the King worſe than the meaneſt of his Subjects, but ſhe was not ignorant that her Father would take it ill: So that ſince ſhe knew this Prince had naturally a light kind of a ſoul, and could entertain more than one paſſion at one time, ſhe uſed her beſt endeavours to extinguiſh his paſſion unto her, by reviving in his heart the former love which he had, and perhaps might have again unto a perſon of rare beauty and virtue, whom he had quitted for her, conceiving, that if he did quit her only for her, and ſhould perſiſt, it would be diſhonourable. Having then fixed upon this reſolution, ſhe would ſing before the King only ſuch Songs as had been made for this illuſtrious Rival, whom ſhe deſired ſhould only reign in the heart of this Prince, and that by ſinging her praiſes, he ſhould apply himſelf unto her again.

Eliſa made uſe of a thouſand ſuch deſigns to leſſen the Kings paſſion towards her, and knowing that I had ſome credit with him, ſpoke one day unto me, when I was intending to move her to be a little more favourable unto the King: Telamis, (ſaid ſhe unto me,) The King doth me the greateſt honours in the world in viſiting me, and making a diſtinction between me and others of quality; yet I wiſh you would be pleaſed to do me a good office unto him, which would be a very acceptable favour unto me, but I am afraid you will not: Methinks Madam, (ſaid I unto her and ſmiled) you ſhould eaſily believe without any argumenrss of perſwaſion, that I cannot deny any thing unto the Miſtreſs of my Maſter: And beſides, I am ſo devoted unto your ſervice, that you may command me any thing without the leaſt fear of diſobedience: It is not as the Miſtreſs of your Maſter, replied ſhe, that I deſire you ſhould ſatisfie my deſire, but as I am your friend, and ſo I will be (if you do not deny me) as long as I live: I beſeech you Madam, ſaid I unto her, make haſte, and tell me what is your pleaſure I ſhould do to merit that glorious Title which you are pleaſed to promiſe me upon thoſe conditions: My deſire is, ſaid ſhe, that you will cauſe the King to love me leſs than he doth, and that he will renew his affection unto that moſt accompliſhed Lady, whom he ſo zealouſly adored before: How Madam (ſaid I unto her) would you have the King love you leſs? Yes, anſwered ſhe, I much deſire it, becauſe I am a real Lover of honour, but wiſh not to be ranked with three or four perſons whom he hath already loved, and whom a little falſe glory ſeduced: I muſt confeſs unto you, added ſhe, that if the King ſhould quit me out of ſcorn perhaps I ſhould be ſo weak as to be a little angry. And I think alſo, that if he ſhould caſt me off for ſome whom he named unto me, I ſhould alſo be ſomething moved: but if he ſhould leave me, only becauſe he hath repented of his infidelity unto ſo accompliſhed a Lady as ſhe is whom he quitted for me, I do aſſure you I ſhould be extreamly joyed; therefore I conjure you to ſpeak unto him upon all opportunities, in behalf of this illuſtrious Rival: Let him often look upon her Picture, and rekindle, if it be poſſible, that fire which blazeth out ſo glorious a flame: For truly Telamis, I conſider that the King cannot make me a Queen, and tho' he could, yet is not my Quality worthy to be one; and he would be infinitely injurious to himſelf, if he ſhould have any ſuch thought: But I aſſure you, that my heart is too high, and my ſoul too noble to ſacrifice my honour upon an ill-grounded vanity; therefore Telamis I conjure you not to deny me this requeſt.

I do confeſs Madam, that this Diſcourſe of Eliſa did ſurprize me: At the firſt, I thought that ſhe had ſome ſecret inclination another way, which perhaps was one part of her virtue; for I could not imagine that one ſo young as ſhe, was capable of ſuch a reſolution as this: but I was quickly undeceived, and was conſtrained to admire the virtue of Eliſa, more than her beauty: The truth is, I was ſo charmed, that I forſook the Kings Intereſt for hers; So that in lieu of negotiating with her as he pleaſed, I negotiated with him as Eliſa pleaſed: Yet was it not poſſible to do as ſhe deſired; ſo that reſolving to ſpeak unto him her ſelf, ſhe did it with ſo much confidence and generoſity, that this Prince loved her the more: yet ſhe had ſo much power over him, as he proteſted that he would never have any unjuſt deſigns upon her, and that he would do what he could to moderate the violence of his paſſion; which was no eaſie matter for him to do;but to bring itabout,and to chaſe one paſſion out with another, he deſigned ſome Conqueſts upon the Sircans which are towards the Weſt; and in order to that, he prepared a great Navy, and employed himſelf wholly in the Wars, purpoſely to leſſen that love which reigned in his Soul: ſo that it may be ſaid, he was as diligent in chaſing Eliſa out of his heart, as if he would have won her by winning of Battels In the mean while, it delighted Eliſa, that all Phenicia did ſtrive in vain to know the cauſe of the Kings deſigns; and it pleaſed her that he talked of nothing but advancing her family, but advancing her father, and promiſing her, that if he could not cure himſelf of his paſſion by this voyage which he was attempting, to let her live as ſhe pleaſed at his return: and that he would endeavour all poſſible ways to pleaſe her. But to teſtifie how extream the Love of this Prince to Eliſa was, even at the very ſame time that he endeavoured to extinguiſh it, be pleaſed to know that Dipœnus and Scillis, whoſe Fame was blazed over all the world, being landed at Tyre, he entertained them, to make during his abſence the rare Statue, which at this preſent is among the Treaſures which Crœſſus had heaped up, and which doth ſo lively reſemble Eliſa, appointing them to repreſent her, as the Athenians did repreſent Victory, which was without wings, intimating by that as well as they, he would not have Victory forſake and fly from him : For their pains, he promiſed ſuch great Recompence when he returned, that it is not imaginable what he would have given for the poſſeſſion of Eliſa her ſelf, ſince he would give ſo much only for her Statue.

Since he had ſeveral Pictures of this fair Eliſa, Dipœnus and Scillis did form their model by them : Alſo they had ſeveral ſights of her, though ſhe knew not the reaſon why they looked ſo upon her, for the King did keep it ſecret : In the mean time, Eliſa was much joyed in her hopes, that her fathers ambition would be ſatisfied without any hazard of her honour or reputation ; and therefore ſhe made a thouſand vows and prayers for the happy ſucceſs of the Kings expedition, who imbarqued after he had given Straton a thouſand Aſſurances of Grandeur at his Return, not daring to expreſs himſelf more directly concerning his Paſſion : I ſhall not weary you Madam, with a Relation of this War : The beginning and ſequel was proſperous to the King; he defeated his enemies whereſoever he met them; and he never ſent any news of his Victories unto Tyre, but he writ unto the incomparable Eliſa, and thanked her as the cauſe of all his happy ſucceſs : In concluſion the difference between the King of Phenicia and the Sircans came to General Battel, which the King gave, and had the Victory, and ſent preſently by me the news of it unto the Queen, and at the ſame time unto Eliſa; forbidding me to ſpeak unto any, that he had received a ſlight wound with a dart on his ſide, leaſt it ſhould diſquiet the Queen, or diminiſh the joys of the people for his Victory : commanding me moreover, to aſſure the Queen and particular Eliſa in private, that he would follow within eight days with his victorious Army, after he had left ſome Garriſons in certain places which he took in the beginning of the War. So uſing the help both of Sail and Oar, I came to Tyre with incredible ſpeed, and brought with me this news of Joy, which preſently became ſo univerſal, that nothing was thought on but magnificent Preparations for the Kings Entry. Eliſa, though not very well, yet ſhe did partake of this publique Rejoycing, and the ſooner, becauſe the Letter, which I brought from the King, was the moſt obliging in the world; and becauſe I aſſured her, that in lieu of loſing this Princes heart as ſhe once intended, ſhe had only purified it, and made it capable only of an innocent paſſion: Adding afterwards, how he had commanded me to tell Straton, that he ſhould prepare himſelf to receive as ſoon as he arrived, one of the moſt conſiderable Offices in the State. So that Madam, Eliſa, having reaſon to hope for the being the Kings Favorite, and not his Miſtreſs, as ſo many others had been, ſhe began to deſire his return, and to be impatient of ſeeing him: Since I had an extraordinary eſteem of her, and loved no other, I never was from her, where Straton was very glad to ſee me; and I went the oftner, becauſe the houſe of Straton being towards the Sea, I was certain from the Chamber of Eliſa, to ſee a Ship arrive, which I thought to be one of the Kings that came before to acquaint us with the hour of his arrival; but it was not ſo, for that Ship ſuffering Shipwrack, we wondered one day when I was in Eliſa's Chamber, to ſee the whole Navy appear: Since I ſpied it the firſt, I could not chuſe but expreſs my joys, by acquainting Eliſa with it: Come Madam, ſaid I unto her, come and triumph over the Conquerour of others, and fully enjoy your Victory.

She bluſhed at my words, and we no ſooner went to the Balcony, but we diſcerned the Fleet, and preſently after, we diſcovered how all the Ships had their ornaments of victory: We ſaw a thouſand Flags waving in amongſt the Cordage, as many flames flaſhing, the Ships were ſet round with colours gained from the Enemies, and all the Decks ſhined with gold and ſilver: But that which moſt ſurprized Eliſa and me, when the Fleet came nearer, was to perceive all theſe Flags and Pennons, in lieu of being of ſeveral colours, as they uſe in combat or in Triumph, were all of one dusky dark colour mixed with gold and ſilver, ſuch as is uſed in the Funeral ceremonies of Kings: The ſight of this made us begin to tremble, but our admiration augmented, when coming nearer the place where we were, we could diſtinctly perceive, that the Captain who had more ornaments than the reſt of the Ships, had upon his Deck a great Coffin placed upon a half part of three ſtairs, and that this Coffin was covered with black cloth, wrought with gold, upon which was placed a Crown, and a magnificent Sword, and at the head of this Coffin a Trophy elevated, to ſignifie, that he who died and was in the Coffin, died in triumphing, a hundred lighted Lamps hung round about the Deck: The Kings chief Officers were in mourning, and waited round about the Coffin: This ſight cauſed extream ſorrow in Eliſa's heart and mine; a doleful muſick was heard from every Ship, which by its lamentable tone ſpoke the King of Phenicia to be dead: All the Ships gained from the enemy followed this Captain, but without any Flags, Pennons, Banners, or Ornaments to ſignifie their defeat; the Souldiers in them were chained upon the Decks of the Ships, to honour the Funeral Pomp of that illuſtrious Conquerour. To be ſhort Madam, it was the King of Phenicia who was dead of his ſlight hurt, which he had commanded me to conceal from the Queen and Eliſa when he ſent me to carry the news of his Victory: Doubtleſs you will ask me Madam how it was poſſible, that a wound which permitted this Prince to write unto the Queen and Eliſa, and which did hardly trouble him, ſhould cauſe his death ſo ſuddenly: But I ſhall anſwer, that the Dart which had been poyſoned, as it was known after my departure, and the venom having not diſperſed its malignity when I came from him, he did not ſeem to be ſo much as ill; but as ſoon as I had left him, the venom reached his heart, and he died within twenty four hours after: He was no ſooner dead, but his Lieutenant General diſpatched a Ship for Tire, to bring this ſad news: Mean while, he caſt anchor near a great Town not far off his Road, purpoſely to give orders for all things neceſſary to honour the Funeral Pomp of the King his Maſter: But, as I told you, the Ship which ſhould have preceded the Fleet, being Shipwracked, none were advertiſed of the Kings death, nor of the Navies approach. After this Madam, you may eaſily imagine, how Eliſa and I were amazed and grieved; for though the ſoul of Eliſa was not ingaged in any paſſion to this Prince, yet ſince ſhe was of a generous diſpoſition, and ſenſible of benefits, it was impoſſible ſhe ſhould look upon the Coffin of this Prince, whom ſhe had ſeen ſo reſpective at her feet, with a dry eye, or tranquile ſoul : And when the Captain of the Ship came under her Window, ſhe haſtily retired, as not being able to endure ſo ſad an object ; yet notwithſtanding her retirement, her ſorrows encreaſed when the Ship came into the Port, and the people who were crowded to render honour unto their victorious and living King, did cry out moſt dolorouſly, when they knew that their Prince was dead : The noiſe of ſuch a clamour was ſo great, that the Chamber of Eliſa ſeemed to ſhake, and it was long before we could make our complaints, becauſe we could not hear each other : 'Tis true, our tears did ſpeak our ſorrows, and we ſaid many things in ſaying nothing: But at laſt our tongues were ſad expreſſors of our loſſes, yet it was not ſuddenly, for Eliſa.deſiring to know all particulars of his death, willed me to go out and inform my ſelf. But this is not pertinent to my diſcourſe, let me only tell you Madam, that the laſt words of the dying King was with the name of Eliſa, which did not leſſen the grief of this fair and virtuous Lady. As ſhe was moved only out of her generoſity, ſo Straton grieved out of intereſt and gratitude both, for all his hopes were quaſhed and could not expect that from the new King which he hoped for from the other. Never was a more general mourning then this,never was a greater conſternation then ſeemed to be amongſt the people, and never did change of Prince cauſe ſuch an alteration in private fortunes.

During this confuſed unſettledneſs and trouble which was in the Court, Straton went into the Country, and carried Eliſa with him, who was glad of ſuch a ſolitude to hide her melancholy, and where ſhe was pleaſed I ſhould ſometimes come and ſee her : But during this time, Dipœnus and Scillis, having moved the Kings Officers for what the late King had promiſed unto them,and theſe Officers, perhaps without acquainting the King, having repulſed them, they imbarqued in the night,and carried away with them the rare Statue which they had made,and which they ſaid was an abſolute miracle.In the mean time,as it is the cuſtom to mourn for the death of a King,ſo it is alſo the cuſtom to rejoyce with him who is to ſucceed;and as publick ſorrows never laſt long, ſo a calm began ſuddenly to appear in the Court, and things were ſettled as before : As for Eliſa, though ſhe was not of an humour to paſs ſo quickly from ſorrows unto joyes, yet out of reaſon and wiſdome ſhe rowzed up her ſelf; and ſince her heart was not ingaged in any particular affection, her ſorrows were more eaſily comforted : Straton then returning unto Tire, Eliſa returned alſo; and ſince ſhe had never ſeen the Queen ſince the Kings death,ſhe went to her as ſoon as ſhe had got into a habit of mourning. Never was the Court ſo full as now, there was not a man of any quality in all Phenicia who was not there at Tire; So that when Eliſa was with the Queen, with a Princeſs who loved her very well, ſhe met with the applauds of all the Grandees in the Court and Realm : For indeed Madam,the mourning which Eliſa wore for that renowned Conquerour, did ſo very well become her, that without doubt it helped her to conquer many hearts which were not yet ſubjected; that black and plain dreſs,that vail hanging down to the ground over her fair hair, that plated Tiffiny about her fair Neck and tyed with ſeveral black Ribbons, like a Scarf, thoſe turned up ſleeves, which let the whiteneſs of her arms appear, and all her ſad habit, which gave a more freſh luſtre to her eyes,and was as a foil unto the freſhneſs of her complexion, all of theſe were ſo advantageous unto her, that her greateſt adorers confeſſed, they never ſaw her ſo fair; and they preſſed ſo that day to ſee her, that one could hardly paſs through the Chamber unto the Queen, who did treat her according to her merits. Amongſt that croud of gallants, there was one that day with the Queen, whoſe name was Poligenes, who was one of the moſt conſiderable men in our Court, both for his quality and merit, who being a great friend of Stratons, and one of the prime Admirours of Eliſa, was raviſhed with joy at the acclamations which were attributed to her Beauty, yet he thought that this his joy was as much an effect of that friendſhip which he held with the Father, as the love which he bore the Daughter; for having ſeen her in the Cradle,and uſed in her infancy to ſpeak unto her,as if he had been her Brother,alſo had given her a hundred adviſements in divers accidents, he could not believe he was in Love with her; yet it was not long before he did perceive it, as I ſhall hereafter tell you: Amongſt this multitude of men of Quality, who were then at Court, there was one of Sidon, called Phocilion, who having never ſeen Eliſa before, was ſo ſurprized and charmed, that he could not talk of any thing elſe: He did not content himſelf with looking upon her whileſt ſhe was with the Queen, but he followed her when ſhe went out as far as her Coach, afterwards he came in again unto the Queen, and mixing with the company of three or four, whereof Poligenes was one, he began to extol the beauty of Eliſa very highly, asking where ſhe lodged? who uſed to viſit her often? and who could carry him thither? Poligenes, who till now was glad of the praiſes which were attributed unto Eliſa, began to think ſtrange at thoſe which Phocilion gave her, for he was very handſom, and he told this freſh Adorer of Eliſa, that the houſe of Straton was not now ſo open and free, as it was wont to be in the time of the late King, and therefore he would not adviſe him to court his new acquaintance; adding further, that ſince he was a Sidonian, it was not convenient for him to ſee ſuch a dangerous perſon in Tire; yet for all this, his perſwaſions would not work upon Phocilion, for which he was very ſorry: So that calling himſelf to an account, he found, that certainly the affection which he bore unto Eliſa, was of another nature then he imagined: But before I acquaint you Madam with the progreſs of this Love, it is requiſite I acquaint you what kind of man the lover was. Poligenes was doubtleſs deſcended from a very illuſtrious family, and out of a houſe more noble then that of Eliſa, his perſon was very handſom, he was rich and neat in his habit, and never any had a more Polite and facetious wit then he, Courtſhip and gallantry were qualities born with him, civility was inſeparable from him, and though he was of a little too ſerious compoſition, yet he was not melancholy; but on the contrary, his converſation was very pleaſing: 'Tis true, he was a little reſerved and particular, and never ſpoke in any of thoſe tumultuous converſations, where there was much company: if he was at any time to give a treatment, he would do it with ſo good a grace, in ſuch order, and ſo neatly, that one would believe it coſt him half as much more as it did;and in any thing which he under took,either Races, Muſicks, Balls, Walks, or Feaſts, he always had ſomething extraordinary and rare, ſo that all unanimouſly did give him the reputation of the neateſt of men, and it may well be ſaid, that all the ſpruce youths of the Court came not neer him : Poligenes was about thirty five years of age when the late King of Phenicia died, although he ſeemed not to be above twenty and eight : He had a Brother much younger than himſelf, but he was not then at Tire; Poligenes being as I have deſcribed, did not mix himſelf with the youth of the Court, which made ſuch a crowd upon Eliſa, as if he were their Rival; but on the contrary, he behaved himſelf as the friend of Straton and his Daughter, not but that he did commend her with a better grace then they, and was as full of his expreſſions of gallantry, but it was in a way more ſubtil, and by not profeſſing the Gallant he was more Courtly than they : Since he knew the ſharpneſs of Eliſa's humour, he carried it ſo as he perſwaded her, that whatſoever he ſaid, were only effects of that Gallantry which proceeded from his natural Genius; ſo that Eliſa not ſuſpecting he had any particular deſign upon her, lived with him in much confidence, and as if he were her brother : The better to palliate his own thoughts, Poligenes would ſomtimes give her advice, either in acquainting her what was ſaid of her, or in adviſing her to rid her ſelf of ſome who viſited her, craftily chuſing thoſe whom he feared moſt prejudicial to him : Eliſa thinking him well intentioned towards her, thought her ſelf exceedingly obliged to him for his behaviour to her, and his advice, though ſhe would be her own Governour, nor was ſhe of too eaſie a belief, yet ſhe lived with him in a moſt obliging manner : So that whil'ſt ſhe made all thoſe to deſpair whom ſhe thought her Lovers, Poligenes whom ſhe thought only her friend, received a thouſand teſtimonies of eſteem and friendſhip. In the mean time, Phocilion notwithſtanding the advice of Poligenes, found out a way by the help of a friend to be carried unto Eliſa, and being handſome and of a good ſpirit, alſo being of good quality, and a very compleat man, Straton entertained him very well, and the better, becauſe he looked upon him as one who might in reaſon think of a Marriage with his Daughter, for he knew very well, that all thoſe Princes and Grand Seigniors who had loved her, would not marry her. As for Eliſa ſhe looked upon him as a compleat man, and never looked further: for in the humour ſhe was, marriage was no part of her inclination. Phocilion being diſcreet and wiſe, having a ſweet and pleaſing wit, and never ſpeaking any thing unto Eliſa, which might give her the leaſt cauſe to ſhun his company, he courted hers, and he preſently got that pleaſing familiarity with her which ſhe allowed to her friends, and denied to her Lovers. Poligenes upon whom Phocilion caſt a ſhadow, imployed all his Stratagems to put him out of Eliſa's favour: Sometimes he would tell her, he was but a Ruſtick, other whiles, that if ſhe had any thoughts of Marriage, it ſhould be one of a better Rank, and that ſhe might the ſooner take his counſel, he would ſpeak ſometimes very well of Phocilion, whom he feared more than all the reſt: For ſince he was well acquainted with the high virtue of Eliſa, he did much leſs fear the Princes who loved her than Phocilion, whoſe condition and quality being more equal unto hers, might permit him to look upon her as a man whom ſhe might innocently Love: But notwithſtanding all his adviſes, he could not perſwade Eliſa to his wiſh; and knowing her to be imperious, and that perhaps he might anger her if he aſſumed any authority over her, he durſt not be further importunate: However, his ſoul enjoyed her uſual ſerenity for ſome time after; for ſince Phocilion was not forward, and ſince his deſign upon Eliſa was not a ſimple deſign of Gallantry, but of Marriage, he did not tranſact as other Lovers did, but carried it with much leſs noyſe, becauſe he was not ſorry to obſerve the carriage of Eliſa amidſt ſo many Adorers before ſhe would declare her ſelf: So that negotiating as the friend of Straton, Poligenes did a little reaſſure himſelf, and alſo came to be very friendly with Phocilion, who having obſerved that Poligenes was in Eliſa's favour, took a ſpecial care not to be upon any ill terms with him.

As there is no manner of mourning ſo ſoon paſſed over as that of the Court, eſpecially where a young Prince ſucceeds an old King, ſo pleaſure now began to bud out in Tire, where they began to make many magnificent Feaſts, of which Eliſa was the faireſt ornament.

There was alſo divers games of Prize to be played, and I remember one which conduced much to the glory of Eliſa, and which procured her the hatred of many beauties: For imagine Madam, that thoſe who won the Prize that day were to carry it unto Eliſa, out of the extream deſire they had to pleaſe her, and to get ſome honour in her preſence. Thoſe three Princes Rivals whereof I ſpoke, and who were Brothers and Rivals both, were in the number of thoſe who were to lay at her feet thoſe marks of advantage which they had won: But it was moſt admirable to ſee, with what modeſt pride Eliſa refuſed what they preſented unto her, and with what repugnancy ſhe obeyed Straton, who commanded her to accept their offerings. Poligenes, who was one of thoſe who brought the Prize, was yet received more favourably than the reſt, becauſe ſhe feared not in him thoſe conſequences which ſhe apprehended in thoſe who were her declared Lovers; yet I am confident, that for all her fury, ſhe was not ſorry for receiving an honour that day, which none but her ſelf ever had, yet ſhe did hide her ſatisfaction ſo well, that ſhe returned home with ſo little ſign of joy, as if ſhe never thought upon it. The next morning, all thoſe who ſhared in her glory went to viſit her, to teſtifie that they were very glad of the honour which ſhe had received; but they found that ſhe had a ſoul ſo infinitely above all that can be phraſed vanity, that they judged her more worthy of a Crown than the Prize they had offered, not but that ſhe received their applauds with a ſubmiſſive modeſty; but on the contrary, it was with ſuch a proud and fierce humility, (if it may be ſaid) as made it apparent, that ſhe found more ſatisfaction in her ſelf, than in the praiſes of another, not but that ſhe did love the commendations of her friends, but ſhe would have their commendations to be real ſigns of that eſteem which thoſe who commend her have of her, and that they be worthy who give her any ſuch applauds: As for thoſe tumultuous Encomiums which are given out of cuſtom or decency, they did more vex than pleaſe her ; and I have ſeen her receive them ſo fiercely, as ſhe hath been ready to convert her love into hatred againſt thoſe who gave them, and truly it is not ſtrange ſhe ſhould; for beſides her natural humour of fierceneſs, and cholor, Poligenes did much contribute unto it ; and I am confident that he would commend this Spirit of fierceneſs in her, a hundred times more than her beauty, voice, or wit : I remember one day amongſt the reſt, when none but Poligenes, Phocilion, and I were with Eliſa, and beginning to commend her generoſity in loving to do good offices unto her friends, we fell inſenſibly to repeat one after another all the excellent qualites which ſhe was owner of, though ſhe endeavoured to make us change our diſcourſe : Since you will needs have me endure your Panigyricks (ſaid ſhe, ſeeing we ſtill went on) I pray do me the favour to tell me of my faults that I may amend them : For my part, ſaid Phocilion, I cannot find any but one which I can deſire ſhould be mended, which is, that you are a little too ſcornful : For my part, replied Poligenes, I think, and could rather wiſh ſhe were not ſo ſweetly familiar ; for I do profeſs unto you, that if there were a neceſſity Eliſa ſhould loſe any one of thoſe qualities which renders her ſo admirable, I would let any of them go, rather than her ſcornful and haughty way of demeanour : How, (ſaid I with admiration, and looked upon Poligenes) do you prefer the pride of Eliſa before any other of the good qualities which ſhe is owner of? I beſeech you conſider well what I ſay, (replied he) and do not think I ſpeak without reaſon : I muſt confeſs replied Phocilion, that my reaſon reacheth not ſo far, nor can I underſtand how it ſhould be poſſible you can conſent that Eliſa ſhould part with the leaſt good quality ſhe hath, rather than that pride and ſcorn, which addeth an ingredient of fear, to be mixed with the Love of thoſe who profeſs any affection to her : For my part (ſaid Eliſa and laughed) I am ſo glad to find any one who will commend a fault which I cannot mend in my ſelf, as I cannot ſufficiently expreſs my obligation unto Poligenes for it : I aſſure you Madam, replied he, you need never thank me for a thought which I cannot chuſe but think: But I beſeech you, ſaid Phocilion, what is the motive which prompts you to affect this pride in Eliſa, which blemiſheth all the reſt of her virtues? It is, replied he, becauſe thereby her heart is not eaſily conquered; and as I am fully perſwaded, (ſpeaking in a kind of railery) that it is not my deſtiny to make that illuſtrious Conqueſt, ſo I am very glad, that there is ſomething in the ſpirit of Eliſa which may hinder others from it as well as my ſelf; and to ſpeak in reaſon, there is nothing that better becomes any high beauty, than this noble Pride, yet I muſt needs ſay, that this humour does not ſuit handſomly with every one, for there is requiſite a thouſand good qualities, to produce thoſe pleaſing effects which I ſpeak of, and it muſt be a high Beauty that muſt ſet it off, for Beauty only is not enough, but a high ſpirit and a great heart are eſſentially requiſite; and I am perſwaded, that the haughtineſs of a fair fool hath ſuch a near reſemblance of Pride, and comes ſo near a kind of fooliſh idle vanity, as it doth much misbecome them, and renders them inſufferable: I know that if this perſon who hath this loftineſs of behaviour, have not alſo a great and generous heart, ſhe will be bitter, and tart, and ſurly in lieu of being ſtately, this I do not wiſh to be in any accompliſhed perſon: Sullenneſs and Statelineſs are two different things, the firſt is Ugly, the other is Majeſtical, the one a ſign of a melancholly Spirit, the other of a great and noble Soul: Yes, the ſtatelineſs which I ſpeak of is a ſpark of Divinity, which diſtinguiſheth thoſe who are ſo from the common herd of people, which makes them feared, and reſpected of thoſe who love them, and which without the leaſt incivility, forbids too much familiarity with thoſe who are ſo ſtately, and which quality I do every day admire in Eliſa; and therefore wonder not that I ſhould deſire her to part with any other quality than with this noble Pride, which I ſo much love in her, and which alſo hath rendred you ſo good offices: To me, replied Phocilion, for heavens ſake do not offer to perſwade me that I am any Debtor unto the haughtineſs of Eliſa: Indeed you are, replied Poligenes, for can you think, that ſhe being ſo fair, ſo amiable, and ſo much adored as ſhe is, her heart would have been at this time to diſpoſe of, if ſhe had not been as ſtately and majeſtical as ſhe is? for if ſhe had been ſo affable and ſweet, as you ſeem to deſire her, ſhe could never have ſeen ſo many denied Suitors at her feet, without having pity upon ſome one of them, inſomuch as when you came unto Tire, and courted her acquaintance, you would have found her heart ingaged, whereas now you find it free, and ſo diſingaged from any affection, as the moſt paſſionate of all her Lovers cannot find in her behaviour the leaſt cauſe of any jealouſie: 'Tis true, replied Phocilion, but on the other ſide, they cannot find any foundation of hope: Yes, replied Poligenes, very much, ſince there is no fear that any will be more happy than your ſelf: But I beſeech you (ſaid Eliſa, and interrupted them) wherein does this ſtatelineſs you ſpeak of conſiſt? I pray tell me, that I may know how to be more or leſs lofty, as occaſions ſhall be offered? Is it in the Aire of my viſage that it appears? or in all my actions in general? Is it in my words? Or in the accent of my voice? It is in ſomething which I cannot define, replied Poligenes; For truly, you are more civil than many others, who paſs for more ſweet and affable than they are; you are eſſentially good, you are ready to do all good offices to your friends with an excellent grace: Alſo upon ſome occaſions you are pityful and tender, but with all theſe you are high-minded and ſtately, as I would have you to be; and to ſay truly, I think that this brave and noble Pride, hath its ſource from the root of your heart, and from thence it paſſeth into your Spirit, into your eyes, into your face, and into all your actions and words: Since ſo (ſaid Eliſa then) I muſt be as long as I live the very ſame I am at this preſent, for I muſt needs confeſs unto you, that I would not change my heart for any others: Though your highneſs of behaviour ſhould make you have no other thought but that, replied Poligenes, yet I ſhould for ever love it; for as I ſaid before, I ſhould not be ſorry if others cannot enjoy that thing, which I cannot my ſelf enjoy.

Phocilion was not yet ſatisfied with the reaſons of Poligenes, but this diſcourſe laſted ſo long, that night ſummoned us to leave Eliſa, who doubtleſs was gladder to ſee her ſtatelineſs commended, then any other Quality, for ſhe heard every one applaud her beauty, her voice, and her Spirit, and ſometimes ſhe met with ſome who found fault with her ſtatelineſs, and extreamly complained againſt it. This was the ſtate of things Madam, when the Brother of Poligenes, whom I told you was travelling in Greece, returned unto Tire: He was then about four and twenty years of age, and there being ſuch a difference of of age between Poligenes and him, he reſpected him almoſt as his Father; and indeed Poligenes took as great a care of Agenor, as if he were his Son; he was therefore extreamly glad to ſee him ſo handſom, and pleaſing every way; and I aſſure you Madam, a man could not be more handſom then he was; he was not only handſom and of a good garb, but he was alſo exceeding agile in all the exerciſes of his body, eſpecially in dancing. Moreover, he had an admirable wit, but it was a merry and diverting wit, which infinitely pleaſed all companies. Moreover, he was the apteſt of all men to make ſecrets, to diſcover thoſe of others, and to hid his own when he would: 'Tis true, this humour laſted not long, nor took him oft, for he had a vanity, which cauſed that he could not be loved, without deſiring it ſhould be known; yet the paſſions of his ſoul were very violent, but vanity would not permit them to be ſtrong in his heart; and certainly, if Agenor had not this fault, he had been much more amiable in the eyes of thoſe he loved then he was: For as for others, except his Rivals, he was the ſweeteſt and civil of men towards them, his vanity being only confieſted unto his Gallantries. Agenor being ſuch a one as I have deſcribed he returned to Tire, whileſt Straton, Barcea, and Eliſa were gone for fifteen daies into the Country. In the interim, Poligenes ſhewed his Brother all the Court, who got in it extraordinary reputation, eſpecially among the Ladies. In the mean while, Agenor, having a ſoul naturally diſpoſed unto Gallantry, could not live without a buſineſs of that nature; he applyed himſelf unto one of the Queens women named Lyriope, one both of beauty and merit, but of envious and revenging ſpirit, ſuch as would not permit her ſelf to be at reſt: Indeed Lyriope looked upon any thing that was advantageous unto any of her companions with a ſpiteful eye;and I believe ſhe never ſaw a good face, but ſhe had ill reſt all that day. : I think alſo that ſhe wiſhed her ſelf fair and brown both at once,that ſhe had both black and grey , and indeed to be all that others were, yet be what ſhe her ſelf was alſo. Lyriope was not only envious at the beauty of others and their Conqueſts, but at their very cloaths alſo, not enduring any ſhould have more riches, nor better made then her ſelf, without extream regret : You may then imagine Madam, that a woman of this humour was extreamly joyed, that a man whom all the Court moſt talked of, and of greateſt bravery, ſhould apply himſelf to ſerve her, and to make choice of her amongſt a Court full of beauties ; ſo that fearing leſt this Conqueſt ſhould eſcape her, ſhe reſolved to joyn her endeavours unto her charms, and retain by ſome light favours what her beauty had gotten : But Lyriope was miſtaken in her reaſon at this time, for I am perſwaded, that if her heart had been harder to conquer, ſhe had kept her conqueſt longer : However, this gallantry made a great noiſe in the world ; for as ſoon as it was ſaid that Agenor loved Lyriope, it was alſo ſaid Lyriope did not hate Agenor ; ſo that when Eliſa returned out of the Country nothing elſe was talked of.

She was no ſooner returned unto Tire,but all the Court came to her, ſo as Agenor wondered, that he could hardly find a man that day in all his viſits, yet it was not long before he knew the reaſon, for going at night unto the Queens lodging he underſtood by the diſcourſe of the Gallants in the Court,that Eliſa was the cauſe of the ſolitude he found in every place:Some ſaid ſhe was returned fairer,then when ſhe went away,and that the Country Air had purified her complexion,others ſaid,ſhe was grown taller,others affirmed her to be ſomething leſs proud,or at leaſt,their joyes to ſee her at Tire again, made her ſeem more ſweet and affable;others who heard her ſing,ſaid and ſwore ſhe had learned ſome Muſick of the Nightingals in the Country,maintaining ſhe never ſung ſo well as now.

Agenor hearing theſe commendations of Eliſa asked Lyriope whether ſhe deſerved them or no:But ſhe,according to her envious humour made a deſcription which out-vied envy it ſelf; ſhe told him, that Eliſa's eyes were ſo great, and ſtaring, as would affright him, that her complexion was ſo high as it was an abſolute red, and that ſhe was ſo arrogant and proud, as that ſhe was even dogged and ſurley; ſo that detracting from Eliſa all her beauty and good qualities, ſhe made her Picture nothing like her. I chancing to be preſent at this diſcourſe of Lyriope, could not chuſe but contradict her, and hate her alſo: I beſeech you Sir, ſaid I unto Agenor, do me the favour to ſuſpend your judgment of Eliſa, until you have ſeen her, which ſhall be ere long, for I am a witneſs how ſhe chid Poligenes, for not bringing you to her houſe this day, telling him, that ſhe did not believe, being his friend ſo much as ſhe was, he would have had a Brother ſo much accompliſhed as reports ſpeak you, and not make her acquainted with him. Agenor hearing me ſay ſo, did eaſily apprehend that Lyriope ſpake enviouſly of Eliſa's Beauty; for though he was in Love with her, yet he doted not, and though ſhe had touched his heart, yet ſhe had not got it: However, he carried the matter, as if he had moſt zealouſly loved her, and therefore he asked her leave in a low voice to ſee Eliſa, which ſhe durſt not deny him.

Agenor having leave to ſee Eliſa, he was no ſooner returned home to his Brother where he lodged, but he went unto his Chamber, to ſee whether he would acquaint him with Eliſa's deſire of bringing him unto her, as I had told him, but he wondered to ſee Poligenes not ſpeak a word unto him concerning her; yet none had ever told Agenor that his Brother was in Love, he imputed it unto his oblivion: So as he reſolved to acquaint him with what he knew, Poligenes was much ſurprized at his Brothers diſcourſe; and the truth was, it was not his forgetfulneſs of what the fair Eliſa ſaid unto him, which reſtrained him from acquainting his Brother with it; but the true reaſon was, becauſe he was not yet fully reſolved whether he ſhould be glad of that acquaintance or no: Yet notwithſtanding, ſince Agenor ſeemed to be much in Love with Lyriope, he reſolved upon it, nor did he well ſee how he could prevent it; therefore deſiring his Brother to excuſe his forgetfulneſs of the honour which Eliſa did him, he promiſed to carry him thither the next morning:

ing : But to be a little better aſſured of the buſineſs, he would pump out his thoughts of Lyriope, to ſee whether it were to be hoped that his paſſion to her would keep him from any thoughts of Eliſa : Brother (ſaid he unto him and ſighed) are you not afraid to make the fair Lyriope jealous, by ſeeming ſo earneſt of Eliſa's acquaintance? Since ſhe cannot think me in Love with one I know not, replied Agenor, I had no ſuch apprehenſions, nor ſhall I render this viſit without her leave : And indeed Agenor, told him upon what terms he was with Lyriope ; and after he had cauſed him to promiſe fidelity unto the confidence he put in him, he let him know that Lyriope did willingly permit him to ſpeak of his paſſion, that ſhe had not forbid him to hope, that he had already writ ſeveral Letters unto her, that indeed ſhe had not returned any anſwers , but it was only becauſe ſhe durſt not truſt the meſſenger, that not a day paſſed whereon ſhe did not give him an occaſion to ſee and ſpeak to her, that ſhe did always acquaint him with the places where the Queen intended to be, to the end he might be there, and that indeed he had ſome reaſon to think himſelf not hated : I aſſure you Brother, replied Poligenes, you have much reaſon to think ſhe loves you, and I am very glad of it : For indeed (ſaid he craftily) beſides that Lyriope is very fair, and the Conqueſt cannot chuſe but be very pleaſing and glorious unto you, you will alſo ſatisfie your ambition as well as your Love , ſince certainly Lyriope is much more in the Queens favour then all the world believes : I know ſome private reaſons which I cannot acquaint you with, (ſaid he, though he had none) that do oblige me to perſwade you unto a careful conſervation of what you got, and to cheriſh the affection of Lyriope. After this, Poligenes thinking himſelf as ſecure as he could deſire, parted from Agenor, who being to viſit a perſon of ſuch extraordinary merit, of whom ſuch high reports were famed, he ordered his ſervant the next morning to give him a Sute of cloaths which he affected, and which indeed did admirably well become him ; for it was neither too plain nor too gaudy, but the colours and trimming ſuited ſo well, as it was very handſom to the eye. Agenor, neglecting nothing which might ſet himſelf off, with the moſt advantage, went to Poligenes as ſoon as it was convenient time to viſit, and claimed his promiſe, which indeed he kept without any repugnancy; imagining that ſince Lyriope was ſo kind, he would not be ſo perfidious to her, as to change for one whoſe Conqueſt ſeemed impoſſible : So that without further delay he went with Agenor unto Eliſa, ſprucing himſelf ſo up that his Brother ſhould not look younger than himſelf; And to ſpeak the truth, the choice was very hard to be made, not but there was a difference between theſe two brothers almoſt in every thing, but yet the difference was without any inequality of merit, both of them having the eſteem of moſt accompliſhed men : The Maxims of Poligenes and Agenor in point of gallantry were very oppoſite unto each other : For Poligenes ſaid, that one ought never to declare his love openly, until he had ſome aſſurance of being beloved : Agenor on the contrary maintained that he ought not to hide the paſſion of his ſoul one minute from her that was the cauſe of it ; And indeed Agenor did not ſpeak this out of a bare humor of gallantry, but did ever ſo expreſs himſelf : Poligenes, for his part, he would be a cloſe Lover until he had aſſurance of reciprocal affection; and therefore finding in the ſpirit of Eliſa marks only of eſteem, and no diſpoſition unto ſuch an affection as he deſired, neither to him nor any other, he ſilently adored her, tho with an unmeaſurable paſſion, hoping ſtill that this reſpective friendſhip would at laſt convert it ſelf into love, maugre her intentions.

But to return where I was; Poligenes and Agenor were betimes at the Houſe of Straton, when no company but my ſelf was there, ſo that I only was the witneſs of this firſt enterview : Since Eliſa was after at the Chamber of Straton than in that of Barcea, becauſe of her fantaſtical humors, it was there where Poligenes preſented his Brother Agenor unto the Father and the Daughter, both whom received them with much civility. After the firſt Complement, Straton having ſome buſineſs with Poligegenes, carryed him out of the Chamber, and left Agenor with Eliſa and me This Beauty was that day in ſuch an advantagious dreſs, as it is no wonder if the Luſter of her beauty dazled the eyes of Agenor. Since ſhe had no intentions of going abroad, her dreſs was as Ladies uſe when they keep their Chambers; but yet as one who would be ſeen, and not as one who was ſick, her habit was blew trimmed with Silver; her hair was part braided up behind with Pearls and blew Ribands, and part hung negligently down upon her neck, on which ſhe wore a Necklace of Diamonds ſet in Gold enamel'd black: Moreover, ſince Chance would have Agenor ſee her with ſome extraordinary delight,ſhe did ſit upon a Cuſhion of Carnation Tinſel; ſo that this Carnation and this blew did caſt ſuch pleaſant reflectionof colours upon the cheeks of Eliſa that her beauty appeared in full advantage of luſtre: So as the light being full in her face, ſhe appeared as ſhe was, fair enough to make an infidel of Agenor, who did ſit juſt oppoſite to thoſe eyes which had made ſo many Conqueſts: We were no ſooner ſet, but Eliſa begun the Diſcourſe: I do aſſure you Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, I can hardly pardon Poligenes for the injury he hath done me in making me no ſooner acquainted with you, ſince he hath deprived me of a pleaſure which I know not how to recover. It is my part Madam, to complain againſt him (replied Agenor,) and not yours; but tho it were ſo that the ſight of me does not diſpleaſe, yet ſince I have the honour to ſee you now, I know not why you ſhould ſay Poligenes hath deprived you of a pleaſure which you cannot recover. The Reaſon is (ſaid ſhe and laughed) becauſe I have an extream deſire and delight to hear the diſcourſe of thoſe who have travelled, eſpecially you who are returned from a place of moſt exquiſite Politeneſs. Provided Madam you will permit me (replyed he and ſmiled) after I have told you what I have ſeen excellent in Greece, to ſpeak alſo of what I have found moſt rare here, I ſhall promiſe you to ſatisfie your curioſity. Perhaps you may think (replyed ſhe craftily) that I think you will not take ſo much pains as to tell me what Beauties there are about the Queen. I mean not of about the Queen,replied he; and when I asked permiſſion to ſpeak of all the Beauties I found to be fair here, I did not intend that this word here ſhould extend it ſelf further then this very Chamber wherein you are. However it be, ſaid ſhe, I pray do me the favour to tell me, whether the Ladies are as fair in Greece, as they are fam'd to be? That beauty Madam, replied he, is certainly moſt admirable: But if you had been as now you are, when I parted from Phenicia or, as young as then you were, had I had the honour to have ſeen you, I ſhould not have been guilty of a thouſand Injuries which I have done you during my Travels: For truly Madam I muſt needs ingeniouſly confeſs, I have ſworn a thouſand times unto a thouſand Ladies, both at Corinth, Athens, Argos, Thebes, and Sparta, that there was not one in all Phenicia which was comparable unto their Beauties. But to repair the injury I have done, I beſeech you Madam give me leave, that as I have told this extream untruth unto a thouſand Greeks, ſo I may tell you alſo as often in real truth, that you alone are fairer then all they together. Tho what you ſay were true (replyed Eliſa in railary) yet I ſhould not be obliged unto you for telling me one thing ſo often; and to ſpeak truly (added ſhe, and turned towards a great Glaſs upon her right hand) I need but look once upon my ſelf to confute all you have told me. Oh Madam (ſaid Agenor, and looking in the Glaſs alſo) if you will but believe your own eyes, you will believe my words. Whileſt they were in this Diſcourſe, and I harkened unto it, I obſerved that Poligenes, who was walking in the other end of the Chamber with Straton, gave no great heed unto what he ſaid unto him, bat on the contrary liſtened with a jealous ear unto the talk of Eliſa and Agenor, eſpecially when they walked neereſt where we were; yet I thought his reaſon was only a bare curioſity to know whether Agenor was pleaſed with the Diſcourſe; and I confeſs I had thoſe thoughts of a Brother which ſhould have been unto a Lover: However, ſince they did often paſs from a ſerious diſcourſe upon a pleaſant, and from a pleaſant unto a ſerious; Eliſa chiding him for his extolling her beauty very ſharply, and Agenor obſtinate in his applauds of it, their diſcourſe was very little of News either of the People or War: But Agenor, according to his maxim, highly extolling Eliſa, and not hiding his advantagious thoughts of her, he commended her to the Heavens, and that with much earneſtneſs: So that Eliſa, to make him change his diſcourſe, and to teſtifie ſhe knew how Lyriope had a ſhare in his heart; I pray tell me, ſaid ſhe unto me, whether Agenor uſe to commend all thoſe he talks with, with ſuch exceſs as he doth me? to the end I may know how to take all he ſays unto me: Since you have ſeen him with the Queen, you may eaſily give me this ſatisfaction; therefore I conjure you to tell me, what he ſaid unto all the Ladies he ſaw; then ſhe named many of the Ladies unto me, and amongſt the reſt, Lyriope. For my part Madam, replied I unto her, I never heard him commend any ſo much as you. How, ſaid ſhe, does he commend me more than he doth Lyriope? Oh Telamis, it cannot be: Yet it is very true, replied Agenor, that I never commended any ſo much as you. I perceive (anſwered ſhe) you do not believe I know that you are in love: But Agenor, I have better intelligence than you think I have; and the Report of Lyriope's Conqueſts did fly into the Country: And I muſt alſo tell you (added ſhe and laughed) that for my own glory I was very glad ſhe had made this Conqueſt before my return, becauſe now I cannot be upbraided for my inability to do it. People newly ſubjected (replied he and looked upon her) are oft-times very glad to revolt. Ah Agenor, replied ſhe, I would have no Subjects rebel againſt their firſt Maſters; and I am perſwaded the chains wherewith Lyriope hath captivated you, are ſo ſtrong, that though you would you cannot break them: However, I think you very bold in telling me that you commend me more than her. I confeſs Madam, replied he that you do a little puzzle me; yet I do conceive that without any injury unto Lyriope, I might ſay as much as I have done; for truly, ſaid he, I am of ſuch an humour, as I no ſooner perceive my ſelf to be in love, but I muſt immediately tell it: Alſo I conceive, that in ſaying one loves, one hath made a long ſpeech unto her he ſays it: nor will I anſwer that I can commend you long as I have done. This way of commending, replied Eliſa, ſhould never be my cuſtom; but Agenor, you have better expreſſed your ſelf than I imagined: However I muſt tell you, that I am very glad you are in love, becauſe I ſhall be more apt to contract friendſhip with you. I do know many perſons Madam, replied I, who will never contract any friendſhip with a man in love. If I had any ſecrets to keep, replied Eliſa, I believe I ſhould not ſay as I do: But all the friendſhip which I deſire with Agenor, is only a bare complacency, and a petty kind of exchange of indifferent ſecrets, which hardly can be termed ſecrets, which yet help very well to furniſh out diſcourſe, and for ſuch a friend, it is no matter if he be in love. Oh Madam, replied he, If I be not much miſtaken, you are a moſt dangerous friend. Poligenes hearing theſe laſt words, could not chooſe but draw nearer, and aſſure his Brother (whileſt Straton was talking with one of his men) that he was miſtaken in what he ſaid, ſince Eliſa was as good a friend as ſhe was a dangerous Miſtreſs.

As he ſpoke theſe words much company came in, which cauſed diſcourſe to be more general: However, tho firſt Viſits uſe not to be very long, yet Agenor continued his until night, and he grew as well acquainted with Eliſa, as if he had known her all his life: But when at night he went to the Queens Lodgings, he was put to a puzle how to render an account to Lyriope of his actions in the afternoon: As ſoon as ſhe ſaw him, ſhe obſerved that he had ſpruced up himſelf that day, and that he was finer than on the firſt dayes when he deſigned to pleaſe her: not but that he was alwaies very handſom; yet paſſionate people can ſpy day at a ſmall crany, and find a difference betwixt a natural neatneſs without deſign, and an extraordinary tricking up, which proceeds from ſome ſecret deſign: So that ſince Lyriope had not ſeen Agenor all that day, ſhe was extreamly deſirous to know where he had been: She no ſooner ſaw him but ſhe began to queſtion him, yet without any diſcovery of her thoughts, I pray Agenor tell me (ſaid ſhe unto him) how you have ſpent this day? and how comes it to paſs I have not ſeen you? I have been in an hundred places, and could not meet with any company, replied he, and at laſt Poligenes having promiſed Straton to bring me unto his houſe, would have me go along with him. Well Agenor (ſaid ſhe and bluſht) what think you of Eliſa? You made ſuch an ugly deſcription of her, replied he, that I believe it cauſed me to think her fair. The fate of this woman (replied this envious perſon) is very ſtrange; for I am perſwaded, that though they ſay every Nation hath a kind of beauty which is particular to it ſelf; ſome affecting the fair, others the black, and ſome the brown , others red; ſome would have tall and groſs, others little or of a mean ſtature; ſome one complexion and features, ſome an other: yet I do believe, that if all men from all parts in the world did ſee Eliſa, they would all conſent to commend her beauty. As ſhe was ſaying this in a low voice unto Agenor, one of thoſe who had been at the houſe of Straton, came into their company and asked Agenor (not knowing what he told Lyriope) whether he ſtayed long with Eliſa after he came away? But Agenor had no ſooner told him a confident lye, and ſaid he came away immediately after him, but another entered, who had ſtayed there late, and came away when he did, who asked Agenor, if ever he ſaw a fairer than Eliſa? And to drive him the more upon the Rock of a non-plus, a third came in, who knowing Agenor had never ſeen Eliſa before that day, and having ſeen him enter ſo ſoon after dinner, told him, that he did very well in making his viſit ſo long, and coming ſo timely to ſee the ſunſhine of Eliſa's beauty at the height of the day.

Lyriope no ſooner heard this, but ſhe bluſht for very ſhame, ſpite, and jealouſie, for ſhe plainly underſtood Agenor went to the houſe of Straton very timely, and was all the whole afternoon there; ſo that he told her a lye, when he ſaid he had been in a hundred places and could find no company. Then ſhe ſternly fixed her eyes upon his, as if ſhe did upbraid him with it; but he not being ignorant of the power he had over the heart of this Woman, did not much trouble himſelf at it, believing it no Herculean labour to make his peace; And indeed he uſed ſuch arguments as perſwaded her that ſhe was beholding to him for the lye he had told: For, ſaid he (as we underſtood afterwards) you may well imagine, that though I ſhould fall in love with Eliſa, and be an Infidel unto you, yet I could not in ſo ſhort a time become ſo deeply engaged, as to make a myſtery of a paſſion which yet had taken no root: But believe me, it was only my complacence unto Poligenes which moved me to ſo long a viſit; and my fear leſt you ſhould take it ill that I had been there all the day, moved me to invent and tell this lye: However (added he moſt craftily) I am very glad that I have diſcovered a ſpark of jealouſie in your ſoul, and as oft as I deſire to receive any new favour from you, I think it my beſt courſe to make a long viſit unto Eliſa. This is rather the way to loſe thoſe which you have already, replied ſhe: Ah Lyriope, ſaid he, I beſeech you know me a little better; and believe it, Rigors will never force me to repentance: 'Tis ſweetneſs only will reclaim me, if ever you think there be any fear of loſing me. Lyriope having a ſoul prepoſſeſſed with a violent paſſion, thought the beſt way to appeaſe Agenor was to oblige him: And being a Woman of more Wit than judgment, ſhe received his Reaſons as good, thinking that to keep him from turning Apoſtate, and loving Eliſa, her beſt courſe was to load him with new favours. As for all theſe petty trifles which make ſuch a bluſter in the world when they are known, ſhe was reſolved to granr them all unto Agenor, thinking thereby indiſſolvably to tie him unto her, to hinder him from loving Eliſa, and to oblige him to marry her: But all did not hit, as you ſhall perceive by the ſequel of the ſtory. In the mean time, ſince Eliſa went much abroad, though Agenor went not to her, yet he ſaw her every day; and ſince her compoſure was ſuch, as the more one looked, the more he liked and admired her; Agenor, who was able to judg who merited admiration, did perceive that admiration grew in his heart every time he ſaw her; Yet for a while he gave his heart the check, and bad reſiſtance unto the beauty of Eliſa; Yet when he began to be glutted with the favours of Lyriope, he began alſo to yield a little unto the darts of Eliſa; the eaſineſs of the one, and the difficulty of the other, did faint his deſires of Lyriope, and ſo kindle them of Eliſa; that he could not live and not look upon her: Yet he durſt not ſo ſoon appear an unfaithful Changeling, and therefore his viſits of Eliſa unknown unto Lyriope, put him to abundance of trouble. On the other ſide, Poligenes who had an obſervant eye over his Brother, perceived preſently that the over-indulgency of Lyriope did deaden his paſſion, ſo that he began extreamly to fear he would become his Rival. In the mean time Phocilion, finding every day more virtue in Eliſa, became ſo extreamly in Love with her, as he was reſolved to do all he poſſibly could to marry her. Since he was very rich, he doubted not but Straton would approve of his deſign, but he did not think it fit to acquaint him with it, without the permiſſion of Eliſa: He ſaw that this fair and wiſe Lady was very civil to him, and that ſhe ſeemed very much to eſteem him, but he ſaw her ſo far from any thought of ſuch a particular affection as he deſired, and his fears of denial ſo fainted his ſoul, that he could not reſolve to diſcover his deſign, But at laſt, after ſeveral viſits, with full intentions of ſpeaking to her, and durſt not, he took heart, and being one day alone with her, he determined to diſcover his long concealed thoughts. But being acquainted with her majeſtical haughtineſs, he endeavoured to find a way of doing it without incenſing her.
